I have not read the verſes he wrote on a Decree by which he was ruined, becauſe he was ſentenced by it to anſwer for a man, who had embezzled the King's money (25) (*), but I have a good opinion of thoſe lines, when I conſider that they are inſerted in a collection of Poems, in which there is a piece which deſerved the approbation of a witty and ſkilful judge, who is by no means laviſh of his commendations. One might add a third to them, ſays he (26), which is that Monſieur le Pays wrote an Encomium on Tobacco; which did no doubt contribute very much to raiſe the price of the farming of it, and to make it ſell better. He wrote two Poems on that barren ſubject, and he found the art of treating it in ſo graceful a manner, and extolling the virtues of tobacco ſo well, that that plant will henceforth appear among the flowers of Parnaſſus. To underſtand the beginning of this paſſage, it muſt be obſerved that the Author had already mentioned two other reaſons. I ſhall tranſcribe them here, becauſe they belong to the hiſtory of the perſon who is the ſubject of this article. "Beſides, the arguments drawn from "the merits of the cauſe, there are two other rea- "ſons, which, one would think, ought to have ſe- "cured Monſieur le Pays againſt ſo ſevere a ſentence. "The one is, that he is not grown rich, ſince thirty "years he has been concerned in the farming of the "King's Revenues: the other, that he is too much "a wit to meddle with the accounts and calculations "relating to the Finances." We may, I am ſure, conjecture, that a Poet who ſucceeded ſo well in the Encomium on Tobacco, deſcribing very elegantly in the ſame volume his reſentment againſt the injuſtice of ſo cruel a decree. A man's Muſe is never more eloquent, nor more lively, nor more fruitful in ſmart reflections, than on ſuch an occaſion. Theſe are not circumſtances, in which one muſt ſay, curæ leves loquuntur, ingentes ſtupent, a light grief breaks out into words, but a great vexation is ſilent. However, I leave it to them, who have read thoſe pieces, to judge whether we may ſay of Monſieur le Pays, what he wrote to a Count. "It were pity, Sir, you had "no grief. You know ſo well how to make an "agreeable uſe of it, and your letter to me contains "ſo lively a deſcription of it, that I ſhould be ſorry "now that you had carried the cauſe, which occa- "ſions your uneaſineſs. Neque Dii neque Deæ faciunt "ut te fortuna in deliciis habeat. Let neither the "Gods nor the Goddeſſes ſuffer you to be in fortune's fa- "vour. If I were Seneca, you ſhould be my Luci- "lius, and I would make you ſuch a Compliment. "And indeed, Sir, ſhould I not be in the right to "ſpeak thus to you, after reading the ſad and plea- "ſant things, which your pretended misfortune made "you write? .... Yes, Sir, your grief has diverted "me very much, becauſe you expreſs it ſo wittily, "that really you muſt not be much troubled with it. "For if you were overwhelmed with it, as you ſay, "you would not ſpeak of it in ſuch an eaſy and un- "concerned manner as you do (27)." Coſtar was very near of the ſame taſte. Here is but one thing, ſaid he (28), which the moſt ſevere Criticks can blame, in Monſieur de Balzac's complaints of his diſtempers and his misfortunes: It is that they are too eloquent and too elaborate. And indeed he makes uſe of ſo many witty thoughts, that he calls to my mind the player Apelles, who whilſt the Emperor Caligula had him whipped, cried in ſo harmonious a tone, that this wicked Prince, to enjoy the longer the pleaſure it gave him, cauſed the puniſhment of that unfortunate wretch to be continued (29). None but a Caligula could be capable of ſuch a barbarous action. But I am apt to think that there have been ſome perſons, who, without being cruel, loved their pleaſure ſo much, that they almoſt rejoiced at our Orator's ſciatica, or gravel, when they read ſome of his letters, &c. He gives ſome inſtances of it, and then adds (30), Moſt of thoſe things are ſo wittily imagined, that I ſhould be an open enemy to the pleaſures of the publick, if it were true that I find fault with them, as my adverſary aſſerts.

§ (*) The Mercure Galant for March 1689, pag. 195, and 196, of the firſt part, acquaints us, that "Monſieur le Pays, after many proſecutions, which "had been carried on to make him pay a very con- "ſiderable ſum of money, for which a farmer of "the King's Revenue pretended to make him anſwer- "able, has at laſt been cleared by a decree of the "Council, whereupon he wrote the lines, which you "will ſee hereunder.

A MONSIEUR LE CONTROLLEUR GENERAL.

Après de ſi longues allarmes,
La Paix eſt chez moy de retour.
Je dors la nuit, je ris le jour,
Du repos je ſens tous les charmes.
Enfin me viola degagé
Du procès où j'étois plongé.
Quand tout preſt à faire naufrage
Le ſecours arrive à propos,
Plus on a tremblé dans l'orage,
Et plus on goute le repos.

i. e. "After ſo many dreads and fears, peace is at "laſt returned to me. I ſleep by night, I laugh by "day; I taſte all the delights of reſt. I am at laſt "free from the proſecution that was carried on againſt "me. When ready to be caſt away, we happen to be "timely ſaved; the more we trembled in the ſtorm, "the ſweeter does reſt ſeem to us."

[I] He was not ſorry the world ſhould know he was a great pawer or ruffler with the Ladies.] He ought to have concealed that fault, for it is a little citizen-like. Conſult Furetiere's Dictionary; you will meet there not only with the definition, but alſo with the condemnation of that practice. The definition contains theſe words (31). "A man is ſaid to paw or "ruffle a woman, when he handles her arms, her "breaſt, &c." The condemnation is expreſſed thus. "None but country girls, or maid-ſervants, ſuffer "themſelves to be pawed or ruffled. It is not the "faſhion to paw among people of diſtinction. . . . . "The country-gentlemen are great rufflers." Furetiere is in the right to aſſert this of the country-gentlemen. He might have added, that this fault prevails more or leſs in the Provinces of France, according as they are more or leſs remote from Paris: and that it is much more common in the cities than in the country, and more in ſmall towns, than in great cities. This proves that men do not follow herein the eternal rules of morality, but only thoſe of politeneſs, or the faſhion of the Court. There is another very remarkable proof of this, which is, that lewdneſs carried to the higheſt degree, and to the laſt act is more common in the cities, than in the villages, and in great cities, more than in little towns. It is quite the reverſe with regard to ruffling. Let us obſerve by the by, that notwithſtanding the great politeneſs which prevailed under the reign of Auguſtus, the

(25) See the Hiſt. des Ouvrag. des Savans, for Sept. 1688. p. 132.

(26) Baſnage de Beauval, Hiſt. des Ouvrages des Savans, Ibid. p. 133.

(27) Le Pays, Nouv. Oeuvrages, part. 2. Liv. 1. Lett. 9. It is written to Count du Bouchage, and dated June the 12th, 1668.

(28) Coſtar, Apologie, p. 111.

(29) Suetonius does not ſay this, he ſays only, Cum aſſiſtens ſimulacro Jovis Apellem tragœdum conſuluiſſet, uter illi major videretur, cunctantem flagellis diſcidit: collaudans ſubinde vocem deprecantis, quaſi etiam in gemitu prædulcem. Suet. in Calig. cap. 33. i. e. "Being near the "ſtatue of Ju- "piter, he ask- "ed Apelles, "the Actor of "tragedies, "Whether he "or Jupiter "ſeemed the "greateſt to "him? And "as Apelles did "not anſwer "immediately, "he had him "whipped, and "praiſed his "groaning voice, "as being even "then ſweet "and harmoni- "ous."

(30) Coſtar, Apologie, p. 130.

(31) Furetiere's Dictionary, under the word Patiner.

is very probable that he never ſaw his Miſtreſs quite naked [K], and ſuppoſed it only that he might have an opportunity to relate ſeveral merry conceits. He was caſt in a vexatious law-ſuit a few years before his death (g), and died at Paris April 3, 1690.

(g) See the rem. [H].

the young maidens at Rome were obliged to defend themſelves againſt the rufflers hands; they made uſe of their nails, but after having pared them very cloſe.

Nos convivia, nos prælia virginum
Sectis in juvenes unguibus acrium,
Cantamus vacui (32).

(32) Horat. Od. 6. lib. 1.

" I ſing ſoft boys and virgins's wars,
" How ſoon they ſmile, how angry ſoon,
" With cloſe-par'd nails, and tender tooth,
" They all invade the ruffling youth."

CREECH.

Horace obſerves in another place that they defended themſelves very feintly againſt thoſe who would kiſs them.

Dum fiagrantia detorquet ad oſcula
Cervicem, aut facili ſævitiâ negat,
Quæ poſcente magis gaudeat eripi,
Interdùm rapere occupet *?

* Idem, Ode 12. lib. 2. See alſo Ode 9. lib. 1.

" Whene'er her head ſhe gently moves,
" To take the earneſt of her loves,
" A balmy kiſs; or elſe denies
" With eaſy forwardneſs, which ſhews
" That ſhe is more content to loſe
" Than he that begs to win the prize;
" Or when ſhe runs to ſnatch an eager kiſs."

CREECH.

(33) In the article Lycurgus the Legiſlator, quotation (9).

I have quoted elſewhere (33) a paſſage, which relates probably to a country-gentleman, who had lived a long time at Paris, and yet thought that to make himſelf welcome with Ladies of Quality he muſt paw or ruffle them. Let us quote that paſſage again, and add the ſequel to it. " Mr. M. . . . went into " Britany with the Marchioneſs de Lavardin, to pay " a viſit to Madam de Sévigny. He was in the Mar- " chioneſs's coach, and in the road, per non parer troppo " coglione, he entertained her with flattering expreſ- " ſions, and took up her hand to kiſs. Madam de La- " vardin ſaid to him with a ſmile, Sir, you are prac- " tiſing your leſſon againſt you go to Madam de " S. . . . . The ſame being in company with the " Counteſs de la Suze, was playing with her hands; " whereupon ſhe repeated to him this line from " Scaron;"

Les patineurs ſont gens inſupportables;

" Your rufflers are inſufferable men."

To which he replied readily by the next line,

Même aux beautez qui ſont très patinables (34).

(34) Suite du Menangiana, p. 178, 179. Monſieur Menage himſelf is the perſon meant here.

" Even to thoſe who deſerve to be " Handled and &c."

You do not prove, will ſome ſay, what was to be proved: have a little patience; you will ſoon meet with the proof: it is to be found in ſeveral of Monſieur le Pays's Letters, and eſpecially in the firſt book of his Amitiez, in the 24th Letter, where he ſpeaks thus to his Caliſto. Though you were naked (35) and unarmed, yet I feared you, though in all probability you had not then by you that curſed bodkin with which you puniſh SO OFTEN the little liberties I take. What follows contains a clearer proof ſtill: I tranſcribe it from a letter he wrote to a Lady, who boaſted that ſhe had given him a box on the ear. " Do not be miſtaken, " dear Madam; the glory of having uſed me ill is not " ſo great as you may imagine. I have had twenty " Miſtreſſes haughtier than you; who know better " how to repel my attempts, and yet they do not " take a pride in it. You are ſtill but a young be- " ginner in matters of cruelty, and your waiting- " woman might teach you. Miſs Katy has uſed me " more cruelly for leſſer liberties: you have given " me but one box of the ear, ſhe has given me above " a dozen. You tore me only a ribbon, ſhe tore " half my hair off my head; and yet ſhe never " mentioned it to any one living. You are as to " vanity like your tall couſin; he was never in war " but on one pitiful occaſion, of which he is con- " tinually giving an account to all the world: you " never abuſed perhaps any one but me, and you " tell the ſtory to the whole town. But you ſhould " not at leaſt intermix fables with your ſtory: if you " would relate faithfully how things paſſed between " us, I could bear with your vanity, and would not " complain of your indiſcretion. What is the mean- " ing of all that oſtentation of pride? Why will " you by your diſcourſes extenuate the exceſſive li- " berties I took? Why exaggerate the bitterneſs of " the opprobrious language, and the heavineſs of " the blow you gave me? Indeed, Madam, if you " will remember it, your injuries were not very bit- " ter, nor was the blow exceedingly heavy. I juſtly " deſerved much more, and though you had done " all that you pretend you did, you had not done " half your duty. And yet, you know very well " in your conſcience, that you was afraid you had " carried your paſſion too far: you feared leſt I " ſhould be more angry than you, and at laſt you " put on ſuch a countenance as to perſuade me my " boldneſs would no longer offend you; but your " good nature did not appeaſe my reſentment, and " when I ſaw your reſiſtance ſlackened ſo ſoon, I " deſpiſed ſo eaſy a victory. Confeſs the truth: it " is this, Madam, that exaſperated you; you took " offence at my contempt, and you thought it pro- " per to conceal it under a ſhew of contempt for me " (36)." The letter which preceeds this is not leſs malicious; it was written to a Lady, who thought Monſieur le Pays a little too familiar: it deſerves to be read, and may afford inſtructions to ſeveral perſons, who may have occaſion for them.

(36) Le Pays, Nouvelles Oeuvr. part. 1. liv. 2. Lettre 3. p. m. 107, 108.

[K] It is very probable that he never ſaw his Miſtreſs quite naked.] He aſſerts it poſitively. " At laſt, " Caliſto, all your artifices have proved unſucceſsful. " I found laſt night the place where you was gone to " bathe yourſelf. . . . . Pray why do you take ſo " much care to hide your body? Indeed you ſhewed " no part, which you need to be aſhamed of: and " if there were any, they were the knees and other " parts of your ſiſter, and of your couſin, which " ſhould have been aſhamed to appear before yours. " But as for you, though you ſhewed all, yet you " ſhewed nothing but what was beautiful, nothing " but what you may take a pride in. I found " then, that thoſe parts which you hide, are not in " the leaſt leſs handſome, than thoſe you ſhew: and I " agreed with myſelf, that there are ſome Ladies, " who would have more reaſons to hide their noſe, " than you your thighs (37)." The reſt of this letter contains many thoughts witty enough to make me imagine, that the Author invented this ſtory, that he might have an opportunity to publiſh them. Though the fair ſex may have the privilege in ſeveral Provinces of France, to take with decency ſuch liberties, as would ruin their reputation in Italy, yet I am perſuaded, that neither Monſieur le Pays's Miſtreſs, nor the ſiſter, nor the couſin of this Caliſto, did bathe themſelves in a river, without a ſhift on, or without a ſheet about them, and in one another's ſight: and with ſo little precaution, that a man might ſurprize them in that condition, and compare them leiſurely the moſt ſecret parts of the one, with thoſe of the others. I queſtion whether country-women ever take ſuch liberties. How much more ought we to judge, that young maidens, who without too great an abuſe, were ſtyled Ladies (Demoiſelles) would not tranſgreſs to ſuch a degree, the laws of modeſty and decency? If they undreſſed themſelves quite, in order to enjoy the better the coolneſs of the weather, they waited unqueſtionably till it was dark. Things are not at preſent upon the ſame footing, as in the time of Diana (38). We may therefore aſſert, of this letter of Monſieur le Pays, and of ſeveral

(37) Le Pays, Amitiez, Amours, & Amourettes, Liv. 1. Lett. 24. p. m. 22.

(38) See Ovid. Metamorph. lib. 2. ver. 461, and lib. 3. ver. 179.

1690. There was a Satyr publiſhed againſt him in the year 1670 (b).

(b) Printtd, if I am not miſtaken, either at Grenoble, or at Lyons. He was very ill uſed in that little Pamphlet.

ſeveral other little works of the ſame kind, that only ſtories invented by the Authors. things are related there as matters of fact, which are

☞ PEARSON (JOHN), a moſt learned Engliſh Biſhop in the 17th Century, was ſon of Mr. Robert Pearſon, Rector of Creak and Snoring in Norfolk, by Elizabeth, one of the Daughters of Dr. Richard Vaughan, ſucceſſively Biſhop of Bangor, Cheſter, and London. He was born at Snoring February 28, 1612-13 (a), and was ſent in May 1623 to Eaton-ſchool, from whence he was elected to King's College in Cambridge April 1632. In 1635 he took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts, and in 1639 that of Maſter (b); and was Fellow of his College, but in 1639 reſigned his Fellowſhip, and lived a Fellow-Commoner in the College (c). In 1639 he entered into holy Orders (d); and December 30th the ſame year he was collated to the Prebend of Netherhaven in the Church of Sarum (e). In June 1640 he was appointed Chaplain to the Lord Keeper Finch, who in December the ſame year preſented him to the Living of Torrington in Suffolk (f). Upon the breaking out of the Civil Wars he became Chaplain to the Lord Goring, whom he attended in the army; and afterwards Chaplain to Sir Robert Cook in London. In 1650 he was made Miniſter of St. Clement's Eaſt-cheap in London (g). In 1657 he and Mr. Peter Gunning had a diſpute with two Roman Catholicks, upon the ſubject of Schiſm; an account of which was printed at Paris in 1658 [A]. In 1659 he wrote

(a) From ſome manuſcript notes written by Dr. Thomas Smith, of Trinity College, Cambridge, and communicated by Thomas Clarke, of the Middle-Temple, Eſq; and from an Extract of the Regiſter of King's-College, Cambridge, communicated by Robert Bankes, M. D. Fellow of that College, and of the College of Phyſicians at London, and Phyſician to Chriſt's Hoſpital, London.

(b) From the Univerſity Regiſter.

(c) From the College Regiſter.

(d) Dr. Smyth's MS. notes.

(e) Walker's Sufferings of the Clergy, part 2. p. 67.

(f) Smyth's MS. notes.

(g) From the College Regiſter.

[A] An account of which was printed at Paris in 1658.] It was printed under the following title: Schiſme unmaſk't: Or, A late Conference betwixt Mr. Peter Gunning, and Mr. John Pierſon, Miniſters, on the one part, and two Diſputants of the Roman Profeſſion, on the other: wherein is defined, both what Schiſme is, and to whom it belongs. With a brief Recapitulation; wherein at one view may be ſeen, the whole Drift of this Conference, for ſuch as want either Learning to reach, or Leiſure to read the whole Tract. And all is concluded with a Deciſion of the main Queſtion, Whether Proteſtants, or thoſe of the Roman Church, be Schiſmatiques. Alſo an Index is drawne, pointing at the principall Matters. Printed at Paris, cum Privilegio, 1658. One of the Roman Catholic Diſputants went under ſeveral names, as Spencer, or Tyrwhitt, or Hatcliffe; and the other was a Phyſician. To the whole is prefixed, a Preface of the Catholique Diſputants, containing the Proceedings of both Parties in Matter of Fact; in which we are informed, that the conference began in May 1657, a little before Whitſuntide.

With regard to the publication of this book, we have the following account in a book of Mr. Thomas Smith, of Chriſt College in Cambridge, printed at London, in 1659, and intitled, A Gagg for the Quakers; with an Anſwer to Mr. Denn's Quaker no Papiſt. "That which follows, ſays Mr. Smith, in "your book about Mr. Gunning and Mr. Pearſon, "who diſputed againſt the Romaniſts, all who know "theſe Miniſters know to be ſuperfluous and frivo- "lous. However, I think fit to tell you, the Roma- "niſt, who put forth an edition [of that Diſpute] "hath ſo changed, tranſpoſed, added, diminiſhed, "and made of it what he liſt, that I believe it will "be as ſoon owned for your (I mean not J. S. but "H. D.'s) conference, as Mr. Pearſon's or Mr. Gun- "ning's. I muſt now tell you further, (what you "have been oft enough told of) that that relation "cannot expect to be regarded by Mr. P. or any "ſober perſon, which is diſclaimed and diſowned by "three of the four, who were diſputants, viz. by "both the Proteſtants, and half the Papiſts. But "chiefly, I muſt intreat you to conſider, whether the "inſerting above 200 lines at a time, as a part of "the conference, which never was part of it, beſides "all profeſſed additions; ſecondly, whether the "leaving out whole ſheets of the Proteſtants, which "the Papiſts thought too hard to anſwer; and third- "ly, the ſcarce ſuffering any one argument and an- "ſwer of both to come together, but caſting uſually "parts of the ſame paper of Mr. G. many ſcore "leaves aſunder one from another, be not a ſcan- "dal, that any Chriſtian would deſire might be co- "vered with ſilence? And I would gladly know "from any ingenious perſon, whether this might "not be anſwer enough to a book put out at the "charge of the Romaniſt's own purſe and conſcience; "a diſcourſe, by being mangled, rendered ſo un- "intelligible, that ſcarce any man ever read it over, "or will. . . . . Reverend Mr. William Moor, the "deceaſed Library-keeper, was perſuaded by J. S. "to read one leaf; but profeſſed, before many wit- "neſſes, he would not read another, if you would "give him the whole impreſſion, becauſe it was ſo "unintelligible, for the cauſes abovementioned." This Conference was re-printed at Oxford, during the reign of King James II. under this title; The Schiſm of the Church of England demonſtrated, in four Arguments, formerly propoſed by Dr. Peter Gunning and Dr. John Pearſon, (the late Biſhops of Ely and Cheſter) by two Catholic Diſputants, in a celebrated Conference upon that point. This was ſoon after animadverted upon by William Saywell, D. D. Maſter of Jeſus-College, Cambridge, in a pamphlet printed at Cambridge, 1688, in 4to, under this title; The Reformation of the Church of England juſtified, according to the Canons of the Council of Nice, and other General Councils, and the Tradition of the Catholic Church. Being an Anſwer to a Paper re-printed at Oxford, called, The Schiſm, &c. in which anſwer the unworthy and falſe dealings of the Papiſts are ſhewed, and the charge of Schiſm returned upon them, and the Church of England proved truly Catholic and Apoſtolick in her doctrine and conſtitution. In the Preface we are informed, that "the conference "was managed in writing about thirty years ago; "and by mutual agreement nothing was to be made "publick without the allowance and conſent of both "parties. But ſuch was the diſingenuity and un- "worthineſs of one of the Romiſh Diſputants, that "contrary to the faith and promiſe he had made, he "ſets forth a book, and pretends it to be an account "of the conference with Biſhop Gunning and Biſhop "Pearſon, when he had left out, changed, and miſ- "placed the matters as he pleaſed himſelf; inſomuch "that his partner was very much aſhamed of this "diſhoneſt and unfaithful dealing, and did utterly "condemn him for what he had done, and renounced "his having been engaged in approving or conſent- "ing to ſuch a baſe and diſingenuous proceeding, and "did openly own and acknowledge ſo much to the per- "ſons concerned." Dr. Saywell then quotes the paſſage above-cited from Mr. Smith, and proceeds thus. But perhaps ſome will demand, why was not the conference then printed whole and entire? Now the reaſon of that was, the Popiſh adverſary did run all the diſpute into obſcure and metaphyſical niceties, that few could underſtand, and fewer would take the pains to read it, and ſo it was not thought fit, and a needleſs charge, to trouble the world with it. Beſides, both the Biſhops did tell their friends, when they diſcourſed with them about a fuller anſwer, that they thought it altogether unneceſſary, becauſe though the diſpute were mangled and miſrepreſented, yet that which they had printed will ſtill be unanſwered by them, and unanſwerable by any of their party; and they were perſuaded that all men, who would carefully read the book, would be of the ſame mind. And as for this paper that is added at the end of the pretended Conference, and now reprinted at Oxford, the wrote a Preface to Mr. Hales's Remains [B]; and publiſhed at London in 4to, his Expoſition

Author does not ſo much as ſay, that it was part of their diſpute, but a pure addition of his own, wherein they were no more concerned than other Divines, and they did not think they were bound to anſwer whatſoever he ſhould afterwards write and publiſh to the world; and yet this Oxford paper would, without any ground or the leaſt colour, impoſe upon the world, that this was a part of that mentioned Conference.

[B] In 1659 he wrote a Preface to Mr. Hales's Remains.] Theſe Remains were printed at London 1659, in 4to, under the title of Golden Remains of the ever memorable Mr. John Hales of Eaton-College. In the Preface Mr. Pearſon obſerves, that if Mr. Farindon had not died before the impreſſion of this book, he would have prefixed to it the life of Mr. Hales, which he had begun. He then aſſures the Reader, that in drawing Mr. Hales's character, he ſhall ſpeak no more, than my own long experience, ſays he, intimate acquaintance, and high veneration grounded upon both, ſhall freely and ſincerely prompt me to. We ſhall take the opportunity to inſert here ſome particulars concerning Mr. Hales, which have been communicated to us by the learned Arthur Aſhley Sykes, D. D. Dean of St. Burien, ſince the printing of our article of that great man. Dr. Nathaniel Ingelo, Prebendary of Windſor, in a letter to Mr. Richard Marriot, dated from Eaton College, October 29. without mentioning of the year, writes as follows:

" Ad (1m.) Mr. Hales went to the Lady Salter's " ſome time after Biſhop King, and about a year af- " ter his ejection from the College.

" Ad (2m.) The ſame Order, which carried Mr. " Farindon from his preaching in London, removed " Mr. Hales from the Lady Salter's; he affirming, " that he would be gone, leſt he ſhould miſchief his " friends.

" Ad (6m.) Mr. Mountague ſays, that he gave an " explication of his belief concerning the Trinity, to " Mr. Salter, according to the Doctrine of the Church " of England.

" Ad (7m.) Mr. Mountague has often heard Mr. " Hales ſay, that the perſon in the ſtory mentioned " by Mr. Farindon in his preface, was Epiſcopius.

" Ad (8m.) Mr. Hales went Chaplain to Sir D. " Carleton to Dort, only to accompany him in the " Embaſſy.

" Admitted Fellow of Eaton, May 4, 1613, for " I find it ſo in our books.

" As to Mr. Hales's being diſcontented, he was ſo " far from it, that he would willingly have waved " the Prebend of Windſor, when it was ſent to him " knowing nothing of it by Archbiſhop Laud; and " he would have refuſed it, but that it was preſent- " ed to him at a publick dinner among many " friends, who perſuaded him to the contrary. " Archbiſhop Laud did alſo ſend for him, and told " him, he might have what Preferment he pleaſed; " and he anſwered, If it pleaſe your Grace, I have " what I deſire.

" He was made Prebendary of Windſor about two " years before the wars, and enjoyed it but two " years. He ſtaid in his Fellowſhip, refuſing the " Covenant, nor otherwiſe complying in any thing " with the times; and was put out for refuſing the " engagement. He was not long ſick, about a fort- " night, and then not very ill; but diſcourſed with " all his friends as freely as in his health, till within " half an hour before his death; for Mr. Montague " was then talking with him, and left him for half " an hour, and before he returned, he was dead, " and had his perfect ſenſe to the laſt minute.

" After he came to Eaton, for thirty years toge- " ther, he was never hindered by any ſickneſs, he " ſtudying conſtantly from five of the clock in the " morning, till night, ſeldom eating any dinner.

" About the time of Archbiſhop Laud's death, he " retired from his lodgings in the college, into a " private chamber at Eaton, where he remained for " a quarter of a year unknown to any; and ſpent in " that time only ſix pence per week, living only upon " bread and beer. And as he had formerly faſted " from Tueſday night to Thurſday night, ſo in that " time of his retirement, he abſtained from his bread " and water; and when he heard that the Arch- " biſhop was murdered, he wiſhed that his head had " been taken off for his."

Mr. Hales's laſt will was as follows:

" In Dei Nomine Amen. Maii decimo nono A. D. 1656.

" My ſoul having been long ſince bequeathed unto " the mercies of God in Jeſus Chriſt, my only Savi- " viour; and my body naturally bequeathing itſelf to " duſt and aſhes, out of which it was taken; I John " Hales, of Eton, in the County of Bucks, Clerk, " by this my laſt Will and Teſtament, do diſpoſe " of the ſmall remainder of my poor broken eſtate, " in manner and form following.

" Firſt, I give to my ſiſter Cicely Coombes five " pounds. More I give to my ſiſter Bridgett Gulli- " ford five pounds. More I give to the poor of the " town of Eton, to be diſtributed at the diſcretion of " my Executrix hereafter named, five pounds. More " I give to ſix perſons to be appointed by my ſaid " Executrix, to carry my body to the grave, three " pounds, to be diſtributed among them by even " portions. More I give to Mr. Thomas Manfield, of " Windſor, Grocer, five pounds. More I give to " Mrs. Mary Collins, wife to Mr. John Collins, of " Eton, five pounds, to this end and purpoſe, that " ſhe would be pleaſed to provide her a ring in " what manner ſhe liſteth, to remain with her, in " memory of a poor deceaſed friend. All which " monies here bequeathed, do at this preſent reſt " intruſted in the hands of my ſingular good friends, " Mr. William Smith, and Mr. Thomas Mountague.

" Moreover, all my Greek and Latin books (ex- " cept St. Jerom's works, which I give to Mr. Tho- " mas Mountague) I give to my moſt deſervedly be- " loved friend, William Salter, of Rich-Kings, Eſq; " to whom I further give five pounds, to this end, " that he would provide him a fair ſeal-ring of gold, " engraven with his arms and hatchments doubled " and mantled, to preſerve the memory of a poor " deceaſed friend. All my Engliſh books, together " with the remainder of all monies, goods, and u- " tenſils whatſoever, I give and bequeath to Mrs. " Hannah Dickinſon, of Eton, Widow and Relict of " John Dickenſon, lately deceaſed, in whoſe houſe, " (for her's indeed it is, and not mine, as being " bought with her money, howſoever for ſome rea- " ſons I have ſuffered the publick voice to entitle me " to it) in whoſe houſe, I ſay, I have for a long " time (eſpecially ſince my unjuſt and cauſeleſs ex- " truſion from my College) been with great care and " good reſpect entertained. And her the ſaid Han- " nah I do by theſe preſents conſtitute and ordain my " ſole executrix. And unto this my laſt will I make " overſeers my very good friends Mr. Thomas Mon- " tague and Mr. William Smith of Eaton; and to each " of them I give five pounds, humbly requeſting " them to be aſſiſtants to my ſaid executrix with " their beſt advice to help, if ſo be ſhe chance to " find any trouble.

" Now becauſe monies are many times not at " command, but may require perchance ſome time " to take them up, I ordain, that in ſix months after " my departure ſhe ſee all theſe my bequeſts and le- " gacies orderly and faithfully diſcharged.

" As for my funeral, I ordain, that at the time of " the next even-ſong after my departure (if conve- " niently it may be) my body be laid in the church- " yard of the town of Eton, (if I chance there to die) " as near as may be to the body of my little Godſon " Jack Dickenſon the elder; and this to be done in " a plain and ſimple manner, without any ſermon, " or ringing the bell, or calling the people together; " without any unſeaſonable commeſſation, or com- " potation, or other ſolemnity on ſuch occaſions u- " ſual.

" And I ſtrictly command my executrix, that nei- " ther of her own head, neither at the importunity, " or authority of any other, neither upon any other " pretence whatſoever, to take upon her to diſpenſe " with this point of my will; for as in my life I " have done the Church no ſervice, ſo will I not, " that in my death the Church do me any honour."

ſition of the Creed [C], which was afterwards reprinted at London in folio, with improvements. In 1660 he took the Degree of Doctor of Divinity (h); and on the 17th of Auguſt that year was collated by the Biſhop of London to the Rectory of St. Chriſtopher's in that city (i); and in the ſame year was made Maſter of Jeſus College in Cambridge, and Archdeacon of Surrey. Before the end of the year following he was Prebendary of Ely, Margaret Profeſſor of Divinity in Cambridge, and Maſter of Trinity College in that Univerſity. In 1672 he was advanced to the See of Cheſter, to which he was conſecrated, February 9, 1672-3. Beſides his Expoſition of the Creed, he wrote ſome other works [D]. He died at Cheſter July 16, 1686.

(h) From the Univerſity Regiſter.

(i) Newcourt's Repertorium, vol. 1. p. 325.

He

Probatum fuit Teſtamentum prædict, coram me Richardo Alleſtree, Sacræ Theologiæ Profeſſore, Præpoſito Collegii Reginalis beatæ Mariæ de Eton juxta Windſor in Com. Bucks Ordinar. Peculiar. Exempt. Juriſdictionis ibid. viceſimo nono die Menſis Martii A. D. 1666. ac pro me probatum, inſinuatum, legitimèque pronuntiatum per eod. commiſſaq; eſt adminiſtratio omnium & ſingulorum Bonorum dict. Defunct. Executrici in eodem Teſtamento nominat. in Juris forma Jurat. remedio & inter eſſe cujuſcunq; in omnibus ſemp. ſalvis. Dat. ſub ſigillo Officii mei Præpoſ. die & anno prædict.

[C] In 1659 he publiſhed at London, in 4to, his Expoſition of the Creed.] It is dedicated to the right worſhipful and well-beloved, the Pariſhioners of St. Clement's Eaſt-cheape; and in the dedication he writes thus: "If I ſhould be at any time unmindfull of "your commands, you might well eſteem me unworthy of your continued favours. And there is "ſome reaſon to ſuſpect I have incurred the interpretation of forgetfulneſs, having been ſo backward in the performance of my promiſes. Some "years have paſſed, ſince I preached unto you upon "ſuch texts of ſcripture, as were on purpoſe ſelected "in relation to the Creed, and was moved by you "to make theſe meditations publick. But you "were pleaſed then to grant what my inclinations "rather led me to, that they might be turned into "an Expoſition of the Creed itſelf; which partly by "the difficulty of the work undertaken, partly by "the intervention of ſome other imployments, hath "taken me up thus long, for which I deſire your "pardon." In the preface, he obſerves, that the Creed without Controverſy, is a brief comprehenſion of the objects of our Chriſtian Faith, and is generally taken to contain all things neceſſary to be believed; and that the method, which he propoſed to himſelf, and has proſecuted in every article, is, firſt, to ſettle the words of each article, according to their antiquity, and generality of reception in the Creed. Secondly, to explicate and unfold the terms, and endeavour a right notion and conception of them, as they are to be underſtood in the ſame. Thirdly, to ſhew what are thoſe truths, which are naturally contained in theſe terms ſo explicated; and to make it appear, that they are truths indeed, by ſuch arguments and reaſons, as are reſpectively proper to evidence the verity of them. Fourthly, to declare what is the neceſſity of believing thoſe truths; what efficacy and influence they have in the ſoul, and upon the life of a Believer. Laſtly, by a recollection of all, briefly to deliver the ſum of every particular truth; ſo that every one, when he pronounceth the Creed, may know what he ought to intend, and what he is underſtood to profeſs, when he ſo pronounceth it. In his Expoſition of the firſt Article of the Creed, he rejects the notion of an innate idea of God. Altho' ſome, ſays he (1), have imagined, that the knowledge of a Deity is connatural to the ſoul of man, ſo that every man hath a connate inbred notion of God; yet I rather conceive the ſoul of man to have no connatural knowledge at all, no particular notion of any thing in it from the beginning, but to receive the firſt apprehenſions of things by ſenſe, and by them to make all rational collections. If then the ſoul of man be at the firſt like a fair ſmooth table, without any actual characters of knowledge imprinted in it; if all the knowledge, which we have, comes ſucceſſively by ſenſation, inſtruction, and natural collection; then muſt we not refer the apprehenſion of a Deity to any connate notion, or inbred opinion.

(1) p. 32 edit. London 1659, in 4to.

[D] Some other works.] 1. No Neceſſity for a Reformation. London 1661, in 4to. 2. A Sermon preached before the King upon the 19*th of March*, 1671, on Eccleſ. xii. 14. publiſhed by his Majeſty's ſpecial Command. London 1671, in 4to. 3. Annales Cyprianici, ſive tredecim annorum, quibus S. Cyprianus inter Chriſtinos verſatus eſt, hiſtoria chronologica; printed with S. Cæcilii Cypriani opera cognita & illuſtrata, per Joannem Oxonienſem Epiſcopum. Oxford 1682, in fol. 4. Vindicatio Epiſtolarum Ignatii adverſus Dallæum. Cambridge 1672, in 4to. 5. Cl. Joannis Pearſoni Ceſtrienſis nuper Epiſcopi, Opera poſthuma. De ſerie primorum Romæ Epiſcoporum Diſſertationes duæ: quibus præfiguntur Annales Paulini & Lectiones in Acta Apoſtolorum. Edenda curavit & auxit H. Dodwellus, cujus acceſſit de eâdem ſucceſſione Diſſertatio ſingularis. London 1688, in 4to. Theſe poſthumous works of our Author contain a diſſertation upon the life of St. Paul; five Analyſes upon the Acts of the Apoſtles, and two diſſertations upon the ſucceſſion of the Biſhops of Rome. The Annales Paulini contain ſcarce any thing, but what is collected from the Acts of the Apoſtles and the Epiſtles of St. Paul. The Martyrdom of that Apoſtle is placed by the Biſhop at the end of Nero's reign. In the Analyſes upon the Acts of the Apoſtles he obſerves, that it is very difficult to determine preciſely the time of the birth, death, and aſcenſion of our Saviour. We know in general, that he was born under the reign of Herod; but there is no circumſtance, which can lead us to fix poſitively upon the year. The Jews, through malignity, have confounded the Order of thoſe times, and the Fathers have not taken much pains to clear it up. They were only poſſeſſed with this falſe notion, that Chriſt preached but oneyear. However, our Author owns, that this is a point of curioſity, which does not at all affect the truth of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory; and he lays it down as the foundation of his Chronology, that Chriſt ſuffered in the nineteenth year of Tiberius's reign. He explodes occaſionally two methods of reaſoning in Baronius, which are admirably well ſuited to ſupport the Doctrine of the Church of Rome with regard to images, and the power of the Pope. For from the paſſage, where it is ſaid, that Peter's ſhadow healed the ſick, that Cardinal concludes, 1. That painting having taken its origin from the ſhadow, which is the image of a perſon, God has conſecrated the worſhip of images by the miracles, with which he honoured St. Peter's ſhadow. 2. That God having given to the ſhadow of St. Peter the ſame virtue as his body, the Popes, who repreſent the perſon, and are, as it were, the ſhadow of that great Apoſtle, ought to have the ſame power and the ſame prerogatives with him.

Our Author afterwards examines, who was the author of this tradition, that "Tiberius propoſed to "the Senate to place Chriſt among the Gods." Every body allows, that Euſebius and the other Fathers aſſerted this merely upon the credit of Tertullian. Monſieur le Fevre (2), without any regard to Tertullian's authority, maintains, that this was a pious invention, with which he thought proper to adorn his Apologetick; becauſe there is no manner of probability, that Tiberius, who had the utmoſt diſregard for Religion, would give himſelf any trouble about deifying our Saviour. Beſides, the reaſon, which Tertullian mentions of the Senate's refuſal, renders the thing extremely ſuſpected. For he ſays, that the Senate oppoſed it, becauſe recourſe had not been had to their authority. But is it probable, that the Senate, who were abſolutely ſlaves to Tiberius's will, ſo that they even offered him altars and divine honours, would become ſo jealous of their power at that ſingle inſtant, and venture to reject a propoſition ſupported by the Emperor, towards whom they had carried their complaiſance to the loweſt ſervility? Mr. Van Dale (3), who thinks, that the Fathers gave a little too much into the Doctrine of a good intention,

(2) Epiſt. 12. L. 2.

(3) Dearaculis Ethnic.

He had a younger brother Richard, educated at Eaton-ſchool, and elected thence to King's College in Cambridge in 1646, where he took the Degree of Maſter of Arts. He was a Profeſſor of Civil Law in Greſham College at London, and kept his Fellowſhip of King's College with it, and was made Doctor of Laws upon the Prince of Tuſcany's viſiting Cambridge in the beginning of the year 1667, he being then under Keeper of tion, and frequently ſupported the proofs of the Chriſtian Religion by falſe reaſons, has attacked with his whole force this ſtory of Tertullian, cited by Euſebius with ſo much triumph. However, Biſhop Pearſon rejects the opinion of Monſieur le Fevre, and affirms, that Tertullian's relation ought to be of great weight, ſince he might have taken it from the Regiſters of the Senate. He obſerves, that this refuſal of the Senate may be conſidered as a piece of flattery, ſince Tiberius having rejected the title and rank of a God, the Senators thought it was doing him honour, not to raiſe any perſon above him. The Fathers have ſpoken in another way. St. Chryſoſtom particularly has diſplayed his eloquence upon this point. He aſſerts, that all this was managed by Providence, which had determined, that the Goſpel ſhould ſpread over the whole earth, without the aſſiſtance of the ſecular powers; and would not permit that Chriſt ſhould be placed among Gods, who had been deified by men.

In the firſt diſſertation concerning the ſucceſſion of the primitive Biſhops of Rome, our Author obſerves, that it is certain, that the Fathers of the third and fourth, and even the fifth century, inſiſted greatly upon the argument of the ſucceſſion of the Biſhops, in oppoſition to the Heretics. They boaſted of an uninterrupted ſucceſſion from the Apoſtles; that by this ſucceſſion it was the ſame flock, which they had fed in the ſame paſtures; that the branches, which had been cut off and ſeparated from the body of the tree, that is, the Sects divided from the Chriſtian Communion, had withered away at a diſtance. For this reaſon, large Churches were ſo ſollicitous in preſerving the names and memory of their Biſhops.

We have but two catalogues of thoſe of Rome; one of which was handed down by the Greeks, and the other by the Latins. Learned men follow follow them promiſcuouſly; but our Author is of opinion, that theſe catalogues are only fit to miſlead us. To begin with that of Euſebius, which is the moſt antient; he aſſerts, that it cannot be exact for this reaſon, that in the Dypticks, whence it was taken, the time of the death of the Biſhops is not ſet down. The Biſhops of Rome, eſpecially in the firſt Century, did not make a figure enough to draw upon them any attention. So that we find nothing certain till after Pope Fabian, who in the middle of the third Century appointed ſeven notaries to collect exactly the names of the Martyrs and the circumſtances of their Martyrdom. The other Churches were obliged to follow this example, becauſe the Hereticks endeavoured to interrupt the ſucceſſion of the Biſhops, in order to break the chain of the Apoſtolical Tradition. For in theſe ages, which ſtill ſmoked with the blood of our Saviour, it was not difficult to aſcend to the ſource of the opinions, which ſprang up in the Church, and to aſcertain the ſucceſſion of a Doctrine as well as that of the Biſhops.

As it is certain, that there were Biſhops at Rome from the very beginning, it ſeems that the principal difficulty conſiſts in diſcovering the firſt Origin. St. Irenæus, who is followed by all antiquity, ſays, that St. Peter and St. Paul founded the Church at Rome. Henry Valeſius owns, that St. Paul contributed to it by his labours there; but he cannot allow, that he was Biſhop of that city. However, St. Epiphanius having obſerved, that St. James was the firſt Biſhop of Jeruſalem, the moſt antient of all the Churches, ſays, that St. Peter and St. Paul were Biſhops of Rome. It is undoubted, that St. Paul was at Rome; but with regard to St. Peter, there is not the leaſt trace in Scripture. On the contrary, a great many able writers have denied, that he ever went to Rome. Salmaſius, who was an eminent advocate for this opinion, affirms, that St. Peter went from Antioch to Babylon, where there was a prodigious number of Jews; and that the name of Babylon, which was afterwards given to Rome, gave occaſion to the notion that he was Biſhop of that city. But Biſhop Pearſon maintains, that we ought not to oppoſe the voice of all antiquity; that the Fathers ſaid, that St. Peter was at Rome, before the myſtical explication of Babylon was introduced; and that the city of Babylon, whither St. Peter went, was not ſituated in Aſſyria, but Egypt, whence that Apoſtle might eaſily go to Rome. The Biſhop's principal deſign is to conclude, that St. Peter having been the firſt Biſhop of Rome, Epiſcopacy is of Apoſtolick Inſtitution. For this reaſon he vehemently oppoſes Salmaſius, who aſſerts, that the Apoſtles left no Biſhops behind them in the Churches, which they had erected. He ſhews, that this would be to accuſe the primitive Church of having forged catalogues of Biſhops, and to have made uſe of fraud; which is overthrowing the truth of hiſtory, and the idea which we ought to have of the purity of thoſe ages. To return to Euſebius, the Biſhop remarks ſeveral others, which had eſcaped that writer in the catalogue, which he has given us of the Biſhops of Rome; and among the reſt one relating to the Pontificate of Xiſtus, which Euſebius makes to have continued eight years in his Chronicon, and eleven years in his Hiſtory. But beſides this contradiction, neither of the dates can be true; for he ſhould have left room for Pope Stephen, whoſe Pontificate would be ſwallowed up by the too long duration of that of Xiſtus. The Latin catalogue is not more certain, according to our Author. Though it has paſſed under the name of Pope Damaſus, who lived in the fourth Century, the Author of it is not known; and it formerly bore the title of Geſta Pontificalia. Blondel however has honoured it with his favourite compliment, by ſaying it was written with a Sun-beam. Iſidorus Mercator has followed it in forging his Decretals, which he aſcribes to Pope Damaſus, in order to give them the more authority. But Biſhop Pearſon obſerves, that the ſtyle is too barbarous, and there appears in it too groſs an ignorance of the Ceremonies of the Church, to be written by Pope Damaſus. In ſhort, that notwithſtanding the air of antiquity, which the Author has endeavoured to give it, it is a work forged in the ſixth Century, and continued by Anaſtaſius Bibliothecarius. Conſequently it is neceſſary to draw up another Chronology of the Biſhops of Rome, by correcting the errors of thoſe above-mentioned. This is the deſign of the Second Diſſertation; but it is a taſk of great difficulty. For if any one Pope is omitted, it is neceſſary, in order to reſtore him to his proper place, to ſhorten or carry higher the pontificate of others. If on the contrary there be a Pope too much, it is neceſſary to have our eyes every where, and to diſtribute the years of him, whom we exclude, in ſuch a manner, as may not interfere with any one certain circumſtance in the hiſtory. Our Author remarks firſt, that Cletus and Anacletus, who are commonly conſidered as two different Popes, are the ſame perſon; that is, by cutting off two ſyllables of the name of Anacletus, there have been made two perſons of one. This, according to Biſhop Pearſon, is an error in Chronology; which is the ſource of many others, and has occaſioned Baronius to fall into a very conſiderable anachroniſm.

The Biſhop obſerves likewiſe, that Linus did not ſucceed St. Peter, but that he was placed in that See by St. Peter and St. Paul, who would not fix themſelves in one ſingle Church; and that he died even before the Apoſtles. Some have maintained, that Linus and Cletus were appointed together to govern the Church of Rome with an equal authority. This is affirmed in the catalogue of Pope Damaſus, againſt which our Author has declared ſo ſtrongly; and it is alſo the ſentiment of Ruffinus and Beda. Whence Blondel and Salmaſius has concluded, that in the firſt and pureſt antiquity the Preſbyters governed the Church, with this only difference between them, that the eldeſt preſided. Biſhop Pearſon aſſerts, that this equality of his Majeſty's Library at St. James's. He died in the ſummer of the year 1670, being then, as it was vulgarly reported, a Roman Catholick. He was a man of excellent learning, and particularly ſkilled in the Greek language, and was a great traveller (k).

(k) Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 1160. 2d edit.

was not known to any of the Fathers, whoſe Epiſcopal Throne muſt have been ſubverted, if it were true, that the authority was divided among the Preſbyters, and that there was no other pre-eminence among them than that of age. He then reſumes the Chronology, and affirms, that Clement died in 83; and thus deſtroys the computation of Baronius and Father Petavius, who repreſent him as living till the year 110. and 111. He anſwers, or rather Mr. Dodwell for him, the three objections, which might be urged againſt this Chronology. The firſt is, that Clement ſuffered martyrdom under the Emperor Trajan, who did not begin his reign till the year 98.

Mr. Dodwell obſerves, that this martyrdom is not a point very certain; and that the name of Pope Clement has been confounded with Clement the Conſul, who indeed was a Martyr. This is an honour, which has been done to ſeveral Popes, who however died in peace. The ſecond is, that Clement gave the vail to a Virgin named Domitilla, about the end of the reign of Domitian, which fell in the year 95. To ſolve this difficulty, Mr. Dodwell makes a very curious digreſſion, to ſhew, that the ceremony of vailing Virgins was not in uſe at that time; and he concludes, that the ſtory of Domitilla's receiving the vail from Pope Clement is a mere imagination, contrary to the hiſtory of thoſe times. Biſhop Pearſon in his Chronology of the firſt Popes follows that of Eutychius; and obſerves, that Clement dying in 83, he was ſucceeded by Evariſtus, Alxeander, Sixtus, and Teleſphorus, the laſt of whom died in 112, according to the Biſhop, whereas the Chronologers commonly make his pontificate extend to the year 152. He ſhews, that Baronius is groſly miſtaken in aſſerting, that Evariſtus died under the Emperor Hadrian, ſince all the Martyrologies prove the contrary. However, the Roman Martyrology imports, that Alexander, the ſucceſſor of Evariſtus, died under the Emperor Trajan. Baronius has erazed the name of Trajan, in order to inſert that of Hadrian. He proves this difference of thirty years, which is to be found between his Chronology and that of others, from divers circumſtances drawn from Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. The Latins affirm that Anicetus ſucceeded Hyginus; and the Greeks, that it was Pius. Our Author defends the opinion of the Greeks; and he urges, that the Epiſtles of Pope Pius, in which we find the word Maſs, and which Baronius ſtyles Golden Epiſtles, are ſpurious, becauſe this pretended Pius is here repreſented as the ſucceſſor of Anicetus. He proves afterwards, that Anicetus was not raiſed to the See of Rome till 142, becauſe Polycarp came to Rome under his Pontificate. Now Irenæus, who wrote his treatiſe of Hereſies in 180, declares, that ſeveral perſons had already ſucceeded Polycarp, who conſequently had ſuffered Martyrdom about the year 147, at the age of 87 years. Soter died in the year 170, after having held the See of Rome eight whole years, according to Euſebius and ſeveral others. But Baronius having drawn up another plan of Chronology, thought proper to retrench above five years of the Pontificate of Soter. Biſhop Pearſon ſhews here, that the Martyrdom of this Pope is very doubtful in other Martyrologies (4). T.

(4) See Hiſt. des Ouvrages des Savans, Mois de Janvier 1688, Art. 1.

PECKIUS (PETER), born at Zirckzee in Zealand in the year 1529, took his Degree of Doctor of Law at Louvain, in the year 1553, and after he had been there Regius Profeſſor of the Paratitla, he was appointed Profeſſor of the Canon Law in the year 1562. He gained ſuch a reputation by his Lectures and by his Works [A], that in the year 1586 he was promoted to the Office of Counſellor in the ſupreme Council of Mechlin. He died there July the 16th, 1589; his corps was carried to Louvain to be interred there in St. Michael's Church, where his widow and his children cauſed a monument to be raiſed for him, with an epitaph (a) engraved upon it, which Aubertus le Miré and Melchior Adam have tranſcribed (b). His ſon PETER PECKIUS was Chancellor of Brabant, and Counſellor of State. He gained a great reputation by his prudence and eloquence in his embaſſies to the Emperor Matthias, and to King Henry IV. He wrote ſeveral Latin Poems, and amongſt others, Votum pro ſtudiis Humanitatis, which has been printed. He died in the year 1625 (c).

(a) See Valerius Andreas, p. 755. Bibliotb. Belgicæ.

(b) See Melchior Adam, in Vit. Juriſc. p. 302.

(c) Valerius Andreas, Bibliotb. Belgicæ, p. 756.

[A] His works.] Men eſteem particularly his Treatiſes de Teſtamento Conjugum, de Jure Siſtendi, and de Juris Canonici Regulis (1). There are ſeveral editions of his writings; and there was a complete edition of them publiſhed in the year 1647. His Commentary ad Tit. de Nautæ, &c. printed at Louvain in the year 1556, and at the Hague, in the year 1603, was reprinted in the year 1647, with very good notes written by Arnold Vinnius The two former editions abounded with errors of the preſs (2). Vinnius added to it, Leges Navales & Jus Navale Rhodiorum, in Greek and Latin. After this edition, there was one publiſhed at Amſterdam, in the year 1668, in 8vo: to which they have added a Summary, or an Index of the Contents, and ſome other things; but the Correctors of the preſs have acquitted themſelves very indifferently of their duty.

(1) See Melchior Adam, in Vitis Juris conſultorum, p. 303.

(2) That which was printed in the year 1645, in the collection of all Peckius's works, does not leſs abound with errors of the preſs.

☞ PEIRCE (JAMES), an eminent Diſſenting Miniſter, was born in the year 1674 (a), at Wapping in London, of parents who lived in good faſhion, and left a good reputation behind them for ſobriety and works of charity (b). By his mother, who died laſt, when he was about ſeven years old, he, with a brother and ſiſter, who were both older than himſelf, was committed to Mr. Matthew Mead, a famous Diſſenting Miniſter at Stepney, as his Guardian, at whoſe houſe he lived for ſome time after his mother's death, and was taught by the ſame tutors Mr. Mead kept for his own ſons, one of whom was Mr. John Neſbit, afterwards an Independent Miniſter in London. He was afterwards by Mr. Mead's direction put to other Grammar ſchools, and at laſt ſent to Utrecht in Holland, where he had his academical inſtitution, and ſtudied under Witſius, Leydecker, Grævius, Leuſden, De Vries, and Luyts, and was well known to the celebrated Mr. Hadrian Reland, who was then his fellow ſtudent, and afterwards when he was Profeſſor correſponded by letter with Mr. Peirce. The latter part of his time abroad our Author ſpent at Leyden, where he attended Perizonius and Noodt eſpecially, hearing Gronovius, Mark and Spanheim occaſionally; and from ſome of theſe Profeſſors in both Univerſities he afterwards received very obliging letters. After he had ſpent above five years in theſe two places, he lived privately in England, for ſome time at London,

(a) Mr. Joſeph Hallet, Jun. in his ſermon on Mr. James Peirce, tells us, that at his death, March 30th, 1726, he was in the 53d year of his age.

(b) See Mr. Peirce's poſtſcript to his Remarks upon the account of what was tranſacted in the Aſſemby at Exon, London 1719, in 8vo.

London, among his relations, and for ſome time at Oxford, where he lodged in a private houſe, and frequented the Bodleian Library. After this at the deſire of his friends, he preached an evening Lecture on the Lord's-Days at the Meeting-houſe in Miles-Lane London, and occaſionally in other places, without intereſting himſelf in the diſputes then on foot between the Preſbyterians and Independents. With the Miniſters of the former ſort he became well acquainted; and at the end of two years, upon their earneſt ſollicitations, he ſettled at Cambridge, they themſelves ſubſcribing liberally for his encouragement there, where he was treated with great reſpect and civility by many Gentlemen of the Univerſity (c). In 1713 he was removed to a Congregation at Exeter, where he continued till the year 1718, when a controverſy ariſing among the Diſſenters about the explication of the Trinity, three articles were propoſed to him, and Mr. Joſeph Hallet, ſenior, another Diſſenting Miniſter in Exeter, in order to be ſubſcribed; which both of them refuſed, and were ejected from their Congregation [A]; upon which there was a new Meeting opened March 15, 1618-9, in that city, of which Mr. Peirce continued Miniſter till his death, which happened March 30, 1726, in the 53d year of his age. He was interred in St. Leonard's Church-yard near that city [B]. His Funeral Sermon was preached April the 3d following by Mr. Joſeph Hallet jun. on John xiii. 17. and printed at London 1726, in 8vo [C]; in which he was reſtrained by Mr. Peirce himſelf from beſtowing any encomiums on him (d); but Mr. Hallet obſerves in a Letter communicated to us (e), that "he was a man of the ſtricteſt virtue, exemplary piety, and great "learning; and was exceedingly communicative of his knowledge. He would con- "deſcend

(c) Ibid.

(d) See Mr. Hallet's Sermon, preached upon occaſion of the death of the Reverend and learned Mr. James Peirce, p. 16.

(e) By Mr. Matthew Wilkins, and dated at Exeter, July 31, 1738.

[A] Three articles were propoſed to him, and Mr. Joſeph Hallet, Senior, another Diſſenting Miniſter of Exeter, in order to be ſubſcribed, which both of them refuſed, and were ejected from their congregation.] Mr. Peirce has given a particular account of this whole affair in Caſe of the Miniſters ejected at Exon, printed at London 1719, in 8vo. The ſecond of the articles propoſed to them to be ſubſcribed was this: That the denying the true and proper Divinity of the Son of God, viz. that he is one God with the Father, is an error of that nature [that is, an error, that is a ſufficient foundation for the people to withdraw from the communion of their Miniſters holding it] contrary to the Doctrine of the Holy Scriptures, and the common Faith of the Reformed Churches. With regard to this article, "I told them, ſays Mr. Peirce (1), that I would "own that Chriſt and the Father were one, becauſe he "ſaid it. They aſked, if I would own they were one "God? I anſwered, if they would turn me to the "text where 'twas ſaid ſo, I would own it; but I "had over and over declared, I would ſubſcribe no "religious teſts at all, that were not expreſſed in "ſcripture words: that if they made it a religious "teſt, that three and two made five, I would refuſe "to ſubſcribe it. And I gave this reaſon for my "ſtiffneſs, that I verily believed, that the worſt miſ-"chief had been done the Church of God, by im-"poſing unſcriptural Creeds and Teſts upon men; "and that now God had ſtirred up a noble ſpi-"rit in man, in whom we little expected it, to "plead againſt impoſitions; and therefore, I could "not in conſcience tamely give up the liberty "they were ſo bravely defending." In another piece (2) he tells us, that he changed his former notions about the Trinity, by reading Dr. Clarke's Scripture Doctrine; a book, ſays he, written with ſuch ſtrength and clearneſs, that I only wonder all that read it are not convinced, and that I did not myſelf ſooner diſcover what he has, I think I may ſay, demonſtrated to be the Doctrine of the Bible.

(1) Caſe of the Miniſters ejected at Exon, p. 11. 4th edit.

(2) Security of Truth, without the Aſſiſtance of Perſecution or Scurrility; being an Anſwer to Mr. Enty's Truth and Liberty conſiſtent and maintained, p. 7. See likewiſe The Weſtern Inquiſition, p. 8.

[B] Interred in St. Leonard's Church-yard, near that city.] The following epitaph was intended to have been inſcribed upon a ſtone over his grave, but refuſed by the Rector of the Pariſh (3).

H. S. E.
JACOBUS PEIRCIUS,
Clari Nominis Theologus;
Qui ingenio perſpicaci limatoq; judicio
Tantam Eruditionem feliciter conjunxit
Ut utrum eximiis naturæ dotibus,
An induſtriæ ornamentis magis conſpicuus eſſet,
In dubio reliquiſſe videatur.
Juvenis ſtudiorum cauſa Ultrajectum ſe contulit;
Unde poſt quinquennium domum reverſus,
Indefeſſo labore atq; diligentiâ,
Omni ferè literarum genere mentem implevit,
Quo ad Theologiæ cognitionem ſubſidii aliquid
Sibi comparare poſſet.
Tantâ igitur optimarum Artium ſcientiâ inſtructus
Cunctas ſacri muneris partes fideliſſimè præſtitit,
Tam accuratis Concionibus quam ſcriptis eruditis
Plurimum celebratus.
Veritatis autem exquirendæ ſemper ſtudioſiſſimus,
Cum in nonnullis tandem accidit ut ſententiam mutaret,
Pari prudentiâ & integritate ſe geſſit;
Nam ut alios ea celare ſedulo curavit,
Dum illorum intereſſe ut ſcirent haud credidit,
Sic cum primum vulgare neceſſarium judicavit,
Nullo ſuo commodo aut incommodo adduci potuit,
Quo minus publicè profiteretur.
Hinc in quorundam offenſionem forte incidens,
Quibuſcum antea concorditer vixerat,
Cum reliquam vitæ partem jam magis privatam,
Sibi vero haud minus laborioſam,
Neq; aliis minus utilem tranſigere ſtatuerat,
Sacris Literis explicandis ſe præcipuè addixit,
Cui præclaro operi cum quatuor annos impenderat,
Partibus quibuſdam editis, quæ ingenii
Et Doctrinæ perpetua erunt monumenta,
Lethali morbo correptus pie placidèq; deceſſit
III Kal. Aprilis A. D. M.DCC.XXVI.
Ætatis ſuæ LIII.

(3) See Dr. Benjamin Avery's Preface, to Mr. Peirce's Fifteen Sermons, p. 5 & ſeqq. edit. London 1728, in 8vo.

The Rector was then requeſted, that he would give leave to have the following words inſcribed on the tomb; viz. Here lyes the reverend, learned, and pious Mr. JAMES PEIRCE; but he would not conſent to it. At laſt the following inſcription was allowed to ſtand; Mr. JAMES PEIRCE's Tomb, 1726. But in Mr. Peirce's meeting, a monument is erected to his memory, with the following epitaph on it:

This Monument was erected
By mournful Friends,
As a laſting Teſtimony of their high Regard
To the Memory and Honour
Of the reverend, pious, and learned Mr. JAMES PEIRCE;
A moſt worthy and endeared PASTOR OF THIS CHURCH,
A rational, judicious, and affectionate Preacher;
A very laborious and ſagacious Interpreter of the holy Scriptures;
A ſincere Lover and ſtrenuous Defender of Truth;
A courageous Sufferer while living
For maintaining the Doctrines of the Goſpel
Of Chriſt,
And for aſſerting the Liberties of Chriſtians;
And after death denied a juſt Encomium
On his Tomb in Leonard's Church-yard
By the Rector of the Pariſh.
The great, good Man, departed hence
In Peace,
March the 30th, 1726,
In the 53d Year of his Age.

[C] His funeral Sermon, &c.] In this ſermon is quoted the following paſſage from the preamble to Mr. Peirce's will: "I do ſincerely and humbly commend " deſcend to converſe on ſubjects of learning with young men, in whom he found " any thirſt after uſeful knowledge; and in his diſcourſing with them would be ex- " tremely free, and treat them as if they had been his equals in learning and years." We ſhall give a catalogue of his writings in the note [D].

PEIRESC

" mend my ſoul to God, whenever he ſhall pleaſe " to call me out of this troubleſome and litigious " world; profeſſing my ſteady belief in one God, " the God and Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt; and " in that one Lord Jeſus Chriſt, in whom, as my " only Saviour, I have fixed my truſt, and through " whoſe atonement and interceſſion alone, I deſire " and expect to find mercy with that God, whom I " have greatly offended, even while I have endea- " voured to ſerve him with that ſincerity, which, I " truſt, he will accept: profeſſing likewiſe my ſin- " cere belief of the Chriſtian Religion, as it is con- " tained in the holy Scriptures, which I have la- " boured, in the uprightneſs of my heart, and with " all plainneſs, to preach; and thanking God with " my Soul, that he has enabled me to reſiſt the temp- " tations I have met with, eſpecially of late, to " corrupt the word of God, and offer violence to my " own conſcience; and declaring now, under the " moſt ſerious and ſolemn view of death and eter- " nity, that my conſcience reproaches me not for the " part I have acted in the controverſy concerning " the Trinity, but that I can review my publick be- " haviour relating to it, with a confidence, whereof, " I truſt, I ſhall not be aſhamed in the day of judg- " ment; and thanking God, that he has honoured " me to ſuffer reproach for the ſake of his truth and " a good conſcience towards him."

[D] We ſhall give a catalogue of his writings in the note.] I. Philoſophical. Exercitatio Philoſophica de Homoeomeria Anaxagorea. Utrecht 1692. II. On the controverſy between the Church of England and the Diſſenters. 1. Eight Letters to Dr. Wells, London 1706 and 1707. 2. Conſideration on the ſixth Chapter of the Abridgment of the London Caſes, relating to Baptiſm and the ſign of the Croſs. London 1708. 3. Vindiciæ Fratrum Diſſentientium in Angliâ. London 1710, in 8vo. 4. An Enquiry into the preſent duty of a Low Churchman. London 1711, in 8vo. 5. Vindication of the Diſſenters. London 1717, in 8vo. 6. A Letter to Dr. Bennet, occaſioned by his late treatiſe concerning the Nonjurors Separation, &c. London 1717, in 8vo. 7. Preface to the Preſbyterians not chargeable with King Charles's death. Exeter 1717, in 8vo. 8. Defence of the Diſſenting Miniſtry and Ordination, in two parts. London 1718, in 8vo. 9. The Diſſenters Reaſons for not writing in behalf of Perſecution. Deſigned for the Satisfaction of Dr. Snape, in a Letter to him. London 1718, in 8vo. 10. Intereſt of the Whigs with relation to the Teſt-Act. London 1718, in 8vo. 11. Reflections on Dean Sherlock's Vindication of the Corporation and Teſt Acts. London 1718, in 8vo. 12. Charge of miſrepreſentations maintained againſt Dean Sherlock. London 1719, in 8vo. 13. Loyalty, integrity, and ingenuity of High Church and the Diſſenters compared. London 1719, in 8vo. III. On the Controverſy about the Ejectment at Exeter. 1. The Caſe of the Miniſters ejected at Exon. London 1719, in 8vo. 2. Defence of the Caſe. London 1719, in 8vo. 3. Animadverſions on the true Account of the Proceedings at Salter's Hall: with a Letter to Mr. Eveleigh. London 1719, in 8vo. 4. A Second Letter to Mr. Eveleigh, in anſwer to his Sober Reply. Exeter 1719, in 8vo. 5. A Letter to a ſubſcribing Miniſter in Defence of the Animadverſions, &c. London 1719, in 8vo. 6. Remarks upon the Account of what was tranſacted in the aſſembly at Exon. London 1719, in 8vo. 7. An Anſwer to Mr. Enty's Defence of the Aſſembly. London 1719, in 8vo. 8. The Weſtern Inquiſition. London 1720, in 8vo. 9. The Security of truth, in Anſwer to Mr. Enty. London 1721, in 8vo. 10. Inquiſition-honeſty diſplayed. London 1722, in 8vo. IV. On the Doctrine of the Trinity. 1. A Letter to a Diſſenter in Exeter. London 1719, in 8vo. 2. Plain Chriſtianity defended, in four parts. London 1719, 1720, in 8vo. 3. Thirteen Queries propounded to the Rev. Mr. Walrond, in an Appendix To the Innocent Vindicated. London 1719, in 8vo. There was an Anſwer to theſe Queries printed in 1721, under the title of, An Anſwer to ſome Queries printed at Exon, relating to the Arian Controverſy, and aſcribed to Dr. Daniel Waterland. Mr. Peirce had ſome thoughts of writing a Reply, but changing his purpoſe, Mr. Joſeph Hallet, jun. wrote a Defence of them, printed at London 1736, in 8vo. with this title: The Truth and Importance of the Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity and Incarnation demonſtrated: in a Defence of the late learned Mr. Peirce's thirteen Queries, and a Reply to Dr. W——'s, and a Gentleman's Anſwer to them, &c. 4. Propoſitions relating to the Controverſy concerning the Trinity, in a Letter to the Rev. Mr. Enty. London 1720, in 8vo. 5. An Anſwer to a Pamphlet entitled, Texts of Holy Scripture compared, &c. London 1721, in 8vo. 6. A Reply to Mr. Enty's late Piece, entitled, Truth and Liberty conſiſtent, &c. London 1721, in 8vo. V. Commentaries on the Scripture. A Paraphraſe and Notes on the Epiſtle of St. Paul to the Coloſſians. With an Appendix upon Epheſ. iv. 8. London 1725, in 4to. In the Dedication to Sir Peter King, Lord Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas, our Author obſerves, that he was " indebted to the great Mr. Locke " more than to any man, for what underſtanding " I have, ſays he, in St. Paul's Epiſtles, and his ad- " mirable Rules and Examples I have, the beſt I " could, endeavoured to follow." And in the Preface he ſays, " that St. Paul's Epiſtles have always " been eſteemed a noble part of the New Teſtament; " but as we are told, and every one who reads them " knows, there are in them ſome things hard to be " underſtood, 2 Pet. iii. 16. they therefore have done " good ſervice to the Chriſtian Religion, who have " by their writings made this part of the holy Scrip- " tures more eaſy and intelligible. Mr. Locke, has " in my judgment, done more this way than any " man; and indeed he had a head admirably turn- " ed for the tracing and diſcovering the profound " and intricate diſcourſes and intentions of ſo cloſe a " reaſoner, who yet abounds with all manner of " figures and long digreſſions. I am not the only " perſon, who have often lamented his not applying " himſelf ſooner to this ſtudy, and that we ſhould " have his Paraphraſe and Notes only upon five of " the Epiſtles; but we have reaſon to be thankful " for them, not only for the light they give to " thoſe Epiſtles, but the uſe they may be of in help- " ing us to underſtand all the reſt. I have in the " preſent work endeavoured to imitate this great " man. . . . . The reaſon why I choſe firſt to ſtudy " this Epiſtle was partly becauſe it was not one of " thoſe Mr. Locke had explained, and therefore a " Comment upon it in his way ſeemed to be wanted. " but to be ingenuous, my chief reaſon was, becauſe " Mr. Locke had admirably cleared the Epiſtle to the " Epheſians, which being in deſign, method, and " expreſſion, very like to this to the Coloſſians, I " concluded his work would yield me much aſſiſtance " in mine. For I reſolved from the firſt to transfer " whatever he had ſaid on that Epiſtle, that was to " my purpoſe, into my work on this. And that I " may not appear a plagiary in not owning by whom " I profit, I acquaint the reader, that I have kept " to my reſolution, and have often borrowed his " words, even where I have not named him; and " this I have the rather done, that he may read " with the more attention, ſince otherwiſe he may " not know whom he is reading, Mr. Locke or my- " ſelf. I would not be thought a bare tranſcriber " from what I have now ſaid. I have ſtudied the " Epiſtle through and through with the greateſt ap- " plication I was able; and there were ſome parts, " wherein I could have no help from Mr. Locke, or " any one elſe, to my ſatisfaction; upon which, at " my firſt ſetting about the work, and long after, I " deſpaired of ſaying any thing, but that I did not " underſtand them. I can however now ſay, I have " found no great reaſon upon the whole to ſpeak " much in that manner, but have ſatisfied myſelf " about moſt of thoſe paſſages, that ſeemed moſt " difficult." 2. A Paraphraſe and Notes on the Epiſtle of St.

PEIRESC (NICHOLAS CLAUDIUS FABRI, LORD OF) Counſellor in the Parliament of Aix, was born in Provence (a), December the 1ſt, 1580. I might add many particulars to thoſe which Moreri relates of him; but the little ſpace I have left, with regard to the letters of the alphabet which follow P, obliges me to ſuppreſs ſeveral articles, and to be very ſhort in many others. I ſhall only obſerve that no man was ever more uſeful to the Republick of Letters than our Peireſc. He was, if one may ſay ſo, the Attorney General of that Commonwealth: he uſed to encourage the Authors; he furniſhed them with hints and materials; he employed his income in cauſing the moſt ſcarce and moſt uſeful Manuſcripts to be either bought, or tranſcribed. His literary correſpondence extended to all the parts of the world [A]: philoſophical experiments, the curioſities of nature, the productions of art, antiquity, hiſtory, the languages, were all equally the ſubjects of his cares, and of his enquiries. You will meet with a particular account of this in his life, written elegantly and learnedly by Peter Gaſſendi [B]. It may be of ſome uſe to obſerve that this man, who was ſo famous throughout all Europe, and whoſe death was lamented by ſo many Poets, and in ſo many Languages [C], and put the humoriſts at Rome into a pompous mourning (b), was unknown to ſeveral perſons of his own nation,

(a) In the village of Beaugencier, which Gaſſendi calls in Latin Belgenſerium.

(b) See the rem. [C].

St. Paul to the Philippians. London 1725, in 4to. 3. A Paraphraſe and Notes on the Epiſtle of St. Paul to the Hebrews: with Diſſertations on ſeveral Texts of Scripture. London 1727, in 4to. VI. Theological. 1. An Eſſay in favour of giving the Euchariſt to Children. London 1728, in 8vo. 2. Fifteen Sermons, and a Scripture Catechiſm. London 1728, in 8vo. T.

[A] His literary correſpondence extended to all the parts of the world.] I have been acquainted by a letter from Monſieur the Abbot Nicaiſe (1), that Monſieur Thomaſin Mazaugues (2), Counſellor in the Parliament of Aix, has by him ten thouſand letters, which were found among Monſieur Peireſc's papers, that he made a choice of them; and that there are many which this celebrated Senator received from Holſtenius, from Father Kircher, from the Cavalier del Pozzo, from Salmaſius, from Selden, from Camden, from Pignorius, from Gualdo, from Meſſieurs Du Puy, from Monſieur Rigaut, and from ſeveral other learned men, all which would make an handſome volume in 4to, which might be publiſhed with this Title, Epiſtolæ Virorum Eruditorum quæ extant ad Peireſkium. You will meet with ſome curious particulars relating to theſe letters, in the beginning of the Menagiana, 2d edition. Here follows a paſſage from Balzac, which will not be beſide my purpoſe. " I am of your opinion, as to the great and " noble encomium you beſtow on your friend: if you " will give me leave to make uſe in French of an " expreſſion borrowed from the Greek, I would add, " that we have loſt by the death of that eminent man, " a piece of the Shipwreck of antiquity, and the relicks of " the golden age. All the virtues of the heroic times had " taken ſanctuary in that noble ſoul. The general " corruption had no influence on his ſound conſtitu- " tion; the evil that touched him could not ſtain him. " His generoſity was not limited by the ſea, nor con- " fined on this ſide the Alps: it ſpread its fa- " vours and kindneſs every where; he received thanks " from the remoteſt parts of Syria, and even from " the top of Mount Libanus. With a moderate eſtate " he had the ſoul of a great Lord, and though he " did not enjoy the friendſhip of Auguſtus, yet he " was a Mecænas (3)." Here follows another paſſage. The late Monſieur de Malherbe was one of his intimate friends; he mentioned him ſometimes to me, but only as a man, who was extremely curious, a great lover of news, and of hiſtorical accounts, a great inquirer after medals, and manuſcripts, a man who loved to make acquaintances in foreign countries, and a great admirer of all the Doctors of Leyden (4).

[B] His life written . . . . by Peter Gaſſendi.] That work is very much eſteemed: however, ſome pretend that ſeveral things in it have not been accurately told (5). I imagine this relates to the paſſages, in which Salmaſius is mentioned. A Phyſician of Caſtres (6), who has made a collection of ſome particulars, of which Gaſſendi ſaid nothing, forgot on the other hand to inſert in his collection ſeveral elogies of Monſieur Peireſc, which Colomiés has inſerted in his Gallia Orientalis (7).

[C] His death was lamented . . . . in ſo many languages.] Naudé will furniſh me with the whole Commentary on this text. " (8) I wiſh . . . I could hear " you talk a little of that famous academy of the " Humoriſts, where, as Monſieur the Baron de Rians " ſaid one day, they had celebrated the funerals of " his Uncle, the Abbot and Counſellor Peireſc, in " above forty different languages . . . . (9). You " may judge how much that academy is eſteemed at " Rome, ſince that ornament of France, that great " Protector of men of letters, that man of an immenſe " learning, would become a member of it; and as " he had honoured that famous academy by his name, " ſhe would alſo, in return, celebrate his memory by " ſuch funeral honours, which ſhe is uſed to pay on- " ly to thoſe who had governed her, and even only " on account of their uncommon virtue and learn- " ing." Hereupon Naudé quotes Gaſſendi, who relates, that beſides the funeral oration, which was delivered in Latin by Monſieur Bouchard, they alſo recited there ſeveral elogies of the deceaſed, in Italian, Latin, and Greek verſe (10); after which Naudé obſerves, that the Baron de Rians, who mentions 40 languages, and Gaſſendi, who mentions but three, are both in the right; for, ſays he (11), Monſieur Peyreſk's praiſes were celebrated in the academy, and in the preſence of the Cardinals, only in three languages. But they inſerted many more afterwards, in the collection that was made and printed at Rome, with the title Pangloſſy, ſive generis humani Leſſus in funere delicii ſui Nicolai Claudii Fabricii Peireſcii, or the Lamentation of Mankind, on the death of its darling Nicholas Claudius Fabri Peireſc, which contains really the elogies of that great man, in forty languages, I had almoſt ſaid, in as many different characters. Whence Scipio de Grammond, who aſſiſted at that ceremony, and who died ſome time after at Venice, took an opportunity to write the following lines, in order to teſtify how honourable that Pangloſſy was, both to Monſieur Peireſc, and to the city of Rome.

Indus, Arabs, Medus, Gallus, Germanus, Etruſcus,
Anglus, Idumæus, Sarmata, Grajus, Iber,
Et quicunque venit gelido de cardine, & uſto,
Eoiſque plagis, occiduiſque ſonus;
Omnes Fabricio concordi voce parentant,
Qui norat proprios reddere cuique ſonos.
Proh ſuperi! quanta eſt Romana potentia, quæ nunc
Tot populis, & tot gentibus ora aperit.
Romana verè nunc clauditur orbis in urbe,
Cui tam multifido competit ore loqui.

i. e. " The Indian, the Arabian, the Mede, the " Frenchman, the Italian, the Engliſhman, the Idu- " mean, the Sarmatian, the Greek, the Iriſhman, " and they who live towards the northern, or towards " the ſouthern pole, they who came from the eaſt " or from the weſt, all celebrate the obſequies of " Peireſc, who could ſpeak to every one of them " in their own language. Good God! how great is " the power of Rome, which opens the mouth of ſo " many nations. We may truly ſay now, that the " whole world is collected within the walls of Rome, " where ſo many languages are now ſpoke."

Balzac ſhews ſome contempt for that Pangloſſy (12). " What does Signor John James (13) mean, with his " frightful title of Pangloſſy? To make up the num- " ber of forty, there muſt be twenty-three languages,

(1) Dated from Dijon, Feb. the 21ſt, 1696.

(2) Who is mentioned above in the rem. [B] of the artic. MARTELLIUS. He did me the honour to write to me, February the 4th, 1699, a letter which contains a moſt particular account of this, which I would have added to this remark [A], if I had not thought that the publick will find it in the Preface to that choice Collection of Letters, before the 2d edit. of this Dictionary be finiſhed. That Collection is printing at Geneva.

(3) Balzac, Lettre à Mr. l'Huillier. It is the 2d of the 2d book of the 1ſt part of his Choice Letters, or Lettres Choiſies, p. 48 of the Dutch edit.

(4) Ibid. Lettre 13, to Chapelain, Liv. 2. p. m. 73.

(5) Multa per-peram neſcio quo fato, in vita Peireskii à Gaſſendo relata, alias fortaſſe docebimus. Clementius, in Vita Salmaſii.

(6) Peter Borel. His Auctarium ad Vitam Peireſcii, was printed at the Hague, in the year 1655.

(7) p. 175, &c.

(8) Naudé, Dialogue de Maſcurat, p. 138.

(9) Ibid. p. 139.

(10) Et carmina quidem in defuncti laudem Italice, Latine, Græce recitarunt lectiſſima totius urbis ingenia: funebrem vero orationem copioſam ſane, & elegantem pronunciavit Joannes Jacobus Buccardus delectus ad id muneris. Gaſſendi in Vita Peireskii, lib. 6. p. m. 349.

(11) Naudé, Dialogue de Maſcurat, p. 141.

(12) They are in the wrong to call it Pandegloſſie in Moreri, and then to put Leſſas inſtead of Leſſus in the editions printed in Holland.

(13) That is to ſay, Bouchard, who made the funeral oration, where he ſtyles himſelf Joannes Jacobus Buccardus.

nation, though men of merit and learning [D]. He died June the 24th, 1637. The Aſtrologers had foretold that he would have a wife and children, and yet he was never married [E].

" which Scaliger was unacquainted with, and the " ſoul of Parnaſſus muſt have been commended in " the gibberiſh of the people of Biſcay, and of Lower- " Britany. This muſt have made a ſad muſick on " your Parnaſſus. It is letting the Barbarians into " that ſacred place, and being as guilty as thoſe who " ſhewed the way into Italy to the King of Sweden's " predeceſſors (14)." See alſo what he obſerves in two other letters, to the ſame Monſieur Chapelain (15).

(14) Balzac, Letter 26, to Chapelain, Liv. 4.

(15) The 28th of the 4th book, and the 1ſt of the 5th.

[D] He was unknown to ſeveral perſons of his own nation, though men of merit and learning.] Balzac furniſhes me with the proof of this aſſertion. " Would " you think Monſieur de la Rochefoucaud never " heard any thing of our Monſieur Peireſc, and that " many other perſons, who are neither Barbarians " nor ignorant, were not better acquainted with " him? You ſee by this, that he had a good reputa- " tion, but that it is the Italian Signor, who un- " dertook to make it great, and that his Pangloſſy is " rather an effect of his ſolicitations, than a volun- " tary reſpect which the ſeveral nations reſolved to " pay to his memory (16)." Here follows another paſſage from the ſame Author. I am fully perſuaded of Monſieur Peireſc's merit, but it was of his reputation I ſpoke; and you know that there is a Donum Famæ, which all the learned do not enjoy, and which makes them, who enjoy it, known not only to the Senate, and to the Order of the Knights, but alſo to the common people, and day-labourers (17).

(16) Balzac, Lettre 1, of the 5th book to to Chapelain, p. 205, 206.

(17) Idem, Lett. 4, of the ſame book, p. 212.

[E] The Aſtrologers had foretold that he would have a wife and children, and yet he was never married.] Gaſſendi, the moſt formidable adverſary of all thoſe people, could not fail to laſh them on this occaſion, for, having ſet down the day and hour of his Hero's birth, he adds, Quod attingo ſolum, ne videar circa temporis circumſtantiam non fuiſſe ſatis diligens; non verò ut faciam hariolandi anſam conjectoribus, quò jam poſt viri obitum, certiùs quàm antè, fata retexant. Etenim mirum dictu eſt, quàm multa mentiti Aſtrologi fuerint, ſeu annos ſpectes, quibus non vixit; ſeu uxorem, & liberos, aliaque, quibus caruerit; ſeu cætera multa, quæ eſt conſequutus (18), i. e. " I hint this on- " ly, that I may not be thought neglectful with re- " gard to the circumſtances of time, but not with " a deſign to give the Diviners an opportunity to " conjecture again, and to unfold his deſtiny with " more certainty now he is dead, than they could do " before. One cannot but wonder at the many fal- " ſities the Aſtrologers foretold of him, either with " regard to the number of years he was to live, " or to his wife and children, and other things, " which he never had, or with regard to a great ma- " ny more, which he obtained." We muſt then correct the paſſage in the Menagiana, where we meet with theſe words. " Monſieur Peireſc left by " his will an hundred volumes to Monſieur Gaſſen- " di, which he was to chooſe out of his whole li- " brary. But the ſon refuſed to execute his father's " laſt will, till he was forced to it by a ſentence " from the Court of Juſtice (19)."

(18) Gaſſendus, in vita Peireskii, lib. 1. circa init.

(19) Menagiana, p. 2. of the firſt Dutch edit. This miſtake has been corrected in the 2d edition.

PELIAS, the ſon of Neptune by Tyro the daughter of Salmoneus, was nurſed by a Mare (a). He reigned in Theſſaly very unjuſtly; for having uſurped the Throne, he maintained himſelf on it either by putting to death, or by perſecuting thoſe who had a right to the Crown [A]. He did not dare to uſe violence againſt his nephew Jaſon, who went and claimed from him his father's Crown (b). He choſe rather to evade that claim by propoſing to the young Prince a religious expedition, which was very proper to gain him a very great reputation [B]. It was the conqueſt of the golden Fleece. Jaſon undertook that expedition. A report being ſpread that it proved fatal to him, Pelias became (a) Ælian. Hiſt. lib. 12. cap. 42.

(b) Pindar. Ode 4. Pythior.

[A] Having uſurped the throne, he maintained himſelf in it, either by putting to death, or by perſecuting thoſe who had a right to the crown.] The Kingdom belonged to Æſon, and not to Pelias, as appears from their Genealogy. Æſon was the ſon of Cretheus (1), whoſe father was Æolus (2). But Pelias was the ſon of Neptune (3), and of a daughter of Salmoneus, Cretheus's brother (4). I add, that Jupiter had given the Kingdom to Æolus, both for him and his poſterity.

Τῶν ποτε
Ζεὺς ὤπασε λαγέτᾳ
Αἰόλῳ, καὶ παισὶ τιμάν.

Quod (Regnum) olim Jupiter dedit populorum duci Æolo & liberis ut eſſet illis decus (5). So that according to the laws of ſucceſſion, it belonged, not to Pelias, who was deſcended from Æolus only by his mother, but to Æſon, who deſcended from him in the male line. Obſerve, that Æſon and Pelias were brothers by the mother's ſide; for Tyro, Salmoneus's daughter, having got two twins, Pelias and Neleus by Neptune (6), married her uncle Cretheus, by whom ſhe got three ſons, Æſon, Amythaon, and Pheres (7). It is plain, that Pelias having aſcended the throne by the excluſion of Æſon, was an uſurper. Æſon and his wife feared him to ſuch a degree, that they did not dare to educate their ſon Jaſon, but as ſoon as he was born, they had him carried ſecretly into Chiron's cave, and publiſhed that he was dead; and they performed all the ceremonies of the funeral, the better to impoſe on the tyrant (8). By that means they ſaved their child's life. But they could not ſecure themſeves againſt Pelias's cruelty; for he forced Æſon to drink the blood of a bull, and gave orders to put Amphinome, Æſon's wife, to death, and cauſed their ſon Promachus to be killed (9). This happened during the journey of the Argonauts, and was occaſioned by a falſe report which had been ſpread of their death. Obſerve that Amphinome, having taken ſanctuary with Pelias's houſhold Gods, and made a thouſand imprecations againſt him, ſtabbed herſelf (10); others ſay ſhe hanged herſelf (11). I do not mention Pelias's cruelty againſt Sidero, Tyro's mother-in-law (12): he killed her on the very altar of Jupiter: it was to revenge his mother Tyro, who had been very ill uſed by that ſtep-mother. Τελειωθέντες δὲ ἀνηγώρισαν τὴν μητέρα, καὶ τὴν μητρυιὰν ἀπέκτειναν σιδήρῳ (13). Κακωμένην γὰρ γνόντες ὑπ' αὐτῆς τὴν μητέρα, ὥρμησαν ἐπ' αὐτήν. Ἡ δὲ φθάσασα, εἰς τὸ τῆς Ηρας τέμενος κατέφυγεν. Πελίας δὲ ἐπ' αὐτῶν τῶν βωμῶν αὐτὴν κατέσφαξε. Καὶ καθόλου διετέλει τὴν Ἥραν ἀτιμάζων. Qui (Pelias & Neleus) cum ad juſtam integramque ætatem perveniſſent, agnita matre, novercam, quòd ejus opera parentem male affectam percepiſſent, facto in eam impetu occiderunt: quæ, tametſi intra Junonis templum confugere antevertiſſet, eam tamen Pelias ſuper aram ipſam jugulavit; & in omnibus rebus Junonem negligebat (14). The Author, who acquaints us with this, adds a particular, which it will not be improper to relate here; it is, that Pelias and Neleus, though twins, lived at variance together; that Neleus was forced to yield, and to go and dwell in another place. Ἐφασίασον δὲ ὕστερον πρὸς ἀλλήλους, καὶ Νηλεὺς μὲν ἐκπεσὼν, ἦκεν εἰς Μεσσήνην, καὶ Πύλον κτίζει. At qui poſtea inter ſe diſcordiam exercere non deſierunt. Neleus demum regno pulſus Meſſenam commigravit, & Pylo urbe condita, &c (15). Diodorus Siculus mentions this diſunion of the two brothers, and obſerves, that Pelias having obtained the city of Iolcos, and the adjacent country, raiſed an army, and led it into Peloponneſus (16). Pauſanias relates, that Neleus made his eſcape out of Iolcos, becauſe he dreaded Pelias (17).

(1) Apollodor. lib. 1. p. m. 45.

(2) Idem, ibid. p. 27.

(3) Idem, ibid. p. 45.

(4) Idem, ibid. p. 27, 43.

(5) Pindar. Pythior. Ode 4. p. m. 341.

(6) Apollodor. lib. 1. p. 43.

(7) Idem, ibid. p. 45.

(8) Pythior. Ode 4. p. 341.

(9) Diodor. Siculus, lib. 4. cap. 51. p. m. 241. See alſo Apoll. Bibliotb. lib. 1. p. 69.

(10) Idem, ibid.

(11) Apollodor. Ibid.

(12) Diodorus Siculus, lib. 4. cap. 70. p. 257. calls her thus, whereby Meziriac ſur les Epitres d'Ovidie, p. 541. has corrected ſeveral paſſages.

(13) Read Σιδηρῳ according to Meziriac's correction, which is approved by Monſieur le Fevre of Saumur, in his notes on Apollodorus, p. 268.

(14) Apollodor. Bibliotb. lib. 1. p. 45.

(15) Idem, ibid.

(16) Diodor. Siculus, lib. 4. cap. 70. p. 258.

(17) Pauſan. lib. 4. p. 112.

[B] He propoſed to Jaſon a religious expedition, which was very proper to gain him a very great reputation.] Numberleſs Authors aſſert with one accord, that he favoured became more bold in his cruelties (c). He was puniſhed for it by the artifices of Medea; his own daughters cut his throat, ſhe having given them hopes that by that means they would make him grow young again (d). He deſired ſo ardently that ſhe would do him that ſervice, that he told her, I give you leave to flee me alive, if you can but put me again in the condition of a youth (e). Some ſay that ſhe did not really reſtore youth to him. Cicero is one of them, nor do I think that he miſtook the one for the other deſignedly, as Muretus imagines [C]. Jaſon behaved very generouſly towards Pelias's daughters, and left favoured the deſign of the Argonauts, only becauſe he imagined it would be a proper method to get rid of Jaſon, whoſe merit he dreaded. Let us quote only Valerius Flaccus; the paſſage is ſomewhat long, but no matter for that, ſince it will acquaint the Reader with another particular, namely, the extent of that Tyrant's dominions.

(c) See the rem. [A].

(d) See Diodorus Siculus, lib. 1. cap. 52, &c.

(e) See Varro's words in the rem. [C].

Hæmoniam primis Pelias frænabat ab annis:
Jam gravis, & longus populis metus: illius omnes,
Ionium quicunque petunt: ille Othryn & Hemum,
Atque imum felix verſabat vomere Olympum.
Sed non ulla quies animo, fratriſque paventi
Progeniem, divûmque minas: hunc nam fore regi
Exitio vateſque canunt, pecudumque per aras
Terrifici monitus iterant: ſuper ipſius ingens
Inſtat fama viri, virtuſque haud læta tyranno.
Ergo anteire metus, juvenumque exſtinguere pergit
Æſonium: letique vias, ac tempora verſat (18).

(18) Valer. Flaccus, Argon. lib. 1. ver. 22.

If I am not miſtaken, Pindar is the only Author, who tells us, that Pelias would make religion to be concerned in that undertaking, and encouraged his nephew by that noble motive (19). Here follows the ſubſtance of that great Poet's diſcourſe; I ſhall make uſe of Meziriac's words. Jaſon being twenty years old, came out of Chiron's cave, and returned into his father Æſon's houſe, where he was viſited by a great many perſons of his relations, amongſt whom were his uncles Pheres and Amythaon, and his firſt couſins Acaſtus and Melampus. He ſpent five whole days in feaſts and entertainments, and in diverting himſelf in their company: and the ſixth day he went with the whole company, and preſented himſelf to Pelias, and required him to ſurrender the Kingdom to him, which was his by law. Pelias ſeeing him ſo well attended, was obliged to give him fair words; he anſwered that he was ready to yield the Kingdom to him; but that he adviſed him to undertake firſt an expedition which would be as pious as glorious; namely, to go to Colchis, to appeaſe the Ghoſt of Phryxus, and to bring the golden Fleece back from Theſſaly: for the Ghoſt of Phryxus appeared often to him in the night time, admoniſhing him to ſend ſome men to Colchis, to call three times upon his ghoſt on his tomb, and to bring back the golden Fleece; and that having conſulted the Oracle upon this, Apollo commanded him the ſame thing. He added that had it not been for his great age, he would have undertaken that voyage himſelf; but that Jaſon had no lawful pretence to be excuſed from it; ſince he was in the prime of his age, ſuch an age, in which the love of glory ought to have more power over his mind, than a vain ambition to reign. Upon the whole he promiſed and moſt ſolemnly ſwore to him, that he would reſign him the Crown the moment he was returned home (20).

(19) See Benoit on Pindar, Ode 4. Pyth. p. 355.

(20) Mezriac, ſur les Epitres d'Ovide, p. 542, 543. This diſcourſe of Pindar, is in the 4th Ode of the Pythic.

[C] Cicero is one of them; I do not think that . . . . . deſignedly, as Muretus imagines.] Let us make Monſieur Menage perform here the office of a Commentator (21). "This Fable of Æſon's being reſtored to "youth by Medea's enchantments, is fully related in "the 7th book of Ovid's Metamorphoſes. But what "Ovid relates of Æſon in that book, Plautus in his "Pſeudolus (22) makes a Cook aſſert it of Pelias.

(21) Menage, Obſervations ſur Malherbe, p. 349, 359.

(22) It is the 80th verſe of the 2d Scene of the 3d Act, p. m. p. 541.

"Quia ſorbitione faciam ego te hodie meâ,
"Item ut Medea Peliam concoxit ſenem;
"Quem medicamento & ſuis venenis dicitur
"Feciſſe rurſus ex ſene adoleſcentulum;
"Item ego te faciam.

i. e. "I ſhall give you a ſoop which will reſtore you "to youth, as Medea is ſaid to have done to old "Pelias, whom ſhe boiled with herbs and medica"ments, and by her art ſhe made him become from "an old man a youth; the ſame I ſhall do to you."

"Cicero ſays the ſame thing in the perſon of "Cato the elder, in his dialogue on old age: Quò "quidem me proficiſcentem haud ſane quis facile retraxe"rit, nec ſi tanquam Peliam recoxerit. i. e. To which "as I advance forwards, no man can call me back, "though he ſhould boil me up, as Medea did Pelias. "And yet, if we may believe Ovid and Apollodo"rus, Pelias was not reſtored to youth by Medea. "He was, at Medea's inſtigation, murdered by his "daughters, who imagined they could reſtore him "to youth, after the ſame manner as Medea had "made an old ram become young again. Muretus "in the tenth chapter of the ſixth book of Variæ "Lectiones, imagined that Plautus and Cicero de"ſignedly affected that miſtake of names: Plautus "under the character of a Cook, who was not uſed to "read the Metamorphoſes, and Cicero under the cha"racter of an old man, whoſe memory failed him "often: and in this he has been followed by Came"rarius, Scioppius, Freherus, and by ſeveral other "Criticks. For my part, I am fully perſuaded that "Plautus and Cicero were in earneſt, and what they "ſay of Pelias was aſſerted by ſome antient "Authors, whom they followed, as Ovid followed "ſome others." Monſieur Menage adds, that what Ovid relates of Æſon, Jaſon's father, Pherecydes and Simonides had aſſerted of Jaſon himſelf, as we learn from the argument or ſummary account prefixed to Euripides's Medea: Φερεκύδης δὲ καὶ Σιμωνίδης φασὶν, ὡς ἡ Μηδεία ἀνιψήσασα τὸν Ἰάσονα, νέον ποιήσει. . . . . So that ſome antient Author had probably wrote, that Pelias was reſtored to youth by Medea, as well as his brother Æſon. And Plautus and Cicero followed the account of that Author, as Ovid followed the account of the Author of the Poem, entitled, Νόστοι, that is to ſay, the returns for we find in the argument of the Medea mentioned above, that that Author related the ſame particulars concerning Æſon in that Poem, which Ovid mentions in his Metamorphoſes.

I cannot imagine, that Plautus aſſerted a falſity on purpoſe to keep up the decorum, or the probability proper to a play; though it ſhould be ſaid an hundred times over and over, that it is in the character of a cook upon the ſtage to falſify hiſtory. But I can leſs ſtill believe what is ſuppoſed with regard to Cicero, that he imagined the decorum required of him that he ſhould make Cato's memory fail him, who was a very grave man. It is better therefore to charge Cicero himſelf with the miſtake, if it be really a miſtake: and this is alſo one of Muretus's anſwers. Tale aliquid hic quoque comminiſcendum eſt: nam aut decorum id & conſentaneum Catoni credidit, quod & memoria vacillare γηροβοσκὸν ἰῶν, & interdum habet aliquid gravitatis in magnis viris minus accurata fabularum & talium rerum cognitio: aut hoc quoque inter μνημονικὰ Ciceronis ἁμαρτήματα numerandum eſt (23). It is hardly poſſible to refute Monſieur Menage's aſſertion: for the antients differ ſo much in their accounts of the mythological adventures, that it is by no means improbable but ſome related that Pelias was really reſtored to youth. But, ſome will object, if he received that kindneſs from Medea, it muſt have been before ſhe fell out with Jaſon: but what probability is there, that before that time ſhe would have beſtowed ſo great a favour on the murderer of her huſband's father and mother? This objection is weak; for moſt of the Authors ſuppoſe that Pelias did not put Jaſon's father to death. The moſt common tradition is, that Æſon, Jaſon's father, was reſtored to youth by Medea, and ſome Authors aſſert that he died in the quiet poſſeſſion of his Kingdom, and left Pelias guardian to his ſon (24). We have ſeen (25), that Pelias ſwore ſolemnly, that he would reſign the Kingdom as ſoon as Jaſon ſhould be returned home, Why ſhould we not think, that there were ſome Authors, who aſſerted that he kept his word? If it be ſo, there is no difficulty in maintaining (23) Muret. Variar. Lection. lib. 6. cap. 10. p. m. 983.

(24) Scholiaſtes Homeri in Odyſſ. lib. 12. He quotes Pherecydes. See Meziriac ſur les Epitres d'Ovide, p. 535.

(25) In the paſſage from Pindar, above, quotation (20).

left even the Kingdom to that Uſurper's ſon [D].

ing that Medea reſtored him to youth at Jaſon's requeſt. However, it is very certain that there are ſtill ſome proofs extant, by which it appears that he wiſhed paſſionately ſhe would do him that kindneſs. Conſult Diodorus Siculus (26) in the paſſage where he relates how Medea, acting like a Fanatick, and making people believe that ſhe came from the country of the Hyperboreans, with a deſign to make Pelias and his Kingdom happy, perſuaded that Prince, that ſhe was commanded to reſtore him to youth. But above all read theſe words of Varro. Peliam Medeæ permiſiſſe ut ſe vel vivum degluberet, dummodo redderet puellum (27), i. e. "Pelias gave Medea leave "to flee him even alive, if ſhe could but make him "young again." Let us obſerve that Pelias's Obſequies were celebrated with great pomp, and that Jaſon was one of the hero's who diſputed the prize in the funeral games of that ceremony (28). Is not this a proof that Pelias was reconciled with his Nephew before he died? It is ſomewhat ſtrange that ſhe ſhould be ſaid to have reſtored her huſband Jaſon to youth, for he was very young when he married her: and if ſome years after ſhe had the vexation to ſee him ready to marry another wife, it was becauſe ſhe began to grow old (29). The tradition of this woman's reſtoring Jaſon to youth is owing perhaps to a lapſus calami, or a ſlip of the pen, either of an author, or a tranſcriber. If inſtead of Αἴσων ſome wrote Ἰάσων, by this miſtake the ſon and the huſband were placed in the room of the father and father-in-law; I mean in the room of the good old man Æſon, whom Medea reſtored to youth. This falſe ſpelling would be nothing elſe but the tranſpoſition of one letter: I own that one is more ſubject to make ſuch a tranſpoſition in printing, than in writing; but yet authors and tranſcribers are not ſo free from it, as it were to be wiſhed. One might therefore have ſome reaſons to think, that they who have aſſerted that Medea reſtored Jaſon to youth, grounded their aſſertion on ſome book, in which, thro' a miſtake, Ἰάσων crept in, inſtead of the word Αἴσων. One cannot pretend this with regard to the writer quoted by Monſieur Menage (30); for it appears from the whole connexion of his diſcourſe, that he ſpeaks of Jaſon's being made young again. I believe that Monſieur Menage would have quoted Lycophron, if he had remembred theſe words: καὶ λέβητι δαιδρυθεὶς δέμας ὐκ ἀσμένως ἔμαρψεν ἐρράθη σκύτος. His body being boiled in a kettle, he did not go unpuniſhed for taking the golden Fleece (31). Whereupon Canterus made this note: Jaſonem à Medea recoctum fuiſſe notum eſt. i. e. "It is well known, that Jaſon was boiled "young again by Medea."

Obſerve that if a woman had the gift aſcribed to Medea, ſhe would uſe it chiefly with regard to her huſband. So that upon the whole, I ſhould not think it ſo ſtrange, that Medea ſhould be ſaid to have reſtored to the vigour of youth, not only Bacchus's nurſes and their huſbands (32), Æſon, her father-in-law, Pelias, Æſon's brother, but alſo her own huſband Jaſon. What is more ſurprizing is, that ſhe forgot herſelf; why would ſhe ſuffer that people could tell her, Medice, cura te ipſum, i. e. "Phyſician, "heal thyſelf." Since you reſtore others to youth, why do not you get rid of your own old carcaſs? This would be as uſeful at leaſt to you, as the making your huſband young again. I ſhall cloſe this remark with taking notice of a miſtake of Aldus Manutius the younger. He aſſerted that Pelias was Jaſon's father (33).

[D] He behaved very generouſly towards Pelias's daughters, and left even the Kingdom to that Uſurper's ſon.] Pelias had three daughters, and Jaſon married them all very advantageouſly: Alceſtis the eldeſt of all was married to Admetus: the ſecond was called Amphinome, and had Andremon for her huſband: the third married Canas, King of the Phocæans, and ſon of . . . . * (34). Diodorus Siculus obſerves (35), that Jaſon ſettled Acaſtus, Pelias's ſon, on his father's throne, and yet he had related a little before, that Pelias having no ſon was afraid of being unthroned by his brother (36). Let it not be urged, to clear him, that he obſerves that the fabulous accounts abound with variations: he obſerves it only, that he may not be blamed, if it be found that he does not always agree with other Authors. Καθόλου γὰρ τοὺς παλαιοὺς μύθους οὐχ ἁπλῆ οὐδὲ συμπεφωνημένην ἰσορίαν ἔχειν συμβέβηκε. Διόπερ ὀ χεὴ θαυμάζειν ἐάν τινα τῶν ἀρχιολογουμένων μὴ συμφώνως ἅπασι τοῖς ποιηταῖς καὶ συγγραφεῦσι συγκρίνωμεν: In priſcis enim fabulis nulla omninò ſimplex & per omnia ſibi conſentiens eſt hiſtoria. Haud ergò mirandum eſt, ſi in antiquitatibus illis recenſendis cum Poëtis & ſcriptoribus aliis non ubique nobis conveniat (37). But I think he did not pretend this obſervation was to clear him, in caſe he ſhould contradict himſelf: he had been to blame, if he had had ſuch a thought. Let us boldly aſſert therefore, that he deſerves to be a little cenſured upon this account: for he ought not to have adapted in page 233, the opinion of thoſe, who ſaid Pelias had no ſon; and in page 243 a quite contrary opinion. He ſhould at leaſt have told us, that ſome aſſerted one thing, and others another. He was in the right to obſerve that his accounts did not agree with thoſe of other writers: we have an inſtance of it here; for we find in Apollodorus (38), that Alceſtis was married in Pelias's life time with Admetus, who had formed the difficult conditions which Pelias required of thoſe who courted her (39). Apollodorus gives him four daughters, and names them one after another (40). Hyginus (41) gives him five daughters, and tells us their names. Pauſanias relates that this Prince's daughters, being diſconſolate for the misfortune they had to kill him, whilſt they intended to reſtore him to youth, left their country and retired into Arcadia, where they died and were buried (42). That Author ſpeaks of their tomb, and adds, that none of the Poets he had read, mention their names, but that the painter Micon put the names of Aſteropea and Antinoe on their pictures. He obſerves elſewhere (43) that one of them was called Alceſtis in the repreſentation of Pelias's Obſequies. I wonder that he had not read the works in which Apollodorus and Diodorus Siculus found the names of theſe daughters, or that he had not read at leaſt theſe two Authors. Let us obſerve that Pelias's wife was named Anaxibia, and that ſhe was the daughter of Bias (44). Others call her Philomacha, and ſuppoſe her the daughter of Amphion (45).

(26) Diod. Sic. lib. 4. cap. 52, 55. See alſo Hygin. cap. 24.

(27) Varro, in Marcipore apud Nonium Marcellum, v. puellos. p. m. 158.

(28) Pauſan. lib. 5. p. 165.

(29) Diod. Sic. lib. 4. cap. 55. p. 244.

(30) The Author of the Argument of Euripides's Medea.

(31) Lycophron, ver. 1313.

(32) Æſchylus, in Nutricibus Bacchi, apud Autorem Argumenti Medeæ Euripidis.

(33) Aldus Manutius, P. F. on Ciceron. de Senectute, ſub fin.

* There is a line or two omitted here in the original.

(34) Extracted from Diodorus Siculus, lib. 4. cap. 54. p. 243.

(35) Idem, ibid.

(36) Idem, ibid. cap. 41. p. 233.

(37) Diod. Sic. lib. 4. p. 172. edit. Henr. Stephani, 1559.

(38) Apollod. lib. 1. p. 51. Hygin. cap. 51.

(39) He required that they ſhould bring him a chariot drawn by a lion, or by a wild-boar. Apollodor. ibid.

(40) Apollod. ibid. p. 45.

(41) Hygin. cap. 24.

(42) Pauſan. lib. 8. p. 245.

(43) Idem, lib. 5. p. 165.

(44) Apollod. lib. 1. p. 45. Hygin. cap. 14. p. m. 44. & cap. 51. p. 98.

(45) Idem, Ibid.

PELIAS was the name of a ſpear (a), which was made a preſent of to Peleus on his wedding day (b) [A]. He uſed it in battles, and gave it to his ſon Achilles, who rendered it extremely famous (c). It was ſo heavy that none but himſelf could dart it (d). It was made of an Aſh-tree, which Chiron cut on Mount Pelion (e). See Pliny (f).

(a) Ovidius, Metam. lib. 13. & alibi.

(b) Scholiaſt. Homeri, in Iliad. lib. 16. ver. 140.

(c) Idem, Ibid.

(d) Homer. ibid.

(e) Idem, ibid.

(f) Plin. lib. 16. cap. 13. p. m. 248.

[A] It was the name of a Spear, which was made a preſent of to Peleus on his wedding-day.] In Homer it is only an epithet taken from the place, where Chiron cut the Aſh-tree. Πηλιάδα μελίην; Peliadem fraxinum (1). Πηλιὰς μελίη; Pelias fraxinus (2). The Pelian Aſh-tree, or the Aſh-tree of Pelias. The Latins turned that Epithet into a proper name.

(1) Homer. Iliad. lib. 16. ver. 143.

(2) Idem, ibid. lib. 21. ver. 277.

PELISSON (PAUL) was one of the fineſt genius's of the 17th Century. The ſame motive which prompted me to be very conciſe in the article of Menage, will make me not ſwell the preſent article to any length (a). All I could ſay with regard to the particular cular honour which the French Academy did Peliſſon [A], and of the applauſes he merited during the proſecutions which he ſuffered under, for having been in Mr. Fouquet's ſervice; all this, I ſay, and ſeveral other particulars of his life, are ſtill freſh in the memory of every reader. It would be equally ſuperfluous to take notice of what was called in France, his application to the grand affair: the complaints and jokes made by the Proteſtants on that occaſion are univerſally known. The publick are perhaps not ſo well acquainted with a circumſtance, of the truth of which ſome perſons have aſſured me, which is, that he wiſhed the great buſineſs of converſions had been always carried on in the method which had been purſued for many years, without having recourſe to dragooning; a courſe that will be had in everlaſting deteſtation by all men of probity and honour, of all countries and religions. He had been, for many years, writing a large controverſial volume on the Sacrament, but had not time to finiſh it. Some little part of this was publiſhed after his death [B]; and we therein ſee the ſubtlety of his genius, which was all he could put into it. The like ſubtlety is ſeen in his reflections or diſputes, or controverſies in religious matters [C], in which he did not forget to take notice of that, which the Church of Rome pretends to be the mighty Stumbling-block of the Proteſtants, I mean the difficulties which ariſe from the way of examination or enquiry. This Stumbling-block, I ſay, if it be one, is rather that of Rome than that of Geneva, as I obſerved in another place [D]. I alſo ſpeak of it in the note; and will obſerve, by the way,

(a) The Elogium and Abſtract of Peliſſon's Life, are inſerted in ſeveral new books which are ſpread in all countries, as the Mercure Galant, the Journal des Savans, Mercure Hiſtorique, Lettres Hiſtoriques, &c.

[A] The particular honour which the French Academy did Peliſſon.] " The FRENCH ACADEMY having de- " ſired to hear, in a full aſſembly, this work (1) " read to them, it being at that time only in manu- " ſcript; they ſome time after decreed, of their own " accord, in honour to the Author, that the firſt " place which ſhould be vacant in the Academy, " ſhould be beſtowed on him; and that in the mean " time, he ſhould be impowered to come to all the " meetings, and give his vote, as an Academician; " with the following clauſe, that the like favour " could not hereafter be indulged any perſon, upon " any conſideration whatever." This paſſage is extracted from the hiſtory of the French Academy (2): they are followed by the compliment of thanks which our Author delivered in that aſſembly, the 30th of December, 1652.

(1) i. e. The Hiſtory of the French Academy. This work of Peliſſon has been always looked upon as a maſter-piece. See Baillet, Jugemens des Savans, ſur les Critiq. Hiſt. num. 134.

(2) p. 369. Paris edit. 1672, 12mo.

[B] Some little part of his work on the Sacrament.] See the extract which Mr. Beauval gives of it, in his Hiſtory of the Works of the Learned (3), and that of Couſin (4).

(3) For Auguſt 1694. p. 513 & ſeq.

(4) In the 20 Journal des Savans, for 1694.

[C] His reflections on the diſputes or controverſies in religious matters.] The firſt part of this work was printed at Paris, in two volumes, 12mo, 1686. See the extract which was given of it in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (5). The year after, the Author reprinted with the addition of a new tome, entitled, An Anſwer to the Objections from England and Holland: or, of the Authority of great numbers in the Chriſtian Religion. See the Journal des Savans (6). Some time after, he added another tome more, divided into four parts, and entitled, The Chimeras of Mr. Jurieu: a general Anſwer to his paſtoral Letters of the ſecond year, in oppoſition to the Book of Reflections, and a ſhort Examination of his Prophecies. The Reader will eaſily figure to himſelf, the advantages which ſo ſubtle a man muſt neceſſarily gain over a chimerical interpreter of the Revelations. All theſe works of Peliſſon have been re-printed in Holland. See the Acta eruditorum (7). They form the three firſt parts of the Reflections or Diſputes about Religion. The fourth part was publiſhed at Paris, in 1692, and entitled, Concerning Toleration in Religion. Some Letters of Mr. Leibnitz, with Mr. Peliſſon's Anſwers *. The following note is in the margin of the firſt page. Theſe objections were made by Mr. Leibnitz, whoſe merit is ſufficiently known. They were ſent to France by the Ducheſs of Hanover, to the Abbeſs of Maubiſſon her ſiſter. It was not known at that time, by whom they were written. Even thoſe perſons who know, by numberleſs proofs, the extent of Mr. Leibnitz's genius, cannot ſufficiently admire how it was poſſible for him to write ſo correctly in French, as the objections in queſtion are writ. But he is one of thoſe extraordinary men, who find no limits in the ſphere of human merit; they fill every part of it.

(5) For July 1686. art. 1. See alſo Journal des Savans, of April 29, 1686.

(6) Of April 12, 1688, p. 540, Dutch edit.

(7) For Nov. 1689. p. 564; and in the Supplement, Tom. 1. p. 609.

* See rem. [H], of the article LEIBNITZ (GODEFROY WILLIAM DE)] Rem. by the Tranſl.

[D] The way of examination . . . is rather the ſtumbling block of the Church of Rome, than that of Geneva, as I obſerved in another place.] If my Readers peruſe the article of NICOLLE (8), they will find that this Doctor, after objecting great difficulties, could not anſwer thoſe which were made to him. To have proceeded according to order, he ought to have anſwered the objections which were retorted upon him, and cleared the way or method of authority. The rubbiſh which had been thrown up there, called immediately for the utmoſt efforts of his hands; and yet he put off this affair till a farther time, and even did not dare to engage his word for it, in a poſitive manner. Here follow his words (9). To conclude, as Mr. Jurieu treats in his book of two principal queſtions, the firſt concerning the ſyſtem of the church, the other concerning the analyſis of the faith; my intention, in this treatiſe, is to apply my ſelf only to the former, by annexing the conſequences which bear a relation to it, and which Mr. Jurieu treats in ſeveral places, and particularly in his third book. We ſhall afterwards ſee, whether it be equally advantageous to treat of the analyſis of faith. But the queſtion, with regard to the Church, is of that importance, as to be examined ſeparately, and in a work by itſelf: and this I have propoſed to do here. Great numbers of people imagined, that this diviſion was made with artifice. One of the two pieces was taken, and the other left; the reaſon of which was, the one promiſed, at leaſt, that the victory would be diſputed; whereas the other threatned an inevitable defeat; whence ſome concluded, that Nicolle was very ſenſible that the way of authority is a mere chimera. Others, who were wiſer, contented themſelves with believing, that he did not doubt but this was the way which God had pointed out to the ſimple, tho' there is no poſſibility of anſwering thereby the objections raiſed by the Proteſtants: ſo that his ſilence ought not to be conſidered as proof of his hypocriſy, but as an effect of that prudence, which will not permit the Catholicks to inform Hereticks, that ſome important truths cannot be well maintained againſt the objections raiſed by adverſaries. I ſhall not pretend to judge of the ſtate of another man's heart; and therefore will not preſume to ſay, that Nicolle was not perſuaded of the truth of what he ſays in one of his books; " God " has not, according to the ſcriptures, only given up " the material world to the diſputes of men; but, " from a much more dreadful effect of his juſtice, " he has even, in ſome meaſure, abandoned the di- " vine myſteries to them, and the ſacred truths which " he has revealed to them, by permitting them to " be expoſed to their contradiction; to become the " ſubject of their conteſts; and that ſome raſh So- " phiſts ſhould inſolently ridicule them in their diſ- " courſes and writings. One cannot, indeed, en- " tirely ſay of this kind of diſputations, what the " wiſe man ſays of thoſe, which have natural things " for their object, viz. that men can never diſcover, " by their utmoſt enquiries, the truth of them: " Mundum tradidit diſputationibus eorum, ut nunquam " inveniant opus quod operatus eſt. It is certain, on " the contrary, that it nevertheleſs appears, and even " ſhines out, through the clouds which men endea- " vour to ſpread, in order to darken it; and that " perſons of an humble, ſincere, and intelligent caſt " of

(8) Rem. [C].

(9) Nicolle, de l'Unite de l'Egliſe, at the end of the Preface.

way, that ſome perſons are of opinion, that few or none make uſe of the way of examination, properly ſo called, though it be much talked of. I even do not know whether it might not be aſſerted, that the obſtacles to a juſt examination do not reſult ſo much from the

" of mind, will diſcover it amid thoſe intricate queſ-
" tions and falſe ſubtilties, with which others endea-
" vour to ſurround it (10)." This ſignifies, that the controverſy about the way of authority, and the way of examination, is not one of thoſe things, which God has abandoned to the diſputes and conteſts of men, without permitting them ever to diſcover what he has done. Now ſome perſons imagine, that Nicolle believed the contrary in his own mind. He had a numberleſs multitude of mighty objections to the way of examination: he knew that they are retorted againſt the way of authority; and that new ones are added to them, which it would be impoſſible for him to ſolve. He therefore thought, that the way by which we are to diſcern revealed truths, is directly like the works of nature, in which God permits us to argue, without permitting us ever to diſcover the myſtery of them (11). Once again, I will not be ſo raſh as to judge of the conſciences of other men.

Peliſſon did not ſucceed better than Nicolle, in the defenſive part. I own that it was not very difficult for him to deſtroy the diſtinction between the examination of attention, and the examination of enquiry or diſcuſſion, and ſome others; but at laſt he was non-pluſſed, as well as his brethren, when he was to ſolve the objection retorted upon him, and remove the difficulties ariſing from the way of authority: inſomuch, that we may here repeat, that it had been better for both churches, to have never debated that queſtion (12). No method can be of more pernicious conſequence, than that of Mr. Nicolle. For, in a word, could he once perſuade mankind that it is impoſſible to diſcover truth by the way of examination, as he endeavours to do with all his might, he would ſoon ſee that he has laboured at nothing but to eſtabliſh ſcepticiſm, and conſequently to deſtroy religion. Every one would then argue after this manner. It is impoſſible to diſcover truth by the way of examination. This Mr. Nicolle has convinced us of. It is plain, that this cannot be found out by the way of authority, and this is much more certain than the reſt. What other courſe can one take, than to give up, once for all, the hopes of ever knowing that truth, which ſo many perſons are in ſearch of, and which one would conclude no man can find? This effect reſults naturally from Nicolle's method, whence we may infer, that it is highly pernicious: for, in a word, nothing can be more oppoſite to religion than ſcepticiſm. It is a total extinction, not only of faith, but of reaſon; and nothing can be a greater impoſſibility, than to reclaim thoſe who have run to ſuch exceſſes (13). Theſe are the words of a man of great learning and abilities (14), who has been long uſed to meditation, is a profound maſter of the art of reaſoning, and has made ſeveral new objections to Nicolle. For he not only ſhews, that, in order to employ the way of authority in a prudent manner, we muſt firſt know which is the church that is poſſeſſed of authority; but alſo that Nicolle's reaſons would lead us neceſſarily to the doctrine of probability in its utmoſt extent. This laſt doctrine would be very contrary to Nicolle, who has ſo ſolidly oppoſed the doctrine of probability. The other point includes a vaſt number of diſcuſſions or enquiries. We cannot diſcover where the authority reſides, but by examining what are the ſigns or characteriſticks of the church which poſſeſſes it. We muſt know the exact number of theſe characteriſticks: we muſt know, not only that there are ſo many, but that there are no more (15). We muſt know whether thoſe who compute an hundred, are more rational than ſuch as count fifteen, or twelve, or ten, or ſix, or only four. When the number of theſe characteriſticks are fixed, we muſt examine whether they ſuit the Romiſh rather than the Greek church. All this requires great pains, and a laborious ſeries of enquiries; ſo that, by endeavouring to avoid the way of examination, we return to it neceſſarily.

[" Where Bayle ſays, after Mr. de la Placette, that
" the way of authority, for putting an end to diſpu-
" ters in religion, a way which Nicolle and Peliſſon
" have well maintained, *is fit only to baniſh a certainty
" with regard to faith, and to eſtabliſh ſcepticiſm*, he
" contradicts himſelf, and oppoſes the Synod of Dort,
" to which he declares himſelf, in ſeveral places, at" tached. The Proteſtant Church, ſays Bayle, rem. D of " the article Maimbourg, *cannot be blamed for having
" eſtabliſhed an order, without which it is* IMPOSSIBLE
" for any ſociety to ſubſiſt. There MUST BE, *in all ſo-
" cieties,* A TRIBUNAL *to pronounce or determine,
" WITHOUT APPEAL, on the diſputes of particular
" perſons, and which may be impowered to inflict* PU-
" NISHMENTS *on ſuch as refuſe to ſubmit; for other-
" wiſe it* WOULD NOT BE POSSIBLE to remedy any " diſorder, nor prevent DISPUTES from being carried on " perpetually. Therefore, only the way of authority,
" and of a tribunal judging, without any appeal
" from it, is capable of remedying the diſorders
" which ariſe from diſputes, and to prevent their " being carried on for ever. Now why does Bayle,
" who aſſerts this here, (and aſſerts it juſtly,) advance
" the direct contrary, in order to overthrow the ar-
" guments of Nicolle and Peliſſon, that the way of " authority *is fit only to baniſh certainty, with regard
" to faith*, &c. * ? "]

There is reaſon to fear, that a third party may ſtart up, who will teach, that men are not led to the knowledge of true religion, either by the way of authority, or by the way of examination, but ſome by education, and others by grace. Education, without grace and examination, does but barely perſuade. Grace with education, and ſometimes without education or examination, or with a ſuperficial examination, perſuades to ſalvation. Gratia Dei ſum quod ſum, (By the grace of God, I am what I am,) ought every orthodox believer to ſay. I am orthodox and through grace (16), and that not of myſelf; it is the gift of God, not by my works, by re-ſearches, by enquiries, that no man may glory. Let the examination be eaſy, or at leaſt poſſible; let it be difficult, or even impoſſible; one very certain circumſtance is, that no man makes uſe of it (17): moſt people cannot read; among ſuch as do read, moſt of them never read the works of their adverſaries; and know the arguments of the other party only by the fragments or extracts from them, which they meet with in their Authors. Theſe fragments exhibit but imperfectly, and in a very weak manner, the pretenſions of the contrary party. To diſcover the ſtrength of the objections, we muſt conſider them when placed in their ſyſtem; and connected with their general principles, their conſequences and dependencies. Therefore, to examine the ſentiments of an adverſary, we muſt not barely compare the anſwer of our Authors with the objection alledged by them; this would be like judging of the force of a wheel, by the bare effects it may produce, when ſeparated from its machine or engine. This cannot be called the way of examination, but in an abuſive ſenſe. As for ſuch Doctors as look into the works of their adverſary, theſe employ the utmoſt exertions of their genius; not in enquiring whether he is in the right, but to diſcover if he is in the wrong, and to invent anſwers. They look upon whatever anſwers they invent as good ones, becauſe they ever continue firmly perſuaded that he is an Heretic. This too cannot be called examination, but in an abuſive ſenſe. The firſt thing a perſon ought to do, in order for a thorough examination, would be to be in doubt, with regard to his own religion: but he would imagine he offended God, ſhould he form the leaſt doubt on that head; he would conſider this doubt as a fatal ſuggeſtion of the devil: a man, therefore, does not put himſelf into the frame or ſtate, into which that man ſhould put himſelf, who was deſirous of diſcerning orthodoxy from heterodoxy: a perſon muſt, according to St. Auſtin, lay aſide or diveſt oneſelf of the ſuppoſition, that we are already in poſſeſſion of the truth. Ut autem facilius miteſcatis, & non inimico animo vobiſque pernicioſo mihi adverſemini, quovis judice me impetrare à vobis oportet, ut ex utraque parte omnis arro-

(10) Préjugez légitimes contre les Calviniſtes, in the Preface.

(11) Mundum tradidit diſputationibus eorum, ut nunquam inveniant opus quod operatus eſt. Salomon, in Eccleſiaſte, cap. 3. ver. 11.

(12) See rem. [D] of the art. NICOLLE.

(13) La Placette's Treatiſe on Conſcience, p. 377. He had ſaid p. 370. That nothing can be falſer, nothing more pernicious, than this objection of Nicolle's: that it turns upon ſuppoſitions which are moſt certainly repugnant to truth; and that it is of no uſe but to deſtroy a certainty in matters of faith and morality, and to eſtabliſh a general Scepticiſm in religion.

(14) Formerly a Proteſtant Miniſter in Bearn, and now in Copenhagen.

(15) La Placette, Traite de la Conſcience, p. 372.

* From the rem. to the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. Tom. 4. p. 970.

(16) See St. Paul's Epiſtle to the Epheſians, chap. 2. ver. 8 and 9.

(17) Obſerve, that this is the diſcourſe, not of the Author of this book, but of the third part I hinted at, who may ſtart up. This muſt be obſerved in ſeveral other places.

the mind's being unfurniſhed with knowledge, as its being over-run with prejudices [E]. It would be unjuſt to charge the Proteſtants with being the authors of the reports which were ſpread, viz. that Peliſſon refuſed to make a confeſſion of his ſins in his laſt ſickneſs.

gantia deponatur. Nemo noſtrum dicat jam ſe inveniſſe veritatem: ſic eam quæramus, quaſi ab utriſque neſciatur. Ita enim diligenter & concorditer quæri potuit, ſi nullâ temerariâ præſumtione inventa & cognita eſſe credatur (18), i. e. "But that you may be the more eaſily ſoftened, and not write againſt me with a rancorous ſpirit, which would be hurtful to yourſelves; it is neceſſary for me to deſire, that pride and prejudice may be laid aſide by both parties. Let not either party ſay that he has already found out the truth; but let us ſearch after it, in ſuch a manner, as though it were not known to either. For thus it may be ſought for, carefully and mutually; unleſs by raſh preſumption, we imagine that it is already found out and known." Thoſe that ſay, that a corruption of heart hinders a Heretic from finding out the truth, are frequently miſtaken, if they mean that a propenſion to drunkenneſs, fornication, and other corporeal pleaſures, or that pride, avarice, &c. miſlead his judgment (19); but they do not miſtake, if they mean that prejudice prevents his diſcovering juſt and valid proofs. Such a man examines the reaſons of the orthodox, in a firm perſuaſion that he has truth on his ſide; and that he would offend God, ſhould he imagine that the proofs of the contrary party have any ſolidity in them. He thinks that he acts as a faithful ſervant of God, if he looks upon theſe reaſons as ſophiſms or fallacies, and if he employs the whole ſtrength of his mind, to find out anſwers; and he cannot believe that his anſwers are bad, ſince, in his opinion, they combat error, and are intended for the ſupport of truth. He commits a miſtake, if he imagines that he has thoroughly examined the ſyſtem of the other party. But I would aſk any one, whether the orthodox have not the like perſuaſion, when they examine or enquire into the cauſes of Hereticks? Both parties act like people engaged in a law-ſuit: theſe never look upon the arguments of their opponents as ſolid; it is to no purpoſe that they read over and over the parchments written on that account, they conſidering them as meer wrangling; and even after they have been condemned by inferior and ſuperior Judges, they ſtill fancy themſelves in the right, and would appeal to another Tribunal, if there was one. Whence ariſes all this? Does not it proceed from their examining all things, with a prepoſſeſſion that juſtice is on their ſide? Nothing is more capable of convincing us of the uſeleſſneſs of an impartial examination, than what happens every day to news-mongers. They are firmly perſuaded, that the party which they eſpouſe, has juſtice on its ſide; and are paſſionately deſirous that it ſhould be victorious. They would be grieved to the ſoul, ſhould a ſhining light dart on their eyes, and prove evidently to them the juſtice and good fortune of the contrary party. This is the effect of thoſe paſſions. They, in reading the manifeſto's and relations of the enemy, look upon them as ſo many falſhoods; how probable ſoever his reaſons may be, they reject them; they apply their whole minds to conſider what anſwer may be made to them. Now, whilſt they attend to the ſpecious appearances of the anſwer, and no ways attentive to the bright ſide of the objection, they never acquire any other knowledge, but ſuch as flatters their prejudices. If ill news comes, they are incredulous; they invent an hundred reaſons to prove it falſe, and employ their utmoſt efforts on that occaſion. If good news be brought, their credulity is boundleſs (20); the weakeſt appearances are, by them, conſidered as a ſtrong proof; they do all in their power to ſtrengthen thoſe appearances; they baniſh all contrary appearances from their imagination; and in this manner they ſpend the year without trouble or diſquietude, thanks to their induſtry, which removes all diſagreeable objects, and creates daily, in their fancy, ſome delightful chimæra or another. Nothing but an indiſputable evidence is able to undeceive them; and were they to examine their own minds with deep attention, they would be obliged to confeſs, that they content themſelves with reaſons which they would deſpiſe, were they alledged in favour of the enemy. Muſt it not be confeſſed, that if we do not examine more carefully the arguments on both ſides, in religious matters, than thoſe which relate to publick news, this does not deſerve the name of examination? And muſt it not be confeſſed, that the ſame ſpirit which commonly prevails in ſuch news-mongers as are extremely zealous for a party, prevail in moſt perſons who are very zealous for their religion? A news-monger is grieved when a battle is loſt, and highly delighted when advice is brought that the battle is won: for this reaſon he exhauſts all the ſtrength of his genius, to convince himſelf that the battle is won; and if indiſputable proofs of the contrary are not given; if there are three probabilities to alledge, for the gaining of the victory, an oppoſition to ten or twelve probabilities for the loſs, he is convinced that it is won. A man is not leſs pleaſed in religious diſputes, when he imagines that an adverſary is defeated; and as much grieved when he ſees him triumph. Thus, on both ſides, the uneaſineſs which men endeavour to avoid, and the pleaſure they ſtrive to procure themſelves, prevent their examining things with equity, and make them uſe double weights and double meaſures.

(18) Auguſt. contra Epiſt. fundam. cap. 3.

(19) See the Philoſophical Commentary on contrainlesd'entrer, part 2. chap. 10. p. 548 & ſeq. and part 4. p. 217 & ſeq.

REFLECTIONS on the prepoſſeſſions of News-mongers.

(20) Obſerve, that there is another kind of News-mongers; perſons who are ingenious in tormenting themſelves; who believe what they fear, and not what they wiſh.

Such are the things we may apprehend a third party advance, aſſerting the right, and denying the fact: aſſerting that men ought to conduct themſelves by the way of examination, and that nevertheleſs no one makes uſe of that way. However this be, the difference proves very great in the event: for, whereas thoſe who are in an error, would perhaps become orthodox, were they not already perſuaded of their being ſo; the orthodox, perhaps, preſerve themſelves from hereſy, becauſe they are firmly prepoſſeſſed with the notion that they are orthodox.

[E] The obſtacles to a juſt examination reſults from the mind's being over-run with prejudices.] There is no great need of a Commentary, after what the reader has juſt now read. The examples of perſons engaged in law-ſuits, and of news-mongers, is very well adapted to ſhew, that a man who is both judge and party, is not very able to diſcern truth from falſhood. Two ſtrong reaſons forbid men to act in both thoſe characters at one and the ſame time: the one is, becauſe they would be too apt to determine in their own favour, though they ſhould be conſcious of their acting unjuſtly: the other is, that he would be inclined to think himſelf in the right, even when the juſtice of the cauſe of his opponent might be eaſily diſcovered. In religious diſputes every man is judge and party; for theſe do not examine the reaſons of their adverſaries with a ſceptical mind. They would think themſelves guilty of a crime, were they to put themſelves in ſuch a ſituation: they therefore examine things with a firm perſuaſion, that the religion which they profeſs is the only true one. In this manner it is plain that ſuch perſons have almoſt the ſame paſſions and prejudices with the news-mongers above-mentioned. Three probabilities on the ſide of our prejudices gain the advantage over ten or twelve on the other: the reaſon of which is, our mind attends with infinitely greater pleaſure to ſuch probabilities as pleaſe, than towards ſuch as give uneaſineſs. This reflection is confirmed by Nicolle. How infinite ſoever the diſpoſition may be between God and his creatures, between things temporal and things eternal; men nevertheleſs prefer daily the moſt inconſiderable pleaſures and the moſt trifling worldly advantages to God and eternal bleſſings: and that becauſe they have a quick ſenſe of thoſe advantages and pleaſures; and, on the contrary, have but a weak conception of God and eternal things. It is in the ſame manner that the mind ſuffers itſelf to be captivated by the vaineſt glimmerings, and the moſt trifling reaſons. For this purpoſe it need but apply itſelf intenſely to them: for this application makes it ſee nothing but them; and employs it ſo entirely, that no other reaſons are allowed acceſs to it. Moſt queſtions ought to be determined no other way, but by comparing the arguments on both ſides; and it is almoſt always raſhneſs, to determine or pronounce upon hearing ſickneſs [F]. His eldeſt brother died young, and had been an author (b). ["He "was fifty years of age at leaſt, he dying in 1647, and had publiſhed a work in 1647. "Now we do not ſay of a man who died at fifty, that he died young *."] Several illuſtrious perſons ſprung from this family [G].

(b) He wrote an anonymous book, entitled, Melange de divers Problemes, printed at Paris in 1647, 12mo. See Peter Borel's Antiquities of Caſtres.

* From the rem. to the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. Tom. 4. p. 971.

I ought thoſe only of one party. But how eaſily may one miſtake in ſuch a compariſon, or not proceed in it with ſincerity! How many perſons have not a compaſs of mind ſufficient to comprehend ſo many particulars at once? If they apply themſelves to the conſideration of one reaſon or argument, they forget the reſt, and therefore do not compare them truly. It is their preſent application that determines them, and their paſſions that make them apply; and conſequently their inclination, not their underſtanding is the principle of their perſuaſion. The moſt dreadful circumſtance in this is; that as, on the one hand, it is ſo eaſy for men to fall into error and illuſion; it is, on the other hand, extremely difficult for them to extricate themſelves from it, and this, becauſe they are not ſenſible of the defects which plunged them into it; and having no other ſpiritual eyes to diſcover them, they judge of themſelves, as well as of others, by thoſe very eyes which are diſeaſed. Ita fit ut animus de ſe ipſo tum judicet, cum id ipſum quo judicat ægrotet (21). Obſerve particularly, 1. That in certain caſes the truth which diſpleaſes is ſo manifeſt, that it is impoſſible for us to miſtake it. 2. That there are ſome law-ſuits and controverſies, in which it is ſo difficult to diſcover truth from falſhood, that the moſt impartial Judges, and even the moſt able Scepticks, know not which to declare for. It is therefore true, that prejudices and paſſions do not blind us on all occaſions; and that the difficulties of examination ariſe ſometimes from the objects themſelves.

(21) Nicolle, Preface to Prejugez legitimes, p. * 4. Dutch edit.

[F] It would be unjuſt to charge the Proteſtants with being the authors of the reports which were ſpread, that Peliſſon refuſed to make a confeſſion of his ſins in his laſt ſickneſs.] Several perſons after reading the Rotterdam Gazette of Monday the 16th of February 1693, imagined that the whole piece inſerted in it, relating to Peliſſon, had been forged in the ſame city; and that the author of the Gazette in queſtion, was forced, from prudential reaſons, to publiſh that piece. This opinion was not true in all reſpects; it being certain that many letters had been ſent from France to Holland, in which it was affirmed, that all Paris was highly offended at the manner, in which Peliſſon had refuſed to make a confeſſion of his ſins. So that the following paragraph in the News-paper, Mr. Peliſſon died yeſterday, having refuſed to let any perſon ſpeak to him about religious matters, and without receiving the ſacrament or confeſſing his ſins (22), was not invented by the famous and ſorry news-writer who was ſuſpected on that occaſion. This article was grounded on ſeveral letters which had been ſent from France. But, will it be objected, were not thoſe letters writ by ſome Proteſtants in Paris? I can ſay nothing as to that; all I know is, that the Roman Catholicks of Paris firſt ſpread this report, and murmured on that account. Mademoiſelle de Scuderi, who had contracted an intimate friendſhip with Mr. Peliſſon, was grieved at this report; and deſired the Biſhop of Meaux to inform her of the true ſtate of that affair, and accordingly that Prelate wrote a letter, which was publiſhed. Some other pieces were publiſhed in France and Holland; and not long after no farther mention was made of it. An undoubted circumſtance is, that Peliſſon died without receiving the ſacrament or confeſſing his ſins. There were three kinds of opinions, as generally happens on this occaſion. Peliſſon's friends affirmed, agreeably to the account given by the Biſhop of Meaux, that he had ſent for a confeſſor; but that a defluxion choaked him before the hour appointed for the confeſſor was come. His enemies put the worſt conſtruction poſſible on all theſe circumſtances, whilſt neutral perſons contented themſelves with ſaying, that this whole affair was to be left to the ſearcher of hearts, and only affirmed the fact, viz. that Peliſſon had not made any confeſſion. As for the reſt, they cenſured thoſe who publiſhed, that HE DIED, having refuſed to let any perſon ſpeak to him about religious matters (23); for this ſuppoſes that ſome perſons came to diſcourſe with him about religion, and that he refuſed to hear them; which particular (ſay they) is abſolutely falſe. They add, that many pious perſons have put off confeſſion, and receiving the ſacrament, in their ſickneſs, either from a belief that they were not ſo near their end as they really were; or becauſe it was not proper, on account of their domeſtick concerns, that they ſhould be thought ſo near their end (24). Such delays, in which conſcience has nothing to do, may be the cauſe of a man's dying without confeſſion. However this be, a Roman Catholick will no doubt be alledged, in oppoſition to Peliſſon (25). The work in queſtion was printed at Paris, with his Majeſty's licence, in 1694: and the following paſſage is found in page 223. of Tome II. The religion of Paul Peliſſon was variouſly talked of. Some ſay, he had none at all; that he was only a time-ſerver; and that, in his opinion, the religion of the Prince, and that which was moſt ſubſervient to his ambition, was always the beſt. Others thought him a Proteſtant in his heart; and others again, that he was a ſincere Catholick. A certain circumſtance is, that he had profeſſed both thoſe religions in different periods of his life, and diſcovered a zeal for both: but in his expiring moments, he did not profeſs any openly; for he would not receive the ſacraments of the Romiſh Church, nor dared to own himſelf a Proteſtant; but perſiſted, to the laſt, in a deep ſilence, the cauſes of which are known only to God (26). But thoſe, who know that this paſſage is not in the Paris edition, will not dare to produce this teſtimony. I know that the Dutch edition contains many particulars, which de Riencourt never dreamt of. It is to be obſerved, that the Dutch edition has the following words in the title, Printed at Paris for Claude Barbin, in the Court of Juſtice, 1694, with his Majeſty's licence. Will any man, who may meet with this book in a library forty years hence, know that it is a ſpurious edition? Will they not ſeriouſly believe, that the entire book was publiſhed at Paris by a corrector of accounts? And if any one ſhould object to them, that his edition does not mention that profound ſilence, that refuſal of the ſacrament, &c. (27), and that they corrupt publick hiſtory; will they not produce a copy which will ſhew, to the eyes of as many witneſſes as can be required? PRINTED AT PARIS FOR CLAUDE BARBIN, &c. Will they take the pains to get able perſons appointed to examine and compare the editions? Certainly no: every man will be led by his own prejudice; and look upon that edition which he does not like as the ſpurious one. Hence it appears, how difficult it is for men to guard againſt error, in the midſt of ſo much gloom, which ſpreads, before-hand, on future times. Our predeceſſors took as much pains to ſeduce us, as we now do to ſeduce poſterity. And if ſome men preſume to corrupt an author's works, in his life time, what man can prove that the manuſcripts of the Fathers of the Church have been ſpared? Who can affirm but that ſome perſons ſuffered perſecution, in order to carry on the trick of a falſifier of libraries?

(22) Rotterdam Gazette, for Feb. 16, 1693. under the article of Paris, 9 February.

(23) Citation (22) above.

(24) Paſcal having confeſſed, in his laſt ſickneſs, alarmed his friends, and made his Phyſicians accuſe him of fear. This made him ſay, "I would willingly have received the Sacrament; but "ſince I find "that people are "ſo much ſurpriſed at my "confeſſion, I "am afraid they "will be more "ſo: and therefore I had better delay it." And the pariſh Prieſt being of the ſame opinion, he did not receive the ſacrament. See his Life, p. 43. Whilſt this ſheet is re-printing, in January 1701, we are told, in the Dutch Gazettes, that Mr. Roſe, Secretary of the Cloſet, and Lieutenant-general Stoupe, died at Paris without receiving any of the ſacraments: and no one infers from hence, that they were not good Catholicks. It is obſerved in the Menagiana, that ſome ſick perſons delay making their wills, and their confeſſions, as an ill omen.

(25) Mr. de Riencourt, Collector of Accounts.

(26) Riencourt, Hiſt. de Louis XIV. p. 224.

(27) For he would not partake of the ſacraments of the church of Rome. Riencourt, Hiſt. de Louis XIV. p. 224.

[G] Several illuſtrious perſons have ſprung from this family.] "From the family of the Peliſſon deſcend- "ed Raymond Peliſſon, firſt Preſident at Chambery: "Peter Peliſſon, ſecond Preſident in the ſame town. "Thomas Peliſſon, Quarter Maſter of the Troop of "Gendarmes of Guy de Maugiron, Governor of "Chambery, and Grand Provoſt of Dauphiné: "Benoiſt (Benedict) Peliſſon, ſole Recorder civil and "criminal of the Parliament of Dauphiné, an hun- "dred and twenty years ago; an employment, ſo "very conſiderable, that it is now divided into nine, "each of which is worth eleven thouſand crowns: "John Peliſſon of Condrieu, Principal of the College "of Tournon, who drew up an epitome of the Latin "Grammar, which Deſpautier has enlarged (28); and "firſt compoſed a Latin Grammar and its Rules, "with the inſtitutions of children in a College, "printed at Lyons 1530, in 16°. by Tribaut Payen, "according to du Verdier, in his Bibliotheque Fran- "coiſe.

(28) This Author, ſo well known in the ſchools in France, is there called Deſpautere, and not Deſpautier. He was ſo far from having enlarged John Peliſſon's work, the latter abridged Deſpautere. See the Epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheque.

(c) In the art. CALVIN, rem. [F] in the margin, citat. (20).

I ought not to have omitted, that this Preface to Sarazin's works is a maſter-piece. It muſt be added to the three or four Prefaces I have already mentioned (c); and it highly deſerves the encomiums which Coſtar has beſtowed upon it (d).

(d) Coſtar, Lettres 268, and 278, of part 1.

" coiſe. He alſo wrote the Elogium of Cardinal du " Tournon, printed at Lyons, by Gryphius, in 1534, " 4to. I could take notice here of a great number " of illuſtrious men ſprung from that antient family " within thoſe four hundred years, who have been " conſpicuous both in the field and the Courts of " Juſtice, with the illuſtrious families into which they " married; and ſpeak of one Lewis Peliſſon, whoſe " great learning has been honourably mentioned by " Preſident Faber, in his treatiſe De erroribus pragmat, and in that De Conjecturis, Chap. X. As " likewiſe of Peter and John James Peliſſons, Coun- " ſellors in the Parliament of Toulouſe, and in the " Chamber of the Edict of Caſtres, perſons eminent " for their learning; the former of whom was ſo " good a cheſs-player, that an Italian, who was ex- " ceedingly well ſkilled in that game, and who was " looking for as good a player as himſelf, having " played with him, without knowing who he was, " and loſing the game, cried; O c'l diabolo, o il " Signor Peliſſonono, i. e. This is either the Devil or " Mr. Peliſſon. . . . . The family of the Peliſſons is " alſo deſcended by the females, from that of du " Bourg (29), which is famous for the great Anne " du Bourg, Counſellor in the Parliament of Paris, " and by Anthony du Bourg, Chancellor of France " under Francis I. and from that of the Cavaignes, " (whoſe heirs they have been) and of Preſident Man- " ſencal. . . . . I would ſay more, had not John " Peliſſon wrote a book profeſſedly on the praiſes of " Raymond Peliſſon, and of the city of Chambery, " printed at Lyons by Gryphius (30)." The Author, from whom I have tranſcribed this long paſſage, informs us elſewhere (31), that Claude Peliſſon was Knight of the Order of St. John of Jeruſalem, two hundred years ſince (32); and that the Peliſſons ſprang from an Engliſhman, Attorney General to the Prince of Wales, when he was in Guyenne.

(29) See The Hiſtory of the French Academy, p. m. 61.

(30) Peter Borel, Threſor des Antiquitez Gauloiſes & Francoiſes, p. 233.

(31) Ibid. p. 377.

(32) This work of Peter Borel was printed in 1655.

(a) Moſt of the particulars of this article, are extracted from a paper of Dr. Robert Hooke, who tranſcribed them from a manuſcript of John Aubery, Eſq;

☞ PELL (JOHN), an eminent Engliſh Mathematician in the 17th Century (a), was ſon of Mr. John Pell, and Grandſon of Mr. John Pell of Southwyke in Suſſex, and was deſcended of an antient family in Lincolnſhire. His mother was of the family of the Hollands in Kent. He was born at Southwyke, of which place his father was Miniſter, March 1, 1610-11. His father died when he was but five or ſix years old. He was educated in Grammar-learning at the Free-ſchool of Stenning, a Market-town in Suſſex, under Mr. John Jefferies; and at thirteen years of age went to Trinity College in Cambridge as good a ſcholar as moſt Maſters of Arts in the Univerſity; and though he underſtood the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages extremely well, yet he never ſtood at any Election of Scholars or Fellows of his College. His perſon was handſome; and the habit of his body ſtrong; and therefore ſcarce ever uſing recreations, he proſecuted his ſtudies with great vigour. In 1630 he took the Degree of Maſter of Arts, and the year following was incorporated of the Univerſity of Oxford. In 1632 he married Ithamaria, ſecond daughter of Mr. Henry Reginolles of London, by whom he had four ſons and four daughters. Beſides the languages he was now Maſter of the Arabick, Italian, French, Spaniſh, and High and Low Dutch. In December 1643, he went to Amſterdam, where he was appointed Profeſſor of the Mathematicks next after Martin Hortenſius, and read with great applauſe publick Lectures upon Diophantus, as his learned Collegue Gerard John Voſſius teſtifies in his book De Scientiis Mathematicis (b), where he ſtyles him a perſon of various Erudition, and a moſt acute Mathematician. In 1646 the Prince of Orange ſent for him to be Profeſſor of Philoſophy and Mathematicks in the Schola Illuſtris at Breda, founded that year by his Highneſs. The year following he publiſhed at Amſterdam in 4to, Controverſia cum Chriſtiano Longomontano de verâ Circuli Menſura [A]; and in 1651 his Idea of Mathematicks, addreſſed to Samuel Hartlib, Eſq; was printed at London in 12°. at the end of Mr. John Dury's Reformed School [B]. While he lived at Breda, he had for his pupil William Lord Brereton, who was ſent thither by his Grand-

(b) Cap. 10.

[A] Publiſhed at Amſterſtam in 4to, Controverſia cum Chriſtiano Longomontano de vera Circuli Menſurâ.] Monſieur Baillet mentions this diſpute between Longomontanus and our Author, in the following paſſage (1). " Monſieur Des Cartes, ſays he, was " drawn into an engagement with the Chief Mathe- " maticians of Europe, partaking in the famous con- " troverſy, which aroſe that year [1645] between " Longomontanus and Pell, about the ſquaring of the " Circle. . . . . Longomontanus . . . . had undertaken " to demonſtrate the quadrature of the Circle, a rock, " on which the greateſt genius's have hitherto ſplit; " nor was he more ſucceſsful in his attempt than o- " thers before him, notwithſtanding the high opi- " nion, which he had entertained of his labour. " Mr. John Pell, an Engliſhman, Profeſſor of Ma- " thematicks in the College of Amſterdam, imme- " diately diſcovered a great deal of falſe reaſoning " in it; and * ſeeing that the point of the difficulty " conſiſted in the proof of one ſingle theorem, he " firſt made the demonſtration of it by himſelf, and " reſolved to propoſe the thing to all the ableſt Ma- " thematicians of his acquaintance, and deſired their " opinion of it. They who examined it † and ſent him " their demonſtrations, were Meſſieurs Roberval, le " Pailleur, Carcavi, Mydorgius, and Father Merſen- " nus, who was returned from his travels into Italy " about the beginning of July; Sir Charles Caven- " diſh, and Mr. Hobbes of England, John Adolphus " Taſſius, a Mathematician of Hamburgh, John " Lewis Wolzogen, a free Baron of Auſtria, Gentle- " man of the Bedchamber to the King of Poland, a " Carteſian in Philoſophy, and a Socinian in Reli- " gion; Father Bonaventure Cavalieri, an Italian, " Profeſſor of the Mathematicks in Bologne; Golius, " Profeſſor at Leyden, and ſome other Dutch Mathe- " maticians. Monſieur Des Cartes likewiſe ſent to " Mr. Pell a ſhort demonſtration upon the ſame ſub- " ject, which ſerved much to authorize what he had " advanced againſt Longomontanus."

(1) Vie de Des Cartes, Tom. 2. p. 274. ad ann. 1645.

* Vit. Hobbian. Auctar. p. 15 and 16.

† Lipſtorp. Specim. Philoſ. Cartes. p. 14.

[B] In 1651 his Idea of Mathematicks, addreſſed to Samuel Hartlib, Eſq; was printed at London in 12*mo. at the end of Mr.* John Dury's Reformed School.] This little Volume is entitled, The Reformed School; and the Reformed Librarie Keeper, by John Durie. Whereunto is added, 1. An Idea of Mathematicks. 2. The Deſcription of one of the chiefeſt Libraries, which is in Germanie, erected and ordered by one of the moſt learned Princes in Europe. Our Author's Idea of Mathematicks in Latin, is printed in Mr. Hooke's Philoſophical Collections, N°. V. p. 127. & ſeqq. with the following pieces, viz. 1. A cenſure upon it by Father Merſennus, dated November 1, 1639, to whom it had been ſent by Mr. Theodore Haak, in October that year. 2. Mr. Pell's anſwer to Merſennus's Cenſure, dated at London 21 November 1639. 3. Merſennus's

Grandfather George Earl of Norwich, and made a great progreſs in Algebra under our author. In 1652 Mr. Pell returned to England; and in 1654 was ſent by Cromwell, then Lord Protector, to the Proteſtant Cantons of Swiſſerland, where he chiefly reſided at Zurich, with the title of Ablegatus, but afterwards had orders to continue there with that of Reſident. June 23, 1658, he took his leave of the Cantons at Zurich in a Latin ſpeech; and returned to England ſo ſhort a time before Cromwell's death, that he had no opportunity of ſpeaking with him. In his Negotiations abroad he did no ill ſervice to the intereſts of King Charles II. and the Church of England. March 31, 1661, he was ordained Deacon by Dr. Robert Sanderſon, Biſhop of Lincoln; and in June following was ordained Prieſt by the ſame Prelate. The ſame year he was preſented by Dr. Gilbert Sheldon, Biſhop of London, to the Rectory of Fobbing in Eſſex, ſituated in ſo unhealthful a place, that ſeven Curates have died there in the ſpace of ſixteen years. In 1663 he was preſented to the Rectory of Laindon with the Chapel of Bartelſdon annexed, in the ſame county. Upon the promotion of Biſhop Sheldon to the See of Canterbury, he became one of his domeſtick Chaplains, being then Doctor of Divinity; "and expected ſoon after, ſays Mr. Wood (c), to be made a Dean; but not being a perſon of activity, as others who mind not learning are, could never riſe higher than a Rector. "The truth is, he was a ſhiftleſs man as to worldly affairs, and his tenants and relations "dealt ſo unkindly with him, that they cozened him of the profits of his Parſonages, "and kept him ſo indigent, that he wanted neceſſaries, even paper and ink, to his dying "day." He was caſt into the King's Bench-Priſon for debt. In March 1682 he was invited by Dr. Whiſtler to live in the College of Phyſicians, where he continued till June; ſennus's Reply, dated 10 December, 1639. 4. Des Cartes's judgment and approbation of Mr. Pell's Idea, dated February 8, 1640. As the Engliſh copy of this Idea is very rare to be met with, we ſhall give the reader a large account of it. He obſerves to Mr. Hartlib, that the ſum of what he had heretofore written or ſpoken to that Gentleman concerning the Advancement of the Mathematicks, is this; that as long as men want will, wit, means, or leiſure, to attend thoſe ſtudies, it is no marvail if they make no great progreſs in them: to remedy which our Author conceives theſe means not to be amiſs.

(c) Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 253, 2d edit.

I. To write a Conſiliarius Mathematicus, anſwering to theſe three Queſtions.

Qu. 1. What fruit or profit ariſeth from the ſtudy of the Mathematicks?

Qu. 2. What helps are there for the attaining this profitable knowledge?

Qu. 3. What order is to be obſerved in uſing theſe helps?

To this purpoſe it ſhould contain,

1. A plain and popular Diſcourſe of the Extent of the Mathematicks, with the profit that redounds, firſt to the ſtudent himſelf, and then to the country, wherein there are many ſuch grounded artiſts.

2. A Catalogue of Mathematicians and their works in this order:

1. A Synopſis of all the ſeveral kinds of mathematical Writings, either extant in print, or acceſſible Manuſcripts in publick Libraries, with ſeveral numbers ſet to every kind.

2. A Chronological Catalogue of all Mathematicians names, that ever were of note, according to the order of the years, when any of their works were firſt printed.

3. A Catalogue of the Writings themſelves, in the order of years, in which they were printed in any language. And this ſhould be contrived thus: firſt, the year of our Lord, and then the names of all the mathematical books printed that year in any country or language, after the uſual manner of catalogues; but 1. adding the Volume, that is, not only what fold (4to. 8vo. &c.) but alſo the number of leaves, that we may eſtate the bulk of the book. 2. Prefixing before the title the year, to which you muſt look back to know either when it was written, or when it was laſt before printed in that or any other language. 3. Setting in the margin after the title, firſt, the year, wherein it was the next time printed; ſecondly, the number of references to the Synopſis in the firſt page; by which numbers one may preſently run over all the books of one ſort, of this or that particular ſubject. 3. A Counſel directing a ſtudent to the beſt books in every kind, in what order, and how to read them; what to obſerve, what to beware of in ſome Mathematicaſters, how to proceed and keep all.

4. A Paræneſis; firſt, to all thoſe, who have means and leiſure, and a wit not unapt for theſe ſtudies, to ſet upon them in regard, 1. Of their profitableneſs to the ſtudent and to mankind. 2. Of that more refined pleaſure of hunting out hidden truths, wreſtling with difficult problems, and getting the victory; and ſo much the rather, becauſe, 3. Of the great facility, that is now in that ſtudy, by reaſon of the many helps to ſpare much labour, time, and coſt, which our Forefathers were forced to ſpend. Secondly, to all thoſe, who have underſtanding to eſtimate the worth of theſe ſtudies, and wealth, wherewith to purchaſe themſelves laſting honour by the wiſe diſpenſing of it, to take more notice of this ſort of ſtudents, and to encourage them, ſetting apart the choiceſt of them to perfect the inventions, to which their genius leads them. Eſpecially, to all Princes and States whom it concerns to take a courſe, 1. That their Dominions may be better furniſhed with this ſort of ſtudies: 2. That the way may be made leſs laborious and coſtly. 3. That Mathematica Ingenia may be diſcovered and aſſiſted.

To which end it would be good;

II. To erect a publick Library, containing all thoſe books, and one inſtrument of every ſort, that hath been invented, with ſufficient revenue;

1. To buy one copy of all thoſe, that ſhall be printed yearly in other countries. And,

2. To maintain a Library-keeper of great judgment, to whom it may belong, 1. To peruſe all books of ſuch ſubjects to be printed within that country; and ſuppreſs whatſoever is not according to art, that learners be not abuſed; and to admoniſh the writers, if they being nothing but ſtale ſtuff. 2. Upon his credit to approve excellent inventions, and impartially to commend the inventors to the rewarders. 3. To receive, record, and place one printed copy of every book ſo peruſed, ſent into the Library, well bound at the Author's or Bookſeller's charge. 4. To reſolve any ſtudent, that enquires about any problems, whether it hath been done already or no, fearing leſt he ſhould actum agere, and therefore perhaps ſuppreſſing ſome invention, which he hath light upon, but doubts, it is old, and to be found in ſome of the books of that Library. 5. To receive, &c. all ſuch Manuſcripts, as ſhall be brought thither by way of gift, legacy, or the like. 6. To maintain correſpondence with ſuch as himſelf in other countries, to know what is printed there. 7. To take notice of all his countreymen, that are fit to be teachers. 8. To keep a catalogue of all ſuch workmen as are able and fit to be employed in making mathematical inſtruments and repreſentations, working upon wood, magnets, metals, glaſſes, &c. 9. To give teſtimonial, after examination, to all ſorts of practiſers, as pilots, maſters, landmeters, accomtants, &c. of their ſpeculative ability and practical dexterity,

June; and then was obliged by his ill ſtate of health to a Grandchild of his living in St. Margaret's Church-yard Weſtminſter. He died in Dyot-Street in the Pariſh of St. Giles's in the Fields, in the houſe of Mr. Cothorne, Reader of that Church, on Saturday December 12, 1685; and was interred at the expence of Dr. Richard Buſby, Maſter of Weſtminſter-ſchool, and Dr. John Sharp, Rector of St. Giles's, in the Vault under that Church, dexterity, that thoſe, that have occaſion to uſe ſuch men, be not abuſed by unable undertakers, to their exceeding great damage.

By the Catalogue men muſt be informed, in that multitude of books, with which the world is now peſtered, what the names are of thoſe books, that tend to this ſtudy only. In the Library they might find the books themſelves, read them, and if they liked them, know whither to ſend to buy them. Beſides, any, whether foreigners or others, might have recourſe thither, and learn what helps that country would afford them in theſe ſtudies.

And this is the beſt courſe that I can think on, ſays our Author, for the making uſe of ſuch helps as we have already. If men deſire better helps, let them employ fit artiſts,

III. To write and publiſh theſe three new treatiſes;

1. Pandectæ Mathematicæ, comprehending as clearly, orderly, thriftily, and ingenuouſly as may be, whatſoever may be gathered out of all thoſe mathematical books and inventions, that were before us, or that may be inferred as conſectaries thereon; citing, at the end of every period or propoſition, the antienteſt Author, in which it is found; and branding all later Writers, if they be taken ſtealing or borrowing without acknowledgment, or (which is worſe) expreſsly arrogating to themſelves any other man's inventions. This would bring that great library into far leſs room, to the ſaving of more Labour, Time, and Coſt, to all Students, than men can yet well imagine. But becauſe this alſo would be too great and cumberſome to carry about us, let there be compoſed

2. Comes Mathematicus, comprehending in a pocket-book (and therefore as briefly as may) the uſefulleſt tables, and the precepts for their uſe, in ſolving all problems, whether purely mathematical, or applied to ſuch practices as men's various occaſions may require.

And laſtly, that in this kind of learning alſo, we be no longer tied to books, let there be compoſed

3. Mathematicus αὐτάρκης, or, an Inſtruction, ſhewing how any Mathematician, that will take the pains, may prepare himſelf ſo, as that he may, though he be utterly deſtitute of books or inſtruments, reſolve any mathematical problem, as exactly as if he had a complete library by him.

" And this is the idea, continues our Author, which " I have long framed to myſelf, according to my " faſhion, with whom this paſſeth for an undoubted " truth, that the ſureſt way to come to all poſſible " excellence in any thing, is to propoſe to ourſelves " the perfecteſt ideas, that we can imagine; then to " ſeek the means tending thereto as rationally as " may be; and to proſecute it with indefatigable " diligence; yet, if the idea prove too high for us, " to reſt ourſelves content with approximation.

" As for the preſent idea, I am ſo far from counting it merely-impoſſible, that I ſee not why it might " not be performed by one man, without any aſſiſtants; provided that he were neither diſtracted " with cares for his maintenance, nor diverted by " other employments.

" The excellency of this work makes me wiſh " mine own nation the honour of firſt undertaking " and perfecting this deſign. And I conceive I have " ſome reaſon to hope that it will be ſo. For " though I know few or none, that are willing " to promote deſigns of this nature, yet can I " not therefore be perſuaded, that this Kingdom " is ſo deſtitute of learned Nobility and Gentry, " that there can be found none to countenance " and advance this part of learning, even in this " way, if they could ſee it poſſible and likely to be " effected.

" As for the library and catalogue, there can be " no doubt but that they may be eaſily had, if mo- " ney be not wanting. Nor is it unlikely, that di- " vers of this nation (if they be ſet apart for it) are " able to compoſe the other three new treatiſes. For " though I know no ſuch, yet I perſuade myſelf " there may be found amongſt us, men able to incoun- " ter all the difficulties, and to endure all the la- " bour, that they muſt needs meet with in the raiſ- " ing of ſo great a fabrick. And I the rather be- " lieve, that there are many ſuch, becauſe for mine " own part, notwithſtanding the want of counſel " and helps in that ſtudy, and the innumerable di- " verſions and diſtractions that I have had, I am " nevertheleſs come to ſuch a confidence of my un- " derſtanding the depth of that ſtudy, that, were " I to pen thoſe Pandects, I ſhould lay heavier laws " upon myſelf, than I have already mentioned; " namely, firſt to lay down ſuch an exact method or " deſcription of the proceſs of man's reaſon in inven- " tions, that afterwards it ſhould be imputed merely " to my negligence and diſobedience to my own " laws, and not to their inſufficiency, if from my " firſt grounds, ſeeds, or principles, I did not, in an " orderly way, according to that preſcribed method, " deduce, not only all that ever is to be found in our " anteceſſors writings, and whatſoever they may " ſeem to have thought on, but alſo all the mathe- " matical inventions, theorems, problems, and pre- " cepts, that it is poſſible for the working wits of " of our ſucceſſors to light upon; and that in one cer- " tain unchanged order, from the firſt ſeeds of ma- " thematicks, to their higheſt and nobleſt applica- " tions, as well as to the meaneſt and moſt ordinary. " Not ſetting them down at random, as they come in " my head, as thoſe before us have done; ſo that " they ſeem to have light upon their problems, and " the ſolution of them by chance, not to have found " them by one perpetual, conſtant, invariable pro- " ceſs of art. Yet ſuch an art may men invent, if " they accuſtom themſelves, as I have long done, to " conſider, not only the uſefulneſs of men's works, " and the meaning and truth of their writings, but " alſo how it came to paſs, that they fell upon ſuch " thoughts, and that they propoſed to themſelves " ſuch ends, or found out ſuch means for them." Were theſe Pandects thus made and finiſhed, I ſuppoſe it is manifeſt, that by their orderly, rational, and uniform completeneſs, above all that hath been hitherto written, they would ſpare after-ſtudents much labour and time, that is now ſpent in ſeeking out of books, and diſorderly reading them, and ſtruggling with their cloudy expreſſions, unapt repreſentations, different methods, confuſions, tautologies, impertinencies, falſhoods by paralogiſms and pſeudographemes, uncertainties, becauſe of inſufficient demonſtrations, &c. beſides much coſt alſo, now thrown away upon the multitude of books, the greater part whereof they had perhaps been better never to have ſeen.

And it may be, ſome would like the method of that work ſo well, as to extend it farther, and apply it to other ſtudies; in ſpeculation imitating this my warineſs, that no falſhood be admitted, and no truth omitted; and for practice inuring themſelves, any ſubject being propounded, to determine the number of all the problems, that can be conceived concerning it; and any problems being propounded, demonſtratively to ſhew either all the means of its ſolution, or the impoſſibility of it; and if ſo, then whether it be not yet or not at all poſſible.

Men eaſily ſee how to contract theſe Pandects into a pocket-book for their ordinary uſe; but ſo to lay them up in their heads, as to need no book at all (according to that Deſideratum of mine, to have a Mathematicus αὐτάρκης) will perhaps ſeem utterly impoſſible to moſt; no man, that ever I heard of, having propoſed ſuch a ſcope to himſelf before. But perhaps they will conceive it more poſſible, if it pleaſe them to ſuſpend their judgments, till they have conſidered what means may be uſed to fortify the imagination, to prompt the memory, to regulate our reaſon, and what effects may be produced by the uniting of theſe means, and the conſtant exerciſing them.

For mine own part, the conſideration of the incomparable excellency, unſtained pleaſure, unvaluable profitableneſs, bleneſs, and undaunted poſſibility of this whole deſign, hath prevailed ſo far with me, that notwithſtanding all the diſcouragements that I have met withal, I have done more towards it than a bare Idea.

Church, called the Rector's Vault. Beſides the books above-mentioned, he wrote ſome others [C].

[C] Beſides the books above-mentioned, he wrote ſome others.] He publiſhed without his name an Exercitation concerning Eaſter, printed in 1664, in 4to. He drew up A Table of ten thouſand ſquare numbers, namely, of all the ſquare numbers between 0 and an hundred Millions, and of their ſides and roots, which are all the whole numbers between 0 and ten thouſand. With an Appendix concerning the endings or laſt figures of all ſquare numbers. London 1672, folio. He publiſhed his Inaugural Oration made at his entering upon his Profeſſorſhip at Breda. He demonſtrated the ſecond and tenth Books of Euclid, which piece was in manuſcript in the Library of the Lord Brereton of Cheſhire; as likewiſe Archimedes's Ψαμμίτης, and the greateſt part of Diophantus's ſix Books of Arithmetick. He alſo made great alterations and additions to Rhonius's Algebra, printed at London 1668, in 4to. under the following title: An Introduction to Algebra, tranſlated out of the High Dutch into Engliſh, by Thomas Brancker, M. A. Much altered and augmented, by D. P. [i. e. Dr. Pell.] Alſo a Table of odd numbers leſs than one hundred thouſand, ſhewing thoſe that are incompoſit, and reſolving the reſt into their factors or coefficients, &c. ſupputated by the ſame Tho. Brancker. Mr. Brancker in his Preface, dated at Whitegate in Cheſhire, April 22, 1668, writes thus: "The title-page ſays that "this book was a Tranſlation, but hath been much "altered. If any man deſire to know what the al- "terations are, and why they are made, he may do "well to compare it with the original; a printed "copy whereof may be had at Francfort in Ger- "many by any that enquires there for it by this title: "Algebra Rhonii Germanicè: Tiguri apud Bodmerum, "1659, in 4to. The copy, which I have, was * Mr. F. T. "given me anno 1662, by a good friend *, who "then told me he much deſired to read it in ſome "language that he underſtood: I then promiſed him "to Engliſh it. As ſoon as my leiſure permitted, I "corrected it according to the printed catalogue of "Errata, and then began the tranſlation. When it "was finiſhed, I deſired to ſee it printed, and got "it licenſed May 18, 1665, with the name of An "Introduction to Algebra; and ſo without any altera- "tion, either in the precepts or examples, ſave only "the correction of many miſtakes, it was ſent to "the preſs, with order to reprint the ſix leaves of "his Table of Incompoſits preciſely as they ſtand there. "A little after I heard that there was at that time Dr. J. P. "in London, a perſon of note, very worthy to be "made acquainted with my deſign, before I made "any farther progreſs in the impreſſion. Being ad- "mitted to ſpeak with him, I found him not only "able to direct me, but alſo very willing ſo to do, "ſo far as his leiſure would admit. He gave me "divers cautions concerning the work; he ſhewed "me the way of making the Table of Incompoſits, "of examining it, and of continuing it as far as I "would. He encouraged me to extend it to an "hundred thouſand; telling me, that by that time "that I had calculated and printed that Table, he "hoped to be at leiſure to review ſome of Monſieur "Rhonius's Problems, and to work them anew, and "that he would ſend them to me, with leave to pub- "liſh them or to keep them by me. I had finiſhed "and printed that Table, as alſo twelve ſheets of "the book itſelf, before he ſent me his alterations. "They begin with Probl. 24. p. 100. All from "thence to the end in his work; as pag. 79, 80, "81, 82, which he ſent laſt of all. So that inſtead "of the firſt 124 pages of Rhonius, this hath juſt "twice as many. Inſtead of theſe 8 or 9 ſheets re- "maining in Rhonius, how much ſhall be hereafter "publiſhed, I will not adventure to foretel, becauſe "of the uncertainty of life, health, leiſure, and of "the acceptance, which this ſhall find amongſt the "lovers of theſe ſtudies, to whom this might have "been more acceptable, if it had been wholly void "of preſs-faults." Soon after the publication of this book, Dr. John Wallis wrote the following letter to Mr. John Collins, F. R. S. communicated to us by William Jones, Eſq; F. R. S.

"SIR,

"I ſend you here incloſed what in my letter by "the laſt poſt I promiſed; which is the reſult of my "Examen of Mr. Branker's Table of incompoſite Num- "bers. I do not pretend to have made it ſo exact, but "that ſome errors may poſſibly have eſcaped mee. "You ſee I have increaſed Mr. Branker's Catalogue "of Amendments, p. 198. by a pretty conſiderable "number. Yet was my Examen in the performance "but ſlight, though upon ſuch grounds, as if accu- "rately perſued, are demonſtrative enough. But ſo "to do, would have taken up more time than I was "willing to employ about it. Yet, as it is, I believe that "many errors have not eſcaped mee. I think it pro- "per enough to print, in one ſingle leaf to be ad- "joined to Mr. Branker's book, this Catalogue as I "have here drawn it up; unleſs you think fit to "tranſmit it firſt (or a copy of it) to Mr. Branker; "that if he have ſince diſcovered any miſtakes, which "I have miſſed, theſe may be added to theſe. One "or two of thoſe, which I have inſerted, are no "other then ſuch faults as the preſſe made by rea- "ſon of ſome letters not appearing (being overtopped "by their neighbours) and which poſſibly in all co- "pies may not appear to be faults, or ſuch as might "have no ill influence, (as at number 31001, and num- "ber . . . 47 and 6'0701;) but I find hee had led "mee the way in ſome others of the like nature at "number 29599, 58901, 466 . ., 641 . ., 659 . .; "and it can do no hurt. In his Catalogue I find the "number 60779 miſ-written for 60799; and at "number 91793, 17 is written inſtead of 13, (the "latter of which he takes notice of in the Errata "at the beginning, but not of the former. The "reaſon why I took this pains myſelf, and give you "this trouble, is becauſe it is ſo very requiſite, that "a table of this nature ſhould bee accurate; where "the ſenſe or concomitants give ſo little help to diſ- "cover an error, and the whole certainty thereof "(unleſs a man be at the pains to calculate anew "upon every occaſion) depends upon the credit and "care of the calculator. And Mr. Branker having "been at the pains to calculate ſo large a table, I "would not have it blemiſhed or made unuſefull for "want of ſuch a Catalogue of Amendments. This "is all I ſhall trouble you with upon this occaſion, "reſting

"Your Friend to ſerve you,

"John Wallis."

"I have received the books you ſent, and thank "you."

PENELOPE, daughter of Icarius, brother of Tyndarus King of Lacedæmonia, was Ulyſſes's wife; and became ſo famous for her chaſtity, that ſhe is propoſed as an example to this day, and is become proverbial. It is related that Ulyſſes obtained her for his wife by the good offices of Tyndarus (a), in return for ſome good counſel he had given him (b). Others ſay that he won her in a race; Icarius having declared to thoſe who were ſuitors to him for his daughter, that he would beſtow her on the ſwifteſt runner (c), and Ulyſſes was the man. He therefore may be compared to perſons who run in purſuit of a benefice, and who get themſelves poſſeſſed of it, by their having the ſwifteſt horſes. He could never be prevailed upon to live in Lacedæmonia, as his father-in-

(a) Apollodorus, Bibliotb. lib. 3. p. m. 217, 218.

(b) See in the article HELENA, (in the text) citat. (a), the advice ſhe gave to Tyndarus, with regard to Helena's marriage.

(c) Pauſan. lib. 3. p. 93.

in-law desired; but set out for Ithaca again, and was followed by his wife. Her behaviour, when her father, who was in pursuit of both, overtook them in the road, deserves particular notice [A]. Our new married couple had a very tender affection for each other, so that Ulysses did all that lay in his power, to prevent his going to the Siege of Troy (d): however, all his stratagems were defeated, and he was forced to quit his dear wife, who had brought him a son. It was twenty years before he saw her again. During this long absence, she was addressed by a great number of suitors [B], who urged her to declare her mind; but she eluded their addresses [C], till the return of her husband, who

(d) See the art. ULYSSES.

[A] Her behaviour, when her father, who was in pursuit of both, overtook them in the road, deserves particular notice.] Icarius, not having been able to persuade his son-in-law to live in Lacedæmonia, endeavoured to obtain his daughter's consent that she would reside there; but his entreaties could not prevail with her so far, as to make him so great a sacrifice, as is, the preferring her father's house to that of her husband. She therefore set out for Ithaca, with Ulysses. Her father finding they had eloped, got into his chariot, ran after, and overtook them; and again conjured his daughter to stay. Ulysses, quite tired with this importunity, told Penelope, that, in case she would follow him willingly, this would delight him much; and yet, if she chose rather to go back to Lacedæmonia, he would not hinder her. Tho' Penelope did not return any answer, and only let down her vail, yet Icarius discovered the dictates of her soul, and saw very plainly, that she was desirous of following her husband. He consented to it, and caused a statue of Modesty to be set up in that place. Ὀδυσσεὺς δὲ τέως μὲν ἠτίχετο, τέλος δὲ ἐκέλευε συνακολουθεῖν Πηνελόπην ἐκοῦσαν, ἢ τὸν πατέρα ἐλομένην ἀναχωρεῖν ἐς Λακεδαίμονα. Καὶ τὴν ἀποκρίνασθαί φασιν οὐδέν, ἐγκαλυψαμένης δὲ πρὸς τὸ ἐρώτημα, Ἰκάριος τὴν μὲν, ἅτε δὴ συνιεὶς ὡς βούλεσθαι ἀπιέναι μετὰ Ὀδυσσέως, ἀφίησιν· ἄγαλμα δὲ ἀνίδρυται Αἰδοῦς. ἐνταῦθα γὰρ τῆς ὁδοῦ προήκουσαν ἤδη τὴν Πηνελόπην λέγουσιν ἐγκαλύψασθαι. Ulysses tandem victus hominis importunitate, puellæ optionem dedit, vel se ut sequeretur, si id mallet; vel cum patre Lacedæmonem rediret: ibi illam ajunt nihil sanè respondisse, sed faciem tantum velasse: Icarium cùm sibi probè nosse videretur, quid illa animi haberet, ut cum Ulysse abiret, permisisse: signum vero pudoris ea in viæ parte dedicasse; quò Penelope, cum faciem velavit, pervenerat (1). We here have some strong characteristicks of a woman of virtue. Reason requires a wife to follow her husband, and nature requires it. Nevertheless, if it be left to her choice, either to go with her husband, or to stay with a father, who passionately desires it, she ought to be seized with a bashfulness that stops her voice, and shews, only by signs, the resolution she intends to take. The modesty and decency of her sex, will not permit her to declare her mind boldly and without blushing. Icarius was somewhat unreasonable; he requiring such a preference, as cannot be reconciled, either with the laws of nature, or the connubial rights. As instruction is conveyed in every part of God's word, it has been observed, that the Psalmist does not employ many arguments, to persuade a young woman, that she must prefer her husband's house to that of her father. It would be to no purpose to expatiate on arguments, to persuade such a circumstance; and for this reason, the sacred Spirit contents itself with promising that young woman, that she will be happy in children, and gain her husband's affection (2).

(1) Pausan. lib. 3. p. 104.

(2) Psalm 45. according to Marot's translation.

Escoute fille en beauté nonpareille,
Enten à moi, & me preste l'oreille:
Il te convient ton peuple familier,
Et la maison de ton pere oublier.
Car nostre Roi, nostre souverain Sire,
Moult ardemment ta grand' beauté desire:
Doresnavant ton Seigneur il sera,
Et de toi humble obeïssance aura.
(3). . . . . .
Ne plains donc pas de quitter pere & mere,
CAR en lieu d'eux mariage prospere
Te produira beaux & nobles enfans,
Que tu feras par tout Rois triomphans.

" But thou, O royal bride, give ear,
" And to my words attend;
" Forget thy native country now,
" And every former friend.
" So shall thy beauty charm the King,
" Nor shall his love decay;
" For he is now become thy Lord,
" To him due reverence pay.
. . . . . .
" Thou, in thy royal father's room,
" Must princely sons expect;
" Whom thou to diff'rent realms may'st send,
" To govern and protect. TATE and BRADY.

(3) It is here promised, that rich presents should be made her, and that she should be clothed magnificently; but this promise did not offer any thing new to a daughter of the King of Egypt. See the whole passage which I omit.

This Psalm is exceedingly beautiful, even when abstracted from its mystical sense, and considered merely as a piece of poetry. But here is a much more beautiful translation, than the old French of Clement Marot is now.

Tuque adeo regina audi; & rem pectore conde:
Nec mea dicta nega placidas demittere in aures:
Jam nunc & patriam & patrem oblivisce're, jam nunc
Ex animo caros penitus depone propinquos:
Unum oculis specta, unum animo complectere regem:
Regem oculis animoque, tuo qui pendet ab ore,
Unius & pulchris defixus vultibus hæret.
Hunc dominum agnosce, & supplex venerare: nec ille
Officio, studioque tibi concedet,
. . . . . ,
Neu desiderio nimium tangare tuorum
Virgo, tibi dulcem patrisque & matris amorem
Leniet adnascens sobolis generosa propago:
Quos regere imperio terras, totumque per orbem
Adspicies populos sceptris frænare superbos (4).

(4) Psalm 45. translated by Buchanan.

[B] She was addressed by a great many suitors.] Here follow the words of a learned Commentator. The number of Penelope's suitors, according to Homer, amounted to 108; since he says, Odyssey 16*th, that there were* 52 from the island of Dulichium, 24 from the island of Samos, 20 from the island of Zacynthus, and 12 from Ithaca; all which numbers added together, make just 108. Eustatbius, in his Commentary on the first Odyssey, enlarges that sum considerably; he saying that, according to the opinion of some persons, they amounted to 300 (5). Meziriac makes this remark, to justify the translation of these words of Ovid, quid . . . alios referam, which he explains I omit above one hundred. Here follows the whole passage from Ovid (6).

(5) Meziriac on Ovid's Epist. p. 101.

(6) Ovidius, in Epist. Penelopes ad Ulyssem.

Dulichii, Samiique, & quos tulit alta Zacynthos,
Turba ruunt in me luxuriosa proci.
Inque tua regnant nullis prohibentibus aula,
Viscera nostra tuæ dilacerantur opes.
Quid tibi Pisandrum, Polybumque, Medontaque dirum (7),
Eurimachique avidas, Antinoique manus,
Atque alios referam? quos omneis turpiter absens
Ipse tuo partis sanguine rebus alis.
Irus egens pecorisque Melanthius author edendi
Ultimus accedunt in tua damna pudor.

(7) Meziriac, p. 100, shews, that we must read, Quid tibi Pisandrum, Polybum, Amphimedontaque dirum.

" From Crete and Samos, Rhodes and Zant set out,
" To court me come a wild, unruly rout;
" Who revel in your house without controul,
" And eat and waste your means, our blood and soul.
" Of Medon, Polybus, Pysander, fell
" Eurimachus, alas! why should I tell?
" With many more, (you sadly out o'th' way)
" Feed here, and on your substance let them prey,
" The beggar Irus, and that goat-herd clown
" Melanthius, range and rummage up and down.
RYMER.

[C] . . . she eluded their addresses.] " Homer re" lates, who deſtroyed them all. Great applauſes are juſtly beſtowed on her caution, in refuſing to treat Ulyſſes as her huſband, till ſhe was perfectly ſure that he was Ulyſſes [D]. Tho' her virtue has been celebrated by the greateſt Poet in the world, and by a numberleſs multitude of writers, yet ſlander has preſumed to attack it. Some ſay, that the reaſon why her gallants had not the laſt favour, was, becauſe they choſe to fare well at Ulyſſes's coſt, rather

" lates, in the ſecond and nineteenth Odyſſey, that " Penelope, to free herſelf from the importunity of " her ſuitors, declared to them, that ſhe would not " marry, till ſhe had finiſhed a piece of linen cloth " ſhe was weaving, to make a winding-ſheet for La- " ertes her father-in-law, when he ſhould die. In " this manner ſhe amuſed them for the ſpace of three " years, without ever finiſhing her web; becauſe " ſhe unravelled in the night, what ſhe had wove " in the day, which gave riſe to the proverb, Pene- " lope's web, employed, when works, which are " never ended, are ſpoken of (8)." This is Mezi- " riac's Commentary on the following lines of Ovid:

(8) Meziriac, on Ovid's Epiſt. p. 40.

Nec mihi quærenti ſpatioſam fallere noctem,
Laſſaret viduas pendula tela manus (9).

(9) Ovidius, in Epiſt. Penelopes ad Ulyſſem.

" Nor ſhould this pains to paſs the evenings take,
" And work and weave, ev'n till my fingers ake.

RYMER.

[D] . . . till ſhe was perfectly ſure he was Ulyſſes.] Meziriac, after the paſſage which I cited elſewhere (10), in which we find that Helena was deceived by the ſimilitude of features between Paris and her huſband, informs us of what follows. Euſtathius obſerves, on the 23d Odyſſey, that Penelope believed much more prudently; for though ſhe imagined ſhe had ſome knowledge of Ulyſſes, ſhe yet would not indulge him the leaſt fondneſs, nor lye with him, till he had informed her of a great number of particulars, and ſhewn her ſeveral tokens, to aſſure her that he was truly her huſband, and that ſhe could not be miſtaken (11). This caution uſed by Penelope ought to ſerve as a rule in every ſuch conjuncture; and, if a woman ſhould commit adultery, for not taking time ſufficient to come to the truth, it would be juſt to cenſure her. This is obſerved by Mr. Baſnage, in a fine work publiſhed by him. Let us ſuppoſe, ſays he (12), a woman, who, in a tranſport of love for her real huſband, runs eagerly to a man whom ſhe takes to be him; this woman has no deſign to commit a miſtake; her eagerneſs cannot be blamed; it is lawful and juſt, if it is directed to her true huſband; in a word, her ignorance is involuntary, and merely the effect of a tender fondneſs. Nevertheleſs, if the woman in queſtion had been embraced by an adulterer, can we make an excuſe for her? Will ſhe feel no confuſion, when ſhe reflects on her warmth and precipitation? Will not theſe condemn her? The Author of the critique on Maimbourg is of the ſame opinion, or very near it. I add this reſtriction, becauſe he hints, if ſuch a woman does not refuſe to enquire into things, from ſome blame-worthy motive, ſhe ought to be excuſed. Here follow his words (13). " I take it for granted, that if a wo- " man, deceived by the reſemblance there ſhould " be between her true huſband and another man, " ſhould grant this man all the privileges of the " marriage bed, her chaſtity would not ſuffer by it. " Though many may ſwear this is a paradox; I af- " firm, and repeat it again, ſuch a woman would " not do her huſband any real injuſtice; and he " would be the moſt unjuſt man upon earth, ſhould " he charge her with defiling the conjugal bed; but " this provided ſhe had not aſſiſted to impoſe upon " herſelf. For, if the impatience of recovering a " huſband made her overlook all the ſuſpicions ſhe " might entertain at the ſight of a man who ſhould " reſemble her huſband, and preſent himſelf under " that title; if, through the fear of not taſting, " without remorſe, the connubial pleaſures, ſhe ſhould " forbear to examine him thoroughly; in a word, " if ſhe ſhould believe him to be her huſband, be- " cauſe ſhe wiſhes him to be ſuch, for the reaſons I " hinted at; ſilencing every thing which might per- " mit her to doubt of it; I ſhould greatly leſſen the " good opinion I had entertained of her merit; and " will freely own, that I ſhould not blame her huſ- " band very much, were he to look upon her only " as half chaſte, and conſider her honour as very " fickle and unſtable . . . . (14)." Two men very " ſeldom reſemble one another ſo perfectly, but they " differ in ſomething or other; whence we may in- " fer, that a woman, who ſuffers herſelf to be im- " poſed upon, conducts herſelf very ſuperficially. " But excuſes are not wanting even on this occaſion; " for where do we hear of wives, who ſcruple to ad- " mit their huſbands, after ſome months abſence, " unleſs they firſt prove themſelves to be their huſ- " bands? When they come into their bed-chambers " in the duſk of the evening, before candles are " lighted, do they not go up to them; and are they " not ready to indulge them in every kind of complai- " ſance, without making any farther enquiry? Does " any one blame them for this? If they are not " blamed, why ſhould any cenſure be thrown on an " unhappy woman, impoſed upon by an impoſtor, " who ſhould have had all the indications of a huſ- " band, ſo far as could be diſtinguiſhed in a dark- " iſh room? It is plain, that if ſuch a one is blamed, " we ought to blame all wives, who behave in this " manner towards their true huſbands; for right " reaſon bids us not judge of things according to the " event; and, in the preſence of God, two actions " which reſult from the ſame cauſe, do not change " their ſpecies, though the one ſucceeds by accident, " and the other ſhould, by accident, be attended " with unhappy conſequences." To ſolve this difficulty, we muſt ſay, that every perſon, who acts raſhly, is to blame, whether evil does, or does not, reſult from it. Every perſon, to act conformably to the dictates of reaſon, ought to examine thoroughly all he does. I will take notice, occaſionally, of a precaution of Seneca. He affirms, that a man who knows his wife, at the ſame time that he imagines ſhe is another man's wife, commits adultery, but that the wife is innocent. But he does not reverſe the propoſition: he does not ſay that a man, who ſhould know another man's wife, upon the ſuppoſition that it was his own, would not ſin. I ſhall here inſert Seneca's words: they will prove that Jacob did not commit adultery the firſt time he knew Leah; but that Leah was guilty of that crime, from her being perfectly ſenſible that ſhe was not Jacob's wife (15).

(14) Ibid. p. 285, 286.

To return to Penelope. Thoſe who have read a certain paſſage of the Hexameron ruſtique, will perhaps imagine, that her precautions do not deſerve very much to be admired, becauſe Ulyſſes made himſelf ſuſpected, by the great eagerneſs with which he attempted to enjoy her. What makes me judge that Homer intended to employ this beautiful artifice here, is, the impatience with which he repreſents Ulyſſes (in the twenty third book) and his eagerneſs to enjoy his wife. She had ſcarce time enough to know him again, and had hardly ſpoke three words to her, but he bluntly, and in the utmoſt tranſports, bids her nurſe Euriclea to get a bed ready for them (16). Theſe are the words of La Mothe le Vayer, Author of the Hexameron ruſtique. This, will it be ſaid, ſuggeſts to us, that Penelope miſtruſted this eagerneſs; and imagined, that the only reaſon why this man was ſo eager, was, from his fear that the diſcovery of his impoſture would fruſtrate his deſires. Without examining what may be objected to this reaſoning, I ſhall content myſelf with one obſervation. La Mothe le Vayer is miſtaken, and does not underſtand the paſſage he hints at in Homer. Had he duly examined this part of the Odyſſey, he would have known that Ulyſſes did not deſire to have a bed prepared for him to lye with Penelope. He only deſired that a bed might be got ready for himſelf to lye down upon, ſince his wife did not vouchſafe to come near him, and treated him in a very cruel manner. His words are as follow:

(10) In the article HELENA, citat. (59).

(11) Meziriac, on Ovid's Epiſt. p. 438.

(12) Baſnage, Traite de la Conſcience, Tom. 1. p. 85. Amſterdam edit. 1696.

(13) Nouvelles Lettres de l'Auteur de la Critique Generale de Maimbourg, p. 277, 278.

(15) Si quis cum uxore ſua tanquam cum aliena concumbat, adulter erit, quamvis illa adultera non ſit. Aliquis mihi venenum dedit, ſed vim ſuam remixtum cibo perdidit: venenum illud dando, ſcelere ſe obligavit, etiamſi non nocuit. Non minus latro eſt, cujus telum oppoſita veſte elapſum eſt. Omnia ſcelera etiam ante effectum operis, quantum culpæ ſatis eſt, perfecta ſunt. Seneca, de Conſtantia Sapientis, cap. 7. p. m. 683.

(16) Hexameron ruſtique, p. m. 104, 105.

rather than lye with his wife [E]. Other Authors ſay, that they really enjoyed her, and that the God Pan was the fruit of their amours [F]; but ſome writers think it better to affirm,

Δαιμονίη, πῆ σοί γε γυναικῶν θηλυτεράων
Κῆρ ἀτίμαζον ἔθηκαν Ὀλύμπια δώματ' ἔχοντες.
Οὔ μὲν γάρ κ' ἄλλη ὧδε γυνὴ τελέσειε θυμῷ
Ἀνδρὸς ἀφιξαίη, ὃς οἱ κακὰ πολλὰ μογήσας
Ἔλθοι εἰκοστῷ ἔτεϊ ἐς πατρίδα γαῖαν.
Ἀλλ' ἄγε μοι μαῖα σθένος ἔμβαλε θάρσυνον τε,
Λέξομαι. ἡ γὰρ τῆγε σιδήρεον ἐν φρεσὶ θυμός (17).

(17) Homer. Od. lib. 23. ver. 166.

" And oh! my Queen! he cries, what power above
" Has ſteel'd that heart, averſe to ſponſal love?
" Canſt thou, Penelope, when Heaven reſtores
" Thy loſt Ulyſſes to his native ſhores?
" Canſt thou, oh cruel! unconcern'd ſurvey
" Thy loſt Ulyſſes on this ſignal day?
" Haſte Euryclea, and diſpatchful ſpread
" For me, and me alone, th' imperial bed.
" My weary nature craves the balm of reſt,
" But Heav'n with adamant has arm'd her breaſt."
POPE.

Penelope's coldneſs to Ulyſſes ſhocked Telemachus, and he cenſured his mother on that account with as much freedom as if he had ſpoke merely to a ſiſter: Wretched mother, ſays he (18), you are mercileſs; no wife would behave in the manner you do towards a huſband. Your heart is ſtill harder than a ſtone. Homer cannot be accuſed of committing a fault againſt the rules of probability; it being common enough for grown lads to ſpeak in ſuch terms: but then he ought not to have copied nature ſo faithfully, and ſhould have put reſpectful words into Telemachus's mouth.

(18) Ibid. ver. 97.

[E] The reaſon why her gallants had not the laſt favour, was, becauſe they choſe to fare well at Ulyſſes's coſt, rather than lye with his wife.] Horace ſuppoſes, that Tireſias gave to Ulyſſes no other reaſon for Penelope's chaſtity. If your Patron loves women, do not wait till he ſhall intreat you: run to meet him, and offer him your Penelope with a gay and contented countenance. Such was the advice which was given Ulyſſes, and here follows his anſwer: How! think you I could make Penelope conſent to this; Penelope, whoſe conduct was ſo prudent and virtuous, that the long continued addreſſes of all her lovers have never been able to make the leaſt impreſſion. Tireſias anſwers: This was becauſe the young fellows, who frequented her houſe, did not care to beſtow much money; and were not ſo ſolicitous about their paſſion, as about eating and drinking. This is the reaſon why your Penelope was ſo prudent. But had ſhe once had to do with an antiquated lover, and divided the profits with you; this would have been ſo delicate a morſel, that ſhe would have been forced from it, with as much difficulty, as a wound from a bloody ſhin (19). Dacier, who tranſlated thoſe lines of Horace in the manner related above, makes the following Commentary on them. Tireſias gives Ulyſſes no other reaſon for his wife's chaſtity than the avarice of her woers. And a circumſtance, which makes this whimſical enough, is its being grounded on a complaint which Penelope herſelf makes in the 18th book of the Odyſſes. She tells them that they are very unjuſt; and that when ſeveral rivals court a woman with an intention to marry her, they offer ſacrifices at their own expence; and treat and beſtow valuable preſents on the friends of their miſtreſs, inſtead of eating up her ſubſtance. They were nettled at this reproach: and therefore one ſent her a gown, another a necklace, a third earings, a fourth a bracelet, &c. But till then, (and this was a long time after the converſation which Ulyſſes is ſuppoſed to have here with Tireſias) they had not once thought of making her the leaſt preſent. It is therefore no wonder that they had ſuch little ſucceſs in their addreſſes to her: and I require no other proof to ſhew the falſity of what other Authors aſſert, viz. that ſhe had favoured them all (20). I have cited (21) ſome verſes of Ovid, which ſhew that Penelope's ſuitors uſed to riot moſt immoderately in her houſe.

(19) Scortator erit, cave te roget: ultro Penelopen facilis potiori trade: putaſne, Perduci poterit tam frugi, tamque pudica, Quam nequiere proci recto depellere curſu? Venit enim magnum donandi parca juventus, Nec tantum Veneris, quantum ſtudioſa culinæ. Sic tibi Penelope frugi eſt: quæ ſi ſemel uno De ſene guſtarit, tecum partita lucellum Ut canis à corio nunquam abſterrebitur uncto. Horat. Sat. 5. lib. 2. ver. 75. Nos numerus ſumus & fruges conſumere nati Sponſi Penelopes. Id. Ep. 2. lib. 1.

(20) Dacier's notes on Horace, Tom. 7. p. 421. Dutch edit.

(21) In the rem. [B].

(22) Lucius Joannes Scoppa Parthenopæus, Collectaneorum, lib. 1. cap. 32. This book was printed in 1507.

[F] Other Authors ſay, that they really enjoyed her; and that the God Pan was the fruit of their amours.] Some modern Authors have taken a pleaſure in compiling falſe teſtimonies on this ſubject. Lucius Joannes Scoppa (22) cites, in the firſt place, the following paſſage from the Priapeia.

Ad vetulam tamen ille (23) ſuam properabat: & omnis
Mens erat in cunno Penelopeia tuo.
Quæ ſic caſta manes, ut jam convivia viſas:
Utque ſututorum ſit tua plena domus.
E quibus ut ſcires quicunque valentior eſſet,
Hæc ea ad arrectos verba locuta procos:
Nemo meo melius nervum tendebat Ulyſſe:
Sive illi laterum, ſeu fuit artis opus.
Qui quoniam periit, modo vos intendite: qualem
Eſſe virum ſciera, vir ſit ut ille meus.
" Swift to his old Penelope he flew,
" Reſolv'd to claſp her in his longing arms.
" Such her chaſte life, that oft ſhe us'd to riot
" With wanton ſparks in his polluted houſe.
" To know the proweſs of theſe jovial blades,
" When warm they woo'd her, each ſhe thus addreſt:
" None better bent a bow than my Ulyſſes,
" Whether by ſtrength or art I cannot ſay.
" Now he is dead, let each his efforts try,
" That I may chooſe an active, vigorous huſband."

(23) i. e. Ulyſſes.

And then he cites the following words of Acron (24), Penelope meretrix fuit, quæ amatores ſuos ſua pulcritudine luxurioſos reddebat, i. e. " Penelope was a whore, " who, by her beauty, fired her lovers with a looſe " paſſion." After this he adds, that Lycophron the Poet ſays (25); Penelopen concubitum omnium procantium paſſam, ex eorum uno genuiſſe filium nomine Pana: quod cum reditu cognoviſſet Ulyſſes ſtatim abiit ad inſulam Cortinam, & ibidem obiit, i. e. " Penelope having ſport- " ed with all her gallants, had a ſon, named Pan, by " one of them; which, when Ulyſſes knew at his " return, he inſtantly went to the iſland Cortina, and " died there." He proceeds, and affirms that Duris of Samos related as follows: Penelopen proſtituto pudore conſuetudinem cum omnibus procis habuiſſe: unde natus Pan qui caprinis pedibus Tragoſceles vocabatur, i. e. " Penelope proſtituted her honour, and " engaged in a wanton commerce with all her gal- " lants; and from theſe intrigues ſprung Pan, who " was called Tragoſceles, becauſe he was born with " goat's feet." Francis Floridus (α) Sabinus wrote a chapter on this ſubject (26). He thinks it ſtrange that Petrarch (27) ſhould have believed Homer, in favour of Penelope, after having been ſo equitable as to reject, in Dido's favour, the authority of Virgil. He obſerves that theſe two Poets have been equally ſucceſsful; the one, in making Penelope paſs for a woman of virtue, though ſhe was unchaſte; the other, in making Dido be conſidered as a lewd woman, though ſhe was ſtrictly virtuous. He obſerves that Penelope was named βασσάρα καττωμύσσα by Lycophron, and he does not approve of Tzetzes's contradicting that Poet. Duris Samius antiquus ſcriptor, cujus Plutarchus Pliniuſque aliique non pauci egregii ſcriptores mentionem faciunt, idem aſſeruit, ut Joannes Tzetzes Lycophronis interpres ait, quamvis eum communi Græciæ cauſſæ favens mentiri dicat. Illam vocem καττωμύσσαν, πορνεύσαν, hoc eſt ſcortantem exponens. Inquit autem: Νῦν δὲ βασσάραν λέγει τὴν Πηνελόπην, καττωμύσσαι δέ, ἀντὶ τοῦ πορνεύσαι. Δῆρις γὰρ ὁ σάμιος ἐν τῷ περὶ ἀγαθοκλέους, φησὶ αὐτὴν συγγίνεσθαι πᾶσι τοῖς μνηστῆρσι, καὶ γενέσθαι τὰ τραγοσκέλη παῖδα. ὅπερ οὐκ ἀληθεύει, ὁ γὰρ ἐμὸς καὶ ἄλλης παιλάτος· καὶ ἕτερος δέ πῶν θεὸς καὶ ὑὸς ἱππίου (28), i. e. " Duris the Samian, an an- " cient writer, who is mentioned by Plutarch, Pliny, " and ſeveral other famous Authors, aſſerts the ſame " thing, as John Tzetzes the interpreter of Lyco- " phron relates, though he ſays that he told a lie, to " favour the common cauſe of Greece. He explains " the following word καττωμύσσαι, πορνεύσαι, that " is whoring. His words are as follow: He now " calls Penelope Baſſaram καττωμύσσαι, that is, a " whore. For Duris the Samian, in his book on Aga- " thocles, ſays, that ſhe lay with her gallants; and that " ſhe brought forth Pan who had goat's feet. But this " is not true; he being the ſon of Mercury and ano- " ther Penelope; and there was another who was ſon " to Jupiter and Hybris." He is of opinion that Homer, by this exerciſe of the bow which Penelope

(24) Acron. in 2 Epiſt. Horat. lib. 1.

(25) Lycophron does not ſay ſo.

(α) It ſhould be Francis Fleuri: at leaſt it is in this manner that Rabelais, book 5. chap. 19. cites this Author, who was his contemporary. REM. CRIT. [" This is a ve- " ry bad correc- " tion: the " true name of " this Italian " was Florido, " and Rabelais " was in the " wrong to tran- " ſlate it into " French by the " word Fleuri."] From the rem. to the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. Tom. 4. p. 971.

(26) It is the 2d of book 3. of Lectionum ſubciſivarum, of Franciſcus Floridus Sabinus.

(27) In an Italian poem, entitled, i Triumfi, which title he borrowed (according to Floridus) from a Greek Poet, who, according to Lactantius, lib. 1. cap. 11. Divinarum Inſtitutionum, had writ a book, entitled, Triumphus Cupidinis.

(28) Floridus Sabinus, Lect. ſubciſivar. lib. 3. cap. 2.

proposed

affirm, that she conceived Pan when Mercury, under the form of a goat, forcibly cropt her virgin-flower [G]. It is a pretty general opinion, that finding it impossible for them to proposed to all her gallants, meant the amorous congress, and the trial she desired to make of their strength. Quid verbis opus est? cum & ipse Homerus, cujus præconio Penelopes laus constat, ex suis operibus id colligi posse voluerit? An forte ille propositus procis arcus aliud significat quam eam, ut juvenum vires experiretur, id præcipue certamen quo se juvenes exercerent delegisse? At hoc quidem vel ex eo patet, quod his verbis νευρὴν ἐντανύσαι, id est nervum intendere, ad id quod volebat exprimendum, accommodatis admodum, frequenter utitur (29), i. e. "What need I employ many words? "Since Homer himself, on whose credit Penelope's "praise depends, would have this inferred from her "own actions. Could the exercise, which she pro- "posed to the young men, (that of the bow) signify "any other than this; that she was desirous of mak- "ing a trial of their strength, in that combat in which "young men love chiefly to exercise themselves? "And this is evident from his often employing the "words to bend the bow, which is extremely well "adapted to express his meaning." He pretends that Ovid, having guessed the true meaning of Homer, intimates to us, that Penelope put her gallants to this trial (30): Nam & Ovidius Homerum idem innuisse vult, cum ait libro primo Amorum,

(29) Idem, ibid.

(30) Idem, ibid. This passage of Ovid is in Eleg. 8. of book 1. Amorum.

Penelope vires juvenum tentabat in arcu;
Qui latus argueret, corneus arcus erat.

i. e. "For Ovid will have Homer mean the same, "when he says in book I. Amorum;

"Virtuous Penelope is said t' have try'd
"With a strong bow, each lusty lover's side."

SEDLEY.

He does not omit the passage of Horace, nor that of the Priapeia which I have cited above; and he concludes with the testimony of Herodotus (31).

Dempster cites many Authors, but without accuracy. Being to prove that Pan was the son of Mercury and Penelope; Ex adulterio eum susceptum à Mercurio, matre Penelope (32); and that Mercury assumed the form of a goat when he enjoyed the woman in question (whence Pan's feet resembled those of a goat) he cites two Epigrams from the Anthologia (33), and a passage from Ausonius (34), which says only that Pan's were so formed; but not that this was owing to the shape which his father assumed when he lay with Penelope. Is it not ridiculous to employ such authorities? He says that Lysander, an antient Historian, relates the same thing as Duris, with regard to Penelope's lewd life; and he adds that Tzetzes (35) relates that Ulysses, unable to bear the infamous riotings which were carrying on in his house, returned to Circe, and was killed by his son Telemachus; and that Pausanias informs us that Ulysses repudiated his wife, because of her adulterous practices; and retired to Sparta, and a little after to Mantinea, where he died. Dempster ascribes to the husband what Pausanias relates only of the wife (36). To conclude, he says we may judge of the adulterous practices of Penelope by the presents she accepted, and her marrying her husband's murderer: not to mention that, to prevent her being mistaken in her choice, she discovered, by a very good proof, he who was the most vigorous of her sparks. Probaturque impudicitia ex eo, quod à procis munera acceperit, quod meretricii animi certissimum argumentum, Homer, Lib. 18. Odyss. & mariti sui Ulysses interfectori nupsit, ex quo connubio natus Italus Jul. Hygin. fab. capit. 127. Ei ob id, ipse Ulysses apud Sabinum poëtam in responsoriis Epistolis:

Tot juvenes inter, tot vina liquentia semper,
Hei mihi! quid credam? pignore casta manes?

..... Et procorum habito delectu, ut fortiori, valentiorique posset concumbere, arcu tentabat singulos. Auctor incertus Priapeiorum carminum (37). i. e. "This cir- "cumstance proves her lewdness, viz. her accepting "presents from her wooers, which is an infallible in- "dication of a lewd turn of mind; and from her mar- "rying the murderer of her husband Ulysses, from which "marriage sprang Italus. For this reason, Ulysses says "as follows, in the responsory Epistles, by Sabinus "the Poet:

"Whilst thus you riot midst so many youths,
"Alas! can I believe you still are chaste?

..... "And being to make choice of a lover, in "order to choose the lustiest and strongest of her "gallants, to lye with, she tried the strength of each "with a bow. See the uncertain Author of the "Priapeia." We may rely more on Meziriac's quotations. Some Authors (a), says he (38), relate that Penelope, during the absence of Ulysses, made a trip in her honour, and brought forth the God Pan: but these Authors are divided into two opinions. Some say that Pan was the son of Mercury and Penelope. Of this opinion is Herodotus, Lib. II. Plutarch in the treatise of Oracles that ceased. The Scholiast of Pindar in the arguments of the Pythicks (Pythian games). Probus on the 4th Eclogue of Virgil: Lucian in the Dialogue of Pan and Mercury, and the Scholiast of Theocritus on the 7th Idyllium: But the two last add, that Pan (39) engaged in the amorous congress, under the form of a goat, with Penelope, whence Pan was born with goat's horns and feet. . . . . Others say that Penelope prostituted herself to all her gallants; and that, from their blended seed, sprang the God Pan. Thus Lycophron calls Penelope βασσάραν σιμῶς κασσωρύσσαν, a whore, committing fornication honourably. Tzetzes says on this subject, Δῆρις ὁ Σάμιος, &c. (40). . . . Certain Scholias which are not yet printed, on the Flute of Theocritus, mention the two opinions, saying that Pan, according to some, was the son of Mercury and Penelope, and according to the rest, of Penelope and all her gallants (41). I am to observe that Claudius du Verdier (42) is very much offended at Lycophron. He cannot pardon him for saying that Penelope prostituted herself; a circumstance he refutes by his own Scholiast, and the following lines from Ovid:

(38) Meziriac on Ovid's Epist. p. 117. (a) Meziriac has omitted to enumerate among these Authors, Cicero, lib. 3. cap. 56. de Nat. Deor. REM. CRIT.

(39) It should be Mercury.

(40) See the sequel of this passage, citat. (28)

Penelope mansit, quamvis custode careret,
Inter tam multos intemerata procos.

"Penelope, tho' left without a guard,
"She yet was spotless midst so many wooers."

(41) Add to this the following words of Barthius in Statium, Tom. 1. p. 334, 335. Quam (Penelopen) cum omnibus procis rem habuisse scripserunt, & inde natum Panem, nomine à multis Patribus ducto. Scholiastes Theocriti in Idyllium (A). Τὸν Πᾶνα εἰ μὲν λέγεταν υἱὸν Πηνελόπης, καὶ πάντων τῶν μνηστήρων, καὶ διὰ τοῦτο λέγεσθαι καὶ Πᾶνα.

[G] When Mercury, under the form of a goat, forcibly cropt her virgin-flower.] This story is related in Lucian, with this remarkable circumstance, that Mercury forgot his having atchieved this feat. Pan went to him, in order to get himself acknowledged or owned, but finding himself received with a scornful countenance, he produced his proofs. Do not you remember, says he, your having formerly ravished a young Lady of distinction in Arcadia? What signifies your biting your nails, and humming and hawing? It was Penelope, Icarius's daughter. She told me, that my goat's horns and feet proceeded from your having concealed yourself under the form of that animal, in order to enjoy her. By Jove, replied Mercury, I do remember, in some little measure, my having done something of that kind (43). This is a very surprizing slip of the memory. The instances of Divine forgetfulness, alledged by the defender of Voiture, are not so strange as this. Costar relates that Jupiter's memory failed him on some occasions. I have now forgot, says he (44), the name of the Deity, who had so much trouble to make him recollect the wonderful expedient he had formerly hit upon, to reconcile two decrees of fate which evidently contradicted one another: and, by the way, it was on this occasion he took so much pains, that he was all over sweat; and from this sweat cabbages sprung. I do not know whether some Authors have said, that he sometimes forgot his amorous conquests. They indeed were so numerous, that his memory might have been at a stand on that occasion; and yet I believe we know not one instance of his forgetfulness on that head. Mercury might be cited for that purpose. I am to observe,

(42) Claudius Verderius, Censura in Auctores, p. 45.

(43) Νὴ Δία μέμνημαί ποτέ σε τοιοῦτόν τι πεποιηκότα. Per Jovem memini me tale quiddam fecisse. Lucian. in Deor. Dialog. Tom. 1. p. 176.

(44) Costar, Defense de Voiture, p. m. 116.

(31) Ἐκ ταύτης γάρ, inquit de Penelope loquens, καὶ ἑρμέων λέγεται γένεσθαι ὑπὸ ἐλλήνων ὁ πᾶν. i. e. ex hac enim & Mercurio Pan à Græcis genitus dicitur. Idem, ibid. The passage of Herodotus is in chap. 145. book 2.

(32) Dempsterus, in Paralipomenis ad Antiquitates Romanas Rosini, lib. 3. cap. 2. p. m. 432.

(33) The 84th and 85th, of chap. 12. book 4.

(34) Auson. Eidill. 3. Mosella, ver. 174. in the Amsterdam edit. of Ausonius 1671. It is Eidyll. ver. 172.

(35) In Lycophron.

(36) See the rem. [I].

(37) Dempsterus, in Paralipom. ad Antiq. Rom. Rosini, lib. 3. cap. 2. p. 443.

to enjoy the Miſtreſs, they attacked her female attendants, and debauched them [H]. The inhabitants of Mantinea uſed to ſay, that ſhe died in their city [I]. Thoſe who affirm, that the reaſon why Homer applauded her ſo much, was, becauſe he deſcended from her, do not argue very juſtly [K]. The reader will ſee in the remark where I treat of this, that Penelope ſurvived Ulyſſes, and married again. I ſhall make particular mention of the ſerve, by the way, that Coſtar had taken this ſtory from Rabelais, his antagoniſt reproaching him with it. I found this, ſays he (45), a very cold ſweat; and Rabelais, from whom you ſtole ſo ingenious a thought, might have formerly paſt for an excellent buffoon, but he now makes very few laugh.

(45) Girac, Reponſe a la Defenſe de Voiture, p. 92.

[H] They attacked her female attendants, and debauched them.] This we may read in the Odyſſey; in which we alſo read, that after Ulyſſes had put to death his wife's gallants, he commanded that ſuch female ſervants as had diſhonoured his houſe by their lewdneſs, ſhould be beat to death with ſwords; but Telemachus, judging them to deſerve a more ignominious death, gave orders for their being hanged.

Θωϊμίτναι ξίφεσιν ϛυγνήκεσιν, ἰσόσε πασῶν
Ψυχὰς ἐξαφίλοισθε, κὴ ἐκλελαθοιτ' Ἀφροδίτης
Τὴν ἄρ' ὑπὸ μνηστῆρσιν ἔχον, μίσγοντό τε λάθρῃ (46).
. . . . . .
Τοῖσι δὲ Τηλέμαχος πεπνυμένος ἦρχ' ἀγορεύειν.
Μὴ μὲν δὴ καθαρῷ θανάτῳ ἀπὸ θυμὸν ἑλοίμην
Τάων αἳ δὴ ἐμῇ κεφαλῇ κατ' ὀνείδεα χεῦαν,
Μητέρι θ' ἡμετέρῃ, παρά τε μνηστῆρσιν ἴαυον.
Ὣς ἄρ' ἔφη, κὴ πεῖσμα νεὸς κυανοπρῴροιο, &c. (47).

(46) Homerus, Odyſſ. lib. 22. ver. 443.

(47) Idem, ibid. ver. 461.

" Drive to yon court without the palace wall,
" And the revenging ſword ſhall ſmite them all.
" So with the ſuitors let them mix in duſt,
" Stretch'd in a long oblivion of their luſt.
. . . . . .
" Thus, thus, the prince; to theſe ſhall we afford
" A fate ſo pure, as by the martial ſword?
" To theſe, the mighty proſtitutes to ſhame,
" And baſe revilers of our houſe and name? &c.
POPE.

It is remarkable, that, of fifty female attendants, only twelve abandoned themſelves to their miſtreſs's gallants (48). I muſt not omit an obſervation of Ariſtotle, that thoſe who quitted philoſophy, to devote themſelves to other ſciences, acted like Penelope's lovers. Some think this thought not very juſt. Cum Ariſtoteles NIMIO philoſophiam ſtudio complectebatur, aſſerere non dubitabat eos qui reliquas artes conſectarentur, hanc vero negligerent, eſſe Penelopes procis ſimiles, qui ut Homerus, cum domina potiri nequiviſſent, ad ancillas divertebant (49), i. e. " As Ariſtotle applied himſelf " too intenſely to the ſtudy of philoſophy, he declared, that thoſe who devoted themſelves to other " ſciences, and neglected this, acted like Penelope's " gallants, who, according to Homer, becauſe they " could not enjoy the miſtreſs, had recourſe to the " maids." This is a lame compariſon: for the perſons in queſtion, did not prefer the maids to the miſtreſs, like thoſe who neglect philoſophy, to apply themſelves to other ſtudies: the only reaſon why they courted the maids was, becauſe their miſtreſs had given them a repulſe. Plutarch ſays, that Bion made uſe of this compariſon. Ἀσϛείως δὲ κὴ Βίων ἔλεγεν ὁ φιλόσοφος, ὅτι ὥσπερ οἱ μνηϛῆρες τῇ Πηνελόπῃ πλησιάζειν μὴ δυνάμενοι, ταῖς ταύτης ἐμίγνυντο θεραπαίναις. οὕτω κὴ οἱ φιλοσοφίας μὴ δυνάμενοι κατατυχεῖν, ἐν τοῖς ἄλλοις παιδεύμασι τοῖς ἠδιόνος ἀξίοις, ἑαυτοὺς κατασκιλτεύουσι. Urbanum eſt etiam Bionis philoſophi dictum, qui ajebat, ſicut Penelopes proci quum non poſſent cum Penelope concumbere, rem cum ejus ancillis habuiſſent: ita qui philoſophiam nequeunt apprehendere, eos in aliis nullius pretii diſciplinis ſeſe conterere (50).

(48) Τὰν δώδεκα πᾶσαι ἀναιδείης ἐπίβησαν, Οὔτ' ἐμέ τινα ϛέργουσαι οὔτ' αὐτὴν Πηνελόπειαν. Harum duodecim omnes impudentiæ ſe dediderunt, Neque me honorantes, neque ipſam Penelopen. Idem, ibid. ver. 424.

(49) Lucius Joannes Scoppa, Collectaneorum, lib. 1. cap. 32.

(50) Plutarchus, de Liberis educandis, p. 7. C.

[I] The inhabitants of Mantinea uſed to ſay, that ſhe died in their city.] Pauſanias (51) furniſhes me with the proof I want; and I will employ Meziriac's words, which are a faithful tranſlation. Pauſanias deſcribing one of the roads which went from the city of Mantinea, to Orchomenus, ſays as follows; On the right hand ſide of the road, we ſee a bank, or little riſing ground, which the Arcadians relate to have been Penelope's ſepulchre; but what they relate, does not agree with the poem called Threſprotides; for there it is ſaid, that Penelope, after Ulyſſes was returned from Troy, had a ſon by Ulyſſes, who was named Ptolyporthes; whereas the people of Mantinea affirm, that Ulyſſes having demonſtrative proofs, that Penelope had invited her gallants to her houſe, turned her out of his houſe; and that ſhe went, firſt to Sparta, and a little after to Mantinea, and there died (52).

(51) Lib. 8. p. 247.

It is affirmed, Tom. 1. of the Chevræana (53), that Pauſanias ſays that Ulyſſes, being returned from Troy, Penelope, who had indulged her gallants the laſt favour, was delivered of a ſon called Polyporthes (54); that her huſband repudiated his lewd wife in the moſt ignominious manner, &c. It is plain, Pauſanias does not ſay this. Of two traditions mentioned by him, the one advantageous, the other diſadvantageous to the Lady's memory; that which was advantageous declared, that Ulyſſes, after his return from Troy, had had that ſon by Penelope; but Chevreau pretends, that Pauſanias relates that her ſparks got this child, and that ſhe was divorced on account of her ſcandalous conduct on that occaſion.

(52) Meziriac, on Ovid's Epiſt. p. 116, 117.

(53) p. 388. Dutch edit.

(54) It ſhould be Ptolyporthes.

[K] Thoſe who affirm, that the reaſon why Homer applauded her ſo much, was, becauſe he deſcended from her, did not argue very juſtly.] Meziriac, having related what ſome Authors ſay, with regard to this Lady's lewdneſs, propoſes an objection to himſelf, and refutes it in the following manner (55). As to what might be objected to all thoſe Authors, that it is not probable that Homer ſhould have propoſed as a true mirrour of chaſtity, and beſtowed ſo many applauſes on a lewd woman, and who, of all women, merited cenſure, two very good anſwers may be given. The firſt, that Homer, who, in the opinion of many perſons, lived in the time of the Trojan war, fell diſtractedly in love with Penelope; and, for her ſake, reſided a very conſiderable time in Ithaca, as Hermeſianax affirms, in his Athenæus, lib. 12. chap. 8. and therefore it is no wonder that he ſhould appear ſo fond of ſinging the praiſes of Ulyſſes and Penelope. It may be anſwered, ſecondly, that ſome are of opinion, that Homer deſcended from Ulyſſes, being the ſon of Telemachus and Polycaſte, or Epicaſte, Neſtor's daughter. Thus, in a little Greek book, entitled, the Combat, or the Diſpute between Homer and Heſiod, we find that the Emperor Adrian, enquiring of the Prieſteſs of Apollo, the country where Homer was born, and who were his father and mother, the following anſwer was made him.

(55) Meziriac, on Ovid's Epiſt. p. 118.

Ἀγνωϛὸν μ' ἔρεαι γενεὴν κὴ πατρίδα γαῖαν
Ἀμβροσίᾳ ϛεμμῆνος. ἔδος δ' Ἰθακήσιός ἐϛιν.
Τηλέμαχος δὲ πατὴρ, κὴ Νεϛορίη Ἐπικάϛη
Μήτηρ, ἣ μιν ἔτικτε βροτῶν πολὺ πάνσοφον ἄνδρα.

" From me you'd know the long-concealed extraction
" Of that immortal warbler, and his country;
" In Ithaca, Telemachus begot him;
" The charming Epicaſte, Neſtor's daughter,
" Was mother to this wiſeſt of mankind.

Theſe two anſwers are weak; for if Homer had lived a conſiderable time in Ithaca, to wooe Penelope, he muſt be ranked among thoſe gallants whom he has ſpoke ſo much ill of; for, unleſs he had joined them, he muſt have made a very poor figure, and would even have been expoſed to many dangerous affronts. Thoſe young ſparks would not have permitted one man to make love to Penelope, without conſulting them. Add to this, that a Poet, who ſhould have a paſſion for a woman, would hardly make that woman's huſband the hero of a poem. Farther, had Homer known that Penelope proſtituted herſelf to ſo great a number of gallants, his paſſion for her would have prompted him to aſperſe her, ſo far from its being the motive to prompt him to beſtow ſo many elogiums on her. Jealouſy, ſpite, and the ſhame of having loved a woman who had diſhonoured herſelf, and not made any diſtinction between him and a crowd of worthleſs ſuitors, would have ſtrongly prompted him to aſperſe her. In fine, I obſerve, the praiſe with which Auſonius crowned her [L].

obſerve, that we muſt not have recourſe to any other reaſons but the following: Ulyſſes was the hero of the poem; it was therefore neceſſary that his wife ſhould appear there as a heroine, at leaſt as an honeſt woman. It would be a violation of the moſt eſſential rules, not to ſuppreſs all the ſhameful actions committed by the wife of his hero. Meziriac adds, that Ulyſſes having been murdered by Telegonus, Minerva adviſed Telemachus, Penelope and Telegonus, to carry his dead body to Circe, in the iſland of Ææa, and to bury it there: and that Telegonus, by the advice of the ſame Goddeſs, married Penelope, and Telemachus married Circe: that from Telemachus and Circe ſprung Latinus, from whom the Latins were ſo called: but that, from Telegonus and Penelope, came Italus, who gave his name to Italy (56). Theſe are noble counſels, and highly worthy of Minerva. If Penelope followed them, I ſhould look upon thoſe as moſt worthy of credit, who declare her to have been extremely kind to her wooers, than ſuch as repreſent her ſo faithful to her huſband. It had been a crime to have married the involuntary murtherer of Ulyſſes; but ſhe would have done worſe than this, if Hyginus may be credited; ſhe would have married Ulyſſes's ſon.

(56) Meziriac, on Ovid's Epiſt. p. 119. He cites Hyginus, cap. 127; and he had ſaid that, according to Euſtathius on the 16th Odyſſey, The Colophonian who wrote the Returns, ſays, that, at laſt, Telemachus married Circe, and Telegonus married Penelope.

(57) Intemerata pracis, & tot ſervavi per annos, Oſcula vix ipſi cognita Telemacho Auſonius, Epigramm. 135. p. m. 83.

(58) Balzac, Entretien 39. p. m. 372.

[L] I ſhall make particular mention of the praiſe with which Auſonius has crowned her (57).] I will here tranſcribe a paſſage from Balzac's converſation (58). "Penelope's kiſſes were ſcarce known to her "ſon Telemachus, becauſe her ſon was not her "huſband, for whom ſhe reſerved all her kiſſes. "The Marquis of Montauzier was pleaſed with "theſe words, and I was perſuaded they would pleaſe "him. But you ſay, that he is reſolved to know "what author I had them from; and he is abſolutely "determined to know them from me, without your "aſſiſtance. . . . . Thoſe expreſſions, which pleaſe a "man, all whoſe pleaſures are chaſte, is the tranſlation, or rather the paraphraſe of the following "verſe, which a Latin poet (59) formerly imitated "from a Greek poet;

"Oſcula vix ipſi cognita Telemacho.

"I might add to the paraphraſe, which is ſhort, a "Commentary which is of no great length; and "I am inclined to do it, ſince you invite me to "ſpeak." This Commentary is as follows: Mary de Medicis, whom we know to have been as chaſte as the poets repreſent their Penelope, was alſo like Penelope in this. Could you believe, that, during the four years of her regency, ſhe did not once kiſs the King her ſon? I was told this by an old Courtier of that age, who took the liberty to obſerve to her, that thoſe outward marks of affection, were neceſſary to procure the love of others, and particularly of children, becauſe they commonly are leſs moved by effects than appearances (60).

(59) See here the ſame kind of policy employed by Balzac, as that I mentioned citat. (45). of the art. GONTAULT (Charles de): he does not name Auſonius, purpoſely to give the greater idea of his learning.

(60) Balzac, Entretien 39. p. 374.

☞ PENN (WILLIAM), an eminent Writer among the Quakers, was ſon of Sir William Penn [A] by Margaret his wife, daughter of John Jaſper, of Rotterdam in Holland, Merchant, and was born in the Pariſh of St. Catharine's near the Tower of London, on the 14th of October 1644 (a), and educated at a School at Chigwell in Eſſex, "where, at eleven years of age, ſays Mr. Wood (b), being retired in a chamber "alone, he was ſo ſuddenly ſurprized with an inward comfort, and (as he thought) an "external Glory in the room, that he has many times ſaid, that from that time he had "the Seal of Divinity and Immortality, that there was alſo a God, and that the ſoul of "man was capable of enjoying his Divine Communications." Afterwards he went to a private ſchool on Tower hill, and had likewiſe the advantage of a domeſtick tutor. In 1660 he was entered a Gentleman-Commoner of Chriſt Church in Oxford, and in October that year was matriculated as a Member of the Univerſity and a Knight's ſon (c). Here Mr. Penn, (who had before received an impreſſion from the preaching of one Tho. Loe, a Quaker) with ſome other ſtudents withdrew themſelves from the national method of worſhip, and held private meetings for the exerciſe of Religion, where they preached and prayed among themſelves. This giving great offence to the heads of the Colleges, our Author, though but ſixteen years of age, was fined for Nonconformity; but continuing ſtill zealous in his religious exerciſes, was at length expelled his College (d) Upon his return home he was ſeverely treated by his father on the ſame account, who at laſt turned him out of doors; but his paſſion afterwards abating, he ſent him to France in company with ſome perſons of Quality, where he continued a conſiderable time, and returned well ſkilled in the French language, and accompliſhed with a moſt polite and courtly behaviour. About the year 1666 his Father committed to his care and management a conſiderable eſtate in Ireland, which occaſioned his reſidence in that Kingdom; and by the preaching of Tho. Loe above-mentioned at Cork, was prevailed on to embrace the Religion of the Quakers, whoſe meetings he conſtantly frequented; in one of which at Cork in November 1667, he, with many others, was apprehended and impriſoned there, but, upon writing a letter

(a) Life of William Penn, p. 1. prefixed to the firſt volume of his works, edit. London 1726, in fol. And Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 1050. 2d edit.

(b) Ibid.

(c) Wood, ibid.

(d) Life, p. 1, 2. Mr. Wood ſays, that he ſtaid two years at Chriſt-Church.

[A] Sir William Penn.] We have an account of him in his epitaph upon his monument in Redcliff church in Briſtol, which is as follows. "To the "juſt memory of Sir WILLIAM PENN, Knt. and "ſometimes General, born at Briſtol (1), Anno 1621, "ſon of Captain Giles Penn, ſeveral years Conſul for "the Engliſh in the Mediterranean; of the Penns "of Penns lodge in the county of Wilts, and thoſe "Penns of Penn in the county of Bucks, and by his "mother from the Gilberts, in the county of So"merſet, originally from Yorkſhire: addicted from "his youth to maritime affairs: he was made Captain "at the years of twenty-one, Rear-Admiral of Ire"land at twenty-three, Vice-Admiral of Ireland at "twenty-five, Admiral to the Straits at twenty"nine, Vice-Admiral of England at thirty-one, "and General in the firſt Dutch war at thirty-two. "Whence returning anno 1655, he was made a "Parliament-Man for the town of Weymouth; 1660 "made Commiſſioner of the Admiralty and Navy, "Governor of the town and fort of Kingſale, Vice-"Admiral of Munſter, and a Member of that Pro"vincial Council; anno 1664, was choſen Great "Captain-Commander under his Royal Highneſs, "in that ſignal and moſt evidently ſucceſsful fight "againſt the Dutch fleet. Thus he took leave of "the ſea, his old element, but continued ſtill his "other employs, till 1669, at what time, through "bodily infirmities contracted by his care and fatigue "of public affairs, he withdrew, prepared, and "made for his end; and with a gentle and even "gale in much peace arrived, and anchored in his "laſt and beſt port at Wanſtead, in the county of "Eſſex, the 16th of Sept. 1670, being then but "forty-nine years and four months old. To his name "and memory his ſurviving Lady hath erected this "remembrance."

(1) Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 1050, ſays, at Myney in Wiltſhire.

[B] Writing

letter to the Earl of Orrery [B] was ſoon diſcharged. His father being informed of his inclination to Quakeriſm, ſent for him to England, and finding him inflexible to all arguments to the contrary [C], turned him out of doors a ſecond time; though his anger was not carried ſo far, but that when our Author was impriſoned for being at the meetings of the Quakers, he would privately uſe his intereſt to procure his diſcharge. About the year 1668 he became a publick preacher among the Quakers (e); and the ſame year publiſhed his firſt piece, entitled, Truth exalted [D], and ſoon after, another, called, The Guide miſtaken [E], and a third, entitled, The Foundation miſtaken [F]. This year he was committed cloſe priſoner to the Tower of London, where he wrote ſeveral treatiſes, particularly his No Croſs no Crown [G]; and being diſcharged after ſeven months impriſonment, in September 1669 went to Ireland, where he preached among the Quakers, and wrote ſome pieces [H]. In 1670 the Conventicle Act, prohibiting the meetings of Diſſenters

(e) Life, p. 2, 3, 4.

[B] Writing a Letter to the Earl of Orrery.] It was as follows.

" To the Earl of Orrery, Lord Preſident of Munſter.

" The occaſion may ſeem as ſtrange as my cauſe " is juſt; but your Lordſhip will no leſs expreſs your " charity in the one, than your juſtice in the other. " Religion, which is at once my crime and my inno- " cence, makes me a priſoner to a Mayor's malice, " but mine own freeman; for being in the aſſembly " of the people called Quakers, there come ſeveral " Conſtables backt with Soldiers, rudely and arbi- " trarily requiring every man's appearance before " the Mayor; and amongſt others violently haled " me with them. Upon my coming before him, he " charged me for being preſent at a tumultuous and " riotous aſſembly; and, unleſs I would give bond " for my good behaviour, who challenge the world " to accuſe me juſtly with the contrary, he would " commit me. I aſked for his authority, for I hum- " bly conceive, without an Act of Parliament, or " an Act of State, it might be termed too much " officiouſneſs. His anſwer was, A Proclamation in " the year 1660, and new Inſtructions to revive that " dead and antiquated order. I leave your Lordſhip " to be Judge, if that Proclamation relates to this " concernment. That only was deſigned to ſuppreſs " Fifth-monarchy killing ſpirits; and ſince the " King's Lord-Lieutenant, and yourſelf, being fully " perſuaded the intention of theſe called Quakers, by " their meetings, was really the ſervice of God, have " therefore manifeſted a repeal by a long continuance " of freedom, I hope your Lordſhip will not now " begin an unuſual ſeverity, by indulging ſo much " malice in one, whoſe actions favour ill with his " neareſt neighbours; but that there may be a ſpee- " dy releaſement to all, for attending their honeſt " callings, with the enjoyment of their families, " and not to be longer ſeparated from both.

" And though to diſſent from a national Syſtem " impoſed by authority, renders men Hereticks, yet " I dare believe your Lordſhip's better read in reaſon " and theology, than to ſubſcribe a maxim ſo vulgar " and untrue; for imagining moſt viſible conſtitu- " tions of religious government, ſuited to the nature " and genius of a civil empire, it cannot be eſteem- " ed Hereſy, but to ſcare a multitude from ſuch en- " quiries, as may create diviſions fatal to a civil " policy; and therefore at worſt, deſerves only the " name of diſturbers. But I preſume, my Lord, the " acquaintance you have had with other coun- " tries, muſt needs have furniſhed you with this in- " fallible obſervation, that diverſities of faith and " worſhip, contribute not to the diſturbance of any " place, where moral unanimity is barely requiſite " to preſerve the peace. It is not long ſince you " were a good Solicitor for the liberty I now crave; " and concluded no way ſo effectual to improve or " advantage this country, as to diſpenſe with free- " dom in things relating to conſcience; and, I ſup- " poſe, were it riotous and tumultuary, as by ſome " vainly imagined, your Lordſhip's inclination, as " well as duty, would entertain a very remote opi- " nion. My humble ſupplication therefore to you " is, that ſo malicious and injurious a practice to in- " nocent Engliſhmen, may not receive any counte- " nance or encouragement from your Lordſhip; for " as it is contrary to the practice elſewhere, and a " bad argument to invite the Engliſh hither; ſo, " with ſubmiſſion, will it not reſemble that clemency " and Engliſh ſpirit, that hath hitherto made you " honourable.

" If in this caſe I may have uſed too great a li- " berty, it is my ſubject; nor ſhall I doubt your " pardon, ſince by your authority I expect a favour, " which never will be uſed unworthy an honeſt man, " and " Your Lordſhip's faithful, &c.

" W. P."

[C] Finding him inflexible to all arguments to the contrary.] The Writer of his Life (2) prefixed to his Works, tells us, that his Father finding him too fixt to be brought to a general compliance with the cuſtomary compliments of the times, ſeemed inclinable to have born with him in other reſpects, provided he would be uncovered in the preſence of the King, the Duke, and himſelf. This being propoſed, he deſired time to conſider of, which his Father ſuppoſing to be with an intention of conſulting his friends, the Quakers, about it, he aſſured him, that he would ſee the face of none of them, but retire to his chamber till he ſhould return him an anſwer. Accordingly he withdrew, and having humbled himſelf before God with faſting and ſupplication, to know his heavenly mind and will, he became ſo ſtrengthened in his reſolution, that returning to his father he humbly ſignified, that he could not comply with his deſire.

(2) p. 4.

[D] His firſt piece, entitled, Truth exalted.] The whole title is as follows. Truth exalted: in a ſhort but ſure teſtimony againſt all thoſe Religions, Faiths, and Worſhips, that have been formed and followed in the darkneſs of Apoſtacy; and for that glorious light, which is now riſen and ſhines forth in the Life and Doctrine of the deſpiſed Quakers, as the alone good old way of life and ſalvation. Preſented to Princes, Prieſts, and People, that they may repent, believe, and obey. By William Penn, whom Divine Love conſtrains in an holy contempt to trample on Egypt's Glory, not fearing the King's wrath, having beheld the Majeſty of him, who is inviſible.

[E] The Guide miſtaken.] It is an Anſwer to Mr. John Clapham's Book, entitled, A Guide to the true Religion.

[F] The Sandy Foundation ſhaken.] It was printed in 4to, with this title: The Sandy Foundation ſhaken: Or, Thoſe ſo generally believed and applauded Doctrines of One God ſubſiſting in three diſtinct and ſeparate perſons, the impoſſibility of God's pardoning ſinners without a plenary ſatisfaction, the juſtification of impure perſons by an imputative Righteouſneſs, refuted from the authority of Scripture-Teſtimonies and right Reaſon. By William Penn, jun. and builder on that foundation which cannot be moved. This book is written againſt Mr. Thomas Vincent, a Preſbyterian Miniſter.

[G] His no Croſs no Crown.] It was printed in 1669 in 4to. and reprinted in 1681 in 8vo. with this title: No Croſs no Crown: A Diſcourſe ſhewing the Nature and Diſcipline of the holy Croſs of Chriſt; and that the denial of ſelf and daily bearing of Chriſt's Croſs is the alone way to the reſt and kingdom of God. To which are added the living and dying teſtimonies of many perſons of fame and learning, both of antient and modern times, in favour of this treatiſe. In two parts.

[H] Wrote ſome pieces.] Among others he wrote A Letter to the young Convinced, publiſhed in his works.

[I] Being

ſenters under ſevere penalties, he was committed to Newgate in Auguſt that year for preaching in Grace-Church-ſtreet, and being tried for the ſame, with Mr. William Mead, at the Seſſions held at the Old-Baily, in Sept. following, they were acquitted by the Jury [I]. Sept. 16 the ſame year his father died, and being perfectly reconciled to him, left him both his paternal bleſſing and a plentiful eſtate (f). About this time he held a publick diſpute at Weſt-Wicomb Buckinghamſhire, concerning the univerſality of the Divine Light, with Mr. Jeremiah Ives, an eminent Baptiſt Preacher. This winter he publiſhed his ſeaſonable Caviat againſt Popery [K]. February 5, 1670-1, he was committed to Newgate for preaching at a Meeting in Wheeler-ſtreet in London; and during his impriſonment, which continued ſix months, wrote ſeveral treatiſes [L]. After his diſcharge he went over into Holland and Germany. In the beginning of the year 1672 he married Gulielma Maria, daughter of Sir William Springett, formerly of Darling in Suſſex, who had been killed during the Civil Wars at the Siege of Bamber; and ſoon after his marriage he ſettled with his family at Rickmerſworth in Hartfordſhire. The ſame year he publiſhed a piece, entitled, The Spirit of Truth vindicated [M], and another againſt Reeve and Muggleton [N], and ſome other tracts in that and the following years [O]. In (f) Ibid. p. 4—35.

[I] Being tried .... with Mr. William Mead, at the Seſſions held at the Old-Baily in September following, were acquitted by the Jury.] An account of this trial was publiſhed in 1670 in 4to. under this title: The People's antient and juſt Liberties aſſerted, in the trial of William Penn and William Mead, at the Seſſions held at the Old-Baily in London, the firſt, third, fourth, and fifth of September 1670, againſt the moſt arbitrary procedure of that Court.

The Preface to the Reader begins thus: "If ever "it were time to ſpeak or write, it is now, ſo many "ſtrange occurrences requiring both. How much "thou art concerned in this enſuing trial, where "(not only the priſoners, but) the fundamental laws "of England have been moſt arbitrarily arraigned, "read, and thou mayſt plainly judge. Liberty of "Conſcience is counted a pretence for Rebellion; "and religious aſſemblies, routs and riots; and the "defenders of both are by them reputed factious "and diſaffected. Magna Charta is Magna Far—— "with the Recorder of London; and to demand "right, an affront to the Court. Will and power "are their Great Charter; but to call for England's, "is a crime, incurring the penalty of their Bale-"dock and naſty hole; nay, the menace of a gag "and iron ſhackles too. The Jury, though proper "Judges of law and fact, they would have over-"ruled in both, as if their verdict ſignified no more, "than to echo back the illegal charge of the bench. "And becauſe their courage and honeſty did more "than hold pace with the threat and abuſe of thoſe, "who ſate as Judges, after two days and two "nights reſtraint for a verdict, in the end were "fined and impriſoned for giving it." Soon after this there was publiſhed a pamphlet, ſaid to be written by Sir Samuel Starling, Lord Mayor of London, who had been ſeverely reflected on in this trial, and printed at London 1671, in 4to, with this title: An Anſwer to the ſeditious and ſcandalous pamphlet, entitled, The Tryal of W. Penn and W. Mead, at the Seſſions held at the Old Baily, London, the 1, 3, 4, 5 of Sept. 1670. contained in four Sections. Sect. I. The Deſign of the Rebellious Pamphlet diſcovered. II. The Scandals againſt the then Lord Mayor, Sir Thomas Bloodworth, and Sir John Hovel, Recorder, anſwered. III. The Juſtice and Honour of that Court vindicated, by a true and impartial Relation of that whole Tryal. IV. The fining of that Jury, that gave two contrary verdicts, juſtified, to prevent a failure of Juſtice in London. Written by S. S. a Friend to Juſtice, and Courts of Juſtice. The Author of this piece owns (3) that the Recorder ſpoke thus upon the Trial: "Till "now I never underſtood the reaſon of the policy "and prudence of the Spaniards, in ſuffering the "Inquiſition amongſt them. And certainly it will ne-"ver be well with us, till ſomething like unto the "Spaniſh Inquiſition be in England." Mr. Penn wrote an anſwer to this, entitled, Truth reſcued from Impoſture, or a brief Reply to a meer Rhapſody of Lies, Folly, and Slander, but a pretended Anſwer to the Trial of W. Penn and W. Mead, &c. writ and ſubſcribed, S. S.

(3) p. 29.

[K] His ſeaſonable Caveat againſt Popery.] The whole title is, A ſeaſonable Caveat againſt Popery; or, A Pamphlet, entitled, An Explanation of the Roman Catholick Belief, briefly examined.

[L] During his impriſonment, which continued ſix months, wrote ſeveral treatiſes.] He wrote his great Caſe of Liberty of Conſcience debated and defended by the Authority of Reaſon, Scripture, and Antiquity, London 1670, in 4to. Truth reſcued from Impoſture, mentioned in the note (I). A cautionary Poſtſcript, to his book, called, Truth exalted. A ſerious Apology for the Principles and Practiſes of the People called Quakers, againſt the malicious Aſperſions, erroneous Doctrines, and horrid Blaſphemies of Thomas Jenner, and Timothy Taylor, two Preſbyterian or Independent Preachers, in their book, entitled, Quakeriſm anatomiz'd.

[M] A piece entitled, The Spirit of Truth vindicated.] The whole title is: The Spirit of Truth vindicated againſt that of Error and Envy, unſeaſonably manifeſted in a late malicious Libel, entitled, The Spirit of the Quakers tried, &c.

[N] Another againſt Reeve and Muggleton.] It was entitled, The new Witneſſes proved old Hereticks: or, Information to the ignorant; in which the Doctrines of John Reeve and Lodowick Muggleton, which they ſtile Myſteries never before known, revealed, or heard of, from the foundation of the World, are proved to be moſtly antient Whimſies, Blaſphemies, and Hereſies, from the Evidence of Scripture, Reaſon, and ſeveral Hiſtorians. Alſo an Account of ſome Diſcourſe between L. M. and myſelf, by which his blaſphemous, ignorant, and unſavoury Spirit is clearly and truly manifeſted, in Love to the immortal Souls of thoſe few, who are concerned in the belief of his Impoſtures. By a living true Witneſs to that one eternal Way of God, revealed in the Light of Righteouſneſs, W. Penn. London 1672, in 4to. In this book our Author confutes the following notions of Reeve and Muggleton, viz. 1. "That God "is not an infinite ſpirit in every place at all times; "but is in the ſhape of a man; and that man, in "reſpect of his body, is the image of God. 2. That "God did not create the heavens and earth out of "nothing, but the ſubſtance was with God from "eternity. 3. That the ſoul of man is generated "and begot by the man and woman with the body; "and that the body and ſoul are inſeparable. "4. That the body and ſoul go to the duſt, and riſe "together at the general reſurrection. 5. That God "deſcended with his body in the ſhape of a man, "and diſſolved himſelf into the Virgin's womb, and "ſo brought forth himſelf a man, who, after he "had lived to ſuch an age, was crucified, and really "died, or ceaſed to be either God or man, for three "days and nights. 6. That God from all eternity, "without any other inducement than his own plea-"ſure, hath decreed ſome for ſalvation, and ſome "for damnation; contrary to which, all their obe-"dience or rebellion ſhall be in vain, to alter his "determination."

[O] And ſome other tracts in that and the following years.] He wrote, Plain-dealing with a traducing Anabaptiſt: or, three letters writ upon occaſion of ſome ſlanderous Reflections given and promoted againſt William Penn, by one John Morſe. London 1672, in 4to. A Winding-ſheet for Controverſy ended. London 1672. in 4to. in anſwer to Mr. Henry Hedworth's Controverſy

In 1677 he travelled into Holland and Germany, in order to propagate the Principles of Quakeriſm; and had frequent converſations with the Princeſs Elizabeth [P] daughter of the Queen of Bohemia, and ſiſter to the Princeſs Sophia, grandmother to his preſent Majeſty (g). In 1678 and the following year he publiſhed ſeveral Tracts [Q]. In 1681 King Charles II. in conſideration of the ſervices of our Author's father, and ſundry debts due to him from the Crown at the time of his deceaſe, by letters patents dated March the 4th, 1680-1, granted Mr. Penn and his heirs, that Province lying on the Weſt ſide of the River Delaware in North America, formerly belonging to the Dutch, and then called the new Netherlands. The name was now changed by the King in honour of our Author, whom and his heirs his Majeſty made abſolute Proprietors and Governors of that countrey. Upon this he publiſhed a Brief Account of the Province of Penſylvania [R], with the King's patent, and their papers relating thereto, deſcribing the country and its produce, propoſing an eaſy purchaſe of lands and good terms of ſettlement for ſuch, as were inclined to remove thither: many ſingle perſons and ſome families out of England and Wales went over, and having made and improved their plantations to good advantage, and begun to build the city of Philadelphia, the Governor, in order to ſecure the new planters from the native Indians, appointed Commiſſioners to confer with them about land, and confirm a league of Peace (h), by whom he ſent a letter to the Indians [S]. He drew up likewiſe verſy ended. The propoſed Comprehenſion ſoberly and not unſeaſonably conſidered. London 1672, in 4to. Quakeriſm a new nick-name for old Chriſtianity; being an Anſwer to a book, entitled, Quakeriſm no Chriſtianity, ſubſcribed by J. Faldo. In which the Riſe, Doctrine and Practice of the abuſed Quakers are truly, briefly, and fully declared and vindicated, from the falſe Charges, wicked Inſinuations, and utmoſt Oppoſition made by that Adverſary. 1672, in 8vo. The Invalidity of John Faldo's Vindication of his book, called, Quakeriſm no Chriſtianity: being a Rejoinder in the Defence of the Anſwer, entitled, Quakeriſm a new Nick-name for old Chriſtianity; wherein many weighty Goſpel-Truths are handled, and the diſingenuous Carriage of that Adverſary is obſerved, for the information of moderate Enquirers. 1673, in 8vo. Wiſdom juſtified of her Children, from the Ignorance and Calumny of Henry Hallywell, in his book called, An Account of Familiſm, as it is revived and propagated by the Quakers. 1673, in 8vo. Reaſon againſt Railing, and Truth againſt Fiction: being an Anſwer to two pamphlets, entituled, A Dialogue between a Chriſtian and a Quaker; and the Continuation of the Dialogue, &c. by one Thomas Hicks, an Anabaptiſt Teacher. 1673, in 8vo. The Counterfeit Chriſtian detected, and the real Quaker juſtified, againſt the vile Forgeries, groſs perverſions, black Slanders, plain Contradictions, and ſcurrilous Language of Tho. Hicks, in his Third Dialogue, called, The Quakers condemned. By way of Appeal to all ſober people, eſpecially thoſe called Anabaptiſts in and about the City of London. 1674, in 8vo. A juſt Rebuke to one and twenty learned and reverend Divines, ſo called; being an Anſwer to an abuſive Epiſtle againſt the People called Quakers. London 1674, in 4to. Urim & Thummim: or, the Doctrines of Light and Perfection maintained, againſt the oppoſite Plea of Samuel Grevil, a pretended Miniſter of the Goſpel, in his un-goſpel-like Diſcourſe againſt a Book, entitled, A Teſtimony of the Light within, antiently writ by Alexander Parker. 1674, in 4to. The Spirit of Alexander the Copper-Smith, juſtly rebuked: or, An Anſwer to a late Pamphlet, entitled, The Spirit of the Hat, or the Government of the Quakers. Judas and the Jews combined againſt Chriſt and his Followers; being a Rejoinder to a late nameleſs Reply, called, Tyranny and Hypocriſy detected, made againſt a Book, entitled, The Spirit of Alexander the Copper-Smith, rebuked. The Chriſtian Quaker, and his divine Teſtimony ſtated and vindicated, from Scripture, Reaſon, and Authority. 1673, in folio. A Diſcourſe of the general Rule of Faith and Practice, and Judge of Controverſy. 1673. A Letter to the Council and Senate of Embden. 1674, in 4to. Naked Truth needs no Shift: or, an Anſwer to a libellous Sheet, entitled, The Quakers laſt Shift found out. 1674. A Return to John Faldo's Reply, called, A Curb for Will. Penn's Confidence. 1674. A Treatiſe of Oaths. containing the ſeveral mighty Reaſons, why the People called Quakers refuſe to ſwear; and thoſe confirmed by numerous Teſtimonies of Gentiles, Jews, and Chriſtians, both Fathers, Doctors, and Martyrs. London 1675, in 4to. England's preſent Intereſt conſidered, with Honour to the Prince, and ſafety to the People. In anſwer to this one Queſtion, "What is moſt fit, eaſy, and ſafe "at this juncture of affairs to be done, for quieting "of differences, allaying the heat of contrary inte- "reſts, and making them ſubſervient to the intereſt "of the Government, and conſiſtent with the proſ- "perity of the Kingdom?" London 1675, in 4to. Saul ſmitten to the Ground; being a brief, but faithful Narrative of the dying Remorſe of a late living Enemy to the People called Quakers, and their Faith and Worſhip. London 1675, in 4to.

(g) Ibid. p. 35——115.

(h) Ibid. p. 115——121.

[P] In 1677, he travelled into Holland and Germany, in order to propagate the principles of Quakeriſm, and had frequent converſations with the Princeſs Elizabeth.] He publiſhed an account of his travels at London, in 8vo. The Princeſs Elizabeth wrote ſeveral letters to him, which are printed in that account.

[Q] In 1678, and the following year, he publiſhed ſeveral tracts.] A brief Anſwer to a falſe and fooliſh Libel, called, The Quakers Opinions, for their ſakes that writ it and read it. 1678, in 4to. To the Children of Light in this Generation. London 1678, in 4to. A brief Examination and State of Liberty ſpiritual, both with reſpect to Perſons in their private Capacity, and in their Church-Society and Communion. 1678. An Addreſs to Proteſtants of all Perſuaſions, more eſpecially the Magiſtracy and Clergy, for the promotion of Virtue and Charity. London 1679, in 4to. A Preface to the Works of Mr. Samuel Fiſher. England's great Intereſt in the Choice of a new Parliament; Dedicated to all her Freeholders and Electors. 1679. One Project for the Good of England, that is, our Civil Union is our Civil Safety: humbly dedicated to the Great Council, the Parliament of England. London 1679, in folio.

[R] A brief Account of the Province of Penſylvania.] It was printed 1681, in folio, and re-printed in 1682, in 4to.

[S] By whom he ſent a letter to the Indians.] It was as follows.

London the 18th of 8th Month, 1681.

"My Friends,

"There is a great God and Power, that hath "made the world, and all things therein; to whom "you and I, and all people, owe their Being and "Well-being, and to whom you and I muſt one day "give an account for all that we do in the world. "This great God hath written his law in our hearts, "by which we are taught and commanded to love "and help, and do good to one another, and not to "do harm and miſchief one unto another. Now "this great God hath been pleaſed to make me "concerned in your part of the world, and the King "of the country where I live, hath given me a great "Province therein. But I deſire to enjoy it with "your love and conſent, that we may always live to- "gether as neighbours and friends. Elſe what "would the great God do to us, who hath made us "not to devour and deſtroy one another, but to live "ſoberly and kindly together in the world? Now I "would have you well obſerve, that I am very ſen- "ſible of the unkindneſs and injuſtice that hath been "too much exerciſed towards you by the people of "theſe parts of the world, who have ſought them- "ſelves, and to make great advantages by you, "rather wiſe the fundamental Conſtitutions of Penſylvania in twenty four articles [T]. In November 1681 he was elected Member of the Royal Society (i). In 1682 he publiſhed The Frame of the Government of the Province of Penſylvania [U]; and in Auguſt that year embarked for that country, where he continued about two years [W], and returned to England in Auguſt 1684. Upon the Acceſſion of King James II. to the Throne, he was taken into a great degree of favour with his Majeſty, which he had enjoyed, while that King was Duke of York; but this expoſed him to the imputation of being a Papiſt, from which he vindicated himſelf [X]. In 1685 he publiſhed A Defence of the Duke of Buckingham's Book of Religion and Worſhip from the Exceptions of a nameleſs Author; and in 1686 A Perſuaſive to Moderation to Diſſenting Chriſtians, in Prudence and Conſcience, humbly ſubmitted to the King and his great Council; and in 1687 Good Advice to the Church of England, Roman Catholicks, and Proteſtant Diſſenters; in which it is endeavoured to make appear, that it is their Duty, Principle, and intereſt, to aboliſh the Penal Laws and Teſts. Upon the Revolution our Author's great intereſt at Court having made him ſuſpected of diſaffection to the Government, he was examined before the Council, December 10, 1688, and obliged to give ſecurity for his appearance in the firſt day of the next Term; which he did, and then was continued on the ſame ſecurity to Eaſter Term following, on the laſt day of which he was diſcharged. In 1690 he was again examined before

(i) Wood, col. 1051.

" rather than to be examples of juſtice and goodneſs " unto you, which I hear hath been matter of trou- " ble to you, and cauſed great grudgings and animo- " ſities, ſometimes to the ſhedding of blood, which " hath made the great God angry. But I am not " ſuch a man, as is well known in my own coun- " try. I have great love and regard towards you; " and I deſire to win and gain your love and friend- " ſhip by a kind, juſt, and peaceable life; and the " people I ſend are of the ſame mind, and ſhall in " all things behave themſelves accordingly. And if " in any thing any ſhall offend you, or your people, " you ſhall have a full and ſpeedy ſatisfaction for " the ſame, by an equal number of juſt men on " both ſides, that by no means you may have juſt " occaſion of being offended againſt them. I ſhall " ſhortly come to you myſelf, at what time we may " more largely and freely confer and diſcourſe of " theſe matters. In the mean time I have ſent my " Commiſſioners to treat with you about land, and a " firm league of peace. Let me deſire you to be " kind to them and the people, and receive theſe " preſents and tokens, which I have ſent you as a " Teſtimony of my good will to you, and my reſo- " lution to live juſtly, peaceably and friendly with " you.

" I am,

" Your loving friend,

" W. Penn."

His friendly and pacific manner of treating the Indians produced in them an extraordinary love and eſteem for him and his people, ſo that they have maintained a perfect amity with the Engliſh in Penſylvania ever ſince. And it is obſervable, that upon renewing the treaty with the late Governor, Sir William Keith, Bart. in 1722, they mention the name of William Penn with great gratitude and affection, ſtyling him a good man; and as their higheſt compliment to Sir William uſe this expreſſion, We eſteem and love you as if you were William Penn himſelf (4).

(4) See The Hiſtorical Regiſter, for the year 1723, No. 30. p. 107, 108.

[T] He drew up . . . the fundamental conſtitutions of Penſylvania, in twenty-four articles.] The firſt of theſe articles is as follows. In reverence to God, the Father of lights and ſpirits, the Author as well as Object of all divine knowledge, faith, and worſhip, I do for me and mine, declare and eſtabliſh, for the firſt fundamental of the Government of this country, that every perſon, that doth or ſhall reſide therein, ſhall have and enjoy the free poſſeſſion of his or her faith and exerciſe of worſhip toward God, in ſuch way and manner as every ſuch perſon ſhall in conſcience believe is moſt acceptable to God. And ſo long as every ſuch perſon uſeth not this Chriſtian liberty to licentiouſneſs, or the deſtruction of others, that is to ſay, to ſpeak looſely and profanely, or contemptuouſly of God, Chriſt, the holy Scriptures, or Religion, or commit any moral evil or injury againſt others in their converſation; he or ſhe ſhall be protected in the enjoyment of the aforeſaid Chriſtian liberty, by the Civil Magiſtrate.

[U] In 1682, he publiſhed The Frame of the Government of the Province of Penſylvania.] This contained twenty-four articles, ſomewhat varying from the Conſtitutions abovementioned, together with certain other laws, to the number of forty, agreed on in England by the Governor, and divers Freemen of the Province: of which laws, one was as follows: That all perſons living in this Province, who confeſs and acknowledge the one almighty and eternal God to be the Creator, Upholder, and Ruler of the world, and that hold themſelves obliged in conſcience to live peaceably and juſtly in civil ſociety, ſhall in no-wiſe be moleſted or prejudiced for their religious perſuaſion or practice in matters of faith and worſhip; nor ſhall they be compelled at any time to frequent or maintain any religious worſhip, place, or miniſtry whatſoever.

[W] In Auguſt that year, he embarked for that country, where he continued about two years.] In a letter to a perſon, who had reflected upon him, he ſhews, that his aim in eſtabliſhing the colony had been directed more to the public good, than his own private intereſt. The letter is printed in his Life, p. 124.

[X] Expoſed him to the imputation of being a Papiſt, from which he vindicated himſelf.] Dr. Tillotſon, among others, having entertained a ſuſpicion of him, and let fall ſome expreſſions to that purpoſe, Mr. Penn wrote the following letter to him.

" Worthy friend,

" Being often told, that Dr. Tillotſon ſhould ſuſ- " pect me, and ſo report me a Papiſt, I think a " Jeſuit; and being cloſely preſſed, I take the liber- " ty to aſk thee, if any ſuch reflection fell from " thee. If it did, I am ſorry one I eſteemed ever " the firſt of his robe, ſhould ſo undeſervedly ſtain " me, for ſo I call it; and if the ſtory be falſe, I " am ſorry they ſhould abuſe Dr. Tillotſon, as well as " myſelf, without a cauſe. I add no more, but " that I abhor two principles in religion, and pity " them who own them: the firſt is, Obedience upon " authority without conviction; and the other, De- " ſtroying them that differ from me for God's ſake. Such " a religion is without judgment, though not with- " out teeth. Union is beſt, if right; elſe charity; " and, as Hooker ſaid, The time will come, when a " few words ſpoken with meekneſs, and humility, and " love, ſhall be more acceptable than volumes of contro- " verſies, which commonly deſtroy charity, the very beſt " part of true religion; I mean, not a charity that " can change with all, but bear all, as I can Dr. " Tillotſon, in what he diſſents from me, and in this " reflection too, if ſaid, which is not yet believed by

" Thy true Chriſtian friend,

Charing-Croſs, 22d of the 11th Month, 1685-6.

" W. Penn."

Dr. Tillotſon's anſwer was as follows.

" Honoured Sir, January 26th, 1685.

" The demand of your letter is very juſt and rea- " ſonable, and the manner of it very kind; there- " fore before the Council upon an accuſation of holding correſpondence with the late King James II. and was held upon bail for ſome time, but diſcharged in Trinity Term the ſame year. He was attacked a third time, and his name inſerted in a Proclamation dated July the 18th the ſame year; but was diſcharged in the laſt day of Michaelmas-Term. He deſigned now to go over a ſecond time to Penſylvania, and publiſhed propoſals in print for another ſettlement there; and had ſo far prepared for his voyage, that an order for a Convoy was granted him by the Secretary of State, which was prevented by a freſh accuſation againſt him, backed with the oath of one William Fuller, who was afterwards declared by the Parliament a Cheat and Impoſtor. A warrant being granted for Mr. Penn's apprehenſion, which he narrowly eſcaped at his return from George Fox's burial,

" fore in anſwer to it be pleaſed to take the follow" ing account. The laſt time you did me the fa" vour to ſee me at my houſe, I did, according to " the freedom I always uſe, where I profeſs my " friendſhip, acquaint you with ſomething I had " heard of a correſpondence you held with ſome at
" Rome, and particularly with ſome of the Jeſuits
" there. At which you ſeemed a little ſurprized,
" and after ſome general diſcourſe about it, you
" ſaid, you would call on me ſome other time, and " ſpeak farther of it. Since that time I never ſaw
" you but by accident and in paſſage, where I " thought you always declined me; particularly at
" Sir William Jones's chamber, which was the laſt
" time, I think, I ſaw you + upon which occaſion I " took notice to him of your ſtrangeneſs to me, and " told him what I thought might be the reaſon of " it, and that I was ſorry for it, becauſe I had a " particular eſteem of your parts and temper. The " ſame, I believe, I have ſaid to ſome others, but to " whom I do not ſo particularly remember. Since your " going to Penſylvania, I never thought of it, till
" lately being in ſome company, one of them preſſed
" me to declare, Whether I had not heard ſomething of
" you, which had ſatisfied me, that you were a Papiſt?
" I anſwered, no, by no means. I told him what I " had heard, and what I ſaid to you, and of the " ſtrangeneſs that enſued upon it; but that this ne" ver went farther with me, than to make me ſuſ-
" pect there was more in that report, which I had " heard, than I was at firſt willing to believe; and
" if any made more of it, I ſhould look upon them
" as very injurious both to Mr. Penn and myſelf.
" This is the truth of that matter; and whenever " you will pleaſe to ſatisfy me, that my ſuſpicion of " the truth of that report I had heard was ground-
" leſs, I will heartily beg your pardon for it. I do " fully concur with you in the abhorrence of the two " principles you mention, and in your approbation
" of that excellent ſaying of Mr. Hooker's, for which
" I ſhall very highly eſteem him. I have endea-
" voured to make it one of the governing principles
" of my life, never to abate any thing of humanity
" or charity to any man for his difference from me
" in opinion, and particularly to thoſe of your per-
" ſuaſion, as ſeveral of them have had experience.
" I have been ready upon all occaſions to do all of" fices of kindneſs, being truly ſorry to ſee them ſo
" hardly uſed; and though I thought them miſtaken,
" yet in the main I believed them to be very honeſt.
" I thank you for your letter, and have a juſt eſteem
" of the Chriſtian temper of it, and reſt

" Your faithful friend,

" Jo. Tillotſon."

This occaſioned Mr. Penn to write another letter to Dr. Tillotſon, which was as follows.

" Worthy Friend,

" Having a much leſs opinion of my own memory
" than of Dr. Tillotſon's truth, I will allow the fact,
" though not the jealouſy. For beſides that I can" not look ſtrange where I am well uſed, I have ever
" treated the name of Dr. Tillotſon with another re" gard. I might be grave, and full of my own bu-
" ſineſs. I was alſo then diſappointed by the Doc" tor's; but my nature is not harſh, my education
" leſs, and my principles leaſt of all. It was the " opinion I had of the Doctor's moderation, ſimplicity,
" and integrity, rather than his parts or poſt, that " always made me ſet a value upon his friendſhip, of " which perhaps I am better judge, leaving the lat" ter to men of deeper talents. I blame him no" thing, but leave it to his better thoughts, if in my " affair his jealouſy was not too nimble for his cha" rity. If he can believe me, I ſhould hardly pre" vail with myſelf to endure the ſame thought of
" Dr. Tillotſon on the like occaſion, and leſs to ſpeak
" of it. For the Roman correſpondence, I will free-
" ly come to confeſſion: I have not only no ſuch
" thing with any Jeſuit at Rome (though Proteſtants
" may have without offence) but I hold none with " any Jeſuit, Prieſt, or Regular in the world, of that " communion. And that the Doctor may ſee what " a novice I am in that buſineſs, I know not one
" any where. And yet when all is ſaid, I am a Ca-
" tholick, though not a Roman. I have bowels for " mankind, and dare not deny others what I crave
" for myſelf, I mean, liberty for the exerciſe of my " Religion; thinking faith, piety, and providence,
" a better ſecurity than force; and that if truth
" cannot prevail with her own weapons, all others
" will fail her. Now though I am not obliged to
" this defence, and that it can be no temporizing
" now to make it; yet that Dr. Tillotſon may ſee
" how much I value his good opinion, and dare own
" the truth and myſelf at all times, let him be " confident, I am no Roman Catholick, but a Chriſ-
" tian, whoſe Creed is the Scripture, of the truth of " which I hold a nobler evidence, than the beſt
" Church-authority in the world; and yet I refuſe
" not to believe the porter, though I cannot leave
" the ſenſe to his diſcretion; and when I ſhould, if " he offends againſt thoſe plain methods of under-
" ſtanding God hath made us to know things by,
" and which are inſeparable from us, I muſt beg his
" pardon, as I do the Doctor's for this length, upon
" the aſſurance he has given me of his doing the " like upon better information; which that he may " fully have, I recommend him to my Addreſs to " Proteſtants from page 133 to the end, and to the " four firſt Chapters of my no Croſs, no Crown; to
" ſay nothing of our moſt inceremonious and un-
" worldly way of worſhip, and their pompous cult;
" where at this time I ſhall leave the buſineſs, with
" all due and ſenſible acknowledgments to thy
" friendly temper, and aſſurance of the ſincere wiſhes
" and reſpects of

" Thy affectionate and real friend,

Charing-Croſs, the 29th of the 11th Month, 1686.

" W. Penn.

Mr. Penn's third letter to Dr. Tillotſon was as follows.

Charing-Croſs 27th of the 2d Month 1686.

" Worthy Friend,

" This ſhould have been a viſit; but being of opi" nion, that Dr. Tillotſon is yet a debtor to me this " way, I choſe to provoke him to another letter by " this, before I made him one. For though he was " very juſt and obliging, when I laſt ſaw him; yet
" certainly no expreſſions, however kindly ſpoken,
" will ſo eaſily and effectually purge me from the " unjuſt imputation ſome people caſt upon me in his " name, as his letter will do. The need of this he " will better ſee, when he has read the incloſed,
" which coming to hand ſince my laſt, is, I preſume,
" enough to juſtify this addreſs, if I had no former " pretenſions. And therefore I cannot be ſo wanting " to myſelf, as not to preſs him to a Letter in my juſt
" defence; nor ſo uncharitable to him, as to think
" he ſhould not frankly write what he has ſaid, when burial, January 16, 1690. Upon this he concealed himſelf for two or three years, and during his receſs wrote ſeveral pieces [Y]. In the latter end of the year 1693, through the

" he has ſaid, when it is to right a man's reputa" tion, and diſabuſe the too credulous world. For
" to me it ſeems from a private friendſhip to be" come a moral duty to the public; which, with a
" perſon of ſo great morality, muſt give ſucceſs to
" the reaſonable deſire of

" Thy very real friend,

" William Penn."

Dr. Tillotſon wrote the following anſwer.

" Sir, April the 29th, 1686.
" I am very ſorry, that the ſuſpicion, which I " had entertained concerning you, of which I gave
" you the true account in my former letter, hath oc-
" caſioned ſo much trouble and inconvenience to " you: and I do now declare with great joy, that I
" am fully ſatisfied, that there was no juſt ground
" for that ſuſpicion; and therefore, I do heartily
" beg your pardon for it. And ever ſince you were
" pleaſed to give me that ſatisfaction, I have taken
" all occaſions to vindicate you in this matter; and
" ſhall be ready to do it to the perſon that ſent you
" the incloſed, whenever he will pleaſe to come to " me. I am very much in the country, but will
" ſeek the firſt opportunity to viſit you at Charing-
" Croſs, and renew our acquaintance, in which I
" took great pleaſure. I reſt

" Your faithful friend,

" Jo. Tillotſon."

In 1688, William Popple Eſq; Secretary of the Plantation-Office, wrote Mr. Penn a letter, dated Octob. 20th, in which he repreſented to him the reflections caſt upon him as a Promoter of the proceedings of the Court. To this Mr. Penn wrote a long anſwer, dated at Teddington, Octob. 24th, 1688; in which he writes thus. I ſay ſolemnly, that I am ſo far from having been bred at St. Omer's, and having received Orders at Rome, that I never was at either place, nor do I know any body there; nor had I ever correſpondency with any body in thoſe places; which is another ſtory invented againſt me. And as for my officiating in the King's Chapel, or any other, it is ſo ridiculous, as well as untrue, that beſides, that no body can do it but a Prieſt, and that I have been married to a woman of ſome condition above ſixteen years, which no Prieſt can be, by any diſpenſation whatever; I have not ſo much as looked into any Chapel of the Roman Religion, and conſequently not the King's, though a common curioſity warrants it daily to people of all perſuaſions. And once for all, I do ſay, that I am a Proteſtant Diſſenter, and to that degree ſuch, that I challenge the moſt celebrated Proteſtant of the Engliſh, or any other, on that head, be he Layman or Clergyman, in public or in private. For I would have ſuch people know, it is not impoſſible for a true Proteſtant Diſſenter to be dutiful, thankful, and ſerviceable to the King, though he be of the Roman-Catholic Communion. We hold not our property or protection from him by our perſuaſion; and therefore his perſuaſion ſhould not be the meaſure of our allegiance. I am ſorry to ſee ſo many, that ſeem fond of the Reformed Religion, by their diſaffection to him, recommend it ſo ill. . . . But ſome may be apt to ſay, Why not any body elſe, as well as I? Why muſt I have the preferable acceſs to other Diſſenters, if not a Papiſt? I anſwer, that I know not that it is ſo: but this I know, that I have made it my province and buſineſs; I have followed and preſſed it; I took it for my calling and ſtation, and have kept it above theſe ſixteen years; and, which is more (if I may ſay it without vanity or reproach) wholly at my own charges too. To this let me add, the relation my father had to this King's ſervice, his particular favour in getting me releaſed out of the Tower of London in 69, my father's humble requeſt to him upon his death-bed to protect me from the inconveniencies and troubles my perſuaſion might expoſe me to, and his friendly promiſe to do it, and exact performance of it from the moment I addreſſed myſelf to him: I ſay, when all this is conſidered, any body, that has the leaſt pretence to good-nature, gratitude, or generoſity, muſt needs know how to interpret my acceſs to the King.
" Perhaps ſome will be ready to ſay, This is not all,
" nor is this yet a fault; but that I have been an
" Adviſer in other matters diſguſtful to the King-
" dom, and which tend to the overthrow of the Pro-
" teſtant Religion, and the Liberties of the People.
" A likely thing indeed, that a Proteſtant Diſſenter,
" who from fifteen years old, has been at times, a
" ſufferer in his father's family, in the Univerſity,
" and by the Government, for being ſo, ſhould de-
" ſign the deſtruction of the Proteſtant Religion. This " is juſt as probable as it is true, that I died a Jeſuit
" ſix years ago in America. Will men ſuffer ſuch
" ſtuff to paſs upon them? Is any thing more fool-
" iſh as well as falſe, than that becauſe I am of" ten at Whitehall, therefore I muſt be the Author
" of every thing that is done there, that does not " pleaſe abroad? But ſuppoſing ſome ſuch things to " have been done, pray tell me, if I am bound to op-
" poſe any thing, that I am not called to do? I ne" ver was a Member of a Council, Cabinet, or Com" mittee, where the affairs of the Kingdom are " tranſacted. I have had no Office or Truſt, and " conſequently nothing can be ſaid to be done by
" me, nor for that reaſon could I lie under any teſt
" or obligation to diſcover my opinion of public
" acts of State; and therefore, neither can any ſuch
" acts, nor my ſilence about them, in juſtice, be made
" my crime. Volunteers are blanks and cyphers in " all Governments. And unleſs calling at White" hall once a day upon many occaſions, or my not " being turned out of nothing (for that no Office is)
" be the evidence of my compliance in diſagreeable
" things, I know not what elſe can with any truth
" be alledged againſt me. However, one thing I " know, that I have every where moſt religiouſly ob-
" ſerved, and endeavoured in converſation with per-
" ſons of all ranks and opinions, to allay heats, and " moderate extremities, even in the politics. It is " below me to be more particular; but I am ſure it
" has been my endeavour, that if we could not all
" meet upon a religious bottom, at leaſt we might
" upon a civil one, the good of England, which is
" the common intereſt of King and People; that " he might be great by juſtice, and we free
" by obedience, diſtinguiſhing rightly on the one
" hand between duty and ſlavery, and on the o" ther between liberty and licentiouſneſs. But alas!
" I am not without my apprehenſions of the cauſe
" of this behaviour towards me, and in this I per" ceive we agree; I mean, my conſtant zeal for an " impartial Liberty of Conſcience. But if that be it,
" the cauſe is too good to be in pain about. I ever
" underſtood that to be the natural right of all men;
" and that he that had a religion without it, his re" ligion was none of his own. For what is not the " religion of a man's choice, is the religion of him
" that impoſes it; ſo that liberty of conſcience is
" the firſt ſtep to have a religion. This is no new " opinion with me: I have writ many Apologies
" within the laſt twenty years to defend it, and that " impartially. Yet I have conſtantly declared, that " bounds ought to be ſet to this freedom; and that " morality was the beſt; and that as often as that
" was violated, under a pretence of conſcience, it
" was fit the Civil Power ſhould take place. Nor did
" I ever once think of promoting any ſort of li" berty of conſcience for any body, which did not
" preſerve the common Proteſtancy of the Kingdom,
" and the antient Rights of the Government; for
" to ſay the truth, the one cannot be maintained
" without the other."

[Y] During his receſs, wrote ſeveral pieces.] A Preface to Robert Barclay's Works, and another to thoſe of John Burnyeat, both printed in 1691. Juſt Meaſures: being an Epiſtle of Peace and Love, to ſuch Profeſſors of Truth, as are under Diſſatisfaction about the Order practiſed in the Church of Chriſt. Printed in 1692. A Key, opening the Way to every Capacity, how to diſtinguiſh the Religion profeſſed by the People called Quakers, from the Perverſions and Miſrepreſentations of their Adverſaries. With a brief Exhortation to all Sorts of People, to examine the intereſt of the Lord Ranelagh, Lord Somers, and Sir John Trenchard, he was admitted to appear before the King and Council, where he repreſented his innocence ſo effectually, that he was acquitted. In February 1693-4 his wife Gulielma Maria died. In 1694 he wrote a Preface to George Fox's Journal [Z], and a Viſitation to the Jews [AA]. In 1695 he wrote a Defence of his Key againſt a nameleſs Author [BB]. The ſame year he preſented to the Houſe of Commons a paper upon occaſion of a bill to excuſe the Quakers from ſwearing. March 5, 1695-6, he married Hannah, the Daughter of Mr. Thomas Callowhill, and Grand-daughter of Mr. Dennis Holliſter, a Merchant of Briſtol, by whom he had four ſons and one daughter. In April 1696, his eldeſt ſon by his former wife, named Springett, died at Warminghurſt in Suſſex of a conſumption in the 21ſt year of his age. The ſame year he publiſhed his Treatiſe, entitled, Primitive Chriſtianity revived in the Faith and Practice of the People called Quakers; and a piece againſt Mr. George Keith, who had left the Quakers, entitled, More Work for George Keith. In 1697 there being a Bill depending in the Houſe of Lords againſt Blaſphemy, he preſented to the Houſe A Caution requiſite in the Conſideration of that Bill, in which he adviſed, that the word Blaſphemy might be ſo explained, as that no ambiguous interpretation might give occaſion to malicious perſons to proſecute under that name whatever they ſhould be pleaſed to call ſo. After which the Houſe thought fit to drop the Bill. In April 1698 he ſet out from Briſtol, where he then lived, for Ireland [CC]. The next Winter reſiding at Briſtol, he in conjunction with Mr. Benj. Coole, wrote a Book, entitled, The Truth of God, as held by the People called Quakers, farther cleared from Miſtakes, &c. In Auguſt 1699 himſelf with his wife and family embarked for Penſylvania [DD], whence he returned to England in December 1701. Upon Queen Anne's Acceſſion to the Crown, he was in great favour with her, and often at Court; and for his conveniency took lodgings at Kenſington, where he wrote More Fruits of Solitude: being a ſecond Part of Reflections and Maxims relating to the Conduct of human Life. After this he removed to Knightſbridge, where he reſided for ſome years. About this time A Bill to prevent occaſional Conformity being brought into the Houſe of Commons, he wrote a Sheet, entitled, Conſiderations upon the Bill againſt occaſional Conformity. In 1706 he removed with his family to a convenient houſe about a mile from Brentford, where he lived ſome years. In 1707 he was involved in a Law-ſuit with the Executors of a perſon, who had been formerly his Steward; but his cauſe (though many thought him aggrieved) was attended with ſuch circumſtances, that the Court of Chancery did not think proper to relieve him; upon which account he was obliged to live in the Old-Baily within the Rules of the Fleet ſome part of this and the following year, till the matter in diſpute was accommodated. In 1710 the air of London not agreeing with his declining conſtitution, he took an handſome Seat at Ruſhcomb near Twyford in Buckinghamſhire, where he reſided the remainder of his life. In 1712 he was ſeized at diſtant times with three ſeveral fits, ſuppoſed to be apoplectick, by the laſt of which his underſtanding and memory were ſo impaired as to render him incapable of publick action for the future. He died July 30, 1718, in the ſeventy fourth year of his age, and was interred Auguſt the 5th following at Jordans in Buckinghamſhire, where his former wife and ſeveral of his family had been buried. Dr. Henry More in the ſecond Tome of his Philoſophical Works (k), obſerves, that our Author in his No Croſs no Crown has treated the ſubject of a future Life and the Immortality of the Soul with a force and ſpirit equal to moſt Writers. And in a Letter of his to Mr. Penn, concerning Baptiſm, and the Lord's Supper, and ſome uſages of the Quakers (l), he remarks, that he had peruſed ſome of Mr. Penn's writings, and met with ſeveral excellent paſſages in them, that are very expreſſive of a vigorous Reſentment and Experience of what appertains to Life and Holineſs. Mr. Edmund Elys, ſome time Fellow of Baliol College in Oxford, and afterwards a Nonjuror, in a Second Letter to the Author of an Anſwer to Mr. Penn's Key, printed in 1697, ſpeaks thus of Mr.

(k) p. 748.

(l) Ward's Life of Dr. H. More, p. 311 & ſeqq. edit. London 1710. in 8vo.

examine their Ways and their Hearts, and turn ſpeedily to the Lord. Printed in 1692. There have been at leaſt twelve editions of this piece. An Eſſay toward the preſent Peace of Europe. Printed twice in 1693. Some Tracts of Solitude, in Reflections and Maxims relating to the Conduct of human Life. Printed in 1693.

[Z] In 1694, he wrote a Preface to George Fox's Journal.] This Preface was afterwards re-printed under the following title: A brief Account of the Riſe and Progreſs of the People called Quakers: in which their fundamental Principle, Doctrines, Worſhip, Miniſtry, and Diſcipline, are plainly declared, &c.

[AA] A Viſitation to the Jews.] It was publiſhed by way of Appendix to Mr. John Tomkins's Harmony of the Old and New Teſtaments.

[BB] In 1695, he wrote a Defence of his Key againſt a nameleſs Author.] This Defence was publiſhed under this title; A Reply to a pretended Anſwer, by a nameleſs Author, to W. Penn's Key; in which the Principles of the People called Quakers, are farther explained and confirmed. By William Penn.

[CC] In April 1698, he ſet out from Briſtol, where he then lived, for Ireland.] Sometime after his arrival in Ireland, Mr. John Plympton, a Baptiſt, having publiſhed at Dublin, a paper entitled, A Quaker no Chriſtian, Mr. Penn publiſhed an Anſwer, entitled, The Quaker a Chriſtian; and a paper, entitled, Goſpel Truths held by the People called Quakers, and re-printed the 8th and 9th chapters of his Primitive Chriſtianity revived. Having in a viſit to the Biſhop of Cork, preſented him with one of his pieces called Goſpel Truths, the Biſhop publiſhed ſome Exceptions to it; which occaſioned Mr. Penn, after his return to England, to reply in A Defence of a Paper, entitled, Goſpel Truths, againſt the Exceptions of the Biſhop of Cork's Teſtimony.

[DD] In Auguſt 1699, himſelf, with his wife and family, embarked for Penſylvania.] While he was in that country, ſome perſons in England taking advantage of his abſence, endeavoured to undermine both his and other proprietary Governments, under the pretence of advancing the prerogative of the Crown;

Mr. Penn : " I intreat you to conſider how great a multitude in this Kingdom have pro-
" voked the wrath of God by calumniating this Gentleman, clamouring againſt him as " if he was a Papiſt, yea a Jeſuit. Is it Popery to aſſert, that The principal Rule of " Faith to a ſincere Chriſtian is that, which Almighty God has written in the Hearts of " all Men? This the People called Quakers do affirm, and in this I fully concur with " them ; and I ſay, for want of a due belief of this, The whole World lieth in Wickedneſs." and a bill for that purpoſe was brought into the Houſe of Lords. His friends, the Proprietors and Adventurers then in England, immediately repreſented the hardſhip of their caſe to the Parliament, ſoliciting time for his return to anſwer for himſelf; and accordingly preſſed his coming over as ſoon as poſſible ; with which he ſeeing it neceſſary to comply, ſummoned an Aſſembly to meet at Philadelphia, to whom on the 15th of Sept. 1701, he made a ſpeech, declaring the reaſons for his return ; and the next day took ſhipping for England, and arrived there about the middle of December. After his return, the bill, which through the ſolicitations of his friends had been poſtponed the laſt Seſſions of Parliament, was wholly laid aſide. T.

PERAXYLUS. This is the name aſſumed by Arnoldus Arlenius in order to expreſs in Greek his country (a). He was a very ſtudious man, a great Grecian, and ſearched with incredible pains for old manuſcripts. Thuanus (b) ſpeaks of him under the year 1561, and declares, that though he could not diſcover the place and day of Arlenius's death, he thought he ought to fix at that time. He obſerves that this learned man had devoted all his ſtudies to the publick good, and that poſterity would always be indebted to him for the edition of Joſephus publiſhed by him in Greek from an excellent manuſcript of Don Diego de Mendoza, Embaſſador of Charles V. at Venice. He adds, that we find there only the books againſt Appion, and that Arlenius leaving Don Diego, when that Nobleman went from Venice, retired to Baſil, and exerciſed his talents there ſome years, and made a good uſe of Henry Stephens's labour. It will be neceſſary to ſee what Mr. Teiſſier ſays [A]. The Tranſlator of Thuanus has rendered that paſſage of him in a negligent manner [B]. I have at laſt diſcovered, that the publick had miſtaken for works already printed, the hopes which Geſner had given with regard to ſome works of Arlenius [C]. I am ſurpriſed that Swertius and Valerius Andreas knew nothing of Peraxylus. He was better known in Italy than in the Low Countries. See in what manner he is applauded by Corradus [D].

(a) A village of Campine, ſituated beyond a little river, which paſſes through Boiſleduc, and is called Déeſe.

(b) Sub fin. lib. 28.

In order to ſhew more clearly how much pains he took in ſearching after manuſcripts, and promoting of polite learning, I ſhall mention what he did with relation to Plato [E]. I might

(1) Teiſſier, Additions aux Eloges tirez de Mr. de Thou, 1. p. 214.

(2) De Poet. ſui temporis, lib. 2.

[A] What Mr. Teiſſier ſays (1.)] He quoting Gyraldus (2), obſerves that Arlenius wrote fine epigrams in Greek and Latin, and that he would have excelled in poetry, if he had not applied himſelf to more ſerious ſtudies. He adds, without citing any authority, that the printed works of Arlenius are the following tranſlations: Dionis Coccæi Romanæ Hiſtoriæ libri duodecim. Olympiodori Philoſophi Platonici & Peripatetici Commentarii ad Ariſtotelis Commentaria. Sermones quidam ex Plutarcho de moribus à nemine antehac verſi. Plurimæ Orationes Chryſoſtomi, Theodoreti, & aliorum S. S. Patrum antea non viſæ. Lycophronis Alexandram ſive Caſſandram, & Iſaaci Tzetzis in eam Commentaria edidit & recognovit.

(3) The Frankfort edition of 1625, ſays Artenius.

[B] The tranſlator of Thuanus, has rendered that paſſage of him in a negligent manner.] He has tranſlated Arnoldus Arlenius (3,) Arnaud (Arnold) de Lens. He ſays, that this Arnaud was called Praxylus, from a name he had aſſumed to himſelf; and that the manuſcript he made uſe of for the edition of Joſephus, belonged to Diego Auſtado Mendoſſe (Mendoza). 1. On what grounds does he pretend, that Arlenius and de Lens are the ſame name? 2. Why does he omit the reaſon for aſſuming the name Peraxylus, which Thuanus had expreſſed? Trans Dieſam amnem qui Silvam ſeu Boſcum-Ducis alluit vico ignobili natus, indeque nomine ingenioſe ab ipſo effecto Peraxylus nuncupatus. 3. Why does he change Peraxylus into Praxyle? 4. Who does he mean by his Diego Auſtado? Why did he not ſay Hurtade? My Readers will pleaſe to take notice, that I don't charge him with any of the errors, which may ariſe from the careleſneſs of the Printers, and that I have not ſeen his tranſlation any where but in Teiſſier's book.

[C] The public had miſtaken for works already printed, the hopes which Geſner had given, with regard to ſome works of Arlenius.] I have conſulted Father Labbe, Dr. Cave, and du Pin, in thoſe places where they give us a catalogue of St. Chryſoſtom's works ; and there met with the names of a great number of Tranſlators, but could never find Arnoldus Arlenius : nor did I meet with it in the Authors who treat of the editions and tranſlations of Dion. This almoſt convinced me, that Arlenius never printed the tranſlations mentioned by Teiſſier. Now in ſearching for the cauſe of this error, I find that it muſt be thrown entirely on Geſner's Epitomizers. He aſſerts in a poſitive manner (4), that Arlenius tranſlated ſome treatiſes on morality from the Greek of Plutarch, which no one, at that time, had tranſlated into Latin ; that he alſo tranſlated 22 books of Dion Cocceius's Roman Hiſtory ; Olympiodorus's Commentaries on Ariſtotle's Meteors (5), and ſome Sermons and Treatiſes of Chryſoſtom, Theodoret, &c. When I go as far back as Geſner, I find that the abovementioned tranſlations had been only expected. Expectamus, ſays he (6), ab Arlenio noſtro, ſi Deus vitam extenderit, quoſdam ex Plutarcho, &c. i. e. " We ex" pect from Arlenius, if God prolongs his life,
" ſome pieces from Plutarch, &c." The Epitomizers of Geſner ſay indeed, that Arlenius tranſlated thoſe books, but they don't ſay that thoſe tranſlations were publiſhed. They only ſay, that he cauſed Lycophron, with Tzetzes's Commentaries, to be printed at Baſil, anno 1545 ; and afterwards Joſephus in the ſame city (7), with a preface, but not accompanied with a tranſlation.

(4) Epit. Bibl. Geſneri, p. m. 80.

(5) We muſt read ad Ariſtotelis meteora, and not ad Ariſtotelis commentaria.

(6) Bibliothecæ, folio, 92 verſo.

(7) Geſner ſays, that Joſephus was publiſhed in 1544.

[D] See in what manner he is applauded by Corradus.] He writes of him as follows (8). Ita quidem (poſtulabantur interpretationes Epiſtolarum Ciceronis) ut Arnoldus Arlenius homo eruditiſſimus ex Germania ad me Regium uſque venerit, & me ſuo, Joannis Opporini, Joannis Strathii, Magni Gruberi, aliorumque doctiſſimorum hominum nomine ſit hortatus, eas ut primo quoque tempore foras darem, i. e. " So that (the notes on " Tully's Epiſtles were deſired) Arnoldus Arlenius,
" a man of profound erudition, came to me from " Germany as far as Reggio, and exhorted me, in " his own name, and thoſe of John Opporinus,
" John Strathius, Magnus Gruberus, and other very " learned men, to publiſh them with all poſſible diſ-
" patch."

(8) In Quæſtura, p. 100. Lugd. Batav. 1667.

[E] I ſhall ſpeak of the great pains he took with Plato.] We have ſeen elſewhere (9), that Simon Grynæus took great pains in preparing a better edition of the works of this Philoſopher. This edition is

(9) In the rem. [B] of the article GRYNÆUS (Simon).

(c) In the rem. [C]. I might have complained (c) of the Abridgers of Geſner for not mentioning his edition of Polybius [F].

is that of Baſil, apud Joannem Valderum 1534. Peraxylus compared it from beginning to end with ſeveral manuſcripts; and by that means corrected above a thouſand conſiderable errors, which conſiſted either of omiſſions, tranſpoſitions, alterations, or ſuperfluous words. His lucubrations were made uſe of, in the edition of Plato's works printed at Baſil, apud Henricum Petri, in 1556, folio, under the direction of Mark Hopper, who beſtowed great elogiums on Peraxylus. Vir ille, ſay he (10), virtutibus & præſtanti doctrina clarus, ARNOLDUS ARLENIUS, ad eruendos, vindicandos, & reſtaurandos bonos autores diis ita volentibus, quaſi natus, nactus .... in Italia quædam manuſcripta Platonis exemplaria, conferre cum iis Vualderianum (cui & Aldinum reſpondebat) cœpit; i. e. "ARNOLDUS ARLENIUS, a man renowned for his "virtue and excellent erudition, and ſent, as it "were, by Providence, to bring forth, and reſtore "valuable Authors; having found .... in Italy, "ſome manuſcript copies of Plato, undertook to col"late them with Valderus's copy, to which that of "Aldus anſwered." Having pointed out ſome of the errors which had been corrected, he adds, that he did not do this to leſſen the fame of thoſe who had publiſhed the former editions; but only to give the more advantageous idea of the new edition, and Peraxylus's merit; Et ut magnum hoc ARLENII noſtri ſtudium, cura, & diligentia innoteſcat, collaudeturque, quam bonis promovendis literis, inque lucem producendis abditis & reconditis authoribus, jam ab annis aliquot multis indefinenter impendit, nullis vel ſumptibus vel laboribus parcens: pro quo ſane viri hujus indefatigabili ſtudio tota literatorum cohors maximas merito gratias agere, & vitam ei longævam ab omnis boni largitore Deo precari debet; i. e. "And to point out and applaud the "great labour, care and diligence, which Arlenius "has beſtowed ſucceſſively, for a great many years, "for the advancement of uſeful literature, and bring"ing to light Authors that had been hid, he "ſparing neither expence or labour on that occaſion; "for which indefatigable toil, all the learned in ge"neral are bound to give him the greateſt thanks; "and to beſeech God, from whom all bleſſings "flow, to indulge him a long life." In fine, he ſpeaks of the manuſcripts which Peraxylus had diſcovered, and which would be of uſe, to give a very fine edition of the antient Commentators of Plato. Idem ille noſter ARLENIUS, pro ardenti ſuo ſtudio & amore quo erga bonas literas, earundemque cultores quaſi flagrat, præter ingentem aliorum plane novorum librorum ſarcinam, etiam aliquot Græcorum commentariorum in noſtrum hunc philoſophum tomos, nobiliores Italiæ bibliothecas ſcrutando nactus eſt, eademque ſocero meo Henricho Petri tradidit; i. e. "The ſame Arlenius, "from his ardent inclination and love, with which "he burns, as it were, for ſound learning, and "thoſe who cultivate it, beſides a great multitude "of other books, quite new, has procured, by "ſearching the fineſt libraries in Italy, ſome vo"lumes of Greek Commentaries made on this Phi"loſopher; and has put them into the hands of "Henry Petri, my father-in-law."

(10) Marcus Hopperus, Epiſt. Dedicat. Oper. Platonis.

[F] His edition of Polybius.] It is that of Baſil, per Johannem Hervagium, 1549, folio. It is greatly preferable to the preceding, which was publiſhed at Haguenau, in 1530, by John Secerius, under the direction of Vincent Obſopæus. The latter contained only the five firſt books of Polybius, with Nicholas Perrot's Latin tranſlation (11). That of Peraxylus contains likewiſe almoſt the ſixth book, and an epitome (12) of the 12 preceding books, copied from the library of Don Diego Hurtado de Mendoza, who had procured it from the library of Janus Moſchus, in the iſland of Corfu (Corcyra) (13). Beſides, it is more correct; for Peraxylus compared the Greek text of the Haguenau edition with ſeveral manuſcripts; and corrected and ſupplied a great many paſſages. Hervagius printed the Greek ſeparately, and afterwards Perrot's Latin verſion, reviſed by Muſculus; and the Latin tranſlation of the epitome of the 12 ſucceeding books, done by the ſame Muſculus.

(11) It was not over againſt, but apart, at the end of the book.

(12) They are rather extracts than an epitome.

(13) See the dedication of Arnoldus Peraxylus Arlenius, (in this order he ranks his names there) to Diego Hurtado de Mendoza, prefixed to his edition of Polybius.

☞ PERCIVAL, an antient and noble family, originally called to Parliament in Ireland, as Baron Percival, by Writ of Summons the 13th of Edward I. created Baronet 1660; Baron Percival of Burton, and Baron Percival 15th of March 1714-5; Viſcount Percival of Kanturck, December 1722; and Earl of Egmont in July 1733. We ſhall give ſome account of this family in Note [A]. The Arms of the Earl of Egmont are quarterly;

[A] We ſhall give ſome account of this family in the note.] The name of it is, in all probability, derived originally from that of Percie, which flouriſhed ſo long under the title of Northumberland, in England. It is conjectured, that the laſt ſyllables of this name was added to the other, on account of the ſcite of the poſſeſſion of a branch of that houſe; the termination val ſignifying, in old French, a valley. This ſuggeſtion ariſes, not only from the agreement of the names, but the ſimilitude of the arms of both houſes. Thoſe of the family of Percie, antiently here in England, and ſtill in Normandy, being Sable a Chief indented Or, as thoſe of Percival are Argent a Chief indented Gules, which were charged with three croſs Patees of the firſt, upon the expedition of Sir Richard Percival to the Holy War, in the ſame manner as the ſame Croſſes were added upon the like occaſions to the arms of Berkeley, and many other families. Sir Thomas St. George affirms, the family of Percival to have been eminent in rank in Normandy 200 years before the Conqueſt; which carries it up as far as the invaſion of that country by Rollo the Dane, firſt Duke of that Province. But it is indubitably and lineally traced for ſeven centuries, and diſtinguiſhed by a deſcent in blood through different channels, of the earlieſt and greateſt families of the old Nobility, from moſt of the Sovereign Houſes ſubſiſting now in Europe, deriving itſelf in this manner no leſs than ſeven times from Gundred and Adelheid, two daughters of William the Conqueror, twice from King Henry I. the only ſon of that Prince, who left legitimate iſſue, and thrice from Joan of Acres, daughter to King Edward I. It may boaſt alſo of a reiterated deſcent from Henry I. King of France, grandſon of Hugh Capet, Founder of the line now reigning in that Kingdom, and through theſe from the Imperial Houſe of Charlemagne, from Eva, daughter of Mac Morough, King of Leinſter in Ireland, from Leoline, Prince of Wales, and from Malcolm Canmore, King of Scotland, by his wife Margaret, the ſiſter of Edgar Athelin, ſole heireſs of the Saxon line in England. This great deſcent is fully proved by the moſt authentic and inconteſtable authorities; but the only branch, that now remains of this family, is that of the Earl of Egmont, the elder and principal Houſes being long ſince extinguiſhed (1). It appears evidently from record, that there were two families (2), which came into England with William the Conqueror in 1066, to whom the name of Percival was common. One of theſe continued long; of very great conſideration among the Barons of the early times, under the title of Somery; and the other has flouriſhed ſtill more, and continued longer under the different names of Percival and Lovell; from whom deſcended the Earls of Yvery in Normandy, the Barons Lovell of Caſtle-Kary in the County of Somerſet; the Barons Lovell of Tichmarſh and Minſter-Lovell, afterwards advanced to the higher honour of a Viſcount by Richard III. the Baron Morley, a younger brother of the Houſe of Tichmarſh, ſo honoured by his marriage with the Heireſs of Morley in the Reign of Henry VII. the Percivals Barons of Ireland in the Reigns of Edward I. and II. the preſent family of the

(1) A brief account of the family of PERCIVAL, communicated by the Right Honourable John Lord Viſcount Percival.

(2) Battle Abbey-Roll, in Hollenſhead.

quarterly ; 1ſt and 4th Percival Argent, on a Chief indented Gules, 3 Croſs Patees of the 1ſt being the Arms aſſumed by Sir Richard Percival in the Holy War ; 2d and 3d antient Percival and Lovel Or, crueile of Croſs Croſlets, a Lyon rampant Azure, being the the Earls of Egmont; and all the other houſes of any note now exiſting of the ſame name in theſe Kingdoms (3).

(3) Brief Account, ubi ſupra.

The firſt anceſtor of this family, concerning whom we have any poſitive teſtimony, was Robert Lord of Breherval in Normandy, who lived before the Conqueſt, and held the Caſtle of Yvery in that Dutchy by the ſervice of three Knight's fees (4), of William de Bellmonte, Earl of Breteuil, Pacy, Conſtantin, and Yvery. This Robert left three ſons, Aſcelin, Gouel, and William. Aſcelin the eldeſt ſucceeded his father, and is ſometimes called Aſcelin Gouel, and Gouel de Percheval. He came over in the army of the Conqueror, an Officer of great Rank, being rewarded with many large Manors in England, particularly thoſe of Caſtle-Kary, Weſton Gordein, Stawell, &c. in the County of Somerſet. He married Iſabella, natural daughter of the Earl of Breteuil, who, in default of legitimate iſſue, became Heireſs in part of her father; and Aſcelin Gouel de Percheval was eſtabliſhed in the Earldom of Yvery by Henry I. King of England, in the year 1119, ſoon after which he died. From his marriage with Iſabella the 24th deſcent, and in the direct male is John the preſent Earl of Egmont. Aſcelin left ſeven ſons, and a daughter married to Radulfus Rufus; but as to the ſons, we have recovered only the names of three, Robert, William, and Roger. Robert dying without iſſue was ſucceeded by his brother William, who married Elizabeth ſiſter to Waleran Earl of Mellent in Normandy, and to the Earl of Leiceſter in England; by whom he had five ſons, Waleran, Ralph, Henry, William, and Richard. Waleran died without iſſue. From Ralph deſcended the Barons of Caſtle-Kary; as the Barons of Tichmarſh and Minſter-Lovell did from William. Richard, the fourth ſon, retaining the name of Percival, delivered it down to his deſcendants. He went a Commander to the Holy War in 1190 with King Richard I. and left three ſons, Robert, Richard, and Hamelin. Robert dying without iſſue was ſucceeded by his younger brother Sir Richard Percival, ſecond of that name, who was a Knight with his Father in the Holy War, and left three ſons, Robert, Hugh, and John. Robert the eldeſt going over to Ireland in 1265, became a Baron of that Kingdom; but that title was extinguiſhed in his grandſon Thomas, who died without iſſue. Hugh, the ſecond ſon of Sir Richard Percival, dying without iſſue, was ſucceeded by his youngeſt brother John; who left three ſons, John, Roger, and Aſcelin. Sir Roger the eldeſt married Joan de Breteſche, Daughter of Sir John de Breteſche, deſcended from the antient Counts of Guiſnes in Flanders, from whom likewiſe ſprung the Veres, Earls of Oxford in England, and the Dukes of Bournonville in France. Sir Roger Percival, dying about the year 1297, left two ſons, John and Richard, who was a Prieſt. Sir John, ſecond of that name, left two ſons, John and Walter; the elder of whom dying without iſſue was ſucceeded by his brother. Sir Walter dying in 1348 left two ſons, John and Ralph; the latter of whom ſucceeded his elder brother in the eſtate, and dying in 1384 left two ſons, Ralph and John. Ralph (the ſecond of that name) dying about the year 1412 left two ſons, Richard and Walter. Richard the third of that name dying about the middle of the reign of Henry VI. left two ſons, Ralph and Thomas. Ralph (the third of that name) dying April the 8th 1477, left three ſons, Richard, John, and Ralph, and a Daughter Joan. Ralph his third ſon left a ſon Thomas, who was ſucceeded by his ſon David, who dying in 1534, left a daughter named Blaſſe, and three ſons, James, George, and Thomas. James the eldeſt dying without iſſue, was ſucceeded by his next brother George, who married Elizabeth, daughter of Edward Bamfyld, Eſq; by whom he had a daughter and three ſons, Richard Bamfyld, and Thomas, of whom the two youngeſt died without iſſue. Richard the eldeſt having been guilty of many extravagancies, and married contrary to the approbation of his father, and being abandoned by him, travelled into Spain, where he ſtaid ſeveral years, and acquired a thorough knowledge of the Spaniſh tongue. Returning home he found his father ſtill in the ſame reſolution, and abſolutely determined not in the leaſt to contribute to his ſupport. This obliged him to apply to the Lord Burghley, who took him into his own houſe, where he employed him in the moſt ſecret tranſactions of State. Not long after, in 1586, the Spaniards making vaſt preparations for that great Armada, with which they two years afterwards invaded England, the world being ignorant upon what quarter the ſtorm would fall; a pacquet of letters in cypher was thrown overboard by a Spaniſh veſſel, and recovered by an Engliſh ſhip, which gave her chace. The letters were brought to the Lord Burghley, and laid by him before the Queen and Council, and no one there being able to decypher them, this Lord Burghley recommended Richard Perctval, as the only proper perſon he knew, both on account of his fidelity, which he had experienced, and his knowledge of the Spaniſh tongue, which he had learned abroad. To which the Queen agreeing, he was immediately ſent for, and the pacquet put into his hands by the Queen herſelf. The next morning he returned it to the Council, and preſented the letters decyphered and fairly tranſcribed in Latin, Spaniſh, and Engliſh. This was the firſt certain intelligence of the real intention of the Spaniards, which was afterwards more fully explained by a letter written to the Pope by the King of Spain, of which Sir Francis Walſingham obtained a copy out of the Pope's cloſet, by means of a Prieſt his Spy. The importance of this diſcovery was ſuch, and the expedition of the perſon employed in it ſo grateful to the Queen, that ſhe inſtantly ordered him a penſion of 800 Marks a year, which he enjoyed all his life after, and ſoon rewarded him farther with a place in the Duchy-Court of Lancaſter, worth 400 l. per ann. more. Sir Robert Cecil, ſecond ſon to the Lord Burghley, afterwards Earl of Saliſbury, being made Maſter of the Court of Wards, he was appointed by him Secretary of that Court, a place worth above 2000 l. per. ann. After which he was made Remembrancer of the ſame, and one of the Commiſſioners for executing the office of Receiver General; beſides which he obtained a great number of grants of wardſhips and leaſes of eſtates in ward to a great value. At this time his father obſerving the great advancement of his fortunes, took him into his favour again; and dying ſoon after left him his eſtate. Upon the death of the Earl of Saliſbury in 1612, he loſt all his employments; but upon the ſettlement of the Court of Wards in Ireland ſoon after, he was made Regiſter of that Court, and ſettled in that Kingdom. He died September 4, 1620, in the 69th year of his age, and by his ſecond wife Alice, Daughter of John Sherman, Eſq; left two Sons, Walter and Philip. Walter dying without iſſue in 1624, was ſucceeded by his brother Philip. This Sir Philip was Regiſter of the Court of Wards in Ireland, Chief Prothonotary of the Common Pleas, Keeper of the Records, Clerk of the Crown, Eſcheator of Munſter, Cuſtomer of Dublin, and General Feodary of Ireland. He held alſo ſeveral other employments of great profit, and grants of Wardſhips to an immenſe value; beſides which in the year 1641, when the Rebellion broke out in Ireland, he was poſſeſſed of an eſtate in land of 62000 acres, the Rent-Roll of which was 4000 l. per. ann. excluſive of his eſtate in England, which ſtill was conſiderable. Going over to England in 1642, he was appointed by the Parliament Commiſſary General of the Army; and upon his return into that Kingdom, Commiſſary General of the Victuals, and Provider General of the Horſe, having alſo a Command in the Army at the ſame time conferred upon him. He was a Member of the Long Parliament for the Borough of Newport in Cornwall; and died November 10, 1647, in the 48th year of his age. He married Catharine, Grand-daughter to Sir William Uſher, Knight,

(4) Script. Norm. per Du Cheſne, Feoda Norm.

the Arms of Aſcelin Gouel de Percival, Earl of Yvery in Normandy, and of the Barons Lovel of Kary in the County of Somerſet, the elder Branch of this Family.

Knight, by whom he had four ſons, John, Arthur, George, and Richard, of whom Arthur and Richard died young; and four daughters. The eldeſt ſon Sir John went over with Henry Cromwell to Ireland, where he recovered his eſtate; and was perfectly well acquainted with the intereſt of that Kingdom, and very ſerviceable to the Proteſtant intereſt in time of Oliver Cromwell. At the Reſtoration he was ſworn of the Privy Council of Ireland, and created a Baronet, and in 1662 choſen Knight of the Shire for the county of Cork; and the whole buſineſs of the Act of Settlement in Ireland, under which all the eſtates of that Kingdom are now held, was in a manner committed to him and the Lord Broghill, afterwards Earl of Orrery. May 26, 1664, he was appointed one of the Council of Trade; and in 1665 created by Act of Parliament Regiſter of the Court of Claims. He died November 1, 1665, in the 36th year of his age, and left iſſue by his wife Catharine, ſiſter of Sir Robert Southwell in the County of Glouceſter, Knight, four ſons, Philip, Robert, John, and Charles, and two Daughters, Catharine married to Sir William Moor in the County of Cork, Bart. and Helena to Daniel Deering, Eſq; ſon to Sir Edw. Deering of Surrenden in Kent, Bart. Of the ſons Charles the youngeſt died an infant; Robert the ſecond was murdered young; Philip the eldeſt ſucceeded his father; but dying Sept. the 11th, 1680, without iſſue, was ſucceeded by his brother Sir John Percival, who died April the 29th, 1686, in the 26th year of his age. He married Catharine, daughter of Sir Edward Deering, of Surrenden in Kent, Bart. by whom he had three ſons, Edward, John, and Philip; and two daughters, Elizabeth and Mary, both of whom died infants. Of the ſons, Sir Edward, the eldeſt, though but ſix years, was treated with great rigour by the Popiſh faction in Ireland; for at the revolution in 1688, notwithſtanding his youth, and the impoſſibility of his having done any thing to incur the juſt diſpleaſure of any Government, he was outlawed, and his eſtate (as far as it could be forfeited, being ſettled upon his other brother) confiſcated during his life to the Crown. But he recovered it upon the acceſſion of King William and Queen Mary, having ſuffered above 40000 l. by that revolution. He dying November the 9th, 1691, was ſucceeded by his next brother John, now Earl of Egmont, who in the reign of Queen Anne, was twice Knight of the ſhire for the county of Cork in Ireland, and one of the Members of the Privy Council; in which poſt he was continued by King George I. who upon his acceſſion to the throne, in 1714, created him Baron Percival of Burton, in the county of Cork; and in 1727, Viſcount Percival, of Kanturk, in the ſame county. Upon the acceſſion of King George II. he was ſtill continued a Member of the Privy Council; and being a Member of Parliament for the Borough of Harwich in Eſſex, was appointed Recorder of the ſame Borough. In 1733, he was created Earl of Egmont, an old ſeat of this family, in the county of Cork. He married Catharine, ſiſter to Sir Philip Parker, of Arwarton, in the county of Suffolk, Bart. by whom he had three ſons and four daughters, John, Philip, and George, and Catharine, Mary, Mary and Helena; of whom John the eldeſt, and Catharine and Helena, are now living; the reſt died infants. Of the daughters, the Lady Catharine married Thomas Hanmer, of Fenns, in the county of Flint, heir to Sir Thomas Hanmer, Bart. but he dying without iſſue, April the 1ſt, 1737, ſhe is now a widow. The Lady Helena is yet unmarried. John, now Lord Viſcount Percival, the only ſurviving ſon, is Member of Parliament for the Borough of Dingle in Ireland; and upon the 15th of February, 1737, married the Lady Catharine Cecil, ſecond daughter of James, late Earl of Saliſbury, by whom he has one ſon, named John-James, from his two godfathers, the Earls of Egmont and Saliſbury. H.

PEREIRA (GOMEZIUS), a Spaniſh Phyſician, lived in the 16th Century. He valued himſelf upon a ſpirit of contradiction, for he affected to attack the beſt eſtabliſhed Doctrines, and maintain Paradoxes. He was highly delighted with the liberty of Philoſophizing; he made a full uſe of it, and even carried it to an extreme. The Materia prima, with which Ariſtotle's followers made ſo much noiſe, was one of the monſters which he propoſed to deſtroy [A]. What he ſubſtituted in the room of this matter was not at all better than what he baniſhed (a). He treated Galen very ſeverely with regard to the Doctrine of Fevers. But what was moſt aſtoniſhing in his Paradoxes was, that he taught that beaſts are machines, and rejected the ſenſitive Soul aſcribed to them. The Reader may

(a) See rem. [A].

[A] The materia prima . . . was one of the monſters he propoſed to deſtroy.] Arriaga, one of the moſt ſubtle Schoolmen of the 17th century, informs us of the objections that were made to our Pereira on that ſubject, and the weakneſs of ſome of his objections. Recentiores nonnulli referunt quendam Gomeſium Pereiram in ſua Antoniana Margarita, negantem omnino materiam primam: contra quem plura congerunt argumenta, quæ oportet examinare, ne rem certam incertis ſuadeamus rationibus (1). . . . Hæc argumenta non urgent Gomeſium (2); i. e. "It is affirmed by ſome Moderns, "that Gomez Pereira, in his Antoniana Margarita, "quite denies the materia prima: a great number of "arguments are produced againſt him, which it will "be neceſſary for us to examine, leſt we ſhould "ground a certainty upon uncertain reaſons or ar"guments. . . . But Gomez is no ways perplexed "with thoſe reaſons." It was objected to him, among other particulars, that if his doctrine was true, it would not be lawful to venerate the bones or relicks of Saints; for, after their death, there would not remain any matter which had belonged to them. This is one of the five objections, which he might have reſolved very eaſily, if Arriaga may be credited, who obſerved that this Philoſopher's doctrine or opinion was not underſtood (3). Hence he thinks it incumbent on him, to give a faithful account of it, and he afterwards oppoſes it with ſome other arguments. Pereira, ſays he, was not ſo wrong-headed, as to aſſert that forms are not received in a ſubject, and that man was compoſed only of a ſoul. He only ſaid, that the ſubject, to which ſouls and other ſubſtantial forms are united, is compoſed of the four elements, and not a materia prima; and he aſcribed the ſame ſimplicity to the elements, which is aſcribed to the materia prima in the ſchool of Ariſtotle. Fatetur hic Author libentiſſimè, in homine (& idem eſt de aliis mixtis) ultra formam ſubſtantialem dari aliquod ſubjectum recipiens illam formam: neque enim tam amens erat hic Author, ut in homine & animantibus nihil aliud præter animam agnoſceret, & poſt mortem illius nihil remanere doceret quod eſſet veneratione dignum in Sanctis, & in quo manerent plura accidentia, quæ prius fuerant in homine vivo, putaretque cadavera nihil eſſe reale, ſed apparens & deludens ſenſus noſtros, vel ſaltem nihil illorum antea fuiſſe, quo ſatisfacit ferè omnibus argumentis in oppoſitum. Verum in hoc recedit hic Author à vera & recepta ſententia, quod illud commune ſubjectum non dicit eſſe materiam primam, ſed ex quatuor elementis unitis, & inter ſe permixtis putat coaleſcere. Elementa autem ipſa omnino adſtruit ſimplicia, ſicut nos materiam primam vel formam ſubſtantialem dicimus eſſentialiter ſimplicem (4). According to Arriaga, the third of the five objections was pretty ſtrong againſt this doctrine of Pereira; for it proved, that one of the elements produced from another was a thing made naturally out of nothing. Pereira was not much perplexed with this; he aſſerting, that ſome creatures have the power of creating, which opinion of his Arriaga approved (5).

(1) Rod. de Arriaga, Diſputat. 2. Phyſica, ſect. 1. p. m. 217.

(2) Ibid. p. 218.

(3) Hæc argumenta non urgent Gomeſium, multo aliter opinantem de entibus naturalibus quam iſti Authores cenſeant. Ibid.

(4) Rod. de Arriaga, Diſputat. 2. Phyſica, ſect. 1. p. m. 218.

(5) Reſpondet Gomeſius falſum eſſe nullam creaturam poſſe creare, nec facile hanc ſolutionem redargues ut infra patebit. Idem, ibid.

may ſee all theſe particulars in a book entitled by him Antoniana Margarita [B]. It is pretended that Mr. Des Cartes ſtole from him the paradox concerning the ſoul of brutes, and that Pereira was not the inventor of it. It is proper to ſee what is found on this ſubject in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres [C]; and I muſt not omit taking notice, that

[B] The book entitled by him, Antoniana Margarita.] He alludes, in this title, to his father's and mother's name. Don Nicholas Antonio ſpeaks as follows of the work in queſtion. Antoniana Margarita, opus Phyſicis, Medicis, ac Theologis utile & neceſſarium, Medinæ Campi 1554, folio. Francofurti deinde 1610. . . Item, novæ veteriſque Medicinæ experimentis & evidentibus rationibus comprobatæ primam partem, ſive Antonianæ Margaritæ ſecundam, quæ quidem Medica eſt poſt priorem illam Philoſophicam. Hæc ſcilicet pars de Febribus tractat, cujus febris eſſentiam, cauſas, & ſpecies eſſe uſque in hæc tempora ignota dilucide (uti Author ipſe ait) demonſtrat, Galenumque non dolo ſed ignorantia extæcatum potiſſimum ſuis de hac re ſcriptis medicis poſteris impoſuiſſe evidenter docet (6); i. e. "Antoniana "Margarita, a work uſeful and neceſſary to Naturaliſts, Phyſicians and Divines, was printed at Medina del Campo, anno 1554, in folio, and afterwards at Frankfort, anno 1610. . . . Likewiſe "the firſt part of Phyſic antient and modern, proved "by experiments and manifeſt arguments, or the "ſecond part of Antoniana Margarita, which indeed relates to Phyſic, as the firſt does to Philoſophy. For this part treats of fevers, whoſe nature, "cauſes and kinds he evidently ſhews, (as this Author "himſelf ſays) to have been quite unknown hitherto; "and ſhews plainly, that Galen impoſed, not through "fraud, but ignorance, on poſterity, in his compoſitions on this ſubject." An anonymous Author wrote againſt him, in Spaniſh, anno 1556 (7). The Antoniana Margarita is grown a very ſcarce book. It was in Mr. Briot's library, which was ſold at Paris in 1679, where Mr. Faure bought it for two Louis d'ors, who ſhewing it me, ſaid, that he did not think he ſhould have purchaſed it ſo cheap. I believe that this book, and Mr. Faure's whole library, is now in the Archbiſhop of Rheims's library.

(6) Nicol. Antonius, Bibloth. Scriptor. Hiſpaniæ, Tom. 1. p. 414.

(7) Adverſus hanc ſcripſit Anonymus Hiſpanum opuſculum ita nuncupatum, Endecalogo contra Antoniana Margarita, Medinæ Campi 1556. 8. Id. ib.

I find in the Bibliotheque of Writers who were Phyſicians (8), that our Pereira's name was George Gomez; and that his Antoniana Margarita, in qua omnium pene morborum diſcurſus proponuntur, (in which moſt diſeaſes are treated of) was printed at Medina (9), by Anthony Graſbeet, anno 1554 and 1587; and that he publiſhed, in the ſame city, anno 1558, another folio work, entitled, Nova veraque Medicina Chriſtiana ratione comprobata. Konig has publiſhed ſome conſiderable errors concerning this Author. Bruta, ſays he (10), ſenſu prædita eſſe opere operoſo & 30 annis elaborato, cui titulus Antoniana Margarita, oſtendere conatus eſt; i. e. "He endeavoured to prove, "in a book entitled Antoniana Margarita, the "compoſing of which coſt him 30 years of prodigious pains, that brutes have ſenſitive ſouls."

(8) Lindenius renovatus, p. 328.

(9) Methymnæ Duelli. Ibid.

(10) Konig, Bibliotb. vetus & nova, p. 619.

Every one that peruſes this, will not gueſs that the particle non (not) was omitted after prædita (endued); and thoſe who do not perceive this, will look upon it as a riddle, or laugh at it. Such might look upon Pereira as the moſt crazy wretch living, ſince he was ſo ſilly as to torment himſelf for thirty years together, to prove that brutes have a ſenſitive ſoul. Thoſe who gueſs the omiſſion, will not avoid falling into error, but will be apt to believe, that the only deſign or aim of this Spaniſh Phyſician, in this work of thirty years, was to prove that brutes have no ſenſation: but this is only a ſmall part of the work in queſtion. Ex eo, continues Konig, omnia Carteſium hauſiſſe quæ de brutorum anima commentatus eſt, Olaus Borrichius in Epiſtola quadam aff. i. e. "Olaus "Borrichius aſſerts, in a certain letter, that Des "Cartes copied from that work, all he writ relating "to the ſouls of brutes." This alſo is a falſity. We ſhall ſoon ſee that Des Cartes did not believe brutes had ſouls, before he ever heard that there was ſuch a man as Pereira. At leaſt it is certain, that our Spaniard's work could ſuggeſt only this thought, in general, to Des Cartes, of rejecting a belief with regard to the ſenſation of brutes. Every thing beſides is peculiar to the French Philoſopher, and does not reſult either from the hypotheſes or explications of Pereira. Nicholas Antonio has not ſpoke of the anſwer to the objections of Palacios, publiſhed by Pereira in 1555.

[C] What is found on this ſubject, in the Nouvelles de la republique des Lettres.] "The moſt cunning "perſons would have laid a wager, that no man "could ever have been ſo ſtupid as to maintain "the contrary (11). And yet there was one in the "laſt century, who dared to maintain this paradox, "in a country where no one could poſſibly have ſuſpected that ſo new a doctrine would have taken "birth. The Reader will ſoon know my meaning, "if I only add, that it was a Spaniſh Phyſician who "publiſhed this doctrine at Medina del Campo, in "1554, in a work, the compoſing of which took "him up thirty years, and which he entitled Antoniana Margarita, in honour of the names of his "father and mother. Who could ever have thought "that Spain, where the freedom of the mind is leſs "tolerated, than that of the body in Turky, ſhould "give birth to a Philoſopher, who would be ſo raſh "as to advance, that animals have no ſenſation? "This is ſo extraordinary a circumſtance, that it "juſtly deſerved to be mentioned in this place; and "it would not be juſt to omit the name of this able "man, who firſt advanced (at leaſt that we know of) "this unheard of paradox. His name was Gomez Pereira, and he lived in the laſt century, and not in "the twelfth, as was ſaid by Abbot de Gerard, a "Doctor of Divinity, in his Conferences on the Philoſophy of Courtiers. This Gomez Pereira was ſtrongly attacked by Michael de Palacios, a Divine of Salamanca; and anſwered him as vigorouſly, without once receding from what he had advanced, "that brutes are mere machines. However, he had "no followers, ſo that his doctrine died with him. "People did not honour him ſo far as to dread him; "ſo that he was ſcarce more known to our age, "than if he had never been born; and it is very "probable that Des Cartes, who did not read much, "had never heard of him. Some nevertheleſs "think, that he borrowed from this Spaniſh Phyſician, the opinion he entertained, with regard to "brutes; for, by ſuch an aſſertion, they think to "deprive him of the glory of the invention, which "is ſo much conqueſt gained over him (12). Some time after, there was publiſhed in the abovementioned Nouvelles de la Republique, &c. an extract of a letter, which the Author had received from Paris; and which contained, among other particulars, the following words: It is not true, as you aſſert, in page 23, that the opinion of Des Cartes, with regard to the ſoul of brutes, was ſtarted but in this age; for there were diſputes of this antiently, as appears from the following paſſage of St. Auſtin, de quantitate animæ, chap. 30. Quod autem tibi viſum eſt non eſſe animam in corpore viventis animantis, quamquam videatur abſurdum, non tamen doctiſſimi homines quibus id placuit DEFUERUNT, neque nunc arbitror DEESSE (13); i. e. "With regard to your opinion, "that the body of a living brute is not informed "with a ſoul; though it may be thought abſurd, "nevertheleſs, ſome very learned men have been of "that opinion, and, I believe, there are ſome at "this time." The Author received another letter, which informed him that this opinion of Des Cartes was much older than St. Auſtin. This letter was writ by Mr. du Rondel, and the extract from it was publiſhed in the Nouvelles, &c. for October 1684. I will copy it here; and, for my Readers ſatisfaction, will ſet down in the margin, the books in which the authorities quoted may be found (14). "It was not only in St. Auſtin's time, that men "doubted with regard to the ſouls of brutes; but "alſo under the Cæſars, that is above three hundred "years before that Father of the Church was born. "The Stoicks uſed to ſpeak of nothing elſe, ſo far "as to aſſert in their ſchools, that there is only a reſemblance between our actions and thoſe of brutes; "and that there is a nature in men and brutes which "differ abſolutely one from the other. My Reader "muſt

(11) i. e. That beaſts have no ſenſation.

(12) Nouv. de la Republ. des Lettres, for March 1684, article 2. p. 20 & ſeq. Furetier, in all probability, had copied from hence, all that we find in page 27, of the Furetieriana, Bruſſels edit. Read there, Antoniana for Antonima.

(13) Nouv. de la Republ. des Lettres, for Auguſt 1684, article 1, p. 555, 556.

(14) Ibid. for October 1684, article 11, p. 838 & ſeq.

that a falſity is affirmed there with regard to the date of this opinion of Mr. Des Cartes.

" muſt not ſuppoſe that they ſaid this only of certain " actions, of which we have little or no ſenſation, " ſuch as digeſtion, ſanguification, conception, &c. " but they alſo underſtood it of the ſtrongeſt, the " moſt vehement, and the moſt ſenſible paſſions. A " Lion, according to them, was not angry, though " he tore to pieces whatever came in his way in the " amphitheatre. Theſe ſaid that his blood ferment- " ed and boiled in him, it being inflamed, un- " luckily or otherwiſe, by certain objects which " were repugnant to the nature of that animal. Im- " petus habent feræ, rabiem, feritatem, incurſum; iram (15) Seneca, lib. 1. de Ira, cap. 3. " quidem non magis quàm luxuriam (15). i. e. Savage " beaſts have violence, rage, fierceneſs, and will " attack; but then he cannot ſay that they are more " ſuſceptible of anger than of luxury. If you aſk " the cauſe of this; it is, Sir, becauſe a Lion whom " Seneca ſaw, happened to ſave the life of a crimi- " nal, without pretending that he ſhould be obliged " to him for it, nor from any propenſion to do a " good action: Quia nec voluit facere, nec bene faci- (16) Idem, de Benef. lib. 2. cap. 19. " endi animo fecit (16). Beſides, if brutes had been " ſuſceptible of anger, they alſo would have been " ſuſceptible of forgiveneſs. Now as clemency is an " effect of reaſon, and as brutes are uninformed " with it, theſe Stoicks concluded that brutes are not " ſuſceptible of anger nor of any other paſſion. " Iraſci non magis ſciunt quàm ignoſcere; & quamvis " rationi inimica ſit ira, nuſquam tamen naſcitur, niſi " ubi rationi locus eſt. Tota ferarum ut extra, ita in- " tra, forma humanæ diſſimilis eſt (17). i. e. They are (17) Idem, de Ira, lib. 1. cap. 3. " as incapable of being angry as of pardoning; " and though anger be an enemy, or repugnant to " reaſon, yet it is never found but where there is " room for reaſon. The whole exterior as well as " interior of brutes is unlike the human form. But, " Sir, a Cynick ſaid this above three hundred years " before the Stoicks of Rome. He believed and " taught in expreſs words, that brutes are not endued " with ſenſation nor knowledge. Is it not pity " that Pereira did not know all this? He would " have made great uſe of it againſt thoſe, who ac- " cuſed him of publiſhing a ſtrange novelty, and " would have laughed at the great erudition of his " antagoniſts. Here follow the words of the Cy- " nic in queſtion: διὰ δὲ τὸ, he ſpeaks of brutes, τὰ " μὲν ψυκτότητι, τὰ δὲ πλεοναςμῷ τῆς ὑγρασίας μηδὲ " διανοεῖσθαι μητὲ αἰσθάνεσθαι (18), That they cannot (18) Plut. de Placit. Philoſ. lib. 5. cap. 19. p. m. 909. " be ſuſceptible of knowledge or ſenſation, becauſe of the " groſſneſs of their conſtitution, and their too great abun- " dance of moiſture. But I do not pretend to warrant " this reaſoning of Diogenes." In the Nouvelles de la Republique for April 1685, is a recantation of the firſt extract. Peruſe what follows. The perſon who had obſerved to us, that St. Auſtin declares that, in his time it was aſſerted that brutes have no ſouls, has lately wrote to us, that having conſulted the 30*th book* De Quantitate Animæ, where he was told this was ſaid, he found nothing in it that bears the leaſt relation to Gomez Pereyra. So that my obſervation is true ſtill, in this reſpect, viz. that no one, before Gomez Pereyra, had taught that brutes are machines. All that remains would be to enquire, whether the paſſages of Mr. du Rondel, quoted in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres for October, prove what he pretends (19). Theſe (19) Nouv. de la Repubi. des Lettres, for April 1685, p. 435. latter expreſſions obliged Mr. du Rondel to collect ſeveral proofs. He intended to communicate them to me, but they were miſlaid, ſo that he could only recover what follows of them.

(20) Mr. du Rondel, in a little piece with which he was pleaſed to favour me in March 1696. I added the marginal quotations.

(20) " It is certain that Diogenes could not be- " lieve that brutes were informed with ſouls, ac- " cording to the principles of his phyſicks, and to " the end of his morality. There are, according to " him, Beings and half Beings. The former are " what they are by their own eſſence; and the latter " can be ranked with the former, either by partici- " pation or imitation, as the Cynicks ſpeak. The " ſecond was of two kinds. Some imitate the mind, " and incline to a circular motion; whilſt others " imitate the ſoul, and move in a ſtrait line: τὰ μὲν " Νοῦν μιμεῖται κ) κύκλῳ κινεῖται, τὰ δὲ ψυχὴν ἐπ' εὐ- " θείας. By the expreſſion circular motion, you will " preſently gueſs that he muſt mean the cœleſtial " Orbs. It is ſo, but eſpecially the milky way, to " which the Cynicks, as well as other Philoſophers, " aſcribed the origin of the paſſions, ἀφ' οὗ τὸ παθητὸν " ἴρχισθαι σῶμα. But, according to the manner " in which the antients deſcribed the deſcent of ſouls " thro' thoſe circles, it was impoſſible that brutes could " be ſuſceptible of any true paſſions. For a ſoul, " paſſing through the ſphere of Jupiter, imbibed " ambition; and in like manner it imbibed indo- " lence in that of Saturn, haughtineſs in that of " Mars, a thirſt of gain in that of Mercury, &c. " (21) .... So that, as we do not obſerve the like (21) See Macrobius, in Somnium Scipionis, lib. 1. cap. 12. " paſſions in brutes, at leaſt in the ſame manner as " we obſerve them in men, they neceſſarily muſt not " have been informed with ſouls (the uſual ſeat of the " paſſions) or that their paſſions were fictitious or " counterfeit, or ſomething like thoſe of men, by " a fortuitous imitation. For this reaſon the Cy- " nicks ranked brutes among ſuch bodies as moved " in a direct line, that is, among ſuch heavy bodies " as tend towards the center. And indeed the na- " ture of brutes is always the ſame, and ever keeps its " uſual determination. There is not the leaſt diffe- " rence or variety in their employments. They are " all condemned to the ſame rule; and their capa- " city extends little farther than to lodge and feed " themſelves. For this reaſon it was ſaid of them, " that all their inclinations were groveling, heavy, " and baſe; and that nature had formed them pur- " poſely to bend towards the earth. Prona ſunt, & " ex ipſa quoque ſuſpiciendi difficultate à ſuperis receſſe- " runt, nec ullam divinorum corporum ſimilitudinem ali- " qua ſui parte meruerunt, nihil ex mente ſortita ſunt, " & ideò ratione caruerunt, duo quoque tantum adepta " ſunt, ſentire vel creſcere, ſays Macrobius (22), with (22) Idem, ibid. cap. 14. p. m. 55. " the following reſtriction of Virgil,

" Quantum non noxia corpora tardant,
" Terrenique habetant artus——

" (becauſe that adds he) in animalibus hebeſcit uſus ani- " mæ DENSITATE corporis, which ſeems to be tranſ- " lated from Diogenes, who ſays that animals are not " capable of ſenſation or knowledge, becauſe of the DEN- " SITY and abundance of their moiſture. See Plutarch, " Lib. V. Chap. XX. Macrobius, I ſay, ſeems to " have tranſlated Diogenes; and this may be reaſo- " nably ſuppoſed, becauſe he employs the ſame " word: but I am not very ſure whether Virgil, " with his noxia corpora (23), had in view what Dio- (23) Virgil. Æn. lib. 6. ver. 731. " genes ſays afterwards, that brutes are like madmen " deprived of reaſon: διακεῖσθαι τοῖς μεμηνόσι, παρεπ- " ταικότως τοῦ ἡγεμονικοῦ: for though noxia implies " hurt and loſs, nevertheleſs μεμηνόσι ſeems to ſig- " nify more: and therefore a Cynic Commentator, " to make us fully conceive this, explains it by the " image of perſons poſſeſſed with the devil. He " affirms that, when ſouls quit bodies and ſearch for " another habitation, if they meet only with bodies " in which reaſon never reſided, the ſouls follow and " haraſs them, and never animate them, as they do " organized bodies deſigned for their reſidence, ὥσπερ " οἱ τιλησκότες ἡμᾶς Δαίμονες. . . Theſe, you will ſay, " are Platonic ideas, which don't agree very well " with our notion of the doctrine of the Cynicks. " This is not my fault. It is Saluſt the Cynic ſays " this; and beſides, Diogenes was not ſo averſe to " the Platonick principles as is naturally imagined. " One Tiberianus tells us in his Socrates, that Dio- " genes had ſeized on the whole philoſophical patri- " mony of Plato: Memores Platonis ſententiæ, cujus " hæreditatem Diogenes Cynicus invadens, nihil ibi " plus * aureâ linguâ invenit. i. e. Calling to mind " the ſaying of Plato, whoſe patrimony being ſeized " by Diogenes the Cynick, he found nothing more " in it than a golden tongue.

* It is the art of living well. This paſſage from Tiberianus, is cited with reference to Virgil's Golden Bough.

" But what I ſay with regard to Diogenes, will " be ſtill more evident by the end of his morality. " According to him, a man, who would live as he " ought to do, ought to be inſenſible; and though " this may ſeem ſtrange and even impoſſible, yet this " Philoſopher muſt have attained to that philoſophi- " cal State, the antients being too poſitive in that cir- " cumſtance to be miſtaken. I know not whether " he made uſe of Chiron's precepts for this purpoſe, " which are mentioned by Maximus Tyrius: nor " can I ſay whether it was from the rules of Antiſ-

Cartes [D]. If this Doctrine be a very ſtrange one, we are not to be ſurprized; of all phyſical objects there is none more abſtruſe or perplexing than the ſoul of brutes. The extreme opinions upon this ſubject are either abſurd or very dangerous; the medium, which ſome have endeavoured to keep, is not to be ſupported. I hope that I ſhall be excuſed in the liberty, which I am going to take, in exhauſting my Collections with regard

" thenes, the Author of the Apathy: but as he was " an Angel of Jupiter, ſent to men to teach them good " and evil, as Epictetus declares; it is my opinion " that he was guided wholly by the dictates of his " own mind. As it was his cuſtom to ſay, that we " muſt oppoſe reaſon to the paſſions, courage to fortune, " and nature to cuſtoms; he, at laſt, reſolved to fol- " low the deſign or intention of nature; and ima- " gined that a man, in order to be a genuine child " of that tender mother, ought to reſemble brutes, " who are ſo natural, ſo faithful an image of her, " in the places of their birth. Diogenes therefore " embraced that opinion, and practiſed it by po- " verty, faſting, and the contemplative life, which " he had the honour to invent. It is related that " Alexander the Great, when upon the point of " conquering India, and already ſure of his deſtiny, " had the courage to wiſh to be Diogenes: ſo great- " ly he envied a life of ſecurity and repoſe! ſo far " the life of the Cynicks ſeemed to him ſuperior to " nature! Diſputare cum Socrate licet, dubitare cum " Carneade, cum Epicuro quieſcere, hominis naturam " cum Stoicis vincere, cum CYNICIS EXCEDERE (24). " i. e. A man may diſpute with Socrates, doubt with " Carneades, lead an undiſturbed life with Epicurus, " conquer nature with the Stoicks, and SURPASS IT " WITH THE CYNICKS. To ſay the truth, this inſen- " ſibility is an odd kind of State, to which no one " has attained without paying very dear for it: Iſtuc " nihil dolere, non ſine magnâ mercede contigit, immani- " tatis in animo, ſtuporis in corpore (25). i. e. This " ſtate of inſenſibility is not acquired but at a very " great price, viz. the utmoſt hardneſs of heart " or mind, and ſtupor of body: however, it is a " ſtate that is very well adapted to the calamities of " this life: and what man among the Heathens but " would have been very glad to have had it ſaid of " them, what was ſaid of certain nations whom you " knew? Victui herba, veſtitui pelles, cubile humus. " Id beatius arbitrantur, quam ingemere agris, illabo- " rare domibus, ſuas alienaſque fortunas ſpe metuque ver- " ſare. Securi adverſus homines, ſecuri adverſus Deos, " rem difficillimam aſſecuti ſunt, ut illis ne voto quidem " opus ſit, i. e. They feed on herbs, are clad with " ſkins, and lye on the ground. This they look " upon as a more happy life than to toil in the fields, " to labour and build houſes, and to be troubled " with hopes and fears about their own poſſeſſions " and thoſe of other people. Being thus ſecure " both againſt men and the Gods, they have attained " a very difficult point, viz. the not having occaſion " ſo much as to wiſh for them."

(24) Seneca, de Brevitate Vitæ, cap. 14. p. m. 711.

(25) Cicero, Tuſcul. Quæſt. lib. 3.

Had I an opportunity of often obliging my readers with ſuch rare, ſuch profound pieces of borrowed erudition, what an ornament would it be to this Dictionary! But I will now cite (26) ſome paſſages from Ariſtotle, whence one would be apt to conclude, that he looked upon brutes as mere machines.

(26) In the rem. [H].

[D] I muſt not omit taking notice that a falſity is affirmed in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, with regard to the date of this opinion of Des Cartes.] " As Gomez Pereira did not draw his pa- " radox from its true principles, nor ſaw into the " conſequences of it, Des Cartes may have found it " firſt in a philoſophical way. 'Tis nevertheleſs very " probable, that he diſcovered it without ſearching " for it. He, in all probability, began and ended " his meditations without once thinking about the " ſouls of brutes and without laying aſide the opi- " nion he had entertained of it from his infancy; " and it was but by conſidering the conſequences of " his principle, with regard to the diſtinction of " thinking and extended ſubſtances, that he perceiv- " ed that the knowledge of brutes deſtroyed the " whole œconomy of his ſyſtem. Nay, perhaps this " objection was made to him, before he thought of " this difficulty. Mere neceſſity therefore made him " aſſert that brutes have no ſenſation. Had it been " poſſible for him to have defended his principles " without this, he could never have attacked an opi- " nion, which not only appeared indiſputable to eve- " ry one, but which is enforced with an utmoſt in- " vincible evidence (27)." To know if this Author is miſtaken, we muſt add to this paſſage the illuſtration he gave on that occaſion, as we find it at the cloſe of the Preface, which was publiſhed at the ſame time with the paſſage which wanted to be cleared up. I ſaid in the ſecond article of the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, that Mr. Des Cartes, in all probability began and ended his meditations without once thinking about the ſouls of brutes, and without laying aſide the opinion he had entertained about it from his infancy. This would be an error in point of fact, if I ſpoke of his ſix famous meditations, which were dedicated to the Sorbonne, and againſt which ſo many objections were ſtarted; for the Treatiſe on the Method, printed in 1637, at the head of theſe ſix meditations, ſhews evidently that Des Cartes already believed that brutes have no ſouls. I therefore declare, that by Des Cartes's meditations, I did not mean thoſe which he dedicated to the Sorbonne. My meaning is, that he probably completed the building a new ſyſtem in his imagination, without once thinking of the ſenſitive ſoul of brutes. Now I do not doubt but that he had quite finiſhed, in his mind, his work, before he publiſhed his method (28). But this Author, notwithſtanding this explication, is certainly miſtaken; for this Hypotheſis of the Automata is one of Des Cartes's oldeſt ſpeculations, as is evident from the proofs which Baillet has given of this. He ſpeaks as follows (29): To ſuppoſe that thoſe works of Des Cartes were writ in the year 1619, is ſuppoſing his opinion, with regard to the ſoul of brutes, above twenty years older than his adverſaries, and ſome learned men before them had endeavoured to fix it. When theſe people ſhall be told, that this opinion was found in the works written in his youth, they will perhaps no longer ſay, " that he began and ended his meditations without " once thinking about the ſouls of brutes, and with- " out laying aſide the opinion he had entertained of " it from his infancy. They will no longer think that " it was but by conſidering the conſequences of his " principles, without the diſtinction of thinking and " extended ſubſtances, that he perceived that the " knowledge of brutes deſtroyed the whole œconomy " of his ſyſtem." *Theſe people will not longer be perſuaded, that the obligation he lay under of anſwering the objections which were made to him on that account, ſuggeſted a thought, for which he was beholden to nothing but the freedom of his thoughts. It was not yet incumbent upon him to aſſert that brutes have no ſenſation, ſince he had not the gift of foreſeeing what would happen to him twenty years after. He had not, at that time, any principles to ſave or defend, as he had not yet eſtabliſhed any for the new Philoſophy: at leaſt he had not peruſed, at that age, either St. Auſtin, Pereira, or any Author from whom he might have borrowed that opinion with reſpect to the ſoul of brutes. Des Cartes, five or ſix years after, being returned from his travels to Paris , revealed that opinion to ſome of his friends; and gave them to underſtand, that he could not believe that brutes were any thing but mere machines. So that thoſe who will find a difficulty in aſcribing this ſentiment to him ſo early as the year 1619, will more readily believe that this opinion occurred to his mind not later than the year 1625. They perhaps will not refuſe to believe Des Cartes himſelf †, who ſays that it occurred to him fifteen or ſixteen years before he publiſhed his metaphyſical meditations. By the way, Paſcal extends this opinion with regard to the Automata more than any other part in Des Cartes's philoſophy. Mr. Baillet was ſo extremely polite, that he refuted the Author of the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres without naming him; and, on the contrary, named him, when he mentioned a thought, which appeared to him praiſe worthy. This, in ſome meaſure, is an exceſs of ceremony prejudicial to the liberty enjoyed in the commonwealth of letters: this is

(27) Nouv. de la Republ des Lettres, for March 1684. p. 22.

(28) Ibid. at the cloſe of the Preface.

(29) Baillet, Vie des Cartes, Tom. 1. p. 51, 52.

* See the manuſcript letter of Iſaac Beeckman, to Father Merſenne, in 1631, whence it is judged, that long before this, he had imparted to his friends in Paris, his opinion, with regard to the Automata, long before.

† Compare the manuſcript treatiſes Thaumantis Regia, compoſed in his youth; and another he cites in his Method, as written long before, with the letters of Tome 3. p. 63. of Tome 2. p. 9, 37, 230.

regard to the opinions of the antients and moderns concerning the nature of the ſoul of brutes [E]. Many perſons will think I ſay too much; but learned men will be of opinion, is introducing into it works of ſupererogation, every man ought to be allowed to name thoſe whom he refutes; it is enough that ſuch a one forbears all churliſh, rude, and injurious expreſſions.

I alſo will quote this other paſſage from Baillet, it relating to the ſame ſubject. "Many are of opinion, that "Des Cartes had borrowed the famous opinion with "regard to the ſoul of brutes, from Gomez Pereira. . . "But we may very much doubt, whether Des Cartes "ever heard of this Pereira; and whether his book, "which has always been pretty ſcarce, ever fell into "the hands of a man, who cared ſo little for books "and reading as our Philoſopher. But all uncer-"tainty in this affair will at once be removed, ſince "Des Cartes had not ſeen Pereira's book, the year "after the publication of his metaphyſical Medita-"tions *; and had already made known his opi-"nion with regard to the ſouls of brutes, upwards "of fifteen or twenty years before, as has been ob-"ſerved in the firſt book of this hiſtory. Beſides, "as Mr. Bayle † has very well obſerved, as Pereira "did not draw his paradox from its true princi-"ples, and not having foreſeen the conſequences of "it; Des Cartes may very probably have been the "firſt who diſcovered it in a philoſophical way. By "the way, Pereira was not the inventor of this Doc-"trine; for, in St. Auguſtin's time , it was de-"bated by men of very great learning, as an opi-"nion which had a great number of Partizans, not-"withſtanding the palpable abſurdity the vulgar "found in it. This Doctrine was of greater an-"tiquity than St. Auſtin, than even Seneca and the "firſt Cæſars ††, according to Mr. du Rondel's ob-"ſervation, who traces it as far back as the Stoicks "and Cynicks (30)."

* He ſent word to Father Merſenne, that he had never ſeen that book, MS. letter, dated 23d June, 1641.

† Nouv. de la Republ. des Lettres, 1614 Tom. 1. p. 22.

 Tom. 2. p. 12. Nouv. de la Republ. des Lettres, Auguſtin, cap. 30. de Quantitate Animæ.

†† Nouv. de la Republ. Ibid. p. 291.

(30) Baillet, Vie de Des Cartes, Tom. 2. p. 537.

[E] With regard to the opinions . . . . concerning the nature of the ſoul of brutes.] Moſt of the antient Philoſophers have taught, that this was a rational ſoul; and conſequently they muſt have ſuppoſed that it differed only more or leſs from that of men. Anaxagoras ſuppoſed the difference to conſiſt in this, that men can explain their reaſonings or arguments, and that brutes cannot explain theirs. Ἀναξαγόρας πάντα ζῶα λόγου ἔχειν τὸν ἐνεργητικὸν, τὸν δ' οἱονεὶ νοῦν μὴ ἔχειν τὸν παθητικὸν, τὸν λεγόμενον τοῦ νοῦ ἑρμηνέα. Anaxagoras omnia animalia habere mentem agentem: non item patientem, qui eſt mentis quaſi interpres (31). Pythagoras and Plato did not differ much from this opinion; ſince they ſaid, that the ſoul of brutes, though really rational, does nevertheleſs not act according to the dictates of reaſon, from their being denied the faculty of ſpeech, and the ill proportion of their Organs (32). It were to be wiſhed that Plutarch, who could expatiate ſo nobly on ſubjects whenever he pleaſed, had not been ſo conciſe on this occaſion: but though his expreſſions be ever ſo laconic, we cannot entertain any doubt with regard to Pythagoras's doctrine. It is plain enough that, according to this Philoſopher, the ſoul of brutes does not differ ſubſtantially from the ſouls of men; for he taught the tranſmigration of ſouls, i. e. that they paſſed indiſcriminately from the body of a man into that of an animal, or from the body of an animal into that of a man. Few doctrines have had more followers than this. I believe that no Philoſophers have ſpoke more advantageouſly of the ſoul of brutes than Porphyry. He aſcribed to them, not only reaſon, but alſo the faculty of making their reaſoning underſtood: and he was of opinion that ſome perſons underſtood their language; and that man ſurpaſſes them only in this particular, that his reaſoning is more refined. Porphyrius, Lib. III. De abſtinentia ſtatuit naturam omnibus animantibus, quibus ſenſum & memoriam dedit, rationem quoque, imò & orationem, tam internam quàm externam, tribuiſſe: additque, Apollonium Tyanæum, Melampum, Tireſiam, & Thaletem, brutorum ſermones dijudicaſſe atque intellexiſſe: quos nihil mirum ſi non intelligamus ipſi, qui plurimarum etiam nationum linguam minimè callemus. Aſſerit itaque bruta rationem participare, neque per eam ab illis hominem ſimpliciter diſtingui; ſed quòd homini perfectum rationis acumen inſit, illis imperfectum (33). i. e. "Porphyry in his third "book relating to abſtinence, is of opinion, that "nature has beſtowed on all animals, to whom it "gave ſenſation and memory, reaſon, and likewiſe "ſpeech, as well internal as external: and adds, "that Apollonius Tyanæus, Melampus, Tireſias and "Thales diſcovered and underſtood the language of "brutes; which it is no wonder we do not under-"ſtand, as we are ſo little ſkilled in the language of "moſt nations. He aſſerts therefore that brutes "have ſome portion of reaſon, and that they are "not merely diſtinguiſhed from men by that faculty; "but only becauſe reaſon is more perfect in them "than in brutes." He proves this by arguments and authorities; and cites Empedocles, Plato, and Ariſtotle. Confirmat iſtiuſmodi dogma in primis ex mutua ſignificatione, qua inter ſe bruta utuntur, quod in avibus potiſſimum apparet, quæ ſibi occinunt vicisſimque reſpondent. Deinde, ex admirabili ſolertia, curaque in futurum proſpiciendi, utilia conſectandi, declinandi adverſa. Præterea, teſtimonio Empedoclis & Platonis, atque etiam Ariſtotelis, quos idem cenſuiſſe, ex eorum dictis ſcriptiſque haberi ait (34). i. e. "He confirms that opinion, in "the firſt place, from the informations which brutes "communicate reciprocally to one another, which is "ſeen eſpecially in birds, who ſing to, and reply al-"ternately to each other. Then, from their won-"derful apprehenſion and ſagacity, and their great "foreſight, in purſuing whatever may be of advan-"tage, and ſhunning every thing hurtful. Thirdly, "from the teſtimony of Empedocles, Plato, and even "Ariſtotle, whom he declares to have had the ſame "opinion, as both their ſayings and writings evi-"dently ſhew." Thoſe who alledge theſe words, think that Ariſtotle is not quoted to the purpoſe (35). They pretend that he aſcribed to brutes only an image or copy of reaſon; and they laughed at that pretended language which Tireſias, Melampus, &c. were ſaid to underſtand; on which occaſion they obſerve that a Rabin has followed the error of Porphyry, and believed that Solomon underſtood that language. Quod item addebat Porphyrius, bruta inter ſe colloqui, & à quibuſdam intelligi, non ita eſt, etſi ita eſſe crediderit quidam ex Hebræis doctoribus, teſte Abulenſi ad capit. 3. libr. 3. Regum, quæſt. 11. aſſerens, eorum voces percalluiſſe Salomonem (36). It perhaps would not be very eaſy for them to ſhew, that their Ariſtotle eſtabliſhed a ſubſtantial diſtinction between the ſouls of men and thoſe of brutes; for it would not be a good proof to ſay that he did not believe brutes are guided by reaſon; ſince it is certain that children and mad people are informed with a ſoul like to that of the moſt rational perſons; and that moſt brutes ſeem to diſcover a greater portion of reaſon than children of a year old and madmen. One might therefore believe, that Ariſtotle acknowledged only a greater or leſs difference between the ſoul of brutes and that of men, i. e. that the difference of the organs, according to him, occaſioned the ſoul of man to reaſon with eaſe and ſubtlety, and that of brutes reaſoned only after a confuſed manner. This might be confirmed by the opinion of thoſe, who declare, that he did not believe the immortality of the ſoul (37).

One circumſtance muſt be obſerved, viz. that the antients, when they quitted the poetical or oratorial ſtyle, did not acknowledge a true or eſſential difference between the human ſoul and matter. I do not ſpeak of groſs, heavy, palpable matter; but of that which the Chymiſts call ſpirits, which is as eſſentially body and matter, and dirt and fleſh can be. They therefore muſt have believed, that the ſouls of men differed from that of brutes only in a greater or leſs degree, and according to different gradations of ſubtilty; and conſequently they muſt have ſuppoſed, that the bare formation or ſtate of the Organs is the reaſon why reaſon does not diſplay itſelf in brutes as in men. Galen was doubtleſs of this opinion, he not believing that ſouls are incorporeal: he did not diſtinguiſh them from the natural heat and the harmony of the conſtitution (38). I am ſenſible that many have aſſerted that the ſoul of man deſcended from Heaven: but this does not prove that they thought the ſoul immaterial (39). Beſides, the Stoicks taught, that

(31) Plutarch, de Placit. Philoſoph. lib. 5. cap. 20. p. 298.

(32) Οὐ μὴν λογικῶς ἐνεργήσας παρὰ τὴν δυσπραξίαν τῶν σωμάτων καὶ τὸ μὴ ἔχειν τὸ φρασικόν. Non tamen ea agere ſecundum rationem, idque fieri ob incommodum corporum temperamentum & quia loquela deſtituuntur. Idem, ibid. p. 909.

(33) Conimbricenſes in Phyſic. Ariſtotel. lib. 2. cap. 9. Quæſt. 3. Art. 1. p. m. 225.

(34) Ibid.

(35) Quod autem aſſerebat Porphyrius, ex Ariſtotelis doctrinâ colligi, exiſtimaſſe illum bruta ratione pollere; falſum eſt: niſi rationem ſumat pro rationis imitatione, quam ſolam brutis quibuſdam Ariſtoteles attribuit, tum loco citato. (that is to ſay, lib. 4. de Hiſt. Animal. cap. 9.) alſo Tome 1. Metaphyſic. cap. 1. ibid. Art. 3. p. 227.

(36) Ibid.

(37) Pomponatius aſſerted this ſtrongly. See La Mothe le Vayer's Diſcourſe on the Immortality of the Soul. It is in Tom. 4. of his works, edit. in 12mo.

(38) See the book entitled, Nic. Nancelii Trachyeni Noviodunenſis de Immortalitate Animæ Velitatio adverſus Galenum, printed at Paris, in 1587. 8vo.

(39) See rem. [R] of the art. LUCRETIUS the Philoſopher.

nion, that I do not ſay a quarter of what they could produce upon this ſubject. They will judge thus alſo with regard to other places, where I have been a little prolix. I ſhall that all ſouls, indiſcriminately, flowed from the ſame ſource. Perſuaſum iis, à Deo, id eſt Mundi animâ, animam hanc eſſe. Laërtius * : Τὰς τῶν ὅλων ψυχὰς μέρη εἶναι τὰς ἐν τοῖς ζῴοις. Animæ univerſi, partes eſſe animantium Animas. Omniumne animantium? omnium: ſed aliæ aliis magis participant, ut ſunt corpora & inſtrumenta. Eſt Socraticum † : Mundi animam, fontem animarum omnium eſſe. Sed illam, quæ ratione uteretur, cognatam & participem, imò jam partem divinitatis eſſe. Plutarchus:  Ἡ δὲ ψυχὴ μετασχοῦσα τοῦ λογισμοῦ, οὐκ ἔστιν ἐτέρα τοῦ Θεοῦ μόνον, ἀλλὰ καὶ μέρος, οὐδ' ἐκ' αὐτοῦ, ἀλλ' ἀπ' αὐτοῦ, καὶ ἐκ αὐτοῦ γέγονεν: Anima mentis & ratiocinationis conſors, non opus ſolum Dei; ſed & PARS eſt; neque ab ipſo, ſed ex ipſo eſt facta. Enimverò etiam aliæ (hac ratione) partes Dei, id eſt mundanæ animæ: ſed iſta ſcilicet eximiè, & quæ proximè vim naturamque ejus referret (40). Could they therefore believe, that the ſouls of brutes were deſtitute of ſenſation? I do not think they believe this; and if Seneca ſaid ſo in the paſſages cited by the learned Mr. du Rondel, he has manifeſtly confuted himſelf in others. Whoever peruſes his laſt epiſtle, will find that he denies brutes only reaſon, wiſdom, true goodneſs, felicity, but not ſenſation: In quo non poteſt beata vita eſſe, nec id poteſt quo beata vita efficitur: beata autem vita bonis efficitur: in muto animali non eſt quo beata vita efficitur: ergo in muto animali bonum non eſt. Mutum animal SENSU comprehendit præſentia: præteritorum reminiſcitur, cùm id incidit, quo ſenſus admonetur: tanquam equus reminiſcitur viæ, cùm ad initium ejus admotus eſt. In ſtabulo quidem nullæ viæ, quamvis ſæpè calcatæ, memoria eſt. . . . . Nec illud nego, ad ea quæ videntur ſecundùm naturam, magnos eſſe mutis animalibus impetus & concitatos, ſed inordinatos ac turbidos. Nunquam autem aut inordinatum eſt bonum, aut turbidum. Quid ergo, inquis, muta animalia perturbatè & indiſpoſitè moventur? Dicerem illa perturbatè & indiſpoſitè moveri, ſi natura illorum ordinem caperet: nunc moventur ſecundùm naturam ſuam. Perturbatum enim id eſt, quod eſſe aliquando & non perturbatum poteſt. Sollicitum eſt, quod poteſt eſſe ſecurum. Nulli vitium eſt, niſi cui virtus poteſt eſſe. Multis animalibus talis ex ſuâ naturâ motus eſt. Sed ne te diu teneam, aliquod erit bonum in muto animali, erit aliqua virtus, erit aliquid perfectum: ſed quale? nec bonum abſolutè, nec virtus, nec perfectum. Hæc enim rationalibus ſolis contingunt, quibus datum eſt ſcire, quare, quatenus, quemadmodum. Ita bonum in nullo eſt, niſi in quo ratio (41). i. e. "That "wherein life cannot be rendered happy, cannot do "thoſe things which make life happy: but life is "made happy in the good: there is nothing in "brutes by which life is made happy; conſequently "there is no goodneſs in brutes. A brute compre- "hends the preſent by ſenſation; and recollects "things paſt, when any thing occurs which calls up "that ſenſation: as a horſe, when led to the begin- "ning of a road, will remember it: but when he "is in the ſtable, he does not remember any thing "of the road, how often ſoever he may have tra- "velled in it. . . . . Nor do I deny, but that brutes "are ſtrongly excited by nature, to thoſe things they "ſee; but then thoſe tranſports are inordinate and "confuſed. Now whatever is inordinate and con- "fuſed cannot be good. Here you aſk: are brutes "moved or excited in an inordinate and confuſed "manner? To this I anſwer, that they would be "moved inordinately and confuſedly, were they, by "nature, ſuſceptible of order: now they are moved "or prompted according as nature excites them. For "that is confuſed, which is capable of being ſome- "times not confuſed. That is ſolicitous or anxious "which may be undiſturbed. Nothing is vicious "but what may have virtue. Brutes have ſuch "emotions naturally. But to dwell no longer on "this ſubject; there will be ſome goodneſs, ſome "virtue, ſome perfection, in a brute: but of what "kind is this? It is not abſolute goodneſs, virtue, or "perfection. Theſe are only the portion of rational "creatures, who are able to know wherefore, how "far, in what manner. Conſequently nothing can "have goodneſs but what is endued with reaſon." Seneca lays down a principle, which ſhews in what ſenſe he ſays elſewhere, that brutes are not prompted to anger, and are incapable of conferring a benefit. He ſuppoſes that a nature, which is not ſuſceptible of the two contraries or oppoſites, is not ſuſceptible of either: whence he concludes, that as brutes are not capable of acting agreeably to order, and according to the rules of reaſon, and being incapable of virtue; they therefore do not perform any thing that can be called irregular, irrational, or a vicious action. For this reaſon he does not call the violence or fury of lions, anger: for, according to the Stoicks, the paſſions are vices, and conſequently no being can be ſuſceptible of them, but what poſſeſſes virtue and reaſon, and which is capable of attaining to the perfection of the wiſe man. See the remark [I]. In another epiſtle (42), he lays it down in the ſtrongeſt manner, as a principle, that brutes are endued with ſenſation. He could not have expreſſed himſelf more clearly, had he been of the opinion of our ſchoolmen. He goes even farther than they; for he aſſerts that they are conſcious of their ſenſation. Qualis ad nos pervenit animi noſtri ſenſus, quamvis naturam ejus ignoremus, ac ſedem, talis ad omnia animalia conſtitutionis ſuæ SENSUS. Neceſſe eſt enim id SENTIANT, per quod alia quoque SENTIUNT, neceſſe eſt SENSUM ejus habeant, cui parent, à quo reguntur. Nemo non ex nobis intelligit eſſe aliquid, quod impetus ſuos moveat: quid ſit illud, ignorat: & conatum ſibi eſſe ſcit: quid ſit, aut unde ſit, neſcit. Sicut infantibus, ſic quoque animalibus, principalis partis ſuæ SENSUS eſt, non ſatis dilucidus, non expreſſus (43). i. e. "Such a ſen- "ſation as we have of our ſouls, though we know "not its nature and ſeat, ſuch a ſenſation all brutes "have of their own conſtitution or frame of body. "It is neceſſary they ſhould FEEL, or be conſcious, "of that by which they FEEL other things: they "muſt neceſſarily have a SENSATION of him, to "whom they pay obedience, and by whom they are "governed. Every one of us is ſenſible, that there "is ſomething which excites our impulſes or paſ- "ſions: but what that is, that we know not: we "are conſcious to ourſelves that we have an inclina- "tion or impulſe: but with regard to what it is, or "whence, that we know not. Brutes, as well as in- "fants, have a SENSE or conſciouſneſs of their prin- "cipal parts, but not ſufficiently clear and evident." Herein he only writes purſuant to the principles of his Sect. It is the property of brutes, according to the Stoicks, to deſire their own preſervation, and to be ſenſible that nature recommends them to themſelves. Τὴν δὲ πρώτην ὁρμὴν φασι τὸ ζῶον ἴσχειν ἐπὶ τὸ τηρεῖν ἑαυτό, οἰκειώσης αὐτῷ τῆς φύσεως ἀπ' ἀρχῆς· καθά φησιν ὁ Χρύσιππος ἐν τῷ πρώτῳ Περὶ τελῶν, πρῶτον οἰκεῖον λέγων εἶναι παντὶ ζώῳ τὴν αὐτοῦ σύστασιν, καὶ τὴν ταύτης συνείδησιν. Primam autem hanc animantis appetitionem fuiſſe dicunt, ſeipſum tuendi atque ſervandi, naturâ ſibi ipſum ab initio conciliante, ut Chryſippus ait in primo De finibus, primum proprium cuique animanti dicens ſui ipſius fuiſſe commendationem, hujuſque conſcientiam (44).

With regard to the Cynicks (45), the paſſage of Plutarch quoted by du Rondel, ſays expreſsly, that, according to Diogenes, brutes have no ſenſation. I ſhould be glad to ſee the doctrine of this Philoſopher a little more at length; for what Plutarch informs us of it, is very obſcure; the beginning and end deſtroying what he had ſaid in the middle. They partake of the underſtanding; that is the beginning. They are affected in much the ſame manner as madmen, that is the end. But are not the moſt raving madmen endued with ſenſation? Had they been compared to perſons troubled with a lethargy or apoplexy, there would have been ſome connexion in what he advances. However this be, I'll tranſcribe the whole paſſage. Διογένης, μετέχειν μὲν αὐτὰ τοῦ νοητοῦ καὶ ἀέρος, διὰ δὲ τὸ τὰ μὲν πυκνότητι, τὰ δὲ πλεονασμῷ τῆς ὑγρασίας, μήτε διανοεῖσθαι, μήτε αἰσθάνεσθαι, προσφερῶς δὲ αὐτὰ διακεῖσθαι τοῖς μεμηνόσι, παραπλησίκοτος τῷ ἡγεμονικῷ. Diogenes, rationis & aëris partem ea percipere, ſed vel ob craſſitiem vel ob abundantiam humoris neque intelligere neque ſentire: ac ferè affecta eſſe eo modo quo ſunt inſanientes, qui de mentis exiverunt poteſtate (46). Whatever might be the doctrine of Diogenes on this

* In Zen.

† Apul. de Dogm. Plat.

 Quæſt. Platonic.

(40) Lipſius, Phyſiolog. Stoicorum, lib. 3. Diſſert. 8. p. m. 984.

(41) Seneca, Epiſt. 124. p. m. 477.

(42) It is the 121ſt, in which he proves the following Theſes, omnibus animalibus eſſe conſtitutionis ſuæ ſenſum.

(43) Seneca, Ep. 121. p. 467.

(44) Diogenes Laert. in Zenone, lib. 7. num. 85. p. m. 416.

(45) I expreſs myſelf in this manner, upon the ſuppoſition that Diogenes, whoſe opinion Plutarch has related, is the Cynic, concerning which ſee the rem. [D], of the article DIOGENES of Apollonia.

(46) Plut. de Placit. Philoſ. lib. 5. cap. 20. It is thus, according to Amyot's verſion. Diogenes ſays, that brutes, indeed, have ſome UNDERSTANDING; but that becauſe of the groſſneſs and denſity of their conſtitutions, and of the abundance of their moiſture, they are not endued either with ſpeech, reaſon, or ſenſation, any more than madpeople, becauſe their brain is diſordered, and have not a free uſe of their reaſon.

ſhall afterwards make ſome reflections [F]. I ſhall obſerve, that Voſſius did not know that any Author beſides Pereira had aſſerted that brutes have no ſenſation [G]. The reader this head, it is certain, that there are many more among the antients who oppoſe, than who declare for it. Plutarch wrote a treatiſe, purpoſely to ſhew, that brutes are endued with reaſon (47). The work, in which he enquires, whether terreſtrial animals are more induſtrious than thoſe of the aquatic kind (48), is writ in the ſame view. I ſhall extract an obſervation from thence, which appears to me important. The Author attempting to refute thoſe who aſſert, that as there are rational animals, there alſo muſt be irrational ones, aſſerts that, by a parity of reaſoning, it might be aſſerted that there muſt be animals who have no ſenſation, as there are ſome who poſſeſs that faculty. I am to obſerve, that he ſuppoſes no one had ever made this laſt diviſion of animals before. He gives it as the example of a tenet, which no one had ever been allowed to advance. This argument is what is called reductionem abſurdum. His words are as follow: Εἰ δέ τις ἀξιοῖ μὴ κολοβὸν εἶναι τὴν φύσιν, ἀλλὰ τὴν ἔμψυχον φύσιν ἔχειν, τὸ μὲν, λογικὸν, τὸ δὲ, ἄλογον· ἕτερος ἀξιώσει τὴν ἔμψυχον φύσιν ἔχειν· τὸ μὲν, φανταστικὸν, τὸ δὲ, ἀφανταστικόν. καὶ τὸ μὲν, αἰσθητικόν· τὸ δὲ, ἀναίσθητον· ἵνα δὲ τὰς ἀντιζύγους ταύτας καὶ ἀντιθέτους ἕξεις καὶ στερήσεις περὶ ταυτὸν ἡ φύσις ἔχοι μέσον οἷον ἰσορροπήσασ· εἰ δὲ ἄτοπον· ὁ ζητῶν τῷ ἐμψύχῳ τὸ μὲν, αἰσθητικὸν, τὸ δὲ, ἀναίσθητον εἶναι. καὶ τὸ μὲν, φαντασιούμενον, τὸ δὲ, ἀφανταστούμενον. ὅτι πᾶν τὸ ἔμψυχον αἰσθητικὸν εὐθὺς εἶναι καὶ φανταστικὸν πέφυκεν. εἰ δὲ ὅτως ἐπιεικῶς ἀπαιτήσει τὸ μὲν λογικὸν εἶναι τῷ ἐμψύχῳ, τὸ δὲ ἄλογον (49). i. e. "But if any one ſhould obſerve or require, that "in order to prevent any defect in nature, ſome animals muſt neceſſarily be endued with the rational "faculties, and others irrational; others will be "found, who will affirm with equal right, that ſome "animals muſt be endued with the faculty of perception, and others be deprived of it; that ſome "muſt have ſenſation, and others have no ſenſation; in ſuch a manner, that nature, at the ſame "time, may have privations oppoſite to thoſe habits "or faculties. But if it ſhould be abſurd to obſerve "this, becauſe every animal is endued both with "the faculty of ſenſation and perception; it conſequently will not be juſt to obſerve or alledge, "that ſome animals are endued with reaſon, and "that others are irrational." A little after, he refutes the Stoicks, by a remark of equal ſtrength. Brutes, ſays he, have no paſſions; their deſires are not deſires, but ſomething like deſires, &c. What would you reply then, ſaid he to them, if any one ſhould take it into his head to teach, that they neither ſee nor hear; and that their ſight is, as it were, ſight? Οὐκ οἶδα τί χρήσονται τοῖς λέγουσι μηδὲ βλέπειν μηδὲ ἀκούειν, ἀλλ' ὡσανεὶ βλέπειν αὐτὰ, καὶ ὡσανεὶ ἀκούειν· μηδὲ φωνεῖν, ἀλλ' ὡσανεὶ φωνεῖν· μηδὲ ὅλως ζῆν, ἀλλ' ὡσανεὶ ζῆν. Neſcio quid reſponſuri ſint iis, qui animalia etiam non videre, non audire, non vocem emittere, ſed quaſi videre, quaſi audire, quaſi vocem edere, denique omnino non vivere, ſed duntaxat quaſi vivere dicerent (50). This ſhews that Plutarch was perſuaded, that no Philoſopher had ever rejected the ſenſitive ſouls of brutes; and conſequently, he muſt have underſtood Diogenes's opinion, in a manner different from what we underſtand the doctrine of Pereira.

To prevent my being too prolix, I will refer the ſequel of the compilation to another place (51).

[F] I ſhall afterwards make ſome reflections.] I will poſtpone them to the article RORARIUS.

[G] Voſſius did not know, that any Author beſides Pereira, had aſſerted that brutes have no ſenſation.] He obſerves, that there are ſome Philoſophers, who made no diſtinction between thought and ſenſation. The concluſion from thence muſt have been, either that brutes were endued with reaſon (52), or that they had no ſenſation (53). The laſt propoſition, adds he, did not pleaſe any one, that I know of, among the Antients, but it has been maintained in the 16th century by Gomez Pereira. Hoc conſtituto, conſequitur, vel beſtias non habere ſenſum, cum non habeant rationem; vel eas, cum ſenſu præditæ ſint, etiam rationales eſſe. Prior ſententia, quod ſciam, veterum placuit nulli. Sed avorum noſtrorum temporibus amplexus illam fuit Gometius Pereira, Philoſopus ac Medicus Hiſpanus, in opere triginta à ſe annis elaborato; quod, ab Antonii, & Margaritæ, parentum ſuorum, nominibus, Antonianam Margaritam inſcripſit. Eandemque opinionem tuetur in Margaritæ hujus Apologia, qua Objectionibus Michaëlis à Palacios, Theologi Salmanticenſis, reſpondet. Utrobique docet, (ut verbis ejus inſiſtam) illos motus brutales, quicunque in brutis viſuntur, non fieri à brutis videntibus, aut audientibus, aut guſtantibus, ſeu per quemcumque alium ſenſum exteriorem, ſeu interiorem, vitaliter ſenſificè immutatis: ſed vel ab ſpeciebus objectorum inductis in eorum organis, noſtris ſenſitivis ſimilibus, cum præſentia ſunt ſequenda, vel fugienda: vel à phantaſmatis, cum hæc abſunt. Nimirum cenſet ea, quæ nos facultati ſenſitivæ tribuimus, proficiſci à quadam ſympathia, & antipathia: quemadmodum enim ſuccinum trahit paleas, magnes ferrum; ſic muta animantia trahi à ſpeciebus rerum amicarum: à natura quippe hanc vim eſſe inditam rebus, ut non omnia moveat, ſed res certas: itaque, re amica præſenti, maxillas animantis natura moveri ad illam recipiendam: re præſenti inimica, eaſdem natura refugere cibum, planeque adverſari. Quod ſi natura voluiſſet ſenſum mutis dare animantibus, daturam etiam fuiſſe mentem: at ea ſic habitura fuiſſe animas indiviſibiles, eoque à corpore ſeparabiles (54); i. e. "This being agreed, "it follows, either that brutes are not endued with "ſenſation, ſince they have no reaſon; or, that "they are endued with reaſon, ſince they have ſenſation. I don't remember that the former propoſition pleaſed any one among the antients. But in "the age of our grandfathers, it was maintained by "Gomez Pereira, a Spaniſh Philoſopher and Phyſitian, in a work, in the compoſing whereof he em-"ploy'd thirty years, and which he entitled, Antoniana Margarita, from the names of his father and "mother. The ſame doctrine is defended by him in "his apology of the juſt-mentioned Margarita, "wherein he anſwers the objections of a Divine of "Salamanca, named Michael de Palacios: he aſſerts, "in both thoſe works (to employ his own expreſſions) "that thoſe brutal motions which are ſeen in brutes, are "not performed by brutes which ſee, hear or taſte, nor is "any alteration produced in them, by any other external "or internal ſenſe, with regard to life and ſenſation: "but they ariſe from the images of objects imprinted on "their organs, like to our ſenſitive organs, when things "preſent are to be followed or ſhunned; or by phantaſms in the abſence of theſe. He is of opinion, "that thoſe things which we aſcribe to a ſenſitive "faculty, reſult from a certain ſympathy and antipathy; for in like manner as ſtraws are attracted "by amber, and iron by the load-ſtone, ſo brutes "are attracted by the images of things which de-"light: nature having endued things with the following power, not to move all, but ſome particular things: thus, when a thing that pleaſes is pre-"ſent, the animals jaws are, by nature, moved "to receive it; but when a thing which diſpleaſes is "preſent, they are prompted, by nature, to refuſe "and hate food. But if it had been the deſign of "nature to beſtow ſenſation on brutes, ſhe would "likewiſe have beſtowed underſtanding; and, in "this manner, they would have had indiviſible ſouls, "which conſequently would have been ſeparable "from the body." Weigh well two points, the one, that he did not explain the motions of animals, from mechanical principles, but by the occult qualities of ſympathy and antipathy; the other, that he rejected the ſenſitive ſoul, from his believing that a thing which is material, diviſible and mortal, is capable of ſenſation; whence he concluded, that if brutes had a ſoul endued with ſenſation, it is not corporeal. When he was deſired to call to mind the actions of brutes, thoſe of a dog, for inſtance, he anſwered, that it was not neceſſary they ſhould proceed from a ſenſitive faculty, ſince otherwiſe the Ariſtoteleans would be in the wrong, not to aſcribe to the exertions of a rational ſoul, ſo many actions reſembling thoſe of men, which a dog performs. He had the art to take advantage of the weak ſide of the

(47) Περὶ τοῦ τὰ ἄλογα λόγῳ χρῆσθαι. Bruta animalia ratione uti.

(48) Πότερα τῶν ζώων φρονιμώτερα, τὰ χερσαῖα ἢ τὰ ἔνυδρα. Terreſtriane an aquatilia ſint callidiora?

(49) Plutarch, de Solertia Animalium, circa init. p. m. 960. C.

(50) Idem, ibid. p. 961. E. A tranſlation, according to Amiot, is given in the remark [I].

(51) In the art. RORARIUS.

(52) Voſſius, de origine & progreſſu Idololatriæ, lib. 3. cap. 41. p. m. 939.

(53) See Francis Valeſius, de ſacra Philoſophia, cap. 55. p. m. 279, where he has a ſtroke, by the by, againſt Pereira, but without naming him.

(54) Voſſius, de Idololatr. lib. 3. cap. 41. p. 939.

reader will ſee in the ſame remark the opinion of our Spaniard pretty fully repreſented. It would be to no purpoſe to endeavour to ſearch in Ariſtotle for the ſeeds or principles of Des Cartes's Doctrine [H]; and it would be to as little purpoſe to refer us to the 4th book of Cicero's Tuſculan queſtions, and to the teſtimony of Porphyry, Proclus, &c. There is no reſemblance or conformity [I] between the Doctrine, which ſuppoſes brutes to cauſe of his adverſaries. This is the uſual ſhift, (and a ſucceſsful one it is) of thoſe who maintain abſurdities (55). Ictus hoſce levi amictu exire ſe poſſe Pereira arbitratur. Putat enim, ut nos non ideo rationem tribuimus beſtiis, quia tam multa actibus faciant ſimillima humanis: ita neque iis adſcribendum eſſe ſenſum, etſi, quæ agant, ſimillima ſint actibus animæ ſenſitivæ. Nec eo movetur, quòd tam diſſimiles ſint animarum actus, imò contrarii prorſus: quia, ut ait, natura etiam pro rebus, in quas agit, contraria operetur. Unde Poëta (56):

(55) Idem, ibid.

(56) Virgil, Eclog. 8. ver. 80.

Limus ut hic dureſcit, & hæc ut cera liqueſcit,
Uno eodemque igni.

Sed longum eſſet omnia ex opere tam operoſo hominis & acuti & docti adferre pro ridicula ſententia, quam diximus. i. e. "Pereira imagines that it will be an eaſy "matter for him to ward off theſe blows: for he is of "opinion that, as we do not aſcribe reaſon to brutes, "becauſe of the great umber of actions, very much "reſembling thoſe of men, which they perform; "ſo neither are we to aſcribe ſenſation to them, "though their actions reſemble greatly thoſe of a "ſenſitive ſoul. Nor is he puzzled, upon its being "objected to him, that the actions of ſouls are ſo "very diſſimilar, nay quite contrary: becauſe (as he "obſerves) nature produces contrary effects in pro-"portion to the thing it works upon: whence the "Poet ſays;

"As fire this figure hardens, made of clay;
"And this of wax with fire conſumes away.
DRYDEN.

"But I ſhould be too prolix, were I to extract, from "this voluminous work in queſtion, all that this in-"genious and learned man ſays, in favour of the "ridiculous opinion above-mentioned." I thought that my readers would be very well pleaſed to find here a ſpecimen of our Spaniard's genius and doctrine.

[H] It would be to no purpoſe to endeavour to ſearch, in Ariſtotle, for the ſeeds or principles of Des Cartes's Doctrine.] Father Pardies endeavoured to find them there. It will perhaps not be uſeleſs, ſays he (57), to examine ſome paſſages in Ariſtotle, to ſee whether, in ſo great a Philoſopher, we may not meet with ſomething which might give a ſanction to an opinion, which in this age appears ſo new and extraordinary. He then extracts the following paſſage from the 9th chapter of the book De Spiritu. "We may conceive, with "very little difficulty, that heat is an effect of na-"ture: but it is difficult to comprehend, how the "nature of bodies can ſo uſefully manage heat, and "employ it, as an inſtrument, to give to every thing "what it ought to have naturally: and imprint on "each of them its peculiar characteriſtick with as "much juſtneſs as if thoſe bodies were endued with "knowledge and reaſon. And * it is certainly not "poſſible, that all theſe things ſhould be done in "this manner without knowledge and the direction "of reaſon: but on the other hand, it does not ap-"pear how we can aſcribe to material Beings the "faculty of knowing. We cannot in any manner "aſcribe all this artifice to the force of fire, of ſpi-"rits, or the moſt ſubtile bodies: but alſo to ſay, "that there is ſome principle in thoſe bodies, which "has the faculty of knowing, this exceeds our utmoſt "admiration. And we have equal cauſe to wonder, "when we conſider the ſoul itſelf of brutes, ſince "it is of the ſame nature with fire and ſpirits." It appears from this paſſage, ſays Father Pardies (58), that Ariſtotle was fully ſenſible of the difficulties which would ariſe in aſcribing knowledge to bodies and brutes. But what he has here propoſed only by way of admiration, he ſeems to have affirmed expreſly in another place, where, ſpeaking of brutes, he writes expreſly as follows †. Of all animals man only is endued with the faculty of thinking. Homo unus ex numero animalium omnium vim obtinet cogitandi. . . . . . And though the reſt of animals have memory, and are capable of order or diſcipline, yet man only has the talent to remember. From theſe words, which Ariſtotle has repeated verbatim elſewhere , one would think that he had aſcribed knowledge to brutes, ſince he aſcribes to them memory; and that if he deprives them of knowledge, it is of that kind of knowledge only which is attended with a peculiar reflection in deliberations, and in the enquiries we make to recall things to our minds. But it is certain that Ariſtotle has diſtinguiſhed in another manner memory and reminiſcence; for, according to him, memory conſiſts only in an image ††, and a repreſentation imprinted on the ſubſtance of that part of the body in which common ſenſe reſides, in much the ſame manner as figures are repreſented, by the impreſſion of ſeals on wax; ſo that, to remember ſome things, is to have the figures of all the things thus repreſented *. Whereas reminiſcence implies alſo a certain perception of the mind, whereby, when we call any thing to mind, we know that we recal ſomething to mind: which is common to all thoughts in general, ſince it is impoſſible to think without knowing that we do ſo. So that as Ariſtotle ſaid brutes have no memory, and that man only has the faculty of remembering; we muſt not wonder that he ſaid alſo, that of all animals, man only is endued with the faculty of thinking. This Philoſopher muſt therefore have ſuppoſed that brutes had no real thoughts. It remains only, after this, that Ariſtotle ſhould acknowledge that brutes are mere automata, and move only mechanically, and by the help of ſprings prepared for that purpoſe. And this alſo he declared clearly; for thus he ſpeaks, where he explains the manner in which the motion of brutes is performed. As thoſe machines, ſays he †, called Automata, when they are moved ever ſo little after a certain manner, perform inſtantly their motions by the force or power of unbent or looſened ſprings: in like manner animals move, having bones and nerves, as ſo many inſtruments, diſpoſed by the induſtry of nature, which produce the ſame effects in them, as pieces of wood and iron produce, with their ſprings in machines. He ſays the ſame elſewhere. It may be, ſays he , that in brutes, one thing moves another, and that their bodies are like thoſe wonderful automata: for indeed, they are compoſed of members which have the quality or faculty even when they are at reſt, to be able to make certain motions the inſtant they are determined to them: and as, in the machines in queſtion, there is no occaſion for ſome perſon to touch them at the very time they are performing their motions, provided they were touched before; ſo the ſame may be ſaid of animals.

(57) Ignatius Gaſton Pardies, on the Knowledge of Brutes, num. 69. p. m. 136.

* V. Interpretem Latinum hujus loci.

(58) Pardies, de la Conoiſſance des Betes, num. 71. p. 140.

† Hiſt. animal. cap. 1.

* Ibid.

† De Animal. motione, cap. 7.

 De gen. anim. cap. 1. poſt med.

Theſe paſſages do great honour to Ariſtotle. They ſhew, 1. That he knew the mechaniſm, which nature practiſed in the bodies of animals, and exerciſed daily in them. 2. That he knew how inconceivably difficult it was to ſuppoſe that matter thinks. But he never aſſerted, either as a certain thing, or as a ſuppoſition, that brutes do not think: he has not diveſted them of thought, taking that word in the ſame ſenſe with the Carteſians: but in taking it in a peculiar ſenſe, for what is called meditation, reflection, deliberation. It is not probable that he defined memory in the manner which Pardies affirms he did; for, according to that definition, there is no difference between imagination and memory. Beſides, brutes will never be machines, ſo long as they ſhall be able to form the image of an abſent object; that is, what memory implies, according to the explanation even of Father Pardies. To conclude, the Jeſuit had no reaſon to oppoſe the criticiſm made on the tranſlator of Ariſtotle (59). Βουλεύεσθαι is a kind of thought, and not thought in general; ſo that tho' man only were capable of the βουλεύεσθαι, as Ariſtotle declares, it yet would not follow that he is the only thinking Being.

(59) By Scaliger. See Pardies, on the Knowledge of Brutes, num. 72. p. 140.

[I] It would be to as little purpoſe to refer us to the fourth book of Cicero's Tuſculan queſtions. . . . . . There to be machines, and what is ſaid by thoſe antient writers.

PEREZ

is no reſemblance or conformity between the doctrine which ſuppoſes them to be machines, and the relations of thoſe antient Authors.] A learned Prelate who has writ againſt Des Cartes, charges him with having advanced no doctrine but what is found in the Authors who preceded him. Here follow his proofs with reſpect to the doctrine of the ſoul of beaſts. Quid hoc eſt vero, quod * apud Ciceronem legimus, beſtias ſimile quiddam facere perturbationum animi, in perturbationes non incidere, quod hæ eveniant ſolum ex aſpernatione rationis. qua carent beſtiæ? quid aliud, inquam, ſuadet hoc nobis, quam beſtias mera eſſe automata? nam ſi perturbationibus carent, neque herum diligit canis, neque lupum ovis reformidat: imo, nec cibum appetunt, nec dolorem fugiunt, nec mortem timent; ſed ex coacto cæcæ materiæ motu id facere videntur quod non faciunt. Scribit conceptis verbis † Plutarchus credidiſſe Diogenem brutas animantes neque intelligere, neque ſentire: quod & confutavit  Porphyrius. Sciſcit †† Proclus animalia tantum rationalia anima eſſe prædita; additque decretum eſſe à Platone animam vere eſſe eam quæ ratione polleat, cætera ſimulacra animarum. At nemo doctrinam hanc vel tradidit apertius, vel fuſius propugnavit, quam Gometius Pereira (60). i. e. "What does that expreſſion mean, which we read in Cicero, that brutes do ſomething which is like to the paſſions of the mind; but that they are not ſuſceptible of paſſions, becauſe theſe proceed from the deſpiſing of reaſon, of which brutes are not poſſeſſed? What, I ſay, can this infer, but that brutes are mere machines? For in caſe they are without paſſions, a dog cannot love his maſter, nor a ſheep fear the wolf: nay, they cannot crave food, fly from pain, fear death; but from the neceſſary impulſe or motion of blind matter they ſeem to do what they really do not. Plutarch declares in expreſs terms, that Diogenes thought that brutes have neither underſtanding nor ſenſation; but this Porphyry refuted. Proclus aſſerts, that none but rational animals have ſouls: and adds, that it was aſſerted by Plato, that that is truly the ſoul which is endued with reaſon, and that the reſt are only images of ſouls: but no man has taught this doctrine more openly, or defended it more at large than Gomez Pereira." We here have four authorities; thoſe of Cicero, of Plutarch, of Porphyry, and Proclus. Let us examine them one after another, without making any mention of Pereira, of whom this learned Prelate ſpeaks in the laſt words of his remark; let us leave him, I ſay, ſince we have ſpoke ſufficiently of him in the remarks preceding this.

I. The paſſage from Cicero is not a good proof, it containing nothing but the diſtinction which the Stoicks made uſe of, and which the reader may have ſeen above (61). They affirmed, that the paſſions and reaſon were two contrary things; and conſequently that they could have but one and the ſame ſubject; they therefore could be found only in rational animals, and conſequently were not found in brutes. Illud animorum corporumque diſſimile eſt, quod animi valentes morbo tentari non poſſunt, corpora poſſunt. Sed corporum offenſiones ſine culpa accidere poſſunt, animorum non item, quorum omnes morbi & perturbationes ex aſpernatione rationis eveniunt. Itaque in hominibus ſolum exiſtunt. Nam beſtiæ ſimile quiddam faciunt, ſed in perturbationes non incidunt (62). i. e. "There is the following difference between ſouls, or minds, and bodies, that ſound or healthy minds cannot be affected with diſorders, which bodies may. But bodily diſorders may happen without the leaſt crime; but it is different with regard to the mind, all whoſe diſorders and paſſions are owing to the deſpiſing of reaſon. They therefore exiſt only in men: brutes do ſomething that reſembles men, but they are not incident to paſſions." Thus Cicero repreſents part of the ſubtilties of the Stoicks with regard to the doctrine of the paſſions (63). His expreſſions do not imply in any manner, that the Stoicks deprived animals of thoſe ſentiments which we love, hatred, anger, &c. They acknowledged that brutes do ſomething like what men do, who fall into a paſſion, devote themſelves to pleaſure, are preyed upon by fear, or any other paſſion; but they pretended that this ſtate was not really love, hatred, anger; or, in general, a paſſion in brutes; for, to be ſuch (ſay theſe) brutes muſt have fallen into it from a contempt of reaſon. Now they are irrational, and conſequently reaſon is not their rule; they do not perform any thing which has a tendency, either to deviate from that rule, or to conform to it. Since therefore the paſſions ariſe in men becauſe they deviate from reaſon, which is their rule or ſtandard; and ſince their nature conſiſts in being contrary or oppoſite to reaſon which they ought to follow; we muſt conclude that what paſſes in, or happens, with regard to beaſts, are not paſſions, though they reſemble paſſions. This is the reſult or ſcope of the ſubtilties of the Stoicks. It is properly a diſpute merely about words; and, at leaſt, it is very certain they did not deny, but that what the other Philoſophers called anger, love, or fear, in brutes, was a real ſenſation. They did not deny but that a dog knew his maſter, and a ſheep knew a wolf, as things which it was neceſſary for them to ſhun. I will not exhibit a collection of proofs, which would ſet this point in the cleareſt light. It will ſuffice to ſay, that thoſe who have laboured moſt to refute ſuch things as were paradoxical in the ſyſtem of the Stoicks, never charged them with reducing beaſts to the condition of Automata. But would they have ſpared them, had they advanced ſuch a doctrine?

II. The paſſage in Plutarch has been examined above (64). The reader may have objected, that it is obſcure, and formed of inconſiſtent parts. I add, that we diſcover clearly therein a ſtrong oppoſition between the doctrine of Diogenes and that of Des Cartes. According to the former, brutes conſiſt of body and ſoul; and if their ſoul has no actual ſenſation or ratiocination, it is becauſe the groſsneſs of their organs, and the abundance of their humours or moiſture reduces them to the condition of madmen. But Des Cartes does not allow any ſenſitive principle in brutes; he makes them conſiſt wholly of matter, and ſuppoſes them to be a body without a ſoul. I am to obſerve, that if the doctrine of Diogenes were probable in any reſpect, it would be ſo only with reſpect to oxen, ſwine, &c. but it ſeems ridiculous, when we apply it to ſwallows, flies, bees, and ants, whoſe organs are infinitely more delicate and leſs moiſt than thoſe of men.

III. I muſt expatiate more on the paſſage from Porphyry. The learned Prelate in queſtion affirms, that this Philoſopher has refuted the aſſertions of Diogenes with regard to brutes, viz. that they are uninformed with underſtanding or ſenſation: but it is certain that Porphyry does not refute any one, who had ſaid that they are inſenſible. His ſilence on that head is a direct proof that no perſon had ever yet ſtarted ſuch a paradox; for as nothing is more contrary to the ſcope or deſign of Porphyry in that work, he would certainly have refuted that hypotheſis. He was attempting to prove, that we ought not to feed upon the fleſh of animals; there appeared to him many inconveniences in this cuſtom, and in particular as it was introducing cruelty (65). He collected all ſorts of anſwers to the objections of his adverſaries. Now what objection could be ſo ſtrong, as to ſuppoſe that brutes have no ſenſation? Is it not certain that were this once eſtabliſhed, there would not be more cruelty in killing an ox than in pulling up a turnep (66)? Here follows another conſideration, which makes me believe, that Porphyry had not once heard of the paradox, which it is pretended he refuted. He lays it down as a principle univerſally acknowledged, that brutes are endued with ſenſation (67), and he infers this conſequence from it, they therefore are rational (68); and he finds in that conſequence the moſt ſpecious arguments he can alledge in favour of his opinion. He propoſes the following objection himſelf; ſince the animal nature includes ſome rational Beings, it alſo muſt include irrational ones (69); and he makes the ſame anſwer as Plutarch, or rather copies word for word, three or four pages from that Author, but without naming him. The things he ſtole from him contain in particular, what the reader may have ſeen above in the remark [E] (70).

* Ciceron. Tuſcul. lib. 4.

† Plutarch, De placit. Philoſ. lib. 5. cap. 20.

 Porphyr. De abſt. ab anim. lib. 3.

†† Procl. in Platon. Philoſ. lib. 3. cap. 1.

(60) Petrus Daniel Huetius, Cenſ. Philoſophiæ Carteſianæ, cap. 8. p. 208. edit. Paris 1689.

(61) Rem. [E].

(62) Cicero, Tuſcul lib. 4. fol. m. 267. C.

(63) Habet ea, quæ de perturbationibus enucleate diſputant Stoici, quæ logica appellant, quia diſſeruntur ſubtilius. Idem, ibid.

(64) Citat. (46).

(65) Porphyr. de Abſtinentia, lib. 3. cap. 20. p. 125. edit. Cantab. 1655. See alſo chap. 19. p. 122.

(66) I do not deny but that this would accuſtom men to ſhed blood; and incline him to be leſs compaſſionate, and more ſavage and barbarous towards his fellow creatures.

(67) Porphyr. de Abſtinentia, lib. 3. cap. 21. p. 125.

(68) Idem, ibid. cap. 1. p. 101. & cap. 21, 22. & alibi.

(69) Idem, ibid. cap. 7. p. 109.

(70) Citations (49) (50)

(70). Theſe are two paſſages which ſhew demonſtratively, that, in that age, all the Philoſophers in general believed there was no ſuch Being as an inſenſitive animal. Amyot has tranſlated the firſt paſſage ſo ill, that it is impoſſible to underſtand any part of it, but has ſucceeded better in the ſecond. I ſhall tranſcribe his very expreſſions, and will obſerve below, why I infert them in this place. "And as to "thoſe who ſpeak ſo ſtupidly and ſo impertinently, as "to affirm that animals neither delight, are not angry, nor fear, that the ſwallow does not make "any proviſion, and the bee has no memory; but "that the ſwallow only ſeems to have foreſight, the "lion ſeems to be angry, and the hind to quake for "fear: I cannot think what anſwer they will be "able to make to thoſe who ſhould object to them; "that we alſo ſhould ſay, that they neither ſee nor "hear, nor have a voice; and that they only ſeem "to ſee and have a voice: in a word, that they do "not live, but only ſeem to live; for to aſſert the "one, would be as repugnant to the cleareſt evi-"dence, as to affirm the other (71)." I tranſcribed this paſſage, to ſtrengthen the conſequence I drew from it, viz. that the doctrine of the automata or machines was conſidered in that age, not as a doctrine which had ever been ſtarted, but as a doctrine which the Stoicks were not able to refute, if any perſon ſhould take it into his head to employ that objection, to defeat them with their own weapons. Plutarch, (will it be ſaid) and Porphyry, make uſe of the word λέγουσι, which is the participle of the preſent tenſe. There conſequently were ſome perſons who made this objection to the Stoicks. I anſwer, that the French tranſlator of Plutarch, as the reader has juſt now ſeen, agrees in that particular with Xylander (72), who has proved by the learned Holſtenius (73), that the λέγουσι ought to be taken in the future conditional tenſe. This is allowable according to the rules of Grammar, and Hiſtory requires it in this place; for Plutarch and Porphyry, thoſe great ſticklers for the reaſon of brutes, would doubtleſs have diſputed againſt the doctrine of the Automata, had they known there was, or had been, any ſuch opinion. Now they do not ſay a word of this.

(71) Plutarch, What Animals are the moſt wary, p. m. 472, according to Amyot's verſion, Geneva edit. 1621. 8vo.

(72) The Latin Tranſlator of Plutarch.

(73) In his Latin tranſlation of Porphyry de Abſtinentia.

IV. As to Proclus, it is true, he aſſerts, that, according to Plato, the rational ſoul is perfectly a ſoul, and that the other ſouls are but images, or repreſentations of ſouls; but, at the ſame time, he ſays, that they partake of knowledge and life, and that rational animals are not the only ones which partake of underſtanding; but that all other animals endued with imagination, memory, and ſenſation, partake of it alſo. Is not this teaching very evidently, that brutes have a ſenſitive ſoul; ſuch, in a word, as the followers of Ariſtotle deſcribe it? Though this paſſage of Proclus be ſomething prolix, I yet will tranſcribe the whole, in order that my Readers may not entertain any doubt, with regard to the ſenſe in which it is to be taken; and that they may be ſure it could not ſerve as a prelude to the Carteſian doctrine, with regard to brutes. Καὶ ὅλως πολλαχῇ δῆλός ἐστι καὶ ὁ Πλάτων ψυχὴν τὴν λογικὴν εἶναι τιθέμενος, τὰς δὲ ἄλλας, εἴδωλα ψυχῶν καθόσον εἰσὶ καὶ αὗται νοεραὶ καὶ ζωτικαὶ, μετὰ τῶν ὅλων παράγουσαι τὰς περὶ τὰ σώματα ζωάς· τὸ δὲ μόνον τὰ λογικὰ ζῶα μετέχειν συγχωρήσομεν, ἀλλὰ καὶ τῶν ἄλλων, ὅσα γνωσικὴν ἔχει δύναμιν· φαντασίαν λέγω, καὶ μνήμην, καὶ αἴσθησιν· ἐπεὶ καὶ ὁ ἐν Φιλήβῳ Σωκράτης, ἐπὶ τὴν νοερὰν ἄγει τὰ τοιαῦτα πάντα σπεύδων. Deinque multis in locis conſtat & ipſum Platonem ſtatuere illam ratione præditam animam, veram eſſe animam, alias verò, animarum eſſe ſimulacra, quatenus ſunt & illæ intellectuales & vivificæ, cum ipſis univerſis producentes illas, quæ circa ipſa corpora, & in ipſis corporibus ſunt. Concedemus autem non ſolum animalia ratione prædita participare Mentem: ſed etiam alia, quæcumque cognoſcendi facultatem habent. Phantaſiam autem dico, & memoriam & ſenſum. Quoniam & illa Socrates, qui in Philebo diſputans introducitur, hujuſmodi omnia ad intellectum rerum ſeriem reducit (74). That my Readers may the better underſtand this, I ſhall obſerve, that in Plato's doctrine, there was ſuch a difference between the ſoul and underſtanding, as is not unlike the difference which the Peripateticks ſuppoſe there is between the genus and ſpecies. The Platonicks aſſerted, that four things which preceded one another, viz. eſſence, life, underſtanding, and the ſoul, were prior to bodies; that life partakes of eſſence, the underſtanding partakes of life and eſſence; and that the ſoul partakes of underſtanding, life, and eſſence, and has alſo reaſon as its peculiar nature. This is what would be called in ſchools, the ſpecific difference of the ſoul. Τεττάρων τοίνυν τούτων ὄντων πρὸ τῆς σωματικῆς ὑποστάσεως αἰτίων, οὐσίας, ζωῆς, νοῦ, ψυχῆς, ψυχὴ μὲν ἀπάντων μετέχει τῶν πρὸ αὐτῆς, τοῦ μὲν λόγου, καίτοι τὴν ἰδιότητα λαχοῦσα, τοῦ δὲ νοῦ, καὶ τῆς ζωῆς, καὶ τοῦ ὄντος, ἀπὸ τῶν ὑπερουσίων αἰτίων. Cum igitur hæ quatuor cauſæ ſint ante corpoream hypoſtaſin, Eſſentia, Vita, Mens, Anima, Anima quidem, particeps eſt omnium eorum, quæ ſunt ante ipſam, ipſam quidem rationem, ſecundum ſuam proprietatem ſortita, Mentem vero, & Vitam, & ipſum Ens ab antiquioribus cauſas adepta (75). In this manner the ſoul might concur or conſpire four ways in the diſpoſing of all poſterior Beings: it extends its influence to bodies, inaſmuch as it exiſts: it extends it to plants, inaſmuch as it lives; and to brutes, inaſmuch as it partakes of the underſtanding, and to the firſt natures, ſuſceptible of reaſon, with the reſt of the attributes, inaſmuch as it is rational. With regard to the underſtanding which had preceded the ſoul, and is the fulneſs of life, and even of being; it influences, after three manners, the œconomy of the univerſe. It illuminated, by its ſpecific virtue, all that is endued with the faculty of knowledge (76); and it concurred in communicating life to a greater number of things, and eſſence to all that Being has formed. Brutes were ranked in the claſs of creatures, which received the irradiation of its virtue. This is evident from the words which Proclus employs, where he ſpeaks of what the ſoul does, inaſmuch as it partakes in the underſtanding. Καὶλὰ μὲν τὸ ὂν τὸ ἑαυτῆς, τὰ πάντα ὑφίστησι καὶ μετέχει σωμάτων· καὶλὰ δὲ τὴν ζωὴν, πάντα τὰ λεγόμενα ζῆν, καὶ μετέχει τῶν φυτῶν. καὶλὰ δὲ τὸν νοῦν, πάντα τὰ γνωσικὴν ἔχοντα δύναμιν, καὶ μετέχει τῶν ἀλογωτάτων. Secundum quidem ipſum ipſius Animæ Ens, omnia (conſtituit) vel uſque ad ipſa corpora. Secundum vero vitam, omnia quæ vivere dicuntur, & uſque ad ipſas plantas. Secundum vero Mentem omnia quæ cognitione præditam facultatem habent, & uſque ad ipſa maxime bruta (77).

(74) Proclus, in Platonis Theologiam, lib. 3. cap. 1. p. 128. edit. Hamburg 1618. folio. Ex verſione Æmilii Porti.

(75) Idem, ibid. p. 129.

(76) Νῦς . . . πρῶτος διακοσμεῖ τὰ πάντα, τὰς μὲν νοερὰς ἰδιότητος ἅπασι, τοῖς γνωσικοῖς ἐλλάμπων τὴν συνάμιν. Mens . . . . trifariam omnia digerit ipſius quidem intellectualis proprietatis facultatem omnibus cognoſcendi vim habentibus per ſuam illuminationem largiens. Idem, ibid.

(77) Idem, ibid.

Nothing could be eaſier than to collect authorities, which would prove evidently, that when Plato ſaid the ſoul of brutes is the image of a ſoul, he did not thereby mean to deprive them of ſenſation. See Plotinus, chap. 11. of book 1. of the 1ſt Ennead. Conſider alſo the following paſſage from a modern Platonic Philoſopher (78). Irrationalem animam Platonici non tam ſubſtantiale aliquid, quam accidentale quiddam eſſe putant, quaſi rationalium VESTIGIUM animarum, in quo SENSUS quidem ſint, ſed per diverſa corporis inſtrumenta diviſi atque patibilis; i. e. "The Platonic Phi-"loſophers are of opinion, that the irrational ſoul is "not ſo much a ſubſtance as an accident; the TRA-"CES, as it were, of rational ſouls, wherein indeed, "the SENSES are but divided and paſſive, by the va-"rious organs of the body." I have given elſewhere (79) the analyſis of ſome paſſages in the 25th diſſertation of a Platonic Philoſopher, who points out very clearly, what it is that diſtinguiſhes the ſoul of brutes from the human ſoul; but he is contented with depriving brutes of ſouls, and ſuppoſes them to be endued with ſenſation (80).

(78) Marcilius Ficinus, in Compendio in Timæum Platonis, cap. 41. p. m. 1038. Operum Platonis.

(79) In the rem. [L], of the art. PAULICIANS.

(80) Ἄλογον, ἄρρενα, ἀλληλοφθόρον, ἀνόητον θεοῦ ἀρετῆς ἄμοιρον ὑπ' αἰσθήσεως σφετέρας βοσκόμενον καὶ δημαγωγούμενον, ἰσχύειν μὲν τοῖς σώμασι, ἀμηχανεῖν δὲ τῷ λογισμῷ. Sine ratione aut prudentia: ita ut alterum in perniciem alterius natum, improvidum, divinæ virtutis expers, ſoloque ſenſu in diem gauderet & duceretur: corporis viribus excellerit, intellectu autem nihil poſſet. Maxim. Tyrius, p. 238.

PEREZ (JOSEPH), in Latin Perezius, a Spaniſh Monk, and Profeſſor of Divinity in the Univerſity of Salamanca, applied himſelf very vigorouſly to the illuſtrating of the Hiſtory of Spain, eſpecially with relation to the Benedictine Order. He publiſhed (a) Eccleſiaſtical Diſſertations in 1688, in which he refuted certain things advanced by Father Papebroch in his Prolegomena to the Acta Sanctorum for the Month of April: he thought him too rigid with reſpect to the acts of St. Eleutherius; but he confeſſed it was but juſt to ſuppreſs ſeveral apocryphal pieces, which have been publiſhed concerning the (a) In Latin, at Salamanca.

the Saints [A]. It was not long (b) ſince he died (c).

(b) I write this in September 1697.

(c) Extracted from Father Papebroch's Anſwer, ad Exhibitionem Errorum, Art. 11. num. 232, 233.

[A] He thought Father Papebroch too rigid, with regard to the acts of St. Eleutherius; but he confeſſed that it was but juſt, to ſuppreſs ſeveral apocryphal pieces which have been publiſhed concerning the Saints.] Saint Eleutherius, Biſhop of Ecane (1), and Saint Anthia his mother, were greatly renowned in the Greek Church, after that their relicks were conveyed, under the Emperor Arcadius, from Rome to Conſtantinople. Their acts were written by Leontius and Theodulus, who, as we are told, lived in that age: however, Father Papebroch is not of that opinion, he conſiders them as ſuppoſititions, and gives a great many reaſons for his opinion. Nevertheleſs, he publiſhed them under the 18th of April. Father Perez thought his criticiſm too ſevere, for which reaſon, he endeavoured to refute it; but at the ſame time applauds the prodigious pains the Jeſuits take who publiſh the Acta Sanctorum, and reject many of them. Pleraque enim (fatendum eſt) Sanctorum acta, ſays he, circumferebantur, partim apertè falſa, partim tenebris denſiſſimis obſita quæ ab doctiſſimis patribus admodum falce juxta & face egere videbantur (2); i. e. "It "muſt be confeſſed, (ſays he,) that a great num- "ber of acts of the Saints were publiſhed, ſome "whereof were manifeſtly falſe, and others obſcure "to the laſt degree, which, in the opinion of the moſt "learned Fathers, wanted to be purged in the moſt "ſevere manner." The public have at laſt been obliged to own, that Melchior Canus gave a very juſt idea of the legendary writers, when he ſaid that the lives of the antient Philoſophers had been writ with more judgment than thoſe of the Chriſtian Saints. They are now more ſtrictly examined; the acts of the new Saints are not larded with ſo many abſurd particulars; it is nevertheleſs certain, that the Writers are ſtill a little negligent on that head. Here follows the ſequel of a paſſage which I cited elſewhere (3); but the moſt diverting circumſtance, Goody, (ſays an Attorney's wife of St. Germain's pariſh) is, that going to the Church of the bare-footed Carmelites, I heard a hawker crying about, the life and miracles of Madam Sta. Thereſa. I bought one of them, in order to gain the indulgences. But being returned home, my huſband began to read it, and was ſurpriſed to find that Sta. Thereſa had two fathers, the firſt, King Bermudes, and the ſecond, Alonzo Sanchez de Cepede (4). This converſation is ſuppoſed to have been held on occaſion of the canonization of St. Thereſa, in 1622. The Author of this piece was not a Proteſtant, he ſaying many bitter things againſt thoſe who profeſs that religion.

(1) A city of Italy.

(2) Extracted from Daniel Papebroch, in Reſponſione ad exhibitionem Errorum, p. 303, 304.

(3) In the rem. [CC] of the article HADRIAN VI.

(4) Caquet de l'Accouchée, ſeconde Journée, p. 7.

PERGA or PERGE, a city of Pamphylia, on a very high place, near which town a Temple of Diana was built (a). It was very antient, and had in great veneration: and though the Epheſian Diana ſurpaſſed that of Perga, the latter had nevertheleſs a conſiderable ſhare in the devotion of nations (b). An Aſſembly was held there every year (c); on which occaſion we may certainly ſuppoſe that the hymns were ſung, written in honour of that Goddeſs, compoſed by Damophila, contemporary with Sapho; and which was ſtill ſung in the time of Apollonius Tyanæus (d). The Diana of Perga, Περγαία Ἄρτεμις, is mentioned on ſeveral Medals (e). This was one of the cities in which St. Paul preached the Chriſtian Faith (f). The famous Geometrician Apollonius Pergæus (g), who wrote a Treatiſe in Conic Sections, was born in it. It is now in a poor condition; its Archiepiſcopal See being transferred to Attalia (h), one of the fourteen cities which was formerly under its juriſdiction. Perga is eight miles from the Sea.

(a) Strabo, lib. 14. p. 459.

(b) Pergæ fanum antiquiſſimum & ſanctiſſimum Dianæ ſcimus eſſe, id quoque à te nudatum & ſpoliatum eſſe, ex ipſa Diana quod habebat auri detractum atque ablatum eſſe dico. Cicero, in Verr. Orat. 6.

(c) Strabo, lib. 14. p. 459.

(d) See Philoſtratus, in ejus Vita, lib. 1.

(e) Spanhemius, de præſt. & uſu Numiſm. p. 782.

(f) Acts of the Apoſtles, chap. 13, 14.

(g) I have given that article.

(h) Baudrand, Geograph.

PERGAMUS, a city of Aſia in Myſia, became very famous under the Monarchs who ſucceeded Philæterus. It was very advantageouſly ſituated [A], and was at firſt a Fortreſs built on a Mountain (a). Lyſimachus, one of Alexander's Succeſſors, depoſited his treaſures in it, and gives the Government of it to one, who, taking the advantage of the ſituation of affairs, ſeized upon them [B], as will be ſeen hereunder. The magnificent

(a) Strabo, lib. 13. p. 428, 429.

[A] It was very advatageouſly ſituated.] Particularly by the great commodiouſneſs of the rivers near it. Longeque clariſſimum Aſiæ Pergamum quod intermeat Selinus, præfluit Cetius profuſus Pindaſo monte (1); i. e. "The river Cetius, whoſe ſource is in mount Pin- "daſus, flows by Pergamus, the moſt famous city "of Aſia, and Selinus runs through it." Theſe are Pliny's words. I wonder he did not mention the Caicus, another river which flowed near Pergamus, and the only one mentioned by Strabo, where he deſcribes that city. Παραῤῥεῖ δ' ὁ Κάϊκος καὶ τὸ Πέργαμον διὰ τῆς Καΐκου πεδίου προσαγορευομένου, σφόδρα εὐδαίμονα γῆν διεξιὼν, σχεδόν τοι καὶ τὴν ἀρίστην τῆς Μυσίας (2); i. e. "The river Caicus flows by Pergamus, "through a very fruitful plain, called Caicus, and "alſo flows through the beſt part of Aſia."

(1) Plinius, lib. 5. cap. 30. num. 611.

(2) Strabo, lib. 13. p. 429.

[B] One . . . ſeized upon them.] The perſon I mean was Philetærus. He had been an eunuch from his infancy, and that by an accident. His nurſe, who had carried him to a funeral, was crowded ſo prodigiouſly by the ſpectators, that the child's teſticles were ſqueezed to pieces. Συνέβη γὰρ ἔν τινι ταφῇ θέας οὔσης, καὶ πολλῶν παρόντων, ἀπωληφθεῖσαν ἐν τῷ ὄχλῳ τὴν κομίζουσαν τροφὸν τοῦ Φιλέταιρον ἔτι νήπιον, συνθλιβῆναι μέχρι τοσοῦδε, ὡς τε πηρωθῆναι τὸν παῖδα· ἦν μὲν δὴ εὐνοῦχος. Nam ſpectaculo quodam funebri, in magna hominum frequentia, nutrix eum geſtans etiamnum infantem in turba hominum deprehenſa, adeò fuit oppreſſa, ut pueri etiam colliderentur genitalia. Erat ergo eunuchus (3). So good an education was beſtowed upon him, that he was capable of exerciſing the moſt exalted employments; and he muſt neceſſarily have been reputed an honeſt man, ſince Lyſimachus entruſted him with the Government of the fortreſs, in which he had depoſited all his treaſures. Philetærus was very faithful to his truſt, till he was ſtrongly attacked by the calumny of Arſinoe, Lyſimachus's wife. From that time he began to withdraw himſelf from the allegiance he owed to that Prince; and to take ſuch meaſures as might maintain him in the independance he intended to uſurp. Affairs were then in ſuch a ſituation, as were greatly advantageous to him. Lyſimachus, oppreſſed with domeſtic diviſions, was obliged to put to death his ſon Agathocles: notwithſtanding which, he was oppreſſed by Seleucus Nicator, and at laſt murdered by the treachery of Ptolomy Ceraunus. Philetærus, during theſe diviſions, ſecured himſelf in the poſſeſſion of Pergamus; he employed artifice, and amuſed that party which he thought the moſt formidable, with vain words and compliments; ſo that, for twenty years, he was poſſeſſed of the caſtle and treaſures of Lyſimachus. His nephew Eumenes (4) was his heir; and enlarged his power by the conqueſts of ſeveral places round Pergamus. He won a battle near Sardis, againſt Antiochus the ſon of Seleucus, and died after having reigned twenty two years (5). Attalus, his firſt Couſin and Succeſſor, aſſumed the title of King. See the following article. Chronologers fix the beginning of Philetærus's reign to the year of Rome 468. He lived to fourſcore years of age (6). Some ſay that his mother was named Boa; that ſhe was a Paphlagonian by birth, a Courtezan by profeſſion, and a Minſtrel (7). He was born at Teium ſtanding on Pontus Euxinus (8).

(3) Ibid. p. 428.

(4) The ſon of Eumenes, brother to Phileterus.

(5) Extracted from Strabo, lib. 13. p. 428, 429.

(6) Lucianus, in Macrobiis.

(7) Athen. lib. 13. p. 577.

(8) Strabo, lib. 12. p. 374.

nificent Library [C] ſet up by the Kings of Pergamus, and Æſculapius's Temple [D] were the principal ornaments of that city. The reader will find in Moreri, that the inhabitants of it built a Temple in honour of the Emperor Auguſtus, and the city of Rome;

[C] The magnificent Library.] I will begin the following remark with a paſſage from Lomeier: Attalus & Eumenes Pergami Reges nobilem bibliothecam conquiſitis undique ſupra ducenta millia exemplaribus, in hædinis pellibus, quæ ab hoc loco pergamenæ dictæ ſunt, deſcriptis, conſtruxiſſe feruntur (9). i. e. "It is related "that Atticus and Eumenes, Kings of Pergamus, "built a noble Library, having collected upwards of "two hundred thouſand volumes from all countries, "in kid's ſkins, which were called, from this coun- "try, Pergamenæ or Parchment." He quotes Chap. II. Book XXV. of Pliny, but we there meet only with the following words: An priores cœperint Alexandriæ & Pergami Reges qui bibliothecas magno certamine inſtituere non facile dixerim. i. e. "I am not "ſure, whether the Monarchs of Alexandria and "Pergamus, who ſtrove to rival one another in the "ſetting up Libraries, firſt began to do this." This quotation from Pliny is therefore not juſt. This Author indeed informs us, in another part of his work, that the People of Pergamus found out the art of preparing ſkins to employ them inſtead of paper. Mox æmulatione circa bibliothecas regum Ptolemæi & Eumenis, ſupprimente chartas Ptolemæo, idem Varro membranas Pergami tradidit repertas (10). We are informed in this paſſage, that the emulation between the Kings of Egypt and Pergamus, who ſhould compoſe the fineſt Library, made the Egyptian Monarch forbid the exportation of paper, which gave occaſion to the invention of parchment. It will be proper to quote St. Jerom in this place. Chartam, ſays he (11), deſuiſſe non puto, Ægypto miniſtrante commercia, & ſi alicubi Ptolemæus maria clauſiſſet, tamen Rex Attalus membranas à Pergamo miſerat, ut penuria chartæ pellibus penſaretur. Unde & Pergamenarum nomen ad hunc uſque diem, tradente ſibi invicem poſteritate, ſervatum eſt. i. e. "It is my opinion that there was no want of "paper, as Egypt traded with other nations; and in "caſe Ptolemy had ſhut up the harbours any where, "yet King Attalus had ſent ſkins from Pergamus, to "ſupply the want of paper: whence it has pre- "ſerved, to this age, the name of Pergame- "na or Parchment." As to the number of books mentioned by Lomeier, we muſt have recourſe to Plutarch (12), who ſays that Mark Anthony made a preſent to Cleopatra of the Library of Pergamus, in which were two hundred thouſand volumes. Father Jacob, in his treatiſe on Libraries, page 28. Part I. affirms very falſely that Strabo ſays, that the Library in queſtion contained two hundred and eighty thouſand volumes. The Sieur le Gallois (13) aſſerts ſtill more falſely, that Pliny declares them to have been ſtill more numerous. Lipſius ſtarts a difficulty unworthy of himſelf with regard to Plutarch's words. Strabo, ſays he (14), who wrote under Tiberius, affirms that the Library of Pergamus was then ſubſiſting in the ſame condition in which King Eumenes ſet it up. Conſequently it had not been removed to Alexandria, in order to be preſented to Cleopatra; or we muſt ſuppoſe that Auguſtus, who undid moſt things that Mark Anthony had done, had it carried back to Pergamus; or that after it had been loſt under Mark Anthony, another had been ſet up exactly like it. This is what we call modum in ſcirpo quærere, (ſeeking a knot in a bull-ruſh) for Strabo does not mean, that the People of Pergamus were ſtill poſſeſſed of the Library or other ornaments with which Eumenes had embelliſhed it; but only that it had not been increaſed ſince the reign of Eumenes. This Prince, ſays he, put it into the ſtate, in which we now ſee it. This is the ſenſe of the Greek text (15): Καλλωπίσας δ' ὅτο τὴν πόλιν, καὶ τὸ Νικηφόριον ἄλσο καλλιφύτευσε, καὶ ἀναθήμασι, καὶ βιβλιοθήκας, καὶ τὴν ἐπὶ τοσόνδε καλλονίαν τῆ Περγάμῳ τὴν νῦν ἥσαν ἐκεῖνο προσεφιλοκάλησε. Hic urbem adornavit, & lucum Nicephorium conſevit, ac donaria & bibliothecas & habitationis locum in Pergamo tantum quantus hodieque eſt conſtituit luculenter (16). Lipſius's objection againſt Vitruvius is better grounded. Reges Attalici magnis philologiæ dulcedinibus inducti cum egregiam bibliothecam Pergami ad communem delectationem inſtituiſſent, tum item Ptolemæus, infinito zelo cupiditatiſque incitatus ſtudio, non minoribus induſtriis ad eundem modum contenderat Alexandriæ comparare (17). Theſe are Vitruvius's words, the plain import of which is, that Ptolemy Philadelphus (18) adorned the city of Alexandria with a noble Library, in emulation of that which the Kings of Pergamus had ſet up in the capital of their Dominions. Lipſius finds very juſtly an error in this paſſage. The Alexandrian Library was ſet up before the Kings of Pergamus, who founded Libraries, were born. But this does not deſtroy what Pliny ſays with reſpect to the emulation between Ptolemy and Eumenes; for no doubt but the King of Egypt, who was contemporary with Eumenes, was greatly ſorry to find, that the King of Pergamus was founding a Library, which might eclipſe the glory of that of Alexandria. I am to obſerve, that the emulation between the Monarchs in queſtion, gave occaſion to a great number of frauds with regard to books, as Galen obſerves. Scribit Galenus, Comment. 1. in lib. Hippocr. de natura hum. inter Alexandriæ & Pergami reges contentionem fuiſſe, quis plura veterum volumina compararet. Tum vero multos ab hominibus pecuniæ avidis falſis auctorum nominibus libros inſcriptos eſſe, quo vetuſtatis plurimum iis & auctoritatis accederet (19), i. e. "We are told by Galen, that an emulation aroſe "between the Kings of Alexandria and Pergamus, "which of them ſhould procure the greateſt number "of volumes of antient Authors. On this occaſion "books, by many perſons greedy of money, were "falſely aſcribed to Authors, in order to give "the greater weight to them, and make them be "judged of the greater antiquity." I have juſt now read in an excellent work (20), that many people think that the Kings of Pergamus began to adorn their city with a Library; and that Attalus formed his Library twenty two years before that of Alexandria. I do not criticiſe the Author of this book; for what he affirms, viz. that this is believed, is doubtleſs true with regard to great numbers of people: many people may ſuppoſe this: all I ſay is, that they are miſtaken. The firſt King of Pergamus, who was named Attalus, was born ſome years after the death of Ptolemy Philadelphus, who founded the Alexandrian Library. The Author adds, in the book in queſtion (21), that the Library of the Kings of Pergamus was brought to Rome. I wiſh he had cited an authority for this.

[D] . . . . and Æſculapius's Temple.] This Deity is ſirnamed Pergameneus in Martial (22); and it is related by a Roman Hiſtorian, that when an enquiry was made in Rome, after thoſe Aſylums which were not truly ſuch, the proofs of the Æſculapius of Pergamus were found valid. Conſules ſuper eas civitates quas memoravi, apud Pergamam Æſculapii compertum aſylum retulerunt: ceteros obſcuris ob vetuſtatem initiis niti (23). i. e. "The Conſuls who preſided over the "cities, I took notice, declared, that an Aſylum of "Æſculapius was found in Pergamus; but that, as "to the reſt, they depended wholly on uncertain tra- "ditions." A man who reads this paſſage in Tacitus, may very probably call to mind the enquiry, which it is ſo neceſſary to make, from time to time, with regard to titles of Nobility. But the enquiry made with regard to falſe aſylums was of much greater importance. So great an abuſe, in this article, was crept into the Grecian cities, that the Magiſtrates found it impoſſible to put the laws in execution, in their due rigour: debtors and criminals of every kind had their ſeveral aſylums, where they were protected by the populace, who thought it a duty incumbent on them, as if it had been an article of Religion. Crebreſcebat enim Græcas per urbes licentia atque impunitas aſyla ſtatuendi: complebantur templa peſſimis ſervitiorum, eodem ſubſidio obærati adverſum creditores, ſuſpectique capitalium criminum receptabantur. Nec ullum ſatis validum imperium erat coërcendis ſeditionibus populi, flagitia hominum ut cærimonias deum protegentis (24). To put a ſtop to this evil practice, an order was iſſued out, commanding all cities, in which were privileged temples, to ſend to Rome the proofs or authorities for their

(9) Lomeier, de Bibliothecis, cap. 6. p. 96.

(10) Plin. lib. 13. cap. 11. p. m. 78, 79.

(11) Hieronym. Epiſt. ad Chrom. Jovin. & Euſeb.

(12) Plutarch. in Vita Marci Antonii.

(13) Gallois, Traite des Bibl. p. 27.

(14) Lipſius, Syntagm. de Bibliothb. cap. 4.

(15) Strabo, lib. 13. p. 429, 430.

(16) Thus theſe words ought to have been tranſlated, and not as Lipſius, de Bibliothecis, cap. 4. Eumenes urbem inſtruxit, & donariis ac bibliothecis, uti nunc eſt, eleganter excoluit. Le Sieur Le Gallois, Traite des Bibl. p. 27. makes uſe of all theſe reflections of Lipſius, without naming him.

(17) Vitruvius, in Præfat. lib. 7.

(18) Vitruvius's words, as they are connected, can be underſtood only of Ptolemy Philadelphus.

(19) Harduinus: in Plin. lib. 35. cap. 2. p. 175.

(20) Jaquelot, de l'Exiſtence de Dieu, p. 126.

(21) Ibid. p. 127.

(22) Martial. Epigr. 17. lib. 9.

(23) Tacit. Annal. lib. 3. cap. 63. ad ann. 775.

(24) Idem, ibid. cap. 60.

Rome (b); and that Galen was born there. It alſo gave birth to ſeveral other renowned perſons, whoſe names are found in Strabo (c). Add to them Oribaſius, Phyſician of Julian the Apoſtate (d).

(b) Tacit. Annal. lib. 4. cap. 37. Cum divus Auguſtus ſibi atque urbi Romæ templum apud Pergamum ſiſti non probibuiſſet.

(c) Strabo, lib. 13. p. 429, 430.

(d) Eunapius, in Vita Oribaſii.

their being Aſylums (25). Some of theſe cities being conſcious of the uſurpation, gave it up (26). Many others relying on antient traditions, or the ſervices they had done to the Romans, ſent deputies. Accordingly the Senate admitted them to audience; but being at laſt tired out with their idle tales, and the factions which were formed, they referred this enquiry to the conſuls. Auditæ aliarum quoque civitatum legationes. Quorum copia feſſi patres, & quia ſtudiis certabatur conſulibus permiſere, ut perſpecta jure, & ſi qua iniquitas involveretur, rem integram rurſum ad Senatum referrent (27). The Conſuls did not act with great rigour on this occaſion, but admitted ſeveral titles of Nobility though grounded wholly on Chimæras: as for inſtance, they admitted, as an authentick proof, what the Epheſians affirmed to them, that the Olive-tree, on which Latona leaned, when ſhe was delivered of Apollo, was ſtill extant. Eſſe apud ſe Cenchrium amnem, lucum Ortygiam, ubi Latonam partu gravidam & oleæ quæ tum etiam maneat adniſam, edidiſſe ea numina, deorumque monitu ſacratum nemus (28). i. e. "That near them was the river Cenchrius, "and the grove Ortygia, where Latona being with "Child, and leaning upon an olive-tree which ſtill "remains there, was delivered of thoſe Deities; "and that the grove was conſecrated by the com-"mand of the Gods." The Judges or inſpectors would not be leſs indulgent, in caſe orders ſhould be given for every pariſh to exhibit the proofs of their ſeveral devotions and relicks. It is well known with what blindneſs the Heathens aſſerted their traditions; nevertheleſs people will not open their eyes, and thereby diſcover the ridiculouſneſs of the ſtories that are told in all places, which boaſt a privileged devotion.

(25) Igitur placitum ut mitterent civitatis jura, atque legatos. Idem, ibid.

(26) Quædam quod falſo uſurpaverant ſponte omiſere: multæ vetuſtis ſuperſtitionibus, aut meritis in populum Romanum fidebant. Idem. ib.

(27) Idem, ibid. cap. 63.

(28) Tacit. Annal. lib. 3. cap. 61.

Polybius furniſhes as good a reflection as this. Pruſias having vanquiſhed Attalus entered into Pergamus (29), and went and offered Æſculapius a pompous ſacrifice, after which he returned to his camp. The next day he cauſed all the Temples to be plundered, and he himſelf took the Statue of Æſculapius on his ſhoulders (30), to which he had ſacrificed victims, and whoſe aid he had invoked the day before. Polybius calls this the action of a frantick mad wretch. Ἅμα μὲν θύειν καὶ διὰ τοῦλον ἐξιλάσκεσθαι τὸ θεῖον προσκυνοῦντα καὶ λιπαροῦντα τὰς τραπέζας καὶ τοὺς βωμοὺς ἐξάλλως, ὅπερ ὁ Προυσίας ἐποίει ποιεῖν, γονυπετῶν καὶ γυναικίζόμενον· ἅμα δὲ ταῦτα καὶ λυμαίνεσθαι καὶ διὰ τῆς τοῦλου καλαφθορᾶς τὴν εἰς τὸ θεῖον ὕβριν διαλίθισθαι, πῶς ἐκ ἂν εἴποι τις εἶναι θυμοῦ λυτοῦντος ἔργα καὶ ψυχῆς ἐξεστηκυίας τῶν λογισμῶν (31). i. e. "For to ſacrifice victims, and "implore the Gods to be propitious; to adore every "altar and ſtone, in a poſture of the loweſt humilia-"tion, and with a womaniſh ſuperſtition, as was "Pruſias's cuſtom; and in the mean time to demo-"liſh the ſame temples, and by ſo doing affront the "Gods; what man will deny but that this is acting "like a raving mad-man?" I am ſure that Polybius would have ſpoke in leſs harſh terms of thoſe, who ſhould have plundered temples, without having invoked the Deities to which they were conſecrated. What he relates, that Pruſias entered Pergamus, is conſiſtent with what Diodorus Siculus tells us, viz. that this Prince giving up all hopes of being ever able to take Attalus priſoner, plunder'd the temple of Nicephorus, which was not far diſtant from the city (32). But here, (will ſome ſay) is an argument that is ſtill ſtronger againſt Polybius. King Eumenes, in his ſpeech to the Senate of Rome, declares expreſsly, that he was beſieged in Pergamus, and that he was ſo fortunate as to prevent the taking of that city. Quod miſerrimum eſt in bello, obſidionem paſſus ſum, Pergami incluſus cum diſcrimine ultimo ſimul vitæ regnique, liberatus deinde obſidione, cum alia parte Antiochus, alia Seleucus circa arcem regni mei caſtra haberent, relictis rebus meis tota claſſe ad Helleſpontem L. Scipioni Coſ. veſtro occurri, ut eum in trajiciendo exercitum adjuvarem (33); i. e. "I ſuſtained a ſiege, which is the moſt "calamitous diſaſter that can befal a man in war; "being ſhut up in Pergamus, where my life and "Kingdom were expoſed to the greateſt hazard; "and being afterwards freed from the ſiege, not-"withſtanding that Antiochus was encamped on one "ſide of my capital, and Seleucus on the other; ne-"vertheleſs, abandoning all my own affairs, I failed "with my whole fleet to the Helleſpont, there to "meet your Conſul Scipio, in order to aſſiſt him in "the tranſportation of his army." I anſwer, that neither Polybius nor Diodorus Siculus ſpeak of what was done under King Eumenes. They ſpeak of a ſiege of Pergamus, poſterior to the time we are ſpeaking of; and ſuſtained by Attalus Philadelphus, againſt Pruſias King of Bithynia. See Appian (34).

(29) Προυσίας μετὰ τὸ νικῆσαι τὸν Ἄτταλον, μετὰ τὸ παρελθεῖν πρὸς τὸ Περγαμον. Pruſias victo Attalo, Pergamum ingreſſus. Polybius, in Excerptis à Valeſio, editis, p. 169.

(30) An excellent piece of ſculpture by Phylomachus, περιττῶς ὑπὸ φυλομάχου κατεσκευασμένον. Idem, Ibid. Diodor. in Excerptis à Valeſio, editis, p. 336, calls it Phyromachus. This is the name of an excellent Sculptor, who flouriſhed in the 120th Olympiad, according to Pliny, lib. 34. cap. 8.

(31) Polyb. in Excerptis à Valeſio, editis, p. 169.

(32) Diodorus Sicul. in Excerptis à Valeſio, publicatis, p. 336. He obſerves, that Pruſias carried off all the Gods from it, and in particular Æſculapius.

(33) T. Livius, lib. 37. cap. 53.

(34) Appianus, in Mithridat. circa init.

PERGAMUS (ATTALUS KING OF), ſucceeded the year of Rome 512, his Couſin Eumenes [A], who had ſucceeded Philetærus their uncle. He aſſumed the title of King which they had not taken [B]; and he imagined he might do this without being thought arrogant, after the glory he had acquired in gaining a battle againſt the Gauls (a). He made an alliance with the Romans (b), at a time when they were in great want of ſuch a friend; for beſides that they were to oppoſe Hannibal in Italy, they alſo were obliged to fight againſt Philip King of Macedon, who had declared himſelf their enemy. Attalus engaged in the intereſt of the Romans with great vigour, and continued firm in it till his death. He undertook a journey to Athens, purpoſely to prejudice the King of Macedon,

(a) See the rem. [B].

(b) In 542. See Livy, lib. 26. p. m. 451.

[A] He ſucceeded . . . . his couſin Eumenes.] Philetærus had two brothers; the eldeſt was named Eumenes, and the other Attalus. The ſon of the latter had the ſame name with his father, and ſucceeded Philetærus. Attalus's ſon was named Attalus, and ſucceeded Eumenes (1). Had Father Labbe read Strabo attentively, he would not have cited him, as having related, that Attalus was the brother and ſucceſſor of Eumenes (2). This error has been copied by Moreri (3). I am ſurprized that Menage did not take notice of an error in Diogenes Laertius, which Valeſius had cenſured (4). This Hiſtorian of the Philoſophers affirms, that Eumenes was Philetærus's ſon (5). Now he ſhould have ſaid nephew, in which quality he is mentioned by Strabo and Athenæus. I cite the words of the latter, becauſe they inform us of a curious particular, viz. that this Eumenes killed himſelf with drinking. ὑπὸ μέθης ἀπέθανεν Ευμένης ὁ Περγαμηνὸς ὁ φιλεταίρου τοῦ Περγάμου βασιλεύσαντος ἀδελφιδοῦς, ὡς ἱστορεῖ Κτησικλῆς ἐν τρίτῳ χρόνων (6). Eumenes Pergamenus Philetæri (7), qui Pergami regnavit ex fratre nepos, ebrietate periit ut refert Cteſicles libro tertio de temporibus. I am to obſerve, that Athenæus has alſo employed elſewhere (8) the ſame word βασιλεύσας, where he ſpeaks of Philetærus.

(1) Strabo, lib. 13. p. 429.

(2) Labbe, Chronologue Francois, Tom. 2. p. 300. at the year of Rome 512.

(3) Under the word Eumenes.

(4) Henri. Valeſius, Not. ad Excerpt. Polyb. p. 19.

(5) Diog. Laert. lib. 4. in Arceſilao. num. 48.

(6) Athen. lib. 10. p. 445.

(7) It is Attali in Dalechamp's Verſion.

(8) Athen. lib. 13. p. 577.

[B] He aſſumed the title of King, which they had not taken.] Strabo ſays this expreſsly. Ἀνηγορεύθη βασιλεὺς ἤτοι πρῶτον νικήσας Γαλάτας μάχῃ μεγάλῃ (9); i. e. "The firſt time he was ſaluted King, was, af-"ter he had overcome the Gauls in a mighty battle." Polybius had made the ſame aſſertion before (10): Νικήσας γὰρ μάχῃ Γαλάτας, ὁ βαρύταλον καὶ μαχιμώταλον ἔθνος, ὃν τότε καλὰ τὴν Ἀσίαν, ταύτην ἀρχὴν ἐποιήσαλο, καὶ τότε πρῶτον αὐτὸν ἐδείξε βασιλέα; i. e. "For having "vanquiſhed in battle the Gauls, who were then the "moſt terrible and martial people in Aſia, he firſt "aſſumed, publickly, the title of King." Livy is of the ſame opinion: Victis deinde prælio uno Gallis, quæ tum gens recenti adventu terribilior Aſiæ erat, regium aſcivit nomen cujus magnitudini ſemper animum æquavit

(9) Strabo, lib. 13. p. 429.

(10) Polyb. lib. 18. in Excerpt. Valeſianis, p. 103.

Macedon, and great honours were done him by the Athenians [C]. He went a ſecond time into Greece, when upwards of ſeventy years of age, in order to procure ſome allies for the Romans, in oppoſition to the Macedonian Monarch (c). He made a ſpeech to the Thebans, in ſo ſtrong and forcible a manner [D], to perſuade them to engage in this alliance, that having exerted himſelf more than was proper for a man of his age, he was ſeized with a giddineſs or defluxion, which prevented his making an end of his harangue. He fainted away in the middle of his ſpeech; and embarking a few days after, returned to Pergamus, where he died (d) a little after, having reigned forty four years (e), having lived ſeventy two years (f). This Prince had ſhewn a great affection for the Philoſophers (g), and who made ſuch a uſe of his riches as was worthy a man of honour, and a great ſoul. He was faithful to his allies, lived in very good harmony with his wife [E], and gave a very good education to his four ſons (h). He was ſucceeded by Eumenes the eldeſt of them. He was of an infirm conſtitution; but poſſeſſed a magnanimity of ſoul, which compenſated for the weakneſs of his body. He was fired with an ardent thirſt for glory, was generous, and was extremely liberal to ſeveral Grecian cities as well as particular men. He enlarged very much the bounds of his dominions, and that merely by his induſtry and prudence. He kept his brothers ſo well to their duty [F], that they concurred with him in

(c) Livy, lib. 23. p. 610.

(d) The year of Rome 556.

(e) Livy, lib. 23. p. 610. Polyb. in Excerpt. Valeſianis, p. 103.

(f) Polyb. ibid.

(g) See the art. LACYDES.

(h) Ex eodem Polybio, in Excerpt. Valeſianis, p. 103.

æquavit (11). In my opinion, theſe three teſtimonies are preferable to the authority of Juſtin, and that of Diogenes Laertius, for, 1. Juſtin commits an error, which proves, that he had not made an exact enquiry into this matter. He ſays that Eumenes was King of Bithynia. This is what might be alledged by thoſe who ſhould refuſe to believe, that our Attalus was the firſt who aſſumed the title of King. Is not Eumenes his predeceſſor, might theſe ſay, ſtyled King by Juſtin the Hiſtorian (12)? But here I would anſwer; Did he command in Bithynia? Did he not command in Pergamus? Can Juſtin clear himſelf, unleſs he has recourſe to ſome Criticks who read Nicomedes for Eumenes, in the paſſage in queſtion? 2. As Diogenes Laertius does not treat hiſtorically of Pergamus, and mentions Eumenes only by accident, we cannot ſuppoſe that he enquired carefully, whether that Prince had aſſumed the title of King. He was contented with knowing that Eumenes enjoyed the ſupreme authority in Pergamus, which made him employ an expreſſion, which ſignifies royalty. He ſays (13), that Eumenes having loaded Arceſilaus with benefits, was the only Monarch to whom that Author dedicated books. The above-cited paſſage of Athenæus ought not to be objected to me. We there find that Philetærus reigned in Pergamus; but that does not imply that he actually aſſumed the title of King. Read the modern Hiſtorians of the Duke of Savoy, of the Electors of Bavaria or Brandenburg, &c. and we ſhall often find the words reign and to reign, which implies no more than an authority exerciſed under the name of Duke or Elector. The medals, which give the title of King to Philetærus, according to Goltzius (14), are a ſtronger proof againſt Strabo, in caſe they are not ſuppoſititious. Thoſe which Spanhemius deſcribes, do not give him that title (15). By the way, Attalus gained his victory over the Gauls, the laſt year of the 134th Olympiad (16). This was the year of Rome 512.

(11) T. Livius, lib. 32. p. m. 610.

(12) Rex Bithyniæ Eumenes. Juſt. lib. 27. cap. 3.

(13) Ἐχορήγει αὐτῷ πολλὰ Εὐμένης ὁ τῆ φιλέλλαιρε· διὸ καὶ τούτῳ τῶν ἄλλων βασιλέων προσεφώνει. Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 38.

(14) See Valeſius, Notis ad Excerpta Polybii, p. 19.

(15) Ezech. Spanhem. de præſt. & uſu Numiſmat. p. 468.

(16) Valeſius, Not. ad Excerpta Polybii, p. 19.

[C] Great honours were done him by the Athenians.] The whole city, men, women, and prieſts, in their ſacerdotal veſtments, went out to meet him. They almoſt forced the Gods to pay him the ſame honours. I am obliged to Livy for this thought. Rex Piræeum, renovandæ firmandæque cum Athenienſibus ſocietatis cauſa trajecit. Civitas omnis obviam effuſa cum conjugibus ac liberis, ſacerdotes cum inſignibus ſuis intrantem urbem, ac dii propè ipſi exciti ſedibus ſuis exceperunt (17). He obſerves, that Attalus thought it more ſuitable to his dignity, to communicate his propoſals in writing, than to expoſe his modeſty to the neceſſity of diſplaying, himſelf, the ſervices he had performed, and to receive innumerable applauſes from a flattering people. The Hiſtorian expreſſes this admirably: In concionem extemplò populus vocatus, ut Rex quæ vellet, coràm ageret: deinde ex dignitate magis viſum, ſcribere eum, de quibus videretur: quàm præſentem aut referendis ſuis in civitatem beneficiis erubeſcere, aut ſignificationibus acclamationibuſque multitudinis, aſſentatione immodica pudorem onerantis (18). War was reſolved upon againſt Philip King of Macedon. It was then the Romans, in honour of Attalus, propoſed to add a new tribe, to the ten antient ones, and to call it Attalis. Ingenti conſenſu bellum adverſus Philippum decretum. Honores regi primùm Attalo immodici, deinde & Rhodiis habiti: tam primùm mentio illata de tribu, quam Attalida appellarent, ad decem veteres tribus addenda (19).

(17) T. Livius, lib. 31. p. 572.

(18) Idem, ibid.

(19) Idem, ibid. p. 573.

[D] He made a ſpeech to the Thebans, in ſo ſtrong and forcible a manner.] This is ſo ſingular an incident, that it deſerves to be read in Plutarch's words (20): Καὶ μέντοι παρελθὼν ὁ Τίτος, ὡς οὐκ ἔφων τὴν πόλιν, ἔπειθεν ἐλέσθαι τὰ Ῥωμαίων, Ἄτταλος σὺν βασιλέως συναγορεύοντος αὐτῷ καὶ συνεξορμῶντος τοὺς Θηβαίους. ἀλλ' Ἄτταλος μὲν, (ὡς ἔοικεν) τῷ γήρᾳ προθυμότερον ἑαυτὸν τῷ Τίτῳ ῥήτορα παρασχεῖν φιλοτιμούμενος, ἐν αὐτῷ τῷ λέγειν προσπεσόντος ἰλίγγου τινὸς ἢ ῥεύματος, ἄφωνον τὴν αἴσθησιν ἐπιληφθεὶς ἔπεσεν, καὶ μετ' ὀλίγον εἰς πλοῖον ἀναχθεὶς εἰς Ἀσίαν ἀποκομισθεὶς ἐτελεύτησεν; i. e. "Upon this Titus (21), as though he had not "taken the city, made a ſpeech to them, exhorting "them to join with the Romans; Attalus alſo ex- "citing the Thebans to do the ſame. But Attalus, "by ſtriving to outdo Quintius, exerting himſelf too "much, in my opinion, for a perſon of his years, was "ſeized with a giddineſs or defluxion in the midſt of "his ſpeech, and fell down; when being carried "on board a ſhip, and ſailing into Aſia, he died a "few days after." The reader may ſee in Livy (22) the manner, in which Eumenes the ſon of Attalus repreſented this accident to the Romans; after diſplaying, in few words, the ſervices which his father had done for the Commonwealth of Rome.

(20) Plutarchus, in Vita Flaminii, p. 372. B.

(21) i. e. Titus Quintius Flaminius, who was then Conſul.

(22) T. Livius, lib. 37. cap. 53.

[E] He . . . . lived in very good harmony with his wife.] She was a native of Cyzicus, of Plebeian extraction, and named Apollonias. The title of Queen was beſtowed on her, and ſhe preſerved it till her death, not by the arts employed by Courtezans (23), but by her modeſty, probity, prudence, and gravity. She bore a tender affection to her four ſons, and continued to love them as long as ſhe lived, though ſhe out-lived her huſband many years. This obſervation is not ſuperfluous; it happening but too frequently, that Queen Dowagers form cabals and factions, in prejudice of their children. King Attalus her ſon paid her great honours. It was a delightful ſight to the inhabitants of Cyzicus, to ſee him and his brother conduct their mother by the hand to all the temples, and other places of the city. For this unnumbered bleſſings were beſtowed upon them (24). It would not be a matter of ſo much ſurprize, to ſee, in this age, ſuch a ſpectacle in the Weſtern parts of the world.

(23) Οὐχ ἑταιρικὴν προσφερομένη πιθανότητα. Non meretriciis illecebris. Polyb. ubi infra.

(24) Polyb. in Excerpt. à Valeſio, 113, 114.

[F] He kept his brothers ſo well to their duty.] Polybius, where he gives us the character of Eumenes, obſerves, as the finiſhing ſtroke of his perfections, that this Prince conducted himſelf ſo prudently towards his brothers, that they proved the inſtruments of the ſecurity of his reign; and adds, that this is rarely ſeen. Ἀδελφοὺς ἔχων τρεῖς καὶ κατὰ τὴν ἡλικίαν καὶ πρᾶξιν πάνυ τούτους συνέσχε πειθαρχοῦντας αὐτῷ, καὶ δορυφοροῦντας καὶ σώζοντας τὸ τῆς βασιλείας ἀξίωμα. τοῦτο δὲ σπανίως εὕροι τις ἂν γιγνόμενον. Fratres cum haberet tres & ætate & induſtria pollentes, eos in officio omnes continuit & morigeros cuſtodeſque regni ac dignitatis ſuæ habuit ſatellites. Quod raro admodum contigiſſe reperias (25). He has reaſon to ſay, that this is a rare circumſtance (26). Hiſtory is filled with the cruel wars, which Princes have been obliged to carry on, either againſt their brothers or their own children; ſo that thoſe who reflect when they read, may form the following aphoriſm; that a King

(25) Idem, ibid. p. 169.

(26) Compare citat. (7), of the article DRUSILLA, daughter of Agrippina; and citat. (4), of the art. DRUSUS, ſon of Germanicus.

in promoting the happineſs of the people, and could never be prevailed upon to engage in any factious enterprizes (i). He continued inviolably attached to his alliance with the Romans, and reaped great advantages from thence. He himſelf brought a ſtrong fleet to Flaminius the Conſul, during the war againſt Philip King of Macedon (k). He excited the Romans to make war againſt Antiochus; and found by experience, that the principles on which his advice was grounded, were very juſt (l); for ſeveral Provinces of which Antiochus

(i) Idem, ibid. p. 166 & ſeq.

(k) Titus Liv. lib. 34. p. 632.

(l) See Liv. lib. 35. p. 651.

King who has brothers and children, finds it more difficult to govern his family than his kingdom. If he prevents civil wars from breaking out, this could not be effected without the moſt laborious and perpetual precautions; and if he does not prevent them, what toils will it coſt him to put an end to them? To what diſquietudes and dangers is he not expoſed? The policy of the Turks ſtrikes one with horror; it ſacrifices with the utmoſt inhumanity, to the reigning Monarch, the life or liberty of all his brethren. However, this is a neceſſary evil; for otherwiſe a wide extended Empire would be expoſed to the moſt horrid deſolations. See Chapter LXXXVIII. Vol. I. of Camerarius's hiſtorical Meditations. Be this as it will, let us not conſider as a felicity, but rather as an effect of the moſt conſummate prudence, ſuſtained by an exalted merit, the concord in which King Eumenes obliged his brothers to live. It was ſo much the more difficult to reſtrain them within the bounds of their duty, as they were ſurrounded with evil examples. Syria and Egypt were cruelly laid waſte by diſputes with regard to the ſucceſſion. The Royal Family in Macedon was embrued in blood from a jealouſy of power and authority. It was an execrable age. Nothing was ſeen but horrid attempts of brothers againſt brothers, and parents againſt children, or children againſt parents. Theſe examples might naturally tempt the King of Pergamus's brothers: and therefore their mother might juſtly think herſelf extremely happy, in ſeeing ſo delightful a harmony ſubſiſt between them. Ἀπολλωνίδα μὲν τὴν Κυζικηνὴν, Εὐμενοῦς δὲ τοῦ βασιλέως μητέρα, καὶ τρεῖς ἄλλους, Ἀτταλον καὶ Φιλεταίρου καὶ Ἀθηναίου, λέγουσι μακαρίζειν ἑαυτὴν ἀεὶ καὶ τοῖς θεοῖς χάριν ἔχειν, οὐ διὰ τὸν πλοῦτον, οὐδὲ διὰ τὴν ἡγεμονίαν, ἀλλ ὅτι τοὺς τρεῖς υἱοὺς ἑώρα τὸν πρεσβύταλον δορυφορουμένους, κἀκεῖνον ἐν μέσοις αὐτοῖς δοράτα καὶ ξίφη φερομένους, ἀδεῶς διαιτώμενον (27). i. e. "It is related that Apollonias of Cyzicus, the mother of King Eumenes, and that of three ſons more, Attalus, Philetærus, and Athenæus, would frequently declare herſelf to be happy, and give thanks to the Gods, not on account of wealth or ſovereignty, but becauſe ſhe ſaw her eldeſt ſon guarded by his three brothers; and becauſe he continued, without the leaſt fear, in the midſt of them, though they were armed with ſwords and ſpears." Attalus, the eldeſt of the three brothers, who did not ſway the ſcepter, had a greater ſhare in the Government than his other two brothers. I own that he diſcovered a great affection for his brother Eumenes on many occaſions. Knowing that he was under great affliction at the conduct of the cities of Peleponneſus (28), he did all that lay in his power to engage them to give him ſatisfaction (29). He gave the name Eumenia to a city, in honour of Eumenes (30). In a word, he was named Philadelphus; and yet the King entertained a ſuſpicion of him, and that very juſtly, as will appear from Livy. This Hiſtorian relates that, after the conqueſt of Macedon, (31), Attalus, who had done great ſervices to the Romans in that famous expedition, came to Rome flushed with ſecret hopes to ſupplant his own brother; and that he would have diſcovered the whole intrigue, had he not been perſuaded from it by the Phyſician who accompanied him. Now this Phyſician had been given him by Eumenes, with orders to watch all Attalus's motions. He was properly the ſpy of the King, whoſe ſuſpicion was juſtly grounded. Suberat & ſecreta ſpes honorum præmiorumque ab ſenatu, quæ vix ſalva pietate ejus contingere poterant. Erant enim quidam Romanorum quoque non boni authores, qui ſpe cupiditatem ejus elicerent: eam opinionem de Attalo & Eumene Romæ eſſe, tanquam de altero Romanis certo amico, altero nec Romanis, nec Perſi fido ſocio. Itaque vix ſtatui poſſe, utrum quæ pro ſe, an quæ contra fratrem petiturus eſſet, ab ſenatu magis impetrabilia forent: adeò univerſos omnia & huic tribuere, & illi verò negare. Eorum hominum (ut res docuit) Attalus erat, qui quantum ſpes ſpopondiſſet cuperent, ni unius amici prudens monitio velut frænos animo ejus geſtienti ſecundis rebus impoſuiſſet. Stratius cum eo fuit medicus, ad idipſum à non ſecuro Eumene Romam miſſus ſpeculator rerum, quæ à fratre agerentur, monitorque fidus ſi decedi fide vidiſſet. Is ad occupatas jam aures ſolicitatumque jam animum cùm veniſſet, aggreſſus tempeſtivis temporibus rem prope prolapſam reſtituit (32). i. e. "He flattered himſelf with ſecret hopes of receiving honours and rewards from the Senate, a circumſtance that was not very conſiſtent with the dictates of conſcience. For he had ſome Romans (evil Counſellors) who flattered his hopes, by obſerving to him, that he was conſidered at Rome as a falſe friend to the Romans; but that Eumenes was not thought to be a frightful ally either to the Romans or to Perſes. For this reaſon it was not eaſy to tell, whether the Senate would be more ready to grant, what he intended to aſk in his own favour, or againſt his brother's intereſt: ſo much the Romans, in general, were prompted to give all things to the one, and refuſe the other. Attalus (as was proved by experience) was one of thoſe men who have an earneſt deſire to poſſeſs what they wiſhed for, if the ſage admonition of a friend had not curbed, as with a rein, the tranſports of his mind in proſperity. He was attended by Stratius the Phyſician, who had been ſent to Rome by Eumenes, who ſuſpected Attalus's conduct; and therefore had put Stratius as a ſpy over him, in order that if Attalus ſhould ſwerve from his duty, he might ſend him a faithful account of it. This Phyſician applied to him at a time when he was forming intrigues; and doing this in a lucky hour, he recovered affairs that were almoſt ruined." I ſhall not tranſcribe the ſolid reaſons, which the Phyſician employed to keep Attalus to his duty. I will only obſerve, that they deſerved to be read in Livy, and that very probably this reaſon was not the leaſt affecting. He repreſented to him, that King Eumenes was old and childleſs; and conſequently that he might ſoon ſucceed him as the lawful heir (33). The reader is to know, that Eumenes's ſon was not then legitimated. Not above three or four years before, certain things had paſt, which ſhewed that Attalus's heart was divided between fraternal love and ambition. King Eumenes having been dangerouſly wounded by two ſtones thrown at him near Delphi, had cauſed himſelf to be conveyed to the iſland of Egina. On this occaſion his wounds were dreſſed with ſo much privacy, that ſcarce one perſon knew that he was living, whereby a report of his death was ſpread univerſally. Attalus gave credit to it ſooner than became a kind brother. He ſpoke, in the ſtyle of a King, to his ſiſter-in-law, Eumenes's wife; and to the Governor of the Citadel. In a word, he diſcovered too haſty a deſire to ſucceed him. Eumenes was not ignorant of this; and tho' he was determined to ſuffer this without ſhewing the leaſt reſentment, he yet could not forbear reproaching his brother, the firſt time he had an opportunity of ſpeaking to him, for the ſurprizingly impatient deſire he ſhewed to marry the Queen. Livy ſays no more; but the truth is, if other authors may be credited, Attalus really lay with the Queen (34). Compotem jam ſui regem, amici poſtero die deferunt ad navem: inde Corinthum, à Corintho per Iſthmi jugum navibus traductis (35), Æginam trajiciunt. Ibi adeò ſecreta ejus curatio fuit, admittentibus neminem, ut fama mortuum in Aſiam perferret. Attalus quoque celerius quàm dignum concordia fraterna erat, credidit. Nam & cum uxore fratris, & præfecto arci, tanquam jam haud dubius regni hæres, eſt locutus. Quæ poſtea non fefellere Eumenem: & quanquam diſſimulare & tacitè habere id patique ſtatuerat, tamen in primo congreſſu non temperavit, quin uxoris petendæ præmaturam feſtinationem fratris objiceret. Romam quoque fama de morte

(27) Plutarchus, de fraterno amore, p. 480. C.

(28) They had thrown down, by a public decree, all the ſtatues of Eumenes. Polyb. in Excerpt. p. 133.

(29) Polyb. ibid.

(30) Stephanus, voce Εὐμένια.

(31) In 585.

(32) Tit. Liv. lib. 45. p. 877.

(33) Haud ambiguum propediem regnaturum eum infirmitate ætateque Eumenis eſſet nullam ſtirpem liberum habentis. (Nec dum enim agnoverat eum, qui poſtea regnavit.) Quid attineret vim afferre rei ſua ſponte mox ad eum adventuræ? Idem, ibid.

(34) Idem, lib. 42. p. 815.

(35) Here we have a remarkable incident. They conveyed a ſhip, by land, from one Gulph of Peloponneſus to another. This has been done on other occaſions.

Antiochus was diſpoſſeſſed after the battle of Magneſia, were beſtowed on him (m) [G]. He alſo excited the Romans to declare war againſt Perſeus King of Macedon (n), and, for this purpoſe, undertook a journey to Rome. At his return from Delphi, were he intended to make a ſacrifice, he was dangerouſly wounded by ſome Aſſaſſins whom Perſeus had ſuborned (o). However, he did not die of his wounds; but a report of his death reached as far as Pergamus. He concealed in ſome meaſure the reſentment he entertained againſt his brother Attalus, who had diſcovered too eager a deſire to ſucceed him (p). He did not join in the war againſt Perſeus (q), and ſome Authors ſay the Romans harboured a ſuſpicion with regard to his fidelity. I muſt not omit that he loſt a battle at ſea, by a ſtratagem of Hannibal [H], and had like to have loſt his life on that occaſion,

(m) It was fought the year of Rome 563.

(n) Idem, Liv. lib. 42. p. 813.

(o) Idem, ibid. p. 815.

(p) See the rem. [F].

(q) Livius, lib. 44. p. 853.

Eumenis perlata eſt. Plutarch has made this the ſubject of a panegyrick both with regard to Eumenes and to Attalus. It was neceſſary to give it that turn, becauſe he was writing a treatiſe on brotherly friendſhip, in which the Royal Family of Pergamus was to be ſet as a good example, after what he had related before concerning the mother of the four brothers (36). With regard to myſelf, I take Livy's account to be more probable. Here follows Plutarch's relation. "Advice being brought, that he was coming "from the ſea-coaſt towards the city, to conſult the "oracle of Apollo, they attacked him from behind; "and threw ſome great ſtones at him which fell on "his head and neck. He was ſo ſtunned with the "blow, that he fainted away. He therefore was "thought to be dead, and a report of this was "ſpread every where, inſomuch that ſome of his "ſervants and even friends flew as far as the city of "Pergamus to carry that news, affirming that they "themſelves had been ſpectators of this accident. "Upon this Attalus, his eldeſt brother, a worthy "man, who had always ſhewn greater loyalty and "fidelity to his brother than any other perſon, was "not only proclaimed King, and crowned with the "royal diadem; but alſo married Stratonice, his "brother's wife, and lay with her. But afterwards, "when news was brought that Eumenes was alive "and returning to his dominions, he took off his "diadem; and reſuming the javelin which he "uſed to carry before his brother when he was one "of his guards, he went out to meet him with the "reſt of the guards, on which occaſion the King received him with great humanity; and ſaluted the "Queen in the moſt honourable manner, and embraced her with the utmoſt tenderneſs: living many years "after, without making the leaſt complaint, or harbouring the leaſt ſuſpicion, he died, and left his "Kingdom, with his conſort, to his brother Attalus. But how did Attalus behave after his death? "He would not bring up any of the children which "Stratonice his wife had brought him, and he had "ſeveral by her; but educated his deceaſed brother's ſon, till he came to man's eſtate, and then he "himſelf ſet the royal diadem on his head, and "gave him the title of King (37)."

(36) See the rem. [E].

(37) Plutarch, On paternal love, p. 273, (in the Greek and Latin edit. it is p. 489.) The above tranſlation is according to Amyot's verſion.

[G] Several Provinces, of which Antiochus was diſpoſſeſſed after the battle of Magneſia, were beſtowed on him.] After that this Prince had been forced to accept of the Peace, on ſuch conditions as the Romans thought proper to impoſe, all the allies of the Romans endeavoured to get a ſhare of his ſpoils. Their demands were heard, and the following anſwer was made them. Decem legatos more majorum ſenatum miſſurum ad res Aſiæ deſceptandas, componendaſque: ſummam tamen hanc fore, ut cis Taurum montem quæ intra regni Antiochi fines fuiſſent Eumeni attribuerentur, præter Lyciam Cariamque, uſque ad Mæandrum amnem, ea civitatis Rhodiorum eſſent. Cæteræ civitates Aſiæ, quæ Attali ſtipendiariæ fuiſſent, eædem Eumeni vectigal penderent: quæ vectigales Antiochi fuiſſent, eæ liberæ atque immunes eſſent (38). i. e. "That ten Commiſſioners, after the cuſtom uſed by their forefathers, "ſhould be ſent by the Senate to enquire into and "ſettle the affairs of Aſia: that the reſult however "ſhould be this; that Eumenes ſhould have that "country which Antiochus had poſſeſſed on this ſide of "Mount Taurus; and that the Rhodians ſhould poſſeſs all that lay on the other ſide of Lycia and Caria, as far as the River Meander. That the other "cities of Aſia, which had paid tribute to Attalus, "ſhould pay the like tribute to Eumenes: but that "ſuch, as had paid tribute to Antiochus, ſhould be "free and pay no tribute." It would not be neceſſary, after ſo expreſs a teſtimony, to hear Cicero; I nevertheleſs will cite him, to point out an error he has committed: Antiochum illum magnum, ſays he (39), majores noſtri magna belli contentione terra marique ſuperatum intra montem Taurum regnare juſſerunt: Aſiam, qua illum multarunt, Attalo, ut is regnaret in ea, condonaverunt. i. e. "Our anceſtors having overcome "Antiochus the Great, in a dreadful war carried on "both by ſea and land, made Mount Taurus the "confines of his dominions; and beſtowed on King "Attalus that part of Aſia, of which they had diſpoſſeſſed him." Cicero commits a miſtake with regard to that King's name, to whom the Romans made ſo noble a preſent, it being Eumenes and not Attalus. I know not whether any Commentator has obſerved this miſtake (40); but I have juſt now conſulted two, who, inſtead of remarking it, have committed another error. ATTALO, ſays Manutius (41), Eumenes fratri qui eam poſtea populo Romano moriens teſtamento legavit. Another ſays, ATTALO Pergami Regi qui moriens populum Romanum fecit hæredem (42). Now it is falſe to aſſert, that Attalus, brother of Eumenes, received from the Romans thoſe Provinces of which Antiochus was diſpoſſeſſed; and it is as falſe to aſſert, that he reſtored them to the people of Rome by his will. It was Attalus the ſon of Eumenes who made the Romans his heir. Father Abram commits another error. He imagines that Cicero ſpeaks of Antiochus Epiphanes, and that this Antiochus was vanquiſhed by Lucius Scipio (43); but he is miſtaken. Antiochus Epiphanes did not reign till after Seleucus Philopater, ſucceſſor to Antiochus the Great; and it was even Antiochus the Great that triumphed, under the command of Lucius Scipio. By the way, Manutius's error is only a copy of that of Valerius Maximus. Liberalis populus Romanus magnitudine muneris, quod Attalo regi Aſiam dedit dono. Sed Attalus etiam teſtamenti æquitate gratus, qui eandem Aſiam populo Romano legavit (44). i. e. "The Romans ſhewed great "liberality, in beſtowing Aſia on King Attalus: and "Attalus, on the other ſide, diſcovered great equity "and gratitude, in bequeathing Aſia to the Romans."

(38) T. Livius, lib. 37. cap. 55. See the paſſage of Strabo, which I ſhall cite in the remark againſt Moreri.

(39) Cicero, in Oratione, pro Sextio, p. m. 92.

(40) See the laſt lines of this rem.

(41) Paul. Manutius, in Orat. Ciceronis pro Sextio, p. 93.

(42) Nicol. Abramus, in eamd. Orat. p. 100.

(43) Antiochum Epiphanem ſive illuſtrem de quo auſpiciis Luc. Scipionis Aſiatici ſuperato Appianus in Syriacis, &c. Idem, ibid.

(44) Valerius Maxim. lib. 5. cap. 2. num. 3. in Extern.

I am to obſerve, that when I drew up this article, Grævius's edition of Tully's orations was not then publiſhed. It has ſince appeared (45). I conſulted it, and peruſed over again all that the reader has ſeen above, before I gave it to the printers; and find that the errors of Father Abraham, Manutius, and Cicero, had been taken notice of by Grævius. See page 78, 79, of Volume V.

(45) i. e. in 1699.

[H] He loſt a battle at ſea by a ſtratagem of Hannibal.] Antiochus finding it would be impoſſible for him to protect Hannibal againſt the Romans, who required him to be delivered up, adviſed him to fly. Accordingly Hannibal retired to the iſland of Crete, and afterwards to the Court of the Bithynian Monarch, Pruſias, whom he prevailed with to infringe the peace which the Romans had concluded between him and our Eumenes. This rupture was, at firſt, attended with ill conſequences with regard to Pruſias, he being defeated in a battle on land; and forced to attempt a naval engagement (46), which he won, and that by the following ſtratagem. Hannibal filled a great number of earthen veſſels with ſerpents of every kind, and gave orders for throwing thoſe pots into the enemy's ſhips. This order being followed, a victory was gained, occaſioned by the terror with which this great number of ſerpents filled Eumenes's ſailors. Cum Pruſias terreſtri bello ab Eumene victus eſſet, & prælium in mare tranſtuliſſet, Annibal novo commento auctor victoriæ fuit. Quippe omne ſerpentium

(46) Juſtin, lib. 32. cap. 4.

occaſion, which was at the time that he was engaged in war with Pruſias King of Bithynia. He died in a very advanced age [I], anno 596. leaving ATTALUS's brother guardian of his ſon, and of the Realm (r). His brother Attalus, ſtrictly ſpeaking, ſwayed the ſceptter till he died. He opened his regency with a glorious action, the reſtoring of Ariaratus to the Kingdom of Cappadocia (s). He ſignalized himſelf by ſeveral other actions (t), and died anno 616, after which ATTALUS, his ward, reigned ſingly. The latter is ſirnamed Philometor [K]. He was a great lover of huſbandry [L]. and even wrote books on that ſubject. He was of a very cruel diſpoſition (u). He ſent rich preſents to Scipio when he was laying ſiege to Numantia [M], and died very ſoon after, about anno 621; and (r) Strabo, lib. 13. p. 420.

(s) Polyb. in Excerpt. Valeſian. p. 168.

(t) See the rem. on the errors of Moreri.

(u) See the rem. [L].

ſerpentium genus in fictiles lagenas conjici juſſit, medioque prælio in naves hoſtium mittit. Id primum Ponticis ridiculum viſum, fictilibus dimicare, qui ferro nequeant. Sed ubi ſerpentibus repleri naves cœpere, ancipiti periculo circumventi, hoſti victoriam ceſſere (47). Cornelius Nepos relates this more at large; and obſerves, that Hannibal's chief view was to kill Eumenes, and for this purpoſe it was neceſſary to find out the ſhip he was on board of (48). Eumenes's ſhip was diſcovered, by ſending out a ſhip-boat, upon pretence of delivering a letter to him; after which Hannibal commanded them to level their fury chiefly againſt that of Eumenes, which they accordingly did; and would have taken it, had he not eſcaped by crowding all the ſail poſſible. The reſt of the ſhips of Pergamus fought very gallantly; but the ſerpents which they threw into them obliged them to ſail away (49). Advice of this being brought to the Romans, they ſent Embaſſadors into Aſia, to pacify thoſe Princes, and to demand Pruſias to deliver up Hannibal to them; but he prevented this by poiſoning himſelf (50). This was about the year 570.

(47) Idem, ibid.

(48) Claſſiarios convocat (Hannibal) hiſque præcipit, omnes ut in unam Eumenis regis concurrant navem, à ceteris tantum ſatis habeant, ſe defendere. Id facile illos ſerpentium multitudine conſecuturos. Rex autem qua nave veheretur, ut ſcirent ſe facturum: quem ſi aut cepiſſent, aut interfeciſſent magno his pollicetur præmio fore. Cornelius Nepos, in Vita Hannibalis, p. m. 369.

(49) Idem, ibid.

[I] He died in a very advanced age.] He lived fourſcore and two years according to Lucian. Ἄτταλος ὁ ἐπικληθεὶς φιλάδελφος, τῶν Περγαμηνῶν ὃς ἐτος βασιλεύων, πρὸς ὃν καὶ Σκηπίων ὁ τῶν Ρωμαίων στρατηγὸς ἀφίκετο, δυὸ καὶ ὀγδοήκοντα ἐτῶν ἐξέλιπε τὸν βίον (51). i. e. "Attalus, ſirnamed Philadelphus, King of Perga-"mus, to whoſe aid the Roman General came, "died aged fourſcore and two years." I do not doubt but that Lucian has committed an error on this occaſion. The Roman General he ſpeaks of is doubtleſs Lucius Scipio Aſiaticus who defeated Antiochus. Now Attalus was not reigning at that time.

(50) Juſtin and Cornel. Nepos, ubi ſupra.

(51) Lucian. in Macrobiis, p. 637. Tome 2. edit. Salmur.

[K] He was ſirnamed Philometor.] "Becauſe of "the great affection he bore his mother, which how-"ever was the cauſe of his death; for as he was "digging a Sepulchre for her, the heat of the ſun "threw him into a fit of ſickneſs, and he died in "ſeven days (52)." In order that the reader may know whence Dacier copied this particular, I ſhall quote a paſſage from Juſtin: Matri deinde ſepulchrum facere inſtituit, cui operi intentus morbum ex ſolis fervore contraxit, & ſeptima die deceſſit (53). His mother's name was Stratonice (54), and ſhe was daughter of Ariarathes King of Cappadocia; and was married to Eumenes a little after the victory which the Romans gained over Antiochus at Magneſia (55). By the way, ſince Strabo (56), Appian (57), and ſeveral other Authors give him the ſirname of Philometor, I fancy that Plutarch, from a ſlip in his memory, gives him that of Philopater (58). It is in the life of the Gracchi, but in other places he calls him Philometor. See the paſſage cited by me in the following remark. Volaterranus had told pretty exactly the particulars which relate to the Kings of Pergamus, but he ſpoils all as to the laſt. He affirms that he is called Philometor by way of irony: Is Philometor ex ſcelere per antiphraſin cognominatus eſt quod matrem interfecerit (59). i. e. "He was ſirnamed Philometor, "ironically, from his wickedneſs, becauſe he mur-"thered his mother." What is worſe is, he cites Juſtin, as relating that this Prince having ſecretly murthered his mother, and afterwards his wife, let his hair and beard grow, to conceal his crime. Now Juſtin ſays the very reverſe.

(52) Dacier, Remarques ſur l'Ode 1. du 1 Livre d'Horace, p. m. 14.

(53) Juſtin, lib. 36. cap. 4. p. m. 537.

(54) Strabo, lib. 13. p. 429.

(55) Liv. lib. 38. p. 733.

(56) Strabo, lib. 13. p. 429.

(57) Appian. in Mithridat.

(58) Plutarchus, in vita Gracchor. p. 830.

(59) Volaterannus, lib. 13. p. m. 497.

[L] He was a great lover of huſbandry.] This was not from a diſpoſition of nature, but ſeems to have been the effect of melancholy. He had put to death ſeveral illuſtrious perſons (60), after which he was ſeized with the deepeſt grief. He covered himſelf, as it were, with ſackcloth and aſhes; after which he entirely abandoned all affairs in general, and employed himſelf wholly in the culture of his garden. Nevertheleſs, he continued as cruel as before; for he took a delight in raiſing the moſt venomous plants, diſtilled the juices from them, which mixing afterwards with ſalutary remedies, he uſed to ſend them as preſents to his friends. Here follows my Author (61). In Aſia rex Attalus florentiſſimus ab Eumene [illegible] patruo acceptum regnum, cædibus amicorum, & cognatorum ſuppliciis, fœdabat, nunc matrem anum, nunc Beronicem ſponſam, maleficiis eorum necatas confingens. Poſt hanc ſceleſtam violentiæ rabiem, ſqualidam veſtem ſumit: barbam capillumque in modum reorum ſummittit: non in publicum prodire, non populo ſe oſtendere, non domi lætiora convivia inire, aut aliquod ſignum ſani hominis habere, prorſus ut pœnas pendere manibus interfectorum videretur. Omiſſâ deinde regni adminiſtratione, hortos fodiebat, gramina ſeminabat, & noxia innoxiis permiſcebat, eaque omnia veneni ſucco infecta, velut peculiare munus, amicis mittebat. i. e. "In Aſia, Attalus, a moſt flouriſhing "Monarch, having received a Kingdom from his "uncle Eumenes *, polluted it by the maſſacre of "his friends, and the puniſhment of his relations; "he ſometimes falſely charging them with making "away with his mother an antient woman, and "with Berenice his conſort. After perpetrating theſe "horrid deeds, he put on rags, ſuffered his hair and "beard to grow after the manner of criminals; did "not appear in publick, nor ſhew himſelf to the "people; did not live with any ſplendor at home, "or do any action like a man who is in his ſenſes; "ſo that one would have concluded, that he did pe-"nance to the manes of thoſe he had ſlain. After-"wards, quite laying aſide the reins of government, "he ſpent his time in digging and ſowing in his "gardens: he mixed ſalutary and venomous herbs "together, and ſteeping them in poiſon, uſed to "ſend them as rare preſents to his friends." To theſe I will add the following words of Plutarch. Ἄτταλος ὁ Φιλομήτωρ ἐκπίνει τὰς φαρμακώδεις βοτάνας, οὐ μόνον ὑοσκύαμον καὶ ἰλλέβορον, ἀλλὰ καὶ κώνειον καὶ ἀκόνιτον καὶ δορύκνιον αὐτὸς ἐν τοῖς βασιλικοῖς σπείρων καὶ φυτεύων, ὁπῶς τε καὶ καρπὸν αὐτῶν, ἔργον πεποιημένος εἰδέναι καὶ κομίζεσθαι καθ' ὥραν (63). i. e. "Atticus Philometor uſed to raiſe "poiſonous herbs; not only henbane and hellebore, "but alſo hemlock, wolfſbane, dorycnion, himſelf "ſowing and planting them in the royal gardens; "he endeavouring to gather them in their reſpective "ſeaſons, and to diſcover their ſeeds, fruits and "juices." Attalus changed this employment, and applied himſelf to the melting of metals (64). His books in the ſubject of huſbandry were not unknown to Varro (65), Pliny (66), and Columella (67). Father Hardouin obſerves that this Prince, according to the teſtimony of Galen, underſtood all kinds of drugs or phyſick, and wrote books on that ſubject. Haud diverſum ab eo puto Attalum eſſe eum, quem Medicum appellat Plinius in indice l. 32. & 33. cum hunc ipſum Pergamenorum regem, omnis generis medicamentorum perquam ſtudioſum fuiſſe Galenus affirmet, l. 1. κατὰ γένη, c. 13. p. 657. & l. 1. de antidotis c. 1. p. 865. De medicinis ex animalibus ſcripſiſſe, l. 10. de facult. ſimp. medic. c. 1. p. 275 (68). i. e. "In my opinion, this "Attalus is not different from him, who is called (by "Pliny) the Phyſician; ſince he affirms, that the "King of Pergamus in queſtion was greatly ſkilled "in all kinds of drugs." Menage aſcribes to another, what relates to the gardens of this Attalus (69).

(60) See the Excerpta Diodori Siculi, publiſhed by Henry Valeſius, p. 370.

(61) Juſtin, lib. 36. cap. 4. p. 537.

(62) Juſtin is miſtaken, it ſhould be ab Attalo.

* It ſhould be Attalus.

(63) Plutarchus, in Demetrio, p. 897, D.

(64) Ab hoc ſtudio, ærariæ artis fabricæ ſe tradit ceriſque fingendis, & ære fundendo procudendoque oblectabatur. Juſtin, lib. 36. cap. 4. 537.

(65) He ſpeaks of it, chap. 1. book 1. de Re Ruſtica.

(66) Plin. lib. 18. cap. 3.

(67) Columella, lib. 1. cap. 1. but inſtead of Attalus & Philometor, read Attalus Philometor. See Father Hardouin *in Indice Plinian*o, p. 100.

(68) Harduinus, ibid.

[M] He ſent rich preſents to Scipio, when he was laying ſiege to Numantia.] I have read this only in Tully. Quo in loco Dejotarum talem erga te cognoviſti, qualis Rex Attalus in Africanum fuit, cui magnificentiſſima dona, ut ſcriptum legimus, uſque ad Numantiam miſit ex Aſia, quæ Africanus inſpectante exercitu accepit (70),

(69) See the rem. [B] of the art. LACYDES.

(70) Cicero, in Oratione pro Rege Dejotaro, p. m. 647.

and having no children, appointed the Romans his heirs (x). Ariſtonius, the baſtard of Eumenes, laughed at this will; ſet himſelf up the lawful ſucceſſor, and even won ſome battles (y); but was conquered and taken priſoner the year of Rome 623 (z). Thus ended the Kingdom of Pergamus, which roſe to great power in a ſhort time, and whoſe ſplendor and magnificence were ſo great, that they became proverbial [N]. I muſt take notice of ſome errors of Moreri [O].

(x) Florus, lib. 2. cap. 20. & multi alii.

(y) Juſtinus, lib. 36. cap. 4.

(z) Idem, ibid.

i. e. "In which place, Dejotarus behaved with the "ſame generoſity towards you, as Attalus did with "regard to Scipio Africanus, to whom, as it is re-"lated, he ſent moſt magnificent preſents out of A-"ſia, as far as Numantia, which Africanus received "in preſence of the army." What was Father Abram thinking of, when he ſaid that Livy does not agree with Cicero (71)? On this occaſion he cites a paſſage of the 58th book of Livy (72), in which it is ſaid, that Scipio, having received great preſents from Antiochus, ſhewed them to the whole army, and ordered the Quæſtor to enter them into his account-book. Could Cicero ſpeak of the Scipio who overcame Antiochus?

(71) Abramus, Commentar. in Orat. Cic. pro Dejotaro, p. 441.

(72) We have only 45 books of Livy.

[N] The ſplendor and magnificence of Pergamus became proverbial.] Peruſe the Commentators on the following words of Horace.

Attalicis conditionibus
Nunquam dimoveas, ut trabe Cypria
Myrtoum pavidus nauta ſecet mare (73).

(73) Horat. Ode 1. lib. 1. ver. 12.

"And hopes of wealth, and world of gain,
"Shall never tempt him from the plain;
"Or draw his fearful ſoul to ride
"In feeble ſhips, and ſtem the tide. CREECH.

Conſider alſo the following verſes of Propertius.

Nec mihi tunc fulcro ſternatur lectus eburno,
Nec ſit in Attalico mors mea nixa toro (74).
Attalicas ſupera veſtes, atque omnia magnis,
Gemmea ſint ludis, ignibus iſta dabis (75).

(74) Propertius, Eleg. 13. lib. 2. See alſo Eleg. 32. of the ſame book.

(75) Idem, Eleg. 17. lib 3. See alſo Eleg. 5. lib. 4.

"Nor let bright ivory the bedſtead form;
"Nor my cold corps lye on a ſplendid bed.
"Tho' thou in gems and richeſt ſilks ſhouldſt ſhine,
"Yet theſe, alas! muſt be a prey to flames.

(76) See the notes Variorum, on Virgil's Georg. lib. 3. ver. 20.

It is ſaid that hangings were not known in Rome, till thoſe of Attalus, which he bequeathed to the Romans, were carried thither (76). Servius affirms (77), that they were invented in the court of the Kings of Pergamus, and were called auæa, ab aula Attali (78). But he is miſtaken in this laſt aſſertion, the Romans calling hangings from the Greek αὐλαίαι (79). However this be, the Attalic hangings were famous. Quid illa Attalica, tota Sicilia nominata, ab eodem Heio peripetaſmata emere oblitus es (80)? i. e. "Why did you forget to purchaſed of Heius, thoſe "gold hangings, which are called Attalic in all parts "of Sicily?" King Attalus firſt invented gold embroidery; aurum intexere in eadem Aſia invenit Attalus Rex (81). Conſider the following paſſage of Silius Italicus.

(77) Ideo aulæa dicta ſunt quod primum in aula Attali, Regis Aſiæ, qui populum Romanum ſcripſit hæredem inventa ſunt. Servius, in Æn. lib. 1. ver. 697.

(78) Servius, in hæc verba Georg. lib. 3. ver. 25. Purpurea intexti tollunt aulæa Britanni.

Quæ radio jactat Babylon, vel murice picto,
Læta Tyros, quæque Attalicis variata per artem,
Aulæis ſcribuntur acu (82).

(79) See Plutarch. in vita Themiſtoclis.

(80) Cicero in Verrem, lib. 6. folio m. 70, B.

(81) Plin. lib. 8. cap. 48. p. m. 232. He ſays, chap. 3. book 33. Attalicis jampridem aurum intexitur inventio regum Aſiæ.

(82) Silius Italicus, lib. 14. p. m. 636.

"Whate'er proud Babylon boaſts of its loom,
"Or the proud Tyrian of his purple dye:
"Or the rich and far-fam'd Attalic tapeſtry.

Pliny makes frequent mention of the exceſſive high price which King Attalus paid for good pictures (83).

(83) Plin. lib. 7. cap. 38. and 34 and 35.

[O] I muſt take notice of ſome errors of Moreri.] My animadverſions relate to the Dutch edition. 1. It is falſe to aſſert, that Attalus, the firſt of that name, extended his conqueſts, in Aſia, as far as mount Taurus. It was under Eumenes, that the Kingdom of Pergamus has this extent, and that by the liberality of the Romans; for before this it was a petty ſtate, as I will now prove. Συνεπολέμησε δὲ καὶ οὗτος (Εὐμένης) Ῥωμαίοις πρός τε Ἀντίοχον τὸν μέγαν, καὶ πρὸς Περσέα. καὶ ἔλαβεν ὑπὸ τῶν Ῥωμαίων ἅπασαν τὴν ὑπ' Ἀντιόχῳ τῷ ἐντὸς τοῦ Ταύρου. Πρότερον δ' ἦν τὰ περὶ Πέργαμον ὑ πολλὰ χωρία μέχρι τῆς Θαλάττης τῆν καλὰ τὸν Ἑλαΐτην κόλπον, καὶ τὸν Ἀδραμυττηνόν (84); i. e. "This Eumenes was likewiſe "an ally of the Romans, in the wars againſt Antiochus "the Great and Perſeus; and the Romans gave him "all that Antiochus had poſſeſſed of Aſia, on the hi-"ther ſide of Taurus. Till then, only a few places "had been ſubject to the Kings of Pergamus, as far as "the ſea, near the bay of Elæa and Adramyttium." Father Labbe led Moreri into thoſe errors, he citing thus with regard to Attalus; "Juſtin 27. Livy 34. "Polybius 5. where he ſays, that he extended his "conqueſts in Aſia, as far as mount Taurus (85)." I did not find this in the 5th book of Polybius; but only that Attalus, during the war againſt Achæus, forced the inhabitants of many cities to declare in his favour. Now we do not call this conqueſts: it does not appear that theſe cities, after his return to Pergamus, were ſubject to him. 2. He ſhould not have contented himſelf with the quotation of Father Labbe's three Authors, ſince they take no notice of the friendſhip of the four brothers, which is generally propoſed as a pattern for the union and harmony that ought to reign between brothers. He ought to have cited Plutarch for this, as Father Labbe did (86). 3. Attalus's wife, the mother of thoſe four brothers, was called Ἀπολλωνὶς (87). He therefore ought not to have called her Apollonie, but Apollonis or Apollonide. 4. The article of the ſecond Attalus is a very poor one. He there begins with ſaying, that he was firſt ſent by his brother Eumenes to Rome in 596, where the Senate indulged him in all he requeſted. This is a mere tranſcript of Father Labbe (88). This Attalus was upwards of threeſcore at the time mentioned there; and conſequently his hiſtory ought not to have began there, conſidering the many memorable acts he had performed before. 5. I am of opinion, that he was not his brother's Embaſſador in Rome anno 596, and believe that the periods were confounded. The journey he made to Rome, after the laſt King of Macedon was taken priſoner, about the year 584, has been transferred to the year 596. 6. It is abſurd to cite Polybius lib. 5. and Juſtin lib. 36. ſince they make no mention of this Attalus. I am to obſerve, that Polybius's hiſtory did not extend as far as the year of Rome 596. 7. Attalus, the third of that name, was ſirnamed Philometor and not Philopater. This error is alſo found in Father Labbe (89). But the circumſtance that moſt deſerves blame, is, his having introduced, between theſe three Attalus's, an Attalus Philadelphus, without taking notice that this is not a new Attalus. The omiſſion of this notice, makes the Reader imagine, that this Attalus Philadelphus differs from the other three, and yet he is the ſame perſon with Attalus the ſecond. We will ſee whether his article be juſt. 8. He does not there diſtinguiſh the actions performed by him before he was King, from thoſe he atchieved under his brother's reign; every Reader may very juſtly ſuppoſe, that every particular related was done by Attalus, after he was appointed Guardian of his nephew, with the Title of King. Now this is falſe. 9. It was not he who ſuſtained the ſiege of Pergamus againſt Antiochus. The Reader has heard (90) that King Eumenes was in Pergamus during the ſiege. 10. He did not make war againſt Perſeus King of Macedon; but he ſhould have ſaid, that he aſſiſted in this war, in quality of ally of the Romans. 11. Neither Strabo nor Appian, whom he cites, ſay that Attalus took Pruſias priſoner; 12. Nor that he ſent preſents to Scipio Æmilianus before Numantia. 13. Nor that he loſt his life by the treachery of Attalus his nephew; for he died before Scipio went to Numantia.

(84) Strabo, lib. 13. p. 429.

(85) Labbe, Chronol. Franc. Tome 2. p. 300. ad ann. Rom. 512.

(86) Labbe, ibid. p. 336. ad ann. 556.

(87) Strabo, lib. 13. p. 429.

(88) Labbe, p. 365. ad ann. 596.

(89) Ibid. p. 391. ad ann. 621.

(90) In the laſt remark, towards the cloſe of the preceding art.

PERIANDER, tyrant of Corinth. He was reckoned among the ſeven wiſe men of Greece; but it had been better to place him among the moſt wicked men that ever lived: for for he altered the conſtitution of his country [A], oppreſſed the liberty of it, and ſeized upon the ſovereign power (a): and to maintain himſelf in his uſurpation, he put the moſt conſiderable men in the city to death, thinking they were capable to reſtore the antient conſtitution of their country (b). On a ſolemn Feſtival he deprived all the women of their jewels, and employed them in the making of a golden ſtatue, which he had vowed (c) [B]. He committed inceſt with his own mother [C]; he kicked his wife to death, though ſhe was with child; he had his concubines burnt, becauſe their calumnies had exaſperated him againſt his wife: he was ſo angry with his ſecond ſon (d), for lamenting his mother's death, that he baniſhed him from his houſe, and diſinherited him. He formed an abominable ſcheme of revenge againſt the inhabitants of Corcyra; which was his ſending their young boys (e) to King Alyattes, to be caſtrated: and when he knew that the ſhip in which thoſe innocent young victims were, put into the harbour of Samos, and that theſe youths were preſerved from the misfortune he deſigned them, he was ſo vexed at it, that he died with grief. He was then about fourſcore years old (f). Some ſay that he lay with his wife after ſhe was dead [D]; a brutality, which is not much leſs ſhocking and horrid

(a) Diog. Laert. lib. 1. num. 98.

(b) Herodotus, lib. 5. cap. 92. p. m. 324.

(c) Diog. Laert. lib. 1. num. 96.

(d) His name was LYCOPHRON; ſee his article, in which I relate what Herodotus obſerves of him.

(e) Diog. Laert. does not limit the number of them. Herodotus, lib. 3. cap. 48. ſays, three hundred choſen out of the beſt families of the iſland.

(f) Extracted from Diog. Laert. in vita Periandri, lib. 1.

[A] He altered the conſtitution of his country.] Diogenes Laertius aſſerts it poſitively. Οὗτος πρῶτος, ſays he (1), δορυφόρους ἔσχε, καὶ τὴν ἀρχὴν εἰς τυραννίδα μετέστησε. He is the firſt who was ſurrounded with guards, and changed the Commonwealth into a Monarchy. Aldobrandinus obſerves upon theſe words, that if we may credit Ariſtotle, we muſt aſcribe to Periander the invention of moſt of the means, by which tyranny is eſtabliſhed and ſupported (2). Omnium autem earum rerum, quæ ad tyrannidem faciunt conſtituendam & conſervandam, auctorem fuiſſe Periandrum Cypſeli filium, tum aliis locis, tum præcipue eodem, lib. 5. polit. ait cap. 11. Τούτων, inquit, τὰ (3) πολλὰ φασι καθαιρῆσαι Περίανδρον. Monſieur Menage, on the ſame words of Laertius, quotes Suidas, who aſſerts, that Periander had 300 guards about him, and that he forbad the Corinthians to keep footmen, and to live in idleneſs. He was continually inventing ſomething to keep them, and he fined thoſe whom he met with ſitting in the publick ſtreets; he feared leſt they ſhould contrive ſomething againſt him. We muſt however obſerve, that Herodotus does not aſcribe the firſt eſtabliſhment of tyranny to him, but to Cypſelus, who having reigned very cruelly at Corinth during thirty years, left his whole authority to his ſon Periander. Τυραννεύσας δὲ ὁ Κύψελος, τοιοῦτος δή τις ἀνὴρ ἐγένετο· πολλοὺς μὲν Κορινθίων ἐδίωξε, πολλοὺς δὲ χρημάτων ἀπεξέρησε, πολλῷ δ' ἔτι πλείους τῆς ψυχῆς. Cypſelus having obtained the ſovereign power, proved ſuch a tyrant, that he made the Corinthians ſuffer many vexations, for he fined many of them, and put a great many more to death (4). Periander was at firſt leſs ſevere than his father, but he proved much more cruel afterwards.

(1) Diog. Laert. in Periandro, num. 98. lib. 1.

(2) Aldobrandinus, in Diog. Laert. ibid.

(3) Aldobrandinus ought not therefore to have made uſe of the word omnium (all thoſe means) the very words he quotes from Ariſtotle (who ſays but many of thoſe means) refute him.

(4) Herodot. lib. 5. cap. 92. p. 324.

[B] The golden Statue which he had vowed.] Take notice of a very remarkable proof of the diſorder in which the falſe religions leave the heart and the mind: they do not reform men's inclination to evil. See here Periander, who makes vows, and who dares not neglect to fulfill them, even when he wants money (5). He believes therefore that there are Gods, he believes a providence, and yet he defiles himſelf with an inceſt, with ſpilling innocent blood, he kills his wife, &c. Let us ſpeak of the diſorders of the mind. This ſame tyrant does not dread the puniſhment of his inceſts, and his murders, but he fears that the Gods would puniſh him ſeverely, and load him with misfortunes, if he did not conſecrate a maſs of gold, which he had promiſed them. Nay, what is worſe ſtill, he imagines that though he accompliſhes his vow only by the means of a moſt unjuſt robbery, which makes all the women of Corinth deſperate, yet the Statue of gold, which he conſecrates, will be acceptable to the Gods, and preſerve him from thoſe evils, which they would have made him ſuffer, had he not offered the Statue he had vowed. If you except the violence offered to a woman's chaſtity or to her conſcience, there is no injury more grievous to honeſt women, than to rob them of their ornaments. The paſſion of being well dreſſed and adorned with jewels, was always very ſtrong in the fair ſex. Φιλόκοσμον genus femineum eſt: multaſque etiam inſignis pudicitiæ, quamvis nulli virorum, tamen ſibi ſcimus libenter ornari (6). . . . . Ut taceam de inaurium pretiis, candore margaritarum, rubri maris profunda teſtantium, ſmaragdorum virore, cerauniorum flammis, hiacynthorum pelago, ad quæ ardent & inſaniunt ſtudia matronarum (7). i. e. "Womankind loves finery: and even many women of an eminent modeſty love to "dreſs, though not for the men, yet to pleaſe themſelves. . . . . Not to mention coſtly ear-rings, white "pearls fetched from the bottom of the Red-Sea, "ſhining emeralds, ſparkling rubies, and bright "jacinths, of which the Ladies are extremely fond." I obſerve this only with a deſign to render the tyrannical temper of the pretended wiſe man of Greece more odious. See the remark [D].

(5) Ἔφορος, ἱστορεῖ ὡς εὔξαιτο, εἰ νικήσειν Ὀλύμπια τεθριππῳ, χρυσᾶν ἀνδριάντα ἀναθεῖναι. νικήσας δὲ, καὶ ἀπορῶν χρυσίου, &c. i. e. "Ephorus relates, that he "(Periander) vowed to conſecrate a golden ſtatue to "the Gods, if "he won the "Olympic "games, and "having won "it, but wanting "money, &c." Diog. Laert. lib. 1. num. 96. p. 60.

(6) Hieron. Epiſt. ad Gaudentium, de Pacauiæ inſtitut. p. m. 268.

(7) Idem, Epiſt. ad Demetriadan, de Servanda Virginitate, p. 291.

[C] He committed inceſt with his own mother.] Her name was Cratea (8). Some aſſert (9), that as ſhe would not refrain the violence of her paſſion, ſhe propoſed to her ſon to lie ſecretly with a woman, who was paſſionately in love with him, but who would not be known. He conſented to it, and thus lay with his mother without being aware of it: for Cratea got into the bed where the pretended Miſtreſs, whom ſhe had mentioned to her ſon, was to be. This intrigue continued a long while upon the ſame footing; but at laſt Periander was reſolved to know who that woman was, he had ſo often enjoyed. He concealed ſome perſon in the room, and when his mother was going to bed, he came to her with a flambeau in his hand. He would have killed her immediately, had he not been prevented by a genius who appeared to him. After that time he lived like a mad man, he became cruel, and put many perſons to death. As for Cratea ſhe made heavy complaints againſt her deſtiny, and killed herſelf. Others do not relate the ſtory ſo: they confeſs indeed (10), that Periander's converſation with his mother was kept very ſecret; but not, that he was ignorant of his lying with his mother. They aſſert that he liked the ſport extremely well, and was angry only becauſe his inceſt was diſcovered; he vented his anger upon his ſubjects, and acted ever after like a tyrant.

(8) Diog. Laert. lib. 1. num. 96.

(9) Parthenius, in Eroticis, cap. 17.

(10) Ariſtippus, apud Diogen. Laertium, lib. 1. num. 96. p. 60.

After his mother was killed, he diſcontinued to worſhip the Goddeſs Venus, and to offer ſacrifices to her; but at laſt he began to worſhip her again, becauſe of ſome dreams, which his wife Meliſſa had. This is what Plutarch obſerves in the beginning of his Banquet of the ſeven wiſe men. He ſuppoſes that on the day of that entertainment Periander began again to ſacrifice to that Goddeſs.

[D] Some ſay that he lay with his wife after ſhe was dead.] Here follows one of Herodotus's ſtories; he relates it where he mentioned the unjuſt uſage which the women of Corinth met with under Periander's reign. This tyrant ſent to conſult the oracle of the dead, about a certain depoſit. His wife Meliſſa appeared, and declared that ſhe would by no means reveal that ſecret; for I am very cold, ſaid ſhe, I am quite naked, the garments with which I have been buried are of no uſe to me, becauſe they have not been burnt. And to prove, continued ſhe, that what I ſay is true, I need only to obſerve, that Periander put his bread into a cold oven. Periander being acquainted with this diſcourſe, it appeared very true to him, becauſe he remembred, that he had lain with Meliſſa, even after ſhe had given up the ghoſt (11). Ταῦτα δὲ ὡς ὀπίσω ἀπηγγέλθη τῷ Περιάνδρῳ, πιστὸν γὰρ οἱ ἦν τὸ συμβόλαιον, ὃς νεκρὰ εἰδυῖη Μελίσσῃ ἐμίγη. Hæc Periandro renunciata, ob illud argumentum fidem fecere, quod ipſe cum Meliſſa quamvis defuncta coierat horrid than that of the Lydian King, who ate his wife up [E]. There are ſome Authors (g) ſilly enough to reckon that action of Periander among the remarkable inſtances of conjugal love. He reigned forty four years, according to Ariſtotle (h), or forty, according to Diogenes Laertius (i). He flouriſhed towards the 38th Olympiad (k). Moreri has made ſome miſtakes [F].

(11) Herodot. lib. 5. cap. 92.

We meet in a work of Heraclides with ſome particulars, which are not diſhonourable to Periander. If he would not ſuffer the inhabitants of Corinth to keep men-ſervants, he forbad coierat (12). He had it therefore proclaimed that all the women of Corinth ſhould come into the Temple of Juno. They obeyed, and dreſſed themſelves in their fineſt attire, as it were for an holiday. But the guards who were hid in the Temple, ſtripped them all without exception; miſtreſſes and ſervants were all uſed alike. All their clothes were burnt on Meliſſa's tomb. That woman was the daughter of Procles, tyrant of Epidaurus, and by her mother's ſide ſhe was related to great Lords, who reigned almoſt throughout all Arcadia (13). An Author quoted by Athenæus, does not give us ſo high a notion of Meliſſa's quality: he aſſerts that Periander fell in love with her (14), as he ſaw her once giving ſome workmen drink (15).

[E] The Lydian King, who eat his wife up.] The Sieur de Rampalle, deſigning to prove that the corruption of morals is not greater in our age, than it was formerly, quotes among other inſtances of intemperance, the voracity of Maximinus, of Albinus, of Phagon, and of Aſtidamas, and then he adds, that Cambyſes ſupped one night upon his wife (16). He is miſtaken as to the name; for I do not think it can be proved that any King of Lydia was ever called Cambyſes: and after all that is not the name of him, who devoured his wife. His name was Cambles. He was a great eater and a hard drinker. The Hiſtorian who mentions him, hints, that he committed that crime without being ſenſible of it; and that he was not apprized of his inhumanity, but when he found his wife's hand in his mouth, as he awaked. He killed himſelf when he came to know the world was acquainted with what he had done. Ξάνθος δὲ ἐν τοῖς Λυδιακοῖς, Κάμβληα φησὶ τὸν βασιλεύσαντα Λυδῶν πολυφάγον γενέσθαι καὶ πολυπότην, ἔτι δὲ γαστρίμαργον. τοῦτον οὖν πολλὰ νυκτὸς τὴν ἑαυτοῦ γυναῖκα καταπρεπῆ γήσαντα καταφαγεῖν. ἔπειτα πρωὶ εὑρόντα τὴν χεῖρα τῆς γυναικὸς ἐν αὑτῷ ὄντα ἐν τῷ στόματι, ἑαυτὸν ἀποσφάξαι μὴ βουλόμενον τῆς πράξεως γινομένης. Xanthus in Lydiacis narrat Cambleta Lydorum olim regem, edacem, bibacem, guloſum fuiſſe, noctuque uxorem ſuam in fruſta diſſectam voraſſe: deinde craſtino manè, repertâ conjugis manu, quæ ad ejus os hæſerat, re cognitâ, & in vulgus ſparſa, ſeipſum jugulaſſe (17). I can hardly believe but this is much like thoſe old women's ſtories, in which giants and men-eaters are ſo much mentioned.

[F] Moreri has made ſome miſtakes.] I ſhall not take notice of his omiſſions; every one may know them by comparing his article of Periander with mine. I. He reckons wrong when he aſſerts that Periander began his reign in the 38th Olympiad, and died in the 48th, having reigned forty four years. He might have ſaid this, if Periander had ſucceeded his father in the beginning of the 38th Olympiad, and was dead towards the end of the 48th Olympiad. But if this were the caſe Moreri ought to have explained it more accurately. II. He ſhould not have quoted Euſebius; for he does not ſay that Periander reigned forty four years. He places the beginning of his reign under the 1ſt year of the 38th Olympiad, and the end (18) under the 1ſt year of the 48th Olympiad. I find a very groſs blunder in theſe words of Scaliger. Obiit (Periander) anno ultimo Olympiadis 48. Tyrannidem obtinuit annos 40. auctore Laërtio. Ergo ejus initium an. primo Olympiadi 38. ut hic rectè aſſignatum (19). i. e. "Periander died the laſt year of the "48th Olympiad. He reigned 40 years according "to Laertius: the beginning therefore of his reign "is truly placed, as it is done here, under the firſt "year of the 38th Olympiad." It is falſe, that according to Euſebius Periander died the laſt year of the 48th Olympiad. And if Euſebius had placed that Prince's death under that year, he would not agree with Diogenes Laertius, who makes him reign but forty years. Scaliger is more accurate five pages lower (20). III. Periander did not anſwer to thoſe, who aſked him why he kept the ſovereign power, that it was as dangerous to reſign it, as to loſe it. That anſwer is equivocal, and obſcure: it is falſe in all thoſe caſes, in which men loſe the ſupreme authority with their lives: for they who loſe it thus, do not run any danger afterwards. It ought to have been ſaid that he anſwered, it was as dangerous to reſign the tyrannical power of one's own accord, as to be deprived of it by one's enemies. We have not in French the privilege of ſpeaking obſcurely: we muſt take care not to expoſe ourſelves to cenſure, much more than the antients were obliged to do. I obſerve this becauſe I tranſcribe the words of the original. Πότε ἐρωτηθεὶς διὰ τὶ τυραννεῖ, ἔφη, ὅτι καὶ τὸ ἑκουσίως ἀποστῆναι, καὶ τὸ ἀφαιρεθῆναι, κίνδυνον φέρει. Being aſked once, why he continued to act the tyrant, he anſwered, becauſe it is dangerous both to reſign it willingly, and to be deprived of it (21). IV. To what purpoſe is Soſicrates (22) quoted, who ſays not a word of what is contained in the article of Periander, and whoſe opinion even differs from that which is followed there with regard to that tyrant's age? He ſuppoſes that he died forty one years before the 49th Olympiad (23). I know very well that by altering the pointing, his opinion may be almoſt reconciled with Euſebius's (24). But did Moreri know this? And muſt Authors be quoted according to ſuch readings as are diſputed? They only may do it, who have given notice that they follow the correction of ſuch or ſuch a Critick. Here follow Balzac's words, which relate to Periander's anſwer. *There is no leſs danger in reſigning the ſupreme power, than in uſurping it. Phalaris * was ready to abdicate, but he would have a God for his ſecurity, who would anſwer for his life, in caſe he reſigned his authority: and it has always been a general opinion that they, who riſe in arms againſt their country, or againſt their Prince, are in a manner under a neceſſity to do evil, becauſe they find it unſafe to do good. They dare not to become innocent, leſt they ſhould expoſe themſelves to the ſeverity of thoſe laws againſt which they have offended; they continue therefore in their crimes, becauſe they do not believe men would be ſatisfied with their repentance* (25). This was one of the maxims, which Mæcenas urged, when Auguſtus conſulted with him and with Agrippa whether or not he ſhould reſtore the Romans to their liberty. Agrippa, adviſed him to do it, and Mæcenas diſſuaded him from it. Let us tranſcribe here the learned Meibomius's collections. Tangit Xiphilinus, ſays he (26), ex parte cauſſam, qua motus Mæcenas Auguſto ſuaſerit, ut imperium retineret. Regnum nempe juſtum & legitime comparatum imprimis conducere rerum magnitudini gubernandæ: nec aliud diſcordantis patriæ remedium eſſe, quam ut ab uno, ut loquitur Tacitus Ann. lib. 4. cap. 9. unumque Reip. corpus unius præſidis nutu, quaſi anima & mente regatur, ut monet Florus, lib. 4. cap. 111. Potior tamen, & altera cauſſa fuit, quam Suetonius adducit loco quem dixi (27), quod Auguſtum, ſi privatus viveret, non ſine periculo fore cenſeret. Eam etiam inculcat Zonaras; quod qui ſemel imperitarint, tuto privatam vitam agere nullo modo poſſint. Quo ſenſu jam olim Periander interrogatus, quur non deponeret imperium, reſpondit: Quoniam per vim imperitanti, etiam ultro imperio abire periculoſum, ut ex Xenophontis lib. de Memorabil. Socrat. refert Stobæus, Serm. 41. Quin & Mæcenas ipſa in Orat. apud Dionem, non alia ratione depoſitionem imperii Auguſto diſſuadet, quam quod oſtendat, neminem Senatui populoque reddita Rep. ipſi parciturum, qui multos offenderit. Hos enim rerum ſummam ad ſe trahendo, id acturos, ut vel ſe ulciſcantur, vel ipſum ſibi adverſantem è medio tollant. Docet id exemplis Pompeji, Julii Cæſaris, Marii, ac Sullæ: quos abdicata poteſtas vel peſſum dederit, vel peſſum datura fuiſſet, ſi diutius vixiſſent. i. e. "Xiphilinus hints in part the "cauſe, which moved Mæcenas to perſuade Auguſtus to "keep the ſovereign power in his hands; namely, that "the (g) Raviſius Textor, in Officina, lib. 5. cap. 3. under the title de Amore conjugali, p. m. 553. and ſeveral others after him.

(h) Ariſt. Polit. lib. 5. cap. 12.

(i) Lib. 1. num. 98.

(k) Ibid.

(12) Idem, ibid. p. m. 325.

(13) Diog. Laert. lib. 1. num. 94.

(14) Pythænetus, lib. 3. de Ægina, apud Athen. lib. 13.

(15) Ὠμοφάγοι τοῖς ἐργαζομένοις. Operariis vinum miniſtrantem. Ibidem.

(16) Rampalle, que le monde ne va pas en empirant, p. 94.

(17) Athen. lib. 10. cap. 3. p. 415.

(18) He mentions only the end of the Monarchical Government at Corinth; but it is the ſame thing with Periander's death.

(19) Scaliger, Animadv. in Euſeb. num. 889. p. m. 84. col. 1.

(20) Ibidem, num. 929. p. 89.

(21) Diog. Laert. lib. 1. num. 97.

(22) They have put Socrates in the ſecond edit. printed in Holland.

(23) Apud Diogenem Laertium, lib. 1. num. 95.

(24) See Menage in Laertium, lib. 1. num. 95. p. 55.

Of the DANGER to which Tyrants who abdicate, expoſe themſelves.

* Phalar. in Epiſt.

(25) Balzac, in the 45th chapter of his Prince, p. m. 33, 34.

(26) Joannes Henricus Meibomius, in vita Mæcenatis, p. 87, 88.

(27) That is to ſay in Octavio, cap. 28. Meibomius quotes cap. 29.

forbad them alſo to live voluptuouſly. This was no bad law. He laid no taxes on any one, and was content with the cuſtom ariſing from the ſale and from the importation and exportation of commodities. He hated the wicked, and cauſed all thoſe to be drowned, who carried on the trade of pimps (l). Laſtly, he eſtabliſhed a Senate, and ſettled the expence of thoſe who were to be Members of it (m).

(l) Thus I underſtand theſe words, τὰς προαγωγὸς πάσας καταπόντιοι. Cragius thinks the proſtitutes are meant here.

(m) Extracted from Heraclides de Politiis, p. 17. editionis Cragii, 1593, in 4to.

" the juſt authority which he had lawfully acquired, was " neceſſary in order to govern ſo great a ſtate: and that " there was no other means, as Tacitus ſpeaks, to " ſuppreſs the diviſions of the country, than the Govern- " ment of ONE, who like the mind and ſoul of the whole " ſhould rule every thing according to his will and plea- " ſure, as Florus obſerves. However, there was a- " nother and more weighty reaſon, which Suetonius " hints in the paſſage I have mentioned; namely, " that Auguſtus would not be free from danger, if he " led a private life. Zonaras urges the ſame argu- " ment, for he obſerves that a man who has once " reigned, cannot be ſecure in a private ſtation. " To the ſame purpoſe was Periander's anſwer: who " being aſked formerly, why he did not reſign the " ſupreme power, replied, it is dangerous for a tyrant " to abdicate even of his own accord, as Stobeus re- " lates from Xenophon. Nay, Mæcenas himſelf in " his oration, rehearſed by Dion, urges that very " reaſon to diſſuade Auguſtus from abdicating: he " repreſents to him that if the Government of the " Commonwealth were reſtored to the Senate and the Peo- " ple, no man would ſpare him, who had exaſperated " many. For that they, arrogating the principal authority to " themſelves, would labour, either to revenge themſelves, " or to get rid of him, if he oppoſed them. He proves " this by the examples of Pompey, Julius Cæſar, " Marius, and Sylla, whom the abdicating of the " ſovereign power did really ruin, or would have " undone, had they lived longer." We may add to this an anſwer of Solon. His friends thought it very ſtrange that he ſhould be frightened at the very name of a Monarch, and ſhould not dare to improve the opportunities he had to ſeize upon the Government. He anſwered (28), It is true, a tyranny is a very fair ſpot, but it has no way to go out at. No man has, I think, put this thought into a better light than Xenophon. He ſuppoſes a tyrant, who makes a moſt lively deſcription of the misfortunes which attend his condition; after which Simonides aſks him, why do you continue in it? Why do you not abdicate? Conſider well what he anſwers. The greateſt misfortune of tyranny is, that there are no means to reſign it. How can a tyrant, who has abdicated, return the ſums of money he has robbed? How can he indemnify thoſe he has put in priſon? How can he reſtore to life again ſo many perſons he has put to death? If a man has ever a juſt cauſe to hang himſelf it is when he is a tyrant. The Greek paſſage will charm thoſe who can underſtand it; let us therefore do them the pleaſure to tranſcribe it. Καὶ πῶς (ἔφη) ὦ Ἱέρων, εἰ ὕτω πονηρόν ἐϛι τὸ τυραννεῖν, κ᾽ τοῦτο συνίγνωκας, ὃν ἀπαλλάτ῀ ὕτω μεγάλα κακῶ; ὅτε σὺ ὅτε ἄλλος μὲν δὴ ὐδεὶς πώποτε ἐκὼν εἶναι τυραννίδ@ ἀφεῖτο, ὅσπερ ἂν ἅπαξ κτήσαιτο; Ὅτι (ἔφη) ὦ Σιμωνίδη, ταύτη ἀθλιώτατόν ἐϛιν ἡ τυραννίς· οὐδὲ γὰρ ἀπαλλαγῆναι δυνατὸν αὐτῆς ἐϛί. πῶς γὰρ ἄν τις ποτὲ ἐξαρκέσειε τύραννο@ ἢ χρήματα ἐκ τῶν ὅσους ἀφείλετο, ἢ δεσμοὺς ἀντιπαράσχοι ὅσους δὴ ἐδέσμευσεν, ἢ ὅσους καθέκτανε, πῶς ἂν ἱκανὰς ψυχὰς ἀντιπαράσχοιτο ἀποθανουμένας; ἀλλ᾽ εἴ πε᷈ρ τῷ ἄλλῳ, ὦ Σιμωνίδη, λυσιτελεῖ ἀπάγξασθαι, ἴσθι (ἔφη) ὅτι τυράννῳ ἔγωγε ἐυρίσκω μάλισα τοῦτο λυσιτελῶ ποιῆσαι. μόνῳ γὰρ αὐτῷ ὔτε ἔχειν ὔτε καταλέσθαι τὰ κακὰ λυσιτελεῖ. *Et qui fit, inquit Hieron, ut ſi adeo miſera res eſt tyrannidem gerere, idque te non fugit, non abjicias tam ingens malum? Neque tu, neque alius quiſquam unquam lubens tyrannidem depoſuit, ubi ſemel nactus eſt. Quoniam, inquit, ô Simonides, iſto nomine miſerrima eſt tyrannis, quòd ab ea non licet diſcedere. Quomodo enim quiſquam tyrannus unquam ſuffecerit ad pecuniam rependendam iis quos ſpoliavit ? aut quomodo vincula repenſet iis quos detruſit in vincula? aut quomodo reſtituet tot animas extinctas iis quos occidit? Sed ſi cuiquam alteri, ô Simonides, expedit laqueo finire vitam, ſcito, inquit, me compertum habere, ut id faciat nulli magis expedire quàm tyranno, quandoquidem huic uni mala nec retinere nec deponere expedit (29). Dionyſius, the Tyrant, uſed to ſay, that rather than return on horſe-back to a private life, a man muſt ſuffer himſelf to be dragged to it by the feet. Livius relates this; but he adds another thought to it, which weakens the former, ultima primis obſtant, and which overthrows the whole ſubject I am treating here. You may judge of it, for I ſhall tranſcribe the whole paſſage. Sed evocatum eum (30) ab legatis Demarata uxor, filia Hieronis, inflata adhuc regiis animis, ac muliebri ſpiritu, admonet ſæpe uſurpatæ Dionyſii tyranni vocis: qua pedibus tractum, non inſidentem equo relinquere tyrannidem dixerit debere. Facile eſſe momento quo quis velit, cedere poſſeſſione magnæ fortunæ: facere & parare eam, difficile atque arduum eſſe. Paululum ſumeret ſpacii ad conſultandum ab legatis: eo uteretur ad accerſendos ex Leontinis milites, quibus ſi pecuniam regiam pollicitus eſſet, omnia in poteſtate ejus futura. Hæc muliebria conſilia Andronodorus neque tota aſpernatus eſt, neque extemplò accepit (31). i. e. " But his wife Demarata, Hieron's daughter, who " had ſtill a royal heart, and the ambition of a wo- " man, calling him (Andronodorus) aſide from the " Embaſſadors, put him in mind of the ſentence, " which Dionyſius the Tyrant uſed to repeat, that a " man ſhould chooſe to be dragged by the feet from " the throne, rather than run from it as it were on " horſe-back. It was an eaſy matter to abdicate an " high poſt whenever he pleaſed; but very hard and " difficult to riſe to it. That he ſhould deſire the " Embaſſadors to give him ſome time to conſult; " and that he ſhould take that opportunity to ſend " for ſoldiers from Leontium, and that if he promiſed " them a royal ſtipend, every thing would ſoon ſub- " mit to him. Andronodorus did not entirely reject " that advice of a woman, but he did not follow it " immediately." There is no need to ſuppoſe, that the ſecond maxim was alſo of Dionyſius; for in all likelihood it was of that ambitious woman, whom Livy makes to ſpeak here. Cicero obſerves, that it was impoſſible for that Tyrant to abdicate his power, and to reform his wicked life, without ruining himſelf (32).

* There is a ſentence omitted here; quomodo ſatisfaciet iis quos in carcerem conjecit?

(29) Xenophon, in Hierone, ſive Tyrannico, p. 533. edit. Henr. Staphani, 1581.

(30) That is to ſay, Andronodorus, who was entreated at Syracuſe, to abdicate the exorbitant power, which he had uſurped.

(31) T. Livius, lib. 24. cap. 22.

(32) Atque ei ne integrum quidem erat ut ad juſtitiam remigraret civibuſque libertatem & jura redderet. His enim ſe adoleſcens improvida ætate irretierat erratis, eaque commiſerat ut ſalvus eſſe non poſſet ſit ſanus eſſe cœpiſſet. Cicero, Tuſcul. 5. cap. 21. i. e. " It was not " poſſible for " him to return " to the practice " of juſtice, and " to reſtore to " his citizens " their liberty " and their " laws; for in " his youth he " had intricated " himſelf in ſo " many crimes, " and done ſuch " things, that he " could not have " been ſafe, had " he began to be " wiſe."

(28) Καλὸν μὲν εἶναι τὴν τυραννίδα χωρίον, οὐκ ἔχειν δὲ ἀπόδασιν. Præclarum fundum tyrannidem eſſe, ſed non habere exitum. Plutarchus, in Solone, p. 85.

PERIBÆA, the daughter of Alcathous King of Megara, the wife of Telamon King of Salamina, and the mother of Ajax. See the remark [C] of the article TELAMON.

PERICLES, was one of the greateſt men that ever flouriſhed in Greece. His Anceſtors both by the father and the mother's ſide were very illuſtrious. He was educated with all the care imaginable, and beſides other maſters, he had for his tutors Zeno Eleates, and Anaxagoras, two of the moſt eminent Philoſophers, who taught at Athens. He learnt from the latter, among other things, to fear the Gods without ſuperſtition [A], and

[A] He learnt from Anaxagoras to fear the Gods without ſuperſtition.] The people at Athens were alarmed without reaſon, as ſoon as there appeared ſome uncommon phænomenon in the air. They imagined it was a ſign of the Gods anger. The Philoſopher Anaxagoras freed Pericles from that fear, by explaining to him the natural cauſes of thoſe meteors. Thus he inſpired him with a more reaſonable devotion, which was not diſturbed by ſuperſtitious fears, and made him hope with an eaſy mind for the bleſſings of Heaven. Οὐ μόνον δὲ ταῦτα τῆς Ἀναξαγόρου συνουσίας ἀπέλαυσε Περικλῆς. ἀλλὰ κ᾽ δεισιδαιμονίας δικεῖ γενέσθαι καθυπέρτερο@, ὅση πρὸς τὰ μετέωρα θάμβο@ ἐργάζεται τοῖς αὐτῶν τὰ τούτων τὰς αἰτίας ἀγνοοῦσι, κ᾽ περὶ τὰ θεῖα δαιμονῶσι κ᾽ ταραττομένοις δι᾽ ἀπειρίαν αὐτῶν. ἦν ὁ φυσικὸς λόγο@ ἀπαλλάττων, ἀντὶ τῆς φοβερᾶς κ᾽ φλεγμαινούσης δεισιδαιμονίας, τὴν ἀσφαλῆ and to account for the eclipſes by a natural cauſe, which proved once very ſerviceable to the Athenians [B]. Men were unjuſt enough to ſuſpect him of Atheiſm, becauſe he had φαλῆ μεῖ' ἐλπίδων ἀγαθῶν εὐσεβείαν ἐνεργάζεσθαι. Nor were theſe the only advantages, which Pericles had of Anaxagoras's acquaintance, and keeping him company: but he ſeemed alſo to be advanced by his inſtructions far above that ſuperſtition, whatever it is, which as to meteors, and the like ſtrange appearances, does with frightful apprehenſions poſſeſs the minds of people, who are ignorant of the true cauſes, by which ſuch effects are naturally produced, and are mad as if the Devil were in them, and in a great agony and diſorder, upon occaſion of theſe divine prodigies, by reaſon of their ignorance, and want of ſkill about them: which ignorance natural reaſon diſcharging and freeing men from, inſtead of a dreadful and unquiet troubleſom ſuperſtition, works in them a free and generous devotion, together with good hopes and kindly aſſurances (1).

(1) Plutarchus, in Pericle, p. 154 F. We make uſe here of the Engliſh tranſlation by ſeveral hands, printed at London 1683, in 5 vol. 8vo. vol. 1. p. 515.

A REFLECTION on the doctrine of Preſages.

What Plutarch relates immediately after this paſſage, deſerves to be quoted. They brought one day to Pericles a ram's head which had only one horn. The ram was born at a country houſe of Pericles. Lampon the Diviner declared it was a ſign that the power of the two factions, which then divided the city of Athens (2), would fall entirely into the hands of him in whoſe ground this prodigy happened. Anaxagoras went another way to work: he diſſected the monſter, and finding the ſkull leſs than it ſhould have been, and of an oval figure, he explained the reaſon why that ram had but one horn, and why it grew out of the midſt of the forehead. That method of accounting for prodigies was very much admired: but ſoon after, Lampon was admired in his turn, when Thucydides's faction was brought under, and the whole authority came into Pericles's hands. Whereupon the Hiſtorian obſerves, that the Diviner and the Philoſopher might both be in the right, the one for hitting upon the effect, and the other for finding out the cauſe. It was the Philoſopher's buſineſs, adds he, to explain whence and in what manner that ſingle horn was produced; but it was the Diviner's office to declare why it had been made, and what it portended. For they who aſſert, that the prodigy is deſtroyed, as ſoon as the natural cauſe of it is found out, do not take notice that they render artificial ſigns uſeleſs, as well as the celeſtial. The lights of watch-towers, the ſun-dials, &c. depend from ſome cauſes, which act according to certain rules, and yet they are deſigned to ſignify ſome things. This is the moſt ſpecious and ſtrongeſt argument that can be urged to ſupport the common opinion which Anaxagoras intended to refute. A natural phænomenon may be a prodigy or a ſign of ſome future evil, notwithſtanding the Philoſophers are capable to account for it. For though they may explain it by the efficacy of the ſecond cauſes, yet it is poſſible that it was deſigned to portend ſome things. Is not the light of watch-towers explained by natural cauſes? But does this prevent them from being a direction to Pilots for the courſe they are to take? Let us confeſs then, that Plutarch defended the common opinion, as learnedly as it could be done. The finding out the efficient cauſe, does not exclude the final cauſe; it does even ſuppoſe it neceſſarily in any action directed by an intelligent Being. What may then be the ground of the Philoſophers aſſertion, when they maintain, that the eclipſes, being natural conſequences of the motion of the planets, cannot be a preſage of the death of a King, and that the overflowing of rivers, being a natural effect of heavy rains, or of the melting of the ſnow, cannot portend a ſedition, the dethroning of a Prince, or ſuch other publick misfortunes? I anſwer to this queſtion, that their aſſertion is grounded on this, namely, that the effects of nature, cannot be prognoſticks of contingent events, unleſs ſome particular intelligent Being deſign them for that end. It is plain that the laws of nature, being left to follow their general courſe, would never have raiſed watch-towers, and would never have lighted fires on thoſe towers for the uſe of Pilots. It was neceſſary that men ſhould be concerned in it, it was neceſſary that their particular wills ſhould apply the power of bodies after a certain manner, relating to the end they propoſed. On the other hand it is plain, that the laws of nature, being left to follow their general courſe, could never produce meteors, or the overflowing of rivers, in order to give notice to the inhabitants of a country, that within two or three years, there will ariſe a ſedition, which will overturn their conſtitution. It is plain, that a particular intelligence muſt form thoſe meteors, or cauſe thoſe great floods, that they might prove ſigns of a change in the Government. Now, theſe are things for which Natural Philoſophy cannot account. For what depends from the particular will of a man, or of an angel, is not the object of a ſcience. Philoſophy cannot explain the cauſes of it. Whence it follows, 1. That an effect, for which natural Philoſophy accounts, is no preſage of a future and contingent event, and 2. that ſuch a preſage is not a thing that can be explained by the laws of nature. Plutarch therefore could not reaſonably aſſert, that the Diviner and the Philoſopher were both in the right, the former hitting the final cauſe, and the latter the efficient cauſe, unleſs he ſuppoſed that ſome particular genius or ſpirit diſpoſed that ram's ſkull after ſuch a manner, that the brain growing narrower, and terminating in a point over againſt the middle of the forehead, might produce but one horn, and make it come forth from that part. He muſt alſo ſuppoſe that that genius modified the ram's brains after that manner, with a deſign that the city of Athens ſhould have notice, that the faction of Pericles would oppreſs Thucydides's faction, and get the whole authority. But ſuch a ſuppoſition being inconſiſtent with the ideas, which teach us, that none but God knows the contingent events, cannot be admitted; ſo that we cannot believe the vulgar opinions about preſages, unleſs we admit alſo, that God produces in a miraculous manner, and by a particular will, all the natural effects which are taken for prognoſticks. According to that ſuppoſition, the miracles, properly ſo called, would be almoſt as frequent as the effects of nature; which is a monſtrous abſurdity. Do not forget to obſerve, that if God had a mind to perform a miracle, in order to let the Athenians know, that one of their parties would be ſuppreſſed, he would have had no occaſion to make that ram's ſkull narrower. He would have produced the horn in the middle of the forehead, without altering any thing in the brains; and this would have made the prodigy appear the better. However it be, I hope no man will find fault with me, for making ſome reflections on a thought of Plutarch, which is ſpecious enough to make moſt of the Readers imagine it is well grounded.

(2) That of Pericles, and that of Thucydides, the ſon of Mileſius.

[B] —— and to account for the eclipſes by a natural cauſe, which proved once very ſerviceable to the Athenians.] Let us tranſcribe a paſſage from Plutarch; it relates to a naval expedition in the beginning of the Peloponneſian war. "And now the veſſels having "their complement of men, and Pericles being gone "aboard the Admiral of his own galley, it happened that the ſun was in an eclipſe, and it grew dark "on a ſudden, to the extreme affrightment of them "all, looking upon it as a diſmal token, and an unlucky ill boding omen. Wherefore Pericles perceiving the pilot or ſteerſman ſeized with a great "fear, and at a ſtand what to do, he took his cloak, "and put it before the man's face, and muffling him "up in it, that he could not ſee, he aſked him, whether he did imagine there was any dreadful thing, "or great hurt in this, that he had done to him, or "whether he thought it was the ſign of any hurt? "He anſwering, no; why, ſaid he, and what does "that differ from this, only that that, which has "cauſed that darkneſs there, is ſomething greater "than a cloak (3)?" Quintilian obſerves, that Pericles freed the Athenians of a very great fear at that time. An verò cum Pericles Athenienſes Solis obſcuratione territos, redditis ejus rei cauſis, metu liberavit: aut cùm Sulpitius ille Gallus in exercitu L. Pauli de Lunæ defectione diſſeruit, ne velut prodigio divinitus facto militum animi terrerentur, non videtur eſſe uſus oratoris officio (4)? i. e. "But do not you think that Pericles "performed the office of an Orator, when he freed "the Athenians from fear, by explaining to them the "cauſes of an eclipſe of the ſun, at which they were "terrified;

(3) Plutarch's Lives, vol. 1. Life of Pericles, p. 588. Mr. Bayle quotes Amyot's French Tranſlation, Vie de Pericles, p. 615, 616, of Vaſcoſan's edit. 1567, in 8vo.

(4) Quintil. Inſtit. Orator. lib. 1. cap. 10. p. m. 55.

had perfectly ſtudied the Doctrine of that Philoſopher [C]. He ſignalized himſelf by an undoubted courage, and by a moſt extraordinary ſtrength of eloquence (a), which was improved and ſupported by the knowledge of Natural Philoſophy; he knew ſo well how to ſuit the people's taſte according to the different times, that he gained almoſt as great an authority under a Republican Government, as if he had been a Monarch [D]. But

a) See the rem. D].

" terrified; and Sulpicius Gallius, when he diſcourſed " of the eclipſe of the moon before L. Paulus's army, " that the ſoldiers might not be frightened at it as " a prodigy?" Valerius Maximus does not ſuppoſe with Plutarch, that Pericles was aboard the fleet; he pretends that that lecture of aſtronomy was given at Athens. Cùm obſcurato repentè ſole inuſitatis perfuſæ tenebris Athenæ ſolicitudine agerentur, interitum ſibi cæleſti denuntiatione portendi credentes; Pericles proceſſit in medium, & quæ à præceptore ſuo Anaxagora pertinentia ad ſolis & lunæ curſum acceperat, diſſeruit: nec ulterius trepidare cives ſuos vano metu paſſus eſt (5). " When " the Athenians were under a great conſternation, " occaſioned by a ſudden eclipſe of the ſun, which " ſpread a great darkneſs over the whole city, the " people taking it for an omen from Heaven, which " portended their deſtruction, Pericles ſtept among " them, and diſcourſing of the courſe of the ſun and " moon, according to what he had learnt from his " maſter Anaxagoras, he taught his fellow-citizens " not to fear ſuch phænomena for the future." Frontinus pretends he explained the cauſe of thunder-bolts, and not the cauſe of eclipſes. Pericles, ſays he (6), cùm in caſtra ejus fulmen decidiſſet, terruiſſetque milites, advocata concione, lapidibus in conſpectu omnibus colliſis, ignem excuſſit, ſedavitque turbationem, cùm docuiſſet ſimiliter nubium attritu excuti fulmen. i. e. " A " thunder-bolt falling once in Pericles's camp, fright- " ened his whole army, whereupon he called his ſol- " diers together, and beating ſtones againſt one ano- " ther, he ſtruck fire out of them, and thus he re- " moved the ſoldiers fears, by repreſenting to them, " that the thunder-bolts were nothing elſe but the " claſhing of the clouds againſt one another, which " occaſioned the bolts to fly about."

(5) Valer. Max. lib. 8. cap. 9. num. 1 Extern.

(6) Frontin. Stratag. lib. 1. cap. 12.

If all the Generals of the Athenians had ſtudied under the Philoſoper Anaxagoras, the misfortune which the Athenian fleet met with before Syracuſe, would not have happened. It was ready to ſail away; but an eclipſe of the moon happening at that time, their General Nicias would not ſet out, which proved the ruin of the whole fleet. But let us hear Plutarch. " The moon fell eclipſed in the night, to the great " fright of Nicias, and of others, who for want of " experience, or out of ſuperſtition, are ſcared with " theſe appearances. That the ſun would be darken- " ed about the thirtieth day of the month, by the " moon going between, this even the ordinary peo- " ple now well enough underſtood; but the moon it- " ſelf to be darkened, how that could come about, " and how on the ſudden a broad full moon ſhould " loſe all her light, and ſhew ſuch various colours, " that was not eaſy to be comprehended: but they " concluded it to be ominous, and a ſign from God " of heavy calamities to enſue. For he who the firſt, " and the moſt plainly of any, and with the greateſt " aſſurance committed to writing, how the moon is " enlightened and overſhadowed, was Anaxagoras; " yet neither was he eminent, nor his notion much " taken notice of; but was looked upon as heterodox, " and kept ſecret, paſſing only amongſt a few, under " ſome kind of caution and confidence. For they " would not ſuffer Naturaliſts, and μετεωρολέχας, as " they then called them, that is, ſuch as diſpute of things above, as leſſening the divine power, by de- " ducing things from natural ſenſeleſs cauſes, and a " long chain of neceſſity, without any thing of pro- " vidence or a free agent. Hence it was, that Pro- " tagoras was baniſhed, and Anaxagoras caſt in pri- " ſon; Pericles had very much ado to procure his " liberty (7)." This paſſage from Plutarch may afford the reader matter for many reflections.

(7) Plut. in Nicia, p. 538. Mr. Bayle quotes Amyot's French Tranſlation, and we make uſe of the Engliſh Tranſlation by ſeveral hands, vol. 3. p. 459, 460.

[C] Men were unjuſt enough to ſuſpect him of Atheiſm, becauſe he had ſtudied . . . . the Doctrine of Anaxagoras.] I ſhall quote for this the authority of a weighty Writer. Ἤκουσε δὲ διδασκάλων, Ἀναξαγόρου μὲν ἐν φιλοσόφοις, ὅθεν, φησὶν Ἀντυλλος, καὶ ἄθεος πρῶτα ἐνομίσθη, τῆς ἐκεῖθεν, δεισίας ἐμφορηθείς. He ſtudied under ſeveral maſters, and learnt philoſophy under Anaxagoras; whence, as Antyllus aſſerts, he began to be looked upon as an Atheiſt, becauſe he applied himſelf particularly to that Philoſopher's Doctrine (8). See a paſſage from Plutarch towards the end of the remark [O]. Here follows one from Diodorus Siculus. Διόπερ ἐκκλησίας συνελθούσης περὶ τούτων, οἱ μὲν ἐχθροὶ τοῦ Περικλέους ἔπεισαν τὸν δῆμον συλλαβεῖν τὸν Φειδίαν, καὶ αὐλῇ τοῦ Περικλέους καθηγόρων ἐπροσυλίαν· πρὸς δὲ τούτοις Ἀναξαγόραν τὸν σοφιστὴν διδάσκαλον ὄντα Περικλέους, ὡς ἀσεβοῦντα εἰς τοὺς θεοὺς ἐσυκοφάντουν δ' ἐν ταῖς καθηγορίαις καὶ διαβολαῖς τὸν Περικλέα, διὰ τὸν φθόνον, σπεύδοντες διαβαλεῖν τὴν τ' αὐθρὸς ὑπεροχήν τε καὶ δόξαν. The people being called together, thoſe who envied Pericles endeavoured to perſuade them to ſeize Phidias, and to proſecute Pericles for ſacrilege. They accuſed alſo Anaxagoras, the Sophiſt, who had been Pericles's tutor; they charged him with impiety towards the Gods; and endeavoured to involve Pericles in the ſame crimes and accuſations, for their only deſign was to darken his reputation, and to undermine his authority (9). That Author adds, that Pericles found no better method to drive that ſtorm off, but by involving the Republick into a conſiderable war; for he was well acquainted with the people's genius and temper (10). They value a great man, when they labour under a difficult war. But the comforts of peace making them indulge themſelves in ſloth and idleneſs, they give a looſe to their jealouſies and ſuſpicions, and bring ſome criminal action againſt the ſame great man, who was their darling in time of war.

(8) Marcell. in Vita Thucyd.

(9) Diodorus Siculus, lib. 12. cap. 39. p. m. 433.

(10) Idem, ibid.

[D] He gained almoſt as great an authority . . . . . as if he had been a Monarch.] It was ſaid his eloquence procured him that power. Pericles feliciſſimis naturæ incrementis, ſub Anaxagora præceptore ſummo ſtudio perpolitus & inſtructus, liberis Athenarum cervicibus jugum ſervitutis impoſuit: egit enim ille urbem, & verſavit arbitrio ſuo. Cumque adverſus voluntatem populi loqueretur, jucunda nihilominus & popularis ejus vox erat. Itaque veteris comœdiæ maledica lingua, quamvis potentiam viri perſtringere cupiebat, tamen in labris ejus hominis melle dulciorem leporem fatebatur habitare: itaque animis eorum, qui illum audierant, quaſi aculeos quoſdam relinqui prædicabat (11). i. e. " Pericles, whom nature " adorned with the moſt happy talents, which he im- " proved with the utmoſt care under his tutor Anaxa- " goras, reduced the free Athenians to ſlavery. For " he governed the city according to his own will and " pleaſure. And even when he ſpoke againſt the " people's inclination, his voice was yet ſweet and " popular. So that though the ſlandering Authors of " the antient Comedy endeavoured to revile him, and " to render his power odious, yet they were obliged " to confeſs that his eloquence was ſweeter than ho- " ney, and that it left, as it were, a ſting in the " hearts of thoſe, who heard him." Valerius Maximus adds, that the only difference there was between Piſiſtratus and Pericles, was that the former exerted his tyranny by the force of arms, and the latter without it. Quid enim inter Piſiſtratum & Periclem interfuit, niſi quod ille armatus, hic ſine armis tyrannidem geſſit? In order to add more weight to that authority of Valerius Maximus, it muſt be obſerved, that he extracted from Cicero what he aſſerts here. Quid Pericles! de cujus dicendi copia ſic accepimus, ut quum contra voluntatem Athenienſium loqueretur pro ſalute patriæ, ſeverius tamen id ipſum, quod ille contra populares homines diceret, populare omnibus, & jucunde videretur, cujus in labris veteres comici etiam quum illi maledicerent, quod tum Athenis fieri licebat, leporem habitaſſe dixerunt, tantamque in eo vim fuiſſe, ut in eorum mentibus qui audiſſent, quaſi aculeos quoſdam relinqueret. At hunc non declamator aliquis ad clepſydram latrare docuerat, ſed, ut accepimus, Clazomenius ille Anaxagoras vir ſummus in maximarum rerum ſcientia. Itaque hic doctrina, conſilio, eloquentia excellens, quadraginta annos præfuit Athenis, & urbanis eodem tempore, & bellicis rebus (12). i. e. " What ſhall we ſay of Pericles? Whoſe elo- " quence we are told was ſuch, that when he ſpoke for

(11) Valerius Maximus, lib. 8. cap. 9. p. m. 699, 700.

(12) Cicero, de Oratore, lib. 3. folio m. 95. B.

" for the preſervation of his country, even againſt " the inclination of the Athenians, his moſt ſevere " reflections againſt his countrymen, ſeemed popu- " lar, and were acceptable to all: the eminent co- " medians, even when they railed at him, which " was then permitted at Athens, owned, that there was " ſuch a ſweet, and yet ſtrong eloquence in his lips, " that his ſpeeches left, as it were, a ſting in the " hearts of thoſe who heard him. It was not ſome " idle declaimer, who taught him to bawl by the " clock: but, as we have it from good hands, he ſtu- " died eloquence under Anaxagoras the Clazomeni- " an, that celebrated man, admirably well verſed in " the moſt important ſciences. Thus Pericles, by " his eminent learning, prudence and eloquence, go- " verned the Republick of Athens forty years, both " in civil and military affairs." We have here a proof of what I ſhall have to obſerve concerning the great liberty, which the comic Poets took againſt Pericles. Their ſatyrical ſtrokes give a greater weight to the encomiums they could not refuſe him with regard to his eloquence. If you have a mind to know the name of the Poets, who have commended it, you have only to conſult Cicero; he tells us, that Eupolis aſſerted that the Goddeſs of Perſuaſion had her ſeat on Pericles's lips (13), and that this man's eloquence left an agreeable ſting in the hearts of his audience. Non quemadmodum de Pericle ſcripſit Eupolis, cum delectatione aculeos etiam relinqueret in animis eorum à quibus eſſet auditus (14). Diodorus Siculus (15), and Pliny the younger, have tranſmitted down to us the very words of that comic Poet. Nec me præterit ſummum oratorem Periclem ſic à comico Eupolide laudari,

Πρὸς δὲ γ' αὖ τούτῳ τάχ' ἡ
Πειθώ τις ἐπικάθηλο τοῖσι χείλεσιν.
Οὕτως ἐκήλει, κἠ μόνος τῶν ῥητόρων,
Τὸ κέντρον ἐγκαταλέλοιπε τοῖς ἀκροωμένοις (16).

i. e. " I know that that eminent Orator Pericles was " thus commended by Eupolis. The Goddeſs of Per- " ſuaſion ſits on his lips. He moves by his ſweet eloquence, " and he alone, of all the Orators, leaves a ſting in the " hearts of his hearers."

You will meet in the Scholiaſt on Ariſtophanes with theſe ſame lines of Eupolis, and with ſome others, which precede them, and contain an encomium on Pericles's eloquence, an eloquence, which pleaſed, which raiſed admiration, and which was dreaded. Hujus ſuavitate maxime hilaratæ ſunt Athenæ, hujus ubertatem & copiam admiratæ, ejuſdem vim dicendi terroremque timuerunt (17). It pleaſed by its ſweetneſs, it raiſed admiration by its copiouſneſs, and ſtruck with terror by its ſtrength. Let us not therefore think it incredible, that it ſhould have made Pericles reign in the midſt of a Republick. His words have been compared with thunder. Qui (Pericles) ſi tenui genere uteretur, nunquam ab Ariſtophane Poëta fulgurare, tonare, permiſcere Græciam dictus eſſet (18). i. e. " If " Pericles's eloquence had been but indifferent, Ari- " ſtophanes the Poet would never have ſaid of him, " that he darted lightning, that he thundered, that " he put all Greece into a confuſion." This paſſage of Cicero has been paraphraſed by Pliny the younger. Adde, quæ de eodem Pericle comicus alter, ὑσραπ', ἐβρόντα, ξυνεκύκα τὴν ἑλλάδα. Non enim amputata oratio & abſciſſa, ſed lata, & magnifica, & excelſa tonat, fulgurat, omnia denique perturbat ac miſcet (19). i. e. " Add " to this, what another comic Poet obſerves of the " ſame Pericles. He darts lightning, he thunders, " he puts all Greece into a confuſion. For his elo- " quence was not ſhort and conciſe, but full, magni- " ficent and elevated, it thundered, lightned, and " put all into diſorder and confuſion." The firſt time Cicero publiſhed his book, he aſcribed theſe words to Eupolis; but he acknowledged his miſtake in another work. Mihi quidem gratum, & erit gratius ſi non modo in libris tuis ſed etiam in aliorum per librarios tuos Ariſtophanem repoſueris pro Eupoli (20). i. e. " This " will be acceptable to me, and more ſtill, if you " get your Tranſcribers to put Ariſtophanes inſtead of " Eupolis, not only in your own copies, but alſo in " thoſe of others." We meet only with lightning and thunder in the quotation from Ariſtophanes, but we ſhall find even thunder-bolts, if we conſult Plutarch. The comedies, ſays he, of the then Maſters of the ſtage, who both in good earneſt, and out of merriment too, let fly many ſhrewd words at him, do plainly ſhew that he got that appellation of Olympius, upon the account of his being an able ſpeaker, by ſaying that he thundered, he lightned, when he harangued the people, and that he carried a dreadful thunder-bolt in his tongue. I make uſe of Amyot's tranſlation *, and I put the Greek words in the margin (21). The Author adds an anſwer of Thucydides, which does very much confirm this. When Archidamus, the King of the Lacedæmonians, aſked him, whether he or Pericles were the better wreſtler, he made this anſwer; When I, ſaith he, have thrown him, and given him a fair fall, he by ſtanding out in the denial, ſaying that he had no fall, gets the better of me, and perſuades people into a belief of what he ſays, whether they will or no, though they ſaw the quite contrary.

Let us not yet quit this ſubject of Pericles's eloquence. Some pretend he was the firſt who wrote his orations down before he delivered them. Πρῶτος γραπτὸν λόγον ἐν δικαστηρίῳ εἶπε, τῶν πρὸ αὐτοῦ χρωμένων. He is the firſt who wrote down his orations, before he delivered them in the aſſemblies of the people; for they who lived before him uſed to ſpeak ex tempore (22). Corradus is in the wrong to imagine that this ſignifies he uſed to read his orations (23). For an oration that is read, is not very proper to produce the effects, which are aſcribed to that Orator's eloquence. There were ſtill ſome orations of Pericles extant in Quintilian's time; but this learned Rhetorician, finding they did not anſwer that eminent man's great reputation, approved the opinion of thoſe, who looked upon them as a ſpurious work (24). Cicero in Bruto negat ante Periclem ſcriptum quicquam quod ornatum oratorium habeat: ejus aliqua ferri. Equidem non reperio quicquam tanta Eloquentiæ forma dignum: ideoque minus miror, eſſe qui nihil ab eo ſcriptum putent: hæc autem quæ feruntur, ab aliis eſſe compoſita (25). i. e. " Cicero obſerves in his Brutus, that before Pericles, " there was nothing writ, that had any thing of elo- " quence in it; but that there are ſome orations of " Pericles handed about: for my part, I do not think " they anſwer the great reputation of eloquence he " gained: ſo that I do not wonder ſome ſhould be- " lieve he left nothing in writing behind him, and " that what is handed about under his name, was " written by ſome other perſons." But there is no reaſon why an indifferent oration, delivered by an excellent Orator, ſhould not charm all thoſe who hear it. Action alone does almoſt all. See the remark [C], of the article NARNI. Let us cloſe this remark, by a paſſage from Thucydides, which acquaints us, that Pericles having the art to reſtrain the Athenians when they were too bold, and to raiſe their courage, when they were not ſtout enough, was really the King of a titular Republick. Ὁπότε γὲν αἴσθοιτό τι αὐτοὺς παρὰ καιρὲν ὕβρει θαρσοῦντας, λέγων καταπλήσσων ἐπὶ τὸ φοβεῖσθαι. κὴ διδιότας, αὖ ἀλόγως, ἀντικαθίση πάλιν ἐπὶ τὸ θαρσεῖν, ἐγίγνετό τε λόγῳ μὲν, δημοκρατία, ἔργῳ δὲ ὑπὸ τοῦ πρώτου ἀνδρὸς ἀρχή. Whenever he found the Athenians ready to attempt ſomething too boldly, he deterred them from it by his threatning eloquence; but when he perceived they began to fear, he raiſed their courage again. So that the name of the Commonwealth was indeed ſtill ſubſiſting, but the ſovereign power was really in the hands of that moſt eminent man (26). Plutarch has admirably well paraphraſed this paſſage of Thucydides (27): he adds to it, very properly, what Plato obſerves concerning the power of eloquence; he takes alſo notice, that the Poets ridiculed the Republick, for granting ſo great a power to one man only, and exhorted Pericles to bind himſelf by an oath not to oppreſs the people. Αὐτὸν δ' ἀπομόσαι μὴ τυραννήσειν κελεύοντες, ὡς ἀσυμμέτρου πρὸς δημοκρατίαν κὴ βαρυτέρας περὶ αὐτὸν οὔσης ὑπεροχῆς. ὁ δὲ Τηλεκλείδης παραδεδωκέναι φησὶν αὐτῷ τοὺς Ἀθηναίους πόλεών τε φόρους, αὐλάς τε τὰς πόλεις, τὰς μὲν δοῦναι, τὰς δ' ἀπολύσαι· λαίνα τείχη, τὰ μὲν οἰκοδομῆσαι, τὰ δὲ αὖθις πάλιν καταβαλεῖν, σπονδὰς, δύναμιν, κράτος, ὑφήνασθαι, πλοῦτόν τ' εὐδαιμονίαν τε. They demanded of him to abjure the exerciſing an arbitrary power, as one whoſe grandeur and eminence were diſproportionable to, and incompatible with a popular Government, and grown to be a grievance not to be endured in a free ſtate. Farther, Teleclides ſaith, that the Athenians had betrayed and ſurrendered up to him both the cuſtoms and impoſts of their ſubject cities, and the cities themſelves, ſo as to bind up ſome, and to let looſe others: and ſtone-walls to build up what he pleaſed, and again to throw them down: leagues of alliance, the intereſt and ſtrength

(13) Πειθὼ quam vocant Græci, cujus effector eſt Orator, hanc Suadam appellavit Ennius. Ejus autem Cethegum medullam fuiſſe vult, ut quam deam in Periclis labris ſcripſit Eupolis ſeſſitaviſſe, hujus hic medullam noſtrum oratorem fuiſſe dixerit. Idem, in Bruto, p. m. 104. i. e. " Ennius " called the " Goddeſs of " Eloquence " Suada, whom " the Greeks " called Peitho. " He aſſerts that " the Orator " Cethegus was " the very mar- " row of her; " ſo that where- " as Epolis " wrote that " that Goddeſs " ſat on Peri- " cles's lips, En- " nius ſays, that " our Orator " was the mar- " row of that " ſame God- " deſs."

(14) Idem, ibid. p. 62.

(15) Died. Sicul. lib. 12. cap. 40. p. m. 434.

(16) Plin. Epiſt. 20. lib. 1. p. m. 60.

(17) Cicero in Bruto, p. 91.

(18) Idem, in Oratore, folio m. 118, B.

(19) Plin. Epiſt. 20. lib. 1. p. 61.

(20) Cicero ad Atticum, Epiſt. 6. lib. 12. p. m. 301, 302.

* We follow the Engliſh tranſlation of Plutarch's Lives, by ſeveral hands, vol. 1. p. 520.

(21) Αἱ μέντοι κωμῳδίαι τῶν τότε διδασκάλων σπουδῇ τι πολλὰς καὶ μικρὰ γέλωτος ἀφυκτότων φορὰς εἰς αὐτὸν, ἐπὶ τῷ λόγῳ μάλιστα τὴν παρρησιαν γενέσθαι δηλοῦσι, βροντᾶν μὲν αὐτὸν καὶ ἀστράπτειν ὅτε δημηγορεῖν, δεινὸν δὲ κεραυνὸν ἐν γλώσσῃ φέρειν λεγόντων. At comœdiæ, quod qui ea tempeſtate docebant eas, & ſerias & ridiculas voces in eum multas ejacularentur, traxiſſe ex vi dicendi eum oſtendunt hoc cognomen (Olympii) Tonare enim & fulminare concionantem, & vehemens eum in linguâ fulmen dicebant gerere. Plutarchus, in Pericle, p. 156, B.

(22) Suidas, in Περικλῆς.

(23) Corradus, in Brutum Ciceronis, p. 77.

(24) Plutarch, in Pericle, p. 156, B. obſerves, that Pericles left nothing in writing behind him, but popular decrees or ordinances.

(25) Quintil. Inſtit. Orator. lib. 3. cap. 1. p. m. 115.

(26) Thucydides, lib. 2. p. 141. edit. Francof. 1614, in folio.

(27) Plut. in Pericle, p. 161.

But yet he could not escape the satyrical strokes of the comic Poets [E]. They traduced him on several accounts; and especially with regard to his love for Aspasia. His dissoluteness with the women was one of the vices with which he was chiefly charged (b). He strength of the nation, their peace, and their wealth, and good fortune (29).

(b) See the rem. [G].

(29) Idem, ibid.

Let us not forget to observe, that with an uncommon strength of genius, he applied his knowledge in Philosophy most happily, to add a lustre to his eloquence. The high speculations, and the deep mysteries of Natural Philosophy and Metaphysicks, with which he had adorned his mind by Anaxagoras's lectures, would have been an obstacle in the way of many others, who had aimed at the glory of great Orators, whereas he met therein with an admirable substance, which added a wonderful strength to his orations. Plato acquaints us with this particular, his expressions are lofty and sublime, they cannot but extremely please those who understand Greek. Πᾶσαι ὅσαι μεγάλαι τῶν τεχνῶν, προσδεῖσθαι ἀδολεσχίας καὶ μετεωρολογίας φύσεως πέρι. τὸ γὰρ ὑψηλόνουν τοῦτο καὶ τὸ πάντη τελεσιουργικὸν ἔοικεν ἐνταῦθόν ποθεν εἰσιέναι. ὃ καὶ Περικλῆς πρὸς τῇ εὐφυΐᾳ εἶναι ἐκτήσατο. προσπεσὼν γάρ, οἶμαι, τοιούτῳ ὄντι Ἀναξαγόρᾳ, μετεωρολογίας ἐμπλησθεὶς, καὶ ἐπὶ φύσιν νοῦ τε καὶ ἀνοίας ἀφικόμενος (ὧν δὴ πέρι τὸν πολὺν λόγον ἐποιεῖτο Ἀναξαγόρας) ἐντεῦθεν εἴληχεν ἐπὶ τὴν τῶν λόγων τέχνην τὸ προσφορον αὐτῇ. In order to succeed in every considerable art, a man ought to be well versed in Dialecticks, and in Natural Philosophy. For they exalt the mind, and give it a certain strength to succeed in every thing. With these sciences Pericles improved the sharpness of his genius. For as he conversed familiarly with Anaxagoras, who studied those things with application, he applied himself also to the contemplation of nature, and learnt to know wherein wisdom and folly consisted (on which subjects Anaxagoras reasoned fully) so that he could from thence borrow lucky hints, which he inserted into his discourses, as he thought it proper (29). Tully, who had, I think, this passage of Plato in his mind, did not express the whole sublimity of it. Pericles, says he (30), primus adhibuit doctrinam, quamquam tum nulla erat dicendi, tamen ab Anaxagora Physico eruditus exercitationem mentis à reconditis abstrusisque rebus ad causas forenses popularesque facile traduxerat, hujus suavitate, &c (31). i. e. "Pericles is the first who made use of learning, tho' "there were yet no art of eloquence in his time. But "being taught by Anaxagoras, the Natural Philo- "sopher, he could easily, from the contemplation of "hidden and abstract subjects, apply his mind to "civil or political affairs, by the sweetness of his "eloquence, &c."

(29) Plato, in Phædro, p. m. 1237, A. B.

(30) Cicero, in Bruto, p. m. 72, 73.

(31) You will find what follows above, citat. (17).

[E] He could not escape the satyrical strokes of the Comick Poets.] Cratinus, Teleclides, Eupolis, Plato, the Comick Poet, and Dexippus railed at him. Plutarch does not only observe it, but he transcribes also their own words (32). Monsieur le Fevre of Saumur observes (33), that Cratinus was resolute and bold in his writings, and that his free style did not spare even the first Officers of the Commonwealth, and the great and Olympian Pericles. Let us see also what he relates in another place. "Hermippus did something, which "St. Augustin was no doubt unacquainted with. "That great Doctor, who was not so well skilled in "the Greek tongue, as one may imagine, and who "studied the Subject of Grace with more application "than the History of Greece, and the Comic Poets, "says somewhere in his City of God, that the licen- "tiousness of the stage was never so great as to abuse "Pericles, but that Terence did not scruple to abuse "Jupiter himself. (The passage is to be met with "in his Eunuch). But he is mistaken; for Hermip- "pus wrote verses against Pericles (34)." There never was a more unjust censure than this; for it is false that St. Augustin asserts what this Critick of Saumur charges him with. He has quoted a long passage, in which the great Pericles's fate is lamented, for not being spared by the Poets who wrote for the Stage. Quid autem hic senserint Romani veteres, Cicero testatur in libris, quos de Republica scripsit, ubi Scipio disputans ait, Nunquam comœdiæ nisi consuetudo vitæ pateretur, probare sua theatris flagitia potuissent. Et Græci quidam antiquiores vitiosæ suæ opinionis quandam convenientiam servaverunt, apud quos fuit etiam lege concessum, ut quod vellet comœdia nominatim, vel de quo vellet, diceret. Itaque sicut in eisdem libris loquitur Africanus, quem illa non attigit, vel potius quem non vexavit, cui pepercit? Esto: populares homines improbos, in repub. seditiosos, Cleonem, Cleophontem, Hyperbolum læsit. Patiamur, inquit, etsi hujusmodi cives, à censore melius est quam à Poëta notari: sed Periclem, cùm jam suæ civitati maxima autoritate plurimos annos domi & bello præfuisset, violari versibus, & eos agi in scena non plus decuit, quàm si Plautus, inquit, noster voluisset, aut Nævius, Publio & Cneo Scipioni, aut Cæcilius Marco Catoni maledicere. Deinde paulò post nostræ, inquit, contrà duodecem tabulæ cum perpaucas res capite sanxissent, in his hanc quoque sanciendam putaverunt, si quis actitavisset, sive carmen condidisset, quod infamiam faceret, flagitiumve alteri. Præclarè. Judiciis enim ac Magistratuum disceptationibus legitimis propositam vitam, non Poëtarum ingeniis habere debemus, nec probrum audire, nisi ea lege ut respondere liceat, & judicio defendere. Hæc ex Ciceronis quarto de Republica libro ad verbum excerpenda arbitratus sum, nonnullis propter faciliorem intellectum vel prætermissis, vel paululum commutatis (35). i. e. "What the opinion of the Romans upon this "matter was, appears from Tully's book concern- "ing the Commonwealth, where he makes Scipio "argue thus: the Comick Poets would never have "been able to gain applause for the slanders they "uttered on the stage, had it not been a customary "thing in those times. The antient Greeks acted "indeed in some manner coherently with their erro- "neous opinion: for it was permitted by law to the "Comick Poets, to say what they pleased, and to "lash whom they pleased. And accordingly, as the "same Scipio Africanus observes in the same books, "whom did they not ridicule, or rather, whom did "they not slander, whom did they spare? But what? "They lashed their wicked countrymen, or sediti- "ous citizens. This may indeed be suffered; tho' "it were better, says he, that such men be noted "by the publick censor, than by the Poets. But "that Pericles, who had governed his country for "several years with a sovereign authority both in "civil and military affairs, should be slandered in "Plays acted upon the Stage, this, says he, was as "indecent and unbecoming, as if our countryman "Plautus, or Nævius, had attempted to traduce "Publius and Cnæus Scipio, or as if Cæcilius had "ridiculed M. Cato. And, adds he a little lower, "though our twelve tables made but very few crimes "capital, yet they made it capital for any man to "act or to write a play, to another's reproach or dis- "grace. This is admirably well: for every one's "life must be subject to the lawful enquiries of the "Magistrates, and not to the Poet's fancies, nor is "it proper that any one should be reproached unless "he be at liberty to answer for himself and to de- "fend himself in a legal manner. This I thought "proper to transcribe word for word from Tully's "fourth Book of the Commonwealth, having only "omitted or altered a few words, that the Reader "might the better understand the whole." That blunder of Monsieur le Fevre should teach all Authors to mistrust their memory, and never to assert any thing without consulting again the books, in which they remember to have read it. He had read in St. Augustin, that the Romans would not have suffered their Comick Poets to traduce Scipio, though they suffered Terence to ridicule Jupiter: his memory failed him, he put Pericles instead of Scipio, and by that alteration he thought himself well grounded to ridicule St. Augustin. Let us see that Father's reflections; they are noble and very judicious: he charges the Roman Law-givers with a very considerable defect: they would not suffer their Poets to speak ill of the Magistrates, but they gave them leave to ridicule the Gods. At Romani, sicut in illa de Repub. disputatione gloriatur Scipio, probris & injuriis Poëtarum subjectam vitam famamque habere noluerunt, capite etiam punire sancientes tale carmen condere si quis auderet. Quod erga se quidem satis honestè constituerunt, sed erga Deos suos superbè & irreligiosè. Quòs cùm scirent non solùm patienter, sed etiam libenter Poëtarum probris maledictisque lacerari, se potius hujuscemodi injuriis indignos esse

(32) Plutarch. in Pericle, p. 153, 154, 160, 165, 170.

(33) Vie des Poëtes Grecs, p. m. 90.

(34) Ibid. p. 81, 82.

(35) Augustinus, de Civitat. Dei, lib. 2. cap. 9. p. m. 166.

He bore patiently to be thus reviled [F], and he might have been thought happy, had he not been expoſed to other misfortunes. But he experienced the malignity of fortune in many reſpects, particularly with regard to his own private family (c) [G]; for he

(c) Taken from Plutarch's Life of Pericles.

(36) Idem, ibid. cap. 12. p. 180, 181.

(37) Nec à vobis ſaltem iſtum meruerunt honorem, ut quibus expellitis à vobis, eiſdem ab his legibus propulſaretis injurias. Majeſtatis ſunt apud vos rei, qui de veſtris ſequius obmurmuraverint aliquid regibus. Magiſtratum in ordinem redigere, Senatorem aut convitio proſequi, ſuis eſſe decretis periculoſiſſimum pœnis. Carmen malum conſcribere, quo fama alterius coinquinetur & vita, decemviralibus ſcitis evadere noluiſtis impune: ac ne veſtras aures convitio aliquis petulantiore pulſaret, de atrocibus formulas conſtituiſtis injuriis. Soli Dii ſunt apud vos ſuperi inhonorati, contemptibiles, viles: in quos jus eſt à vobis datum, quæ quiſque voluerit dicere: turpitudinum jacere, quas libido confinxerit atque excogitaverit, formas. Arnob. lib. 4. p. 150, 151. i. e. "The "Gods do not "deſerve that "honour from "you, that you "ſhould ſecure "them againſt "ſlander, by the "ſame laws by "which you "ſecure your-"ſelves againſt "it. It is treaſon "among you to "hint the leaſt "thing againſt "your Kings. "You have de-"creed penal-"ties againſt "thoſe, who "pretend to "teach the Ma-"giſtrates their "duty, or who "abuſe a Sena-"tor. To write "a poem againſt "any one's con-"duct or repu-"tation, is made "capital by the "Decemvirs "laws. Nay, to "ſay the leaſt "thing againſt "any of you, is "puniſhable. "The Gods a-"lone are con-"temned, deſ-"piſed, and re-"viled, they a-"lone may be "ridiculed, and "repreſented "under the moſt "ſhameful "forms, that "can be ima-"gined."

(38) Plut. in Pericle, p. 165, D.

eſſe duxerunt, ſeque ab eis etiam lege munierunt, illorum autem iſta etiam ſacris ſolennitatibus miſcuerunt. Itane tandem Scipio laudas, hanc Poëtis Romanis negatam eſſe licentiam, ut cuiquam opprobrium infligerent Romanorum, cum videas, eos nulli Deorum peperciſſe veſtrorum? Itane pluris tibi habenda eſt exiſtimatio veſtræ curiæ, quàm Capitolii, imò Romæ unius quàm cæli totius: ut linguam maledicam in cives tuos exercere Poëtæ etiam lege prohiberentur, & in Deos tuos ſecuri, tanta convicia nullo Senatore, nullo Cenſore, nullo Principe, nullo Pontifice prohibente jacularentur? Indignum videlicet fuit, ut Plautus aut Nævius Publio & Cneo Scipioni, aut Cæcilius M. Catoni maledíceret: & dignum fuit, ut Terentius veſter flagitio Jovis optimi maximi adoleſcentium nequitiam concitaret (36). i. e. " But the Romans, as " Scipio boaſts in that ſame book of the Common-" wealth, would not ſuffer the Magiſtrates life or " reputation to be expoſed by the ſlanders and re-" proaches of the Poets, making it capital for any " one who ſhould dare to write ſuch Poems. This " was indeed wiſely decreed with regard to them-" ſelves; but then their conduct towards the Gods " was in that reſpect ſcornful and irreligious. For " though they knew that the Poets were not only " quietly, but even with pleaſure ſuffered to abuſe " and ridicule the Gods, they thought ſuch an uſage " was unbecoming with regard to themſelves, and " provided againſt it by a law, but they ſuffered it " with regard to the Gods even in their ſacred ſo-" lemnities. Why then, Scipio, do you commend your " laws, for denying the Roman Poets the liberty of " abuſing any of the Romans, when you ſee they " ſpare none of your Gods? Do you make more ac-" count of your Senate-houſe, than of your Capitol, " nay, of Rome alone, than of all Heaven? That " you ſhould even by a law provide againſt your " Poets traducing their Fellow-Citizens, whilſt they " may freely abuſe your Gods, no Senator, no Cen-" ſor, no Prince, no Prieſt oppoſing it? It was for-" ſooth undecent for Plautus or Nævius to revile " Publius and Cnæus Scipio, or for Cæcilius to ſlan-" der M. Cato; but it was well done of Terence, to " encourage young men to laſciviouſneſs, by the ex-" ample of the great and good Jupiter's Amours" Arnobius had already reproached the Heathens with the ſame fault. See the Margin (37); his words do well deſerve to be read.

[F] . . . . . He bore patiently to be thus reviled. We do not read, that any of the Poets, who abuſed him, was puniſhed for it. And yet it is very probable, that it had been an eaſy matter for a man, whoſe power was ſo great, to have puniſhed thoſe men's audaciouſneſs. They offended him in the moſt tender part: for they repreſented Aſpaſia as an imprudent and laſcivious Concubine: they repreſented her thus, I ſay, even on the Stage. Ἐν δὲ ταῖς κωμῳδίαις Ὀμφάλην νέα καὶ Δηϊάνειρα καὶ πάλιν Ἥρα πρόσαγορεύεται. Κρατῖνος δ' ἀνδρικῶς παλλακὴν αὐτὴν εἴρηκεν ἐν τούτοις, Ἥραν τε τοὶ Ἀσπασίαν τίκτει, καὶ καλαπυγοσύνην παλλακὴν κυνώπιδα. i. e. " She was called in the " plays, the new Omphale, and Deianeira, and alſo " Juno. Cratinus ſtyles her poſitively an Harlot " in theſe lines: ſhe was delivered of Juno Aſpaſia, " an imprudent and obſcene Harlot (30)." This indolence was partly owing to policy; for if Pericles had attempted to ſilence the Poets, it would have opened the eyes of the Athenians with regard to a particular, which it was very much his intereſt to keep ſecret from them; they would have perceived that they had only the name of a Republican Government left, and that the whole power was really in the hands of one man. Nothing is more proper to prevent the people from taking notice, that their liberty is quite extinct, than the ſuffering them to rail with impunity againſt thoſe, who really poſſeſs the kingly power under ſuch names, as have nothing odious in them. It was therefore Pericles's intereſt to deſpiſe the licentiouſneſs of the Stage: but let us not aſcribe his patience only to his craft and policy; it was owing alſo to the greatneſs of his ſoul; for a man ſo brave and lively as he was would never have bore injuries with ſo much patience as he did, had he not had a moſt extraordinary ſtrength of mind. Read the following paſſage of his life. It is reported, that there was once a bold villain, who abuſed him an whole day with opprobrious language, in a full aſſembly of the people, and affronted him with all the injuries he could think of: which Pericles bore patiently, without anſwering one word, diſpatching in the mean time ſome important buſineſs till the evening came, when he returned home quietly, without diſcovering the leaſt concern or paſſion, though that impudent fellow followed him all the way, with all the foul language he could rake up: and as Pericles was ready to get into his own houſe, it being then quite dark, he ordered one of his ſervants to take a link, and conduct that man ſafe home (39). The greatneſs of his courage and patience appeared moſt eminently, in the beginning of the Peloponneſian war. The enemy was laying the country of Attica waſte; and as he was not in a condition to repulſe them, he provided only for the ſecurity of Athens. People murmured againſt him for that conduct; they wrote ſmart and ſatyrical poems againſt him; they ſlandered and even threatened him. He deſpiſed all thoſe railings and clamours, and continued to act with the utmoſt tranquillity, according to his own prudence and wiſdom. Ἐχρῆτο τοῖς αὑτῷ λογισμοῖς, βραχέα φροντίζων τῶν καλαβοώντων καὶ δυσχεραινόντων. καί τοι πολλοὶ μὲν αὐτῷ τῶν φίλων δεόμενοι προσέκειντο, πολλοὶ δὲ τῶν ἐχθρῶν ἀπειλοῦντες καὶ καληγοροῦντες. πολλοὶ δ' ἤδοι ᾄσματα καὶ σκώμματα πρὸς αἰσχύνην, ἐφυβρίζοντες αὐτοῦ τὴν στρατηγίαν, ὡς ἀνανδρον καὶ προϊεμένην τὰ πράγματα τοῖς πολεμίοις. ἐπιφυόμενος δὲ καὶ Κλέων ἤδη διὰ τῆς πρὸς ἐκεῖνον ὀργῆς τῶν πολιτῶν πορευόμενον ἐπὶ τὴν δημαγωγίαν . . . . πλὴν ὑπ' ἀθύμου ἐκινήθη τῶν τοιούτων ὁ Περικλῆς, ἀλλὰ πράως καὶ σιωπῇ τὴν ἀδοξίαν καὶ τὴν ἀπέχθειαν ὑφιστάμενος. Following the dictates of his own reaſon, he deſpiſed the vain clamours of thoſe who murmured and railed againſt him; though many of his friends were importunate with their prayers, and many of his enemies threatened him, and inveighed againſt him, many ſung ſatyrical poems, and abuſed him, as though his adminiſtration was too weak and remiſs, and he betrayed the Commonwealth to the enemies. Even Cleon himſelf, obſerving that the city was exaſperated againſt him, began to ridicule him, with a deſign to court the people's favour. . . . But nothing of all this moved Pericles in the leaſt. He bore envy and detraction with mildneſs and patience (40). What a courage, what a conſtancy, what a ſtrength of mind do we not obſerve here!

(39) Amyot's French tranſlation of Pericles's Life, p. 554.

(40) Plut. in Pericle, p. 170, D. and E.

[G] He experienced the malignity of fortune . . . with regard to his own private family.] The wife he married was his relation; ſhe had already been married to Hipponicus, by whom ſhe had a ſon: Pericles had two by her, and grew weary of her, and ſhe for her part was not much pleaſed with him, ſo that ſhe conſented, without reluctancy, to marry the man he propoſed to her (41). I do not think the blame muſt be laid upon her alone; for Pericles behaved himſelf after ſuch a manner, as gave his wife a juſt occaſion to be angry: he was in love with other women; for not to mention Chryſilla (42), whom he loved perhaps when he was already married, it is certain that he kept Aſpaſia. He was ſo bewitched with her, that he married her, though ſhe had a bad reputation. They who wiſhed him no good, ſpread a thouſand reports abroad, which were very proper to exaſperate his wife's mind, nor were all their reports perhaps ill-grounded. They aſſerted, that Phidias, one of the moſt excellent Carvers in the world, and who was the general Surveyor of all the works which Pericles cauſed to be made for the ornament of the city, inticed Ladies to his houſe, with a pretence to ſhew them the works of the beſt Maſters, but in reality, with a deſign to debauch them, and to deliver them up to Pericles. Πάντα δ' ἦν σχεδὸν ἐπ' αὐτῷ, καὶ πᾶσιν ἐπισλάθει τοῖς τεχνίταις διὰ φιλίαν Περικλέους. καὶ τοῦτο τῷ μὲν φθόνον, τῷ δὲ βλασφημίαν ἤνεγκεν, ὡς ἐλευθέρας τῷ Περικλεῖ γυναῖκας εἰς τὰ ἔργα φοιτώσας ὑποδεχομένῳ τοῦ Φειδίου. δεξάμενοι δὲ τὸν λόγον οἱ κωμικοὶ, πολλὴν ἀσέλγειαν ἀυλοῦ κατεσκέδασαν, εἴς τε τὴν Μυσίππου γυναῖκα διαβάλλοντες, ἀνδρὸς φίλου καὶ ὑποστρατήγου τοῦ Περικλέους; εἴς τε τὰς Πυθαγγέλου καὶ Λάμπωνος

(41) Ibidem, p. 165.

(42) Αὐτὸς δὲ (ἴσως) ἐν τοῖς ἐλεγείοις ἐρᾷν μὲν ὁμολογεῖ Χρυσίλλης τῆς Κορινθίας, Τέλεος δὲ θυγατρὸς, ἧς καὶ Περικλέα τὸν Ὀλύμπιον ἐρᾶν φησι Τηλεκλείδης ἐν Ησιόδοις. The ſame Ion confeſſes in his elegies, that he loved Chryſilla, the Corinthian, Teleus's daughter, with whom Pericles the Olympian was alſo in love, if we may believe Teleclides in his Heſiodi. Athen. lib. 10. p. 436, F.

he was unhappy both in a wife, and in children. There is a reflection to be made on the ſlanders that were ſpread againſt him [H]. He died the third year of the Peloponneſian λαμπρᾶς ὀρνιθοτροφίας, ὃς ἐταῖρος ὢν Περικλέους, αἰτίαν εἶχε ταῖς γυναιξὶν αἷς ὁ Περικλῆς ἐπλησίαζεν. Omnia ferè hic ob Periclis neceſſitudinem curabat, artificibuſque præerat omnibus: id quod huic convitia, illi conflavit invidiam, quaſi ingenuas matronas, ad ſpectanda opera commeantes, in gratiam Phidias Periclis reciperet. Eos rumores excipientes comici, inſolentem laſciviam ei impegere, ac Menippi uxorem amici atque in bello legati improperavere, Pyrilampiſque avium vivaria, cui, quum familiaris Periclis eſſet, infligebatur, ipſum mulieribus quibus conſueſceret Pericles, ſubjicere pavones (43). "The "comic poets making an advantage of thoſe reports, "abuſed him in the moſt outrageous manner, charging him with keeping the wife of Menippus, "who was his friend, and had been his Lieutenant in "the armies; they alſo aſſerted, that Pyrilampis, one "of his intimate acquaintance, kept curious birds, "and eſpecially peacocks (44), which he uſed to "ſend to the women with whom Pericles lay (45)." If Pericles was not well pleaſed with his wife, he was leſs ſatisfied ſtill with his eldeſt ſon, who was a very wicked youth: he was prodigal, and complained continually of his father's ſavingneſs: his complaints were louder ſtill, after he was married to a woman who uſed to ſpend high. He borrowed money in his father's name, and ſeeing that Pericles proſecuted the lender, inſtead of paying that ſum, he railed moſt bitterly againſt him. But let us make uſe of Amyot's words (46). "Young Xantippus, being "exceedingly exaſperated againſt his father, ſlandered him publickly throughout the city, relating by "way of ridicule, how he ſpent his time when he "was retired within his own houſe, and giving an "account of his converſations with the Sophiſts and "Teachers of Rhetorick; for as it happened once "in the publick games, that one of the champions, who ſtrove who ſhould dart a javelin beſt, "ſtruck and killed out of wickedneſs (47) one Epitimius, a Theſſalian (48), he went and told about, "that Pericles had been an whole day diſputing with "Protagoras the Rhetorician, whether the javelin, "or the man who darted it, or they who appointed "the game, were, according to ſound and ſtrict reaſon, to be accounted guilty of that murder. Further, Steſimbrotus writes, that the report which was "ſpead throughout the city, that Pericles kept his "wife, had been diſperſed by Xantippus himſelf; "and that the quarrel and miſunderſtanding between "the father and the ſon continued till his death, "without being ever made up." There is a very dark equivocation in that tranſlation of Amyot. Pericles kept his wife. Was it his own wife? Was it Steſimbrotus's? or was it Xantippus's? The firſt ſenſe, how ridiculous ſoever it be, agrees beſt of all with the rules of the French grammar. But it is not Plutarch's ſenſe: this Hiſtorian meant, that it was Xantippus, who publiſhed every where that his own wife had been debauched by Pericles: but one could never find it out, either by the Greek words of Plutarch, or by the Latin tranſlation: we muſt gueſs at it by another paſſage of the ſame Hiſtorian. He obſerves in page 160, that Pericles was accuſed of having had a criminal converſation with his daughter-in-law, and that Steſimbrotus was the perſon who charged him with that wicked action. Στησίμβροτος ὁ Θάσιος δεινὸν ἀσέβημα καὶ μυθώδεις ἐξενεγκεῖν ἐτόλμησεν εἰς τὴν γυναῖκα τοῦ υἱοῦ κατὰ τοῦ Περικλέους. Steſimbrotus of Thaſos charges Pericles with an horrid but falſe attempt againſt his own ſon's wife (49). By the help of this paſſage we may underſtand the following, which otherwiſe would be a perfect riddle. Πρὸς δὲ τούτοις, καὶ τὴν περὶ τῆς γυναικὸς διαβολὴν ὑπὸ τοῦ Ξανθίππου φησὶν ὁ Στησίμβροτος εἰς τοὺς πολλοὺς διασπαρῆναι. Beſides this Steſimbrotus relates that his infamy with regard to his wife was ſpread by Xanthippus (50). The vexation I ſhall now ſpeak of was but ſmall, if compared with that domeſtick grief: but it was not inconſiderable if it be conſidered by itſelf. Pericles had a Steward who regulated the whole expence of the family with ſo much thrift (51), that it had been impoſſible for the meaneſt citizens to avoid all ſuperfluous expences in their families with more care than was done in his. That great ſavingneſs made Pericles's ſon, and all the women in the houſe murmur and complain; and was not this a kind of misfortune to the maſter? We have ſome reaſons to imagine that Pericles did not think himſelf happy in loſing his eldeſt ſon, though he had no great ſatisfaction from him: for nature prompts us to chooſe rather the life than the death of a child, though he be undutiful. But we may be ſure that that great man was overwhelmed with grief, when the plague carried off his ſecond ſon, the only lawful child he had left. The conſtancy of his mind was not ſhaken by the death of his eldeſt ſon, nor by his ſiſters, nor even by that of moſt of his friends and relations: but he could not forbear ſhedding tears at this laſt misfortune (52). His high ſpirit, and great ſoul never ſunk under the greateſt misfortunes; he was never known to weep, or to mourn at the funerals of any of his friends or relations, till the death of Paralus, the laſt of his lawful children. The loſs of this alone touched him home: and yet he endeavoured to keep up his natural conſtancy, and to preſerve his wonted ſedateneſs. But when he came to put a garland on the head of his departed ſon, grief overcame him upon beholding his face, ſo that he burſt out into tears, and cried bitterly, which he had never done before in all his life time (53). This puts me in mind of an Egyptian King mentioned by Herodotus (54), and of an omiſſion of Valerius Maximus. Pericles intra quatriduum duobus mirificis adoleſcentibus filiis ſpoliatus; iis ipſis diebus & vultu priſtinum habitum retinente, & oratione nulla ex parte infractiore concionatus eſt. Ille verò caput quoque ſolito more coronatum gerere ſuſtinuit, ut nihil ex vetere ritu propter domeſticum vulnus detraheret (55). i. e. "Pericles having loſt in four days time two worthy "ſons in the prime of their age, harangued the people at that very time, without ſhewing any thing "altered in his countenance, nor was the ſtrength of "his eloquence abated in the leaſt. Nay, he bore "to have his head adorned with a garland as uſual, "ſo that his domeſtick grief did by no means make "him change any thing in his uſual behaviour."

I look upon Pericles's proceedings in favour of his baſtard ſon, as a conſiderable unhappineſs. He had enacted a law, which proved the ruin of many perſons, and then for the ſake of that baſtard he deſired to have it repealed; he obtained that favour only from the people's compaſſion for his misfortunes. Οὗτος ἓν δεινὸν τὸν κατὰ τοσοῦτον ἰσχύσαντα τὸν νόμον, ὑπ' αὐτοῦ πάλιν διαλυθῆναι τοῦ γράψαντος, ἡ παροῦσα δυστυχία τῷ Περικλεῖ περὶ τὸν οἶκον, ὡς δίκην τινὰ διδωκότι τῆς ὑπεροψίας καὶ τῆς μεγαλαυχίας ἐκείνης, ἐπέκλασε τοὺς Ἀθηναίους· καὶ δόξαντες αὐτὸν νεμεσητά τε παθεῖν, ἀνθρωπίνως τε διοῦσθαι, συνεχώρησαν ἀπογράψασθαι τὸν νόθον εἰς τοὺς φράτερας, ὄνομα θέμενον τὸ αὐτοῦ. i. e. It ſeemed a ſhocking thing, that a law, which had been executed againſt ſo many perſons, ſhould be repealed by the very ſame man who enacted it. But Pericles's domeſtick grief moved the Athenians (who looked upon his misfortunes as puniſhment for his pride and haughtineſs): They thought it was proper that men ſhould comfort him who was afflicted through the envy of the Gods: they ſuffered therefore that his baſtard ſon ſhould be regiſtered in his ward under his father's name (56). A favour muſt be very unacceptable when it coſts ſo much. What a vexation is it for a man to think that a whole city will reflect upon his conduct, when after he had enacted a law of ſo great a conſequence, that it required part of the inhabitants ſhould be made a ſacrifice to it, I mean, that they be reduced to ſlavery, he petitions to have it repealed for his own private intereſt? By the law I ſpeak of it was enacted, that all they who were not born of an Athenian father and an Athenian mother, ſhould be reputed baſtards, according to which law near five thouſand citizens were ſold for ſlaves.

[H] There is a reflection to be made on the ſlanders that were ſpread againſt him.] That reflection is Plutarch's; it is deſigned to ſhew the uncertainty of hiſtory; it is one of the arguments urged for the Epocha or Suſpenſion of Judgment, maintained in the Syſtem of Hiſtorical Scepticiſm. Plutarch having related the ſlanders of the Poets againſt Pericles, and the moſt abominable calumny of Steſimbrotus, cries

(43) Plut. in Pericle, p. 160, C.

(44) Theſe birds were extremely dear at that time. See Athenæus, lib. 14. cap. 20. p. 654, 655.

(45) Amyot's Tranſlation of Pericles Life, 577.

(46) Amyot, ib. p. 617, 618.

(47) He ought to have ſaid by miſchance. See Girac, Replique à Coſtar, p. 438. The Greek word is ἀκουσίως, that is to ſay, involuntarily.

(48) Amyot did not underſtand his original here; he ſhould have ſaid, that Epitimius killed an horſe unawares. Ἵππον, ſays Plutarch, ἀκοντίῳ παταξάντος Ἐπιτιμίου τῶ φαρσαλίου ἀκουσίως καὶ κτείναντος. See Girac, ibid. where he banters Goſtar ſoundly. Obſerve alſo, that Plutarch calls Epitimius a Pharſalian, and not a Theſſalian, as Amyot does.

(49) Plut. in Pericle, p. 160, E.

(50) Idem, ibidem, p. 172, B.

(51) Idem, ibidem, 162.

(52) Amyot's tranſlation of the Life of Pericles, p. 618.

(53) This does not agree with what is obſerved of him, that he ſhed tears when Aſpaſia was proſecuted. See the rem. [O], quotations (174), (175).

(54) Lib. 3. cap. 14. He relates, that Pſammenitus did not lament the misfortune of his daughter, nor of his ſon, and that he cried, when he was a witneſs to one of his friend's unhappy fate. See ibidem, what he anſwered, when he was asked the reaſon of that conduct. See alſo Montagne's Eſſays, book 1. chap. 2.

(55) Valerius Maximus, lib. 5. cap. 10. See alſo Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 9. cap. 4. Plutarch, de Conſolat. ad Apollon. p. 118. relates the ſame particular with Valerius Maximus, but he ſuppoſes one ſon died 8 days after the other.

(56) Plut. in Pericle, p. 172, E.

ponnesian war (d) after a long sickness, which had weakened his understanding [I]. And yet a little before he died he made a very good observation, which gave Plutarch an opportunity to make a judicious reflection on the nature of God [K]: but that Author went too out that it is very difficult to find out the truth. The contemporary Authors conceal or disguise it, some out of hatred and jealousy, others out of friendship and by a spirit of flattery. They who come after them are by the distance of the times prevented from knowing the truth of those events, which happened before. Οὕτως ἔοικε παντὶ χαλεπὸν εἶναι καὶ δυσθήρατον ἱστορία τἀληθὲς, ὅταν οἱ μὲν ὕστερον γιγνόμενοι τὸν χρόνον ἔχωσιν ἐπιπροσθοῦντα τῇ γνώσει τῶν πραγμάτων. ἡ δὲ τῶν πράξεων καὶ τῶν βίων ἡλικιώτις ἱστορία, τὰ μὲν φθόνοις καὶ δυσμενείαις, τὰ δὲ χαριζομένη καὶ κολακεύουσα, λυμαίνηται καὶ διαστρέφῃ τὴν ἀλήθειαν. Tantæ molis est & difficultatis assequi ex historia veritatem, quum posteriores, antequam cognoscant res, præveniantur tempore: æqualis rerum gestarum & hominum historia partim invidia & odio, partim gratia & adulatione opprimat & pervertat veritatem (57). Plutarch knew those difficulties by his own experience. He was obliged to observe that the cause of the Peloponnesian War was not much known (58). What then will be known? The reason why that cause was uncertain holds good in a thousand other occasions. Pericles's great reputation and power rendered him odious; this made slanderers invent an hundred false stories against him. They would at all events make him answerable for the misfortunes of that war. Some invented one thing, others another. What would you have a reader to believe amidst so many different slanders? The moment he had drawn the hatred of the multitude upon him, there arose several smart and satyrical wits, who offered up to that hatred, as it were to an evil genius, the victims they judged the most proper. Καὶ τί ἄν τις ἀνθρώπους σατυρικοὺς τοῖς βίοις καὶ πρὸς καλὰ τῶν κρειττόνων, βλασφημίας ὥσπερ δαίμονι κακῷ τῷ φθόνῳ τῶν πολλῶν ἀποθύοντας ἑκάστοτε, θαυμάσειεν. Et quidem quis miretur, petulanti homines lingua, si maledicta in principes invidiæ multitudinis, tanquam malo dæmonio, assiduè consecraverint (59). Now they knew of no offerings more proper than such injuries as were calculated to disgrace him. I am well pleased with Plutarch for making but little account of the pretensions of the Megarians (60), though they were supported by Aristophanes's authority. They were parties concerned against Pericles in that affair, and one may say of Aristophanes, and of all those comick Poets of those times, what has been lately observed of a modern Author (61), that they are capable only to make us question the most evident truths, whenever they assert them. If Plutarch lived at this time, he would assert, that our posterity will have all the trouble imaginable to judge of the true history of our age; for there are so many falsities published, and so many victims offered to the evil genius of the people's hatred and envy, that if the satyrical wits of Athens come to life again, they would think themselves but mere novices. And besides there are so many elogies published, that if the flatterers of that country rose from the dead, they would be convinced that they were but young beginners in point of flattery.

(d) Thucydides, lib. 2. p. m. 118. it was the 3d year of the 87th Olympiad.

I remember a beautiful passage in Plutarch, in which Pericles is concerned (62). When a fact is certain, but the Author's intention is unknown, it is a most wicked and malicious conduct to pretend to ascribe it to bad motives. And yet this is what the comick Poets did. They asserted that Pericles kindled the Peloponnesian War for the sake of the Concubine Aspasia, and on Phidias's account, and by no means from a noble and brave ambition to humble the pride of the Peloponnesians, and to be in no manner behind-hand with the Lacedæmonians (63) They who, when they cannot deny but an action is commendable, rake into the intentions of the heart, and suppose they were bad, carry envy and malice to the highest degree. Ἐν μὲν γὰρ τοῖς εὐδοκιμοῦσιν ἔργοις καὶ πράγμασιν ἐπαινημένοις αἰτίαν φαύλην ὑπολάβῃσι, καὶ καλωγίαι ταῖς διαβολαῖς εἰς ὑποψίας ἀτόπους περὶ τῆς ἐν ἀφανεῖ προαιρέσεως τοῦ πράξαντος· αὐτῷ τὸ πεπραγμένον ἐμφανῶς ἐ δυνάμενοι· ψέγειν . . . . . σύδηλον ὅτι φθόνῳ καὶ κακοηθείας ὑπερβολῇ ἐ λέλοιπε. Præclaris enim & laudatis factis atque rebus maligni causam qui subjiciunt vitiosam, calumniandoque in sinistris abducunt suspiciones de latente ejus qui rem gessit consilio, quando ipsum factum palam vituperare non possunt . . . . . hos liquet ad summam invidentiam & nequitiam nihil sibi feciſſe reliquum (64). I would be glad to know whether Duris of Samos and Theophrastus ascribed to Aspasia the two wars which the Poets charged her with. Harpocration quotes them after the same manner as he does Aristophanes. Δοκεῖ δὲ δυοῖν πολέμων αἰτία γεγονέναι, τοῦ τε Σαμιακοῦ, καὶ τοῦ Πελοποννησιακοῦ· ὡς ἔστι μαθεῖν παρά τε Δύριδι τῷ Σαμίῳ, καὶ Θεοφράστῳ ἐν τῷ τετάρτῳ τῶν πολιτικῶν, καὶ ἐκ τῶν Ἀριστοφάνους Ἀχαρνέων. She is thought to have been the cause of two wars, of the Samian, and of the Peloponnesian, as may be seen in Duris of Samos, in Theophrastus's fourth book of Politicks, and in Aristophanes's Acharnenses (65). But who knows whether they asserted it positively, or related it only as the opinion of Pericles's enemies, and as that of the Poets?

(57) Idem, ibid. p. 160. E. N. B. The full sense of that passage is given in the words before it.

(58) Ibid. p. 169. A.

(59) Idem, ibid. p 160, D.

(60) They asserted, that the carrying off two Prostitutes belonging to Aspasia, determined Pericles to engage in that war. See hereunder, the rem. [O].

(61) The Author of the Esprit de Mr. Arnauld; (who was Monsieur Jurieu). See the art. ARNAULD, (Anthony), Doctor of the Sorbonne, quotation (64).

(61) Plut. de Herodoti malignitate, 855, F.

(62) Amyot's translation of this passage is very erroneous. Whereas on the contrary, says he, it was neither out of ambition, nor out of obstinacy, but rather to humble the pride of the Peloponnesians, and not to be behind-hand with those of Lacedæmon. The Greek words are, p. 856, A. ἡ φιλοτιμία τινὶ καὶ φιλονικία μᾶλλον εἰς τὸ ῥῆξαι τὸ φρόνημα Πελοποννησίων, καὶ μηδενὸς ὑφεῖσθαι Λακεδαιμονίων ἀθυμήσαντος.

(63) Idem, ibid. p. 160, A.

[I] He died . . . . after a long sickness, which weakened his understanding.] "The plague seized him, "not with sharp and violent fits as it did others that "had it, but with a dull and lingring distemper, "through various changes and alterations, leisurely "by little and little wasting the strength of his body, "and undermining the noble faculties of his soul. "So that Theophrastus in his Morals, having made "it a moot-point, whether men's manners change "with their fortunes, and their souls, being jogged "and disturbed by the ailings of their bodies, do "start aside from the rules of virtue, has left it "upon record, that Pericles, when he was sick, "shewed one of his friends that came to visit him "an amulet or charm, that the women had hung "about his neck; as much as to say, that he was "very sick indeed, when he would admit of, or in-"dure such a foolery as that was (66)." I have quoted the Greek words of Plutarch in the article DESBARREAUX (67). There must certainly be a mistake in the chapter where Ælian relates that Pericles, Callias, and Nicias, having spent all their estate, took a large glass of poison. It was the last time they drank one another's health, being determined not to live, after they could no longer live well (68). If Ælian's memory did not fail him, his transcribers must have wrote by mistake Pericles instead of Epicles: for we read in Athenæus, that Antocles and Epicles being determined to live together, and making every thing a sacrifice to voluptuousness and luxury, shortened their days with a glass of poison, when they found all their money was spent (69).

(64) Idem, ibid. p. 856, A.

(65) Harpocrat. in Ἀσπασία, p. m. 79.

(66) Amyot's translation of the Life of Pericles, p. 620, 621.

(67) Quotation (22).

(68) Κοινὴν τελευσαίαν πρότερον ἀλλήλοις προπίοντες ὥσπερ ἐν συμποσίῳ ἀνέλυσαν. They drank for the last time one another's health in a glass of hemlock, and from the table they removed to their grave. Ælian Variæ Hist. lib. 4. cap. 23.

(69) Athen. lib. 12. p. 537.

[K] Plutarch . . . . makes a judicious reflection on the nature of God.] Immediately after the words, which I have transcribed in the foregoing remark according to Amyot's translation, we meet with the following passage (70). "When he was drawing "near his end, the best of the citizens, and those of "his friends who were left alive, sitting about him, "were discourfing of his virtue and authority, how "great it was, and were reckoning up his famous "actions and atchievements, and the number of his "victories. For there were no less than nine tro-"phies, which he as their Chief Commander and "Conqueror of their enemies had set up for the ho-"nour of the City and State. These things they "talked of together among themselves, as though "he did not understand or mind what they said, "but had been utterly bereft of his senses. But he "had listned all the while, and given good heed to "all the passages of their discourse, and speaking out "among them, said, that he wondered they should "commend and take notice of those things in him, "which were as much owing to fortune, as to any "thing else, and had happened to many other "Generals in former times as well as to him; and "that at the same time they should not speak of "that, which was the most excellent and greatest "thing of all; for, said he, there never was any of "all my fellow-citizens that ever put on mourning "upon my account." Here follows Plutarch's reflection (71). To me it appears that this one thing of him too far: he carried the notion of the ſupreme goodneſs too high, and pretended that it can never hurt; ſo that he choſe rather to aſcribe evil to another cauſe. This will give us room to conſider one of his proofs of Herodotus's malice, and what has been anſwered to it him did make that otherwiſe childiſh and arrogant title they gave him, in nick-naming him Olympius, that is, the Heavenly or the Godlike, to be without envy and truly becoming him, I mean his kind and courteous carriage, and a pure and untainted unblemiſhed converſation in the height of power and place; according to thoſe apprehenſions and notions we have of the Gods (72) themſelves in their kind, whom upon this account that they are naturally authors of all good things, and are not the authors of any evil, we do think worthy to rule and govern the world. Not as the Poets rudely fancy, who confounding us with their fooliſh unmannerly conceits and opinions, are taken tardy in their own poems and fictitious ſtories, when they call the place indeed wherein they ſay the Gods make their abode, a ſecure and quiet ſeat, free from all hazards and commotions, not troubled with winds, nor darkned with clouds, but at all times alike ſhining round about with a ſoft ſerenity and a pure light, inaſmuch as ſuch a tempered ſtation is moſt agreeable and ſuitable for a bleſſed and immortal nature to live in; and yet in the mean while do affirm, that the Gods themſelves are full of trouble, enmity, anger, and other paſſions, which no way become even men that have any underſtanding. All that Plutarch obſerves here againſt the Poets is very reaſonable and very judicious; but all the reſt is of a deceitful beauty; they are envenomed flowers, which conceal a ſnake, Latet anguis in herba. Some will perhaps imagine, that I mean there are ſome hints here of Epicurus's falſe doctrine concerning the tranquillity the Gods enjoy, free from hatred and anger. But this is not my meaning: it is not the poiſon of Epicurus, but that of Manicheiſm, which Plutarch preſents us with here. We have obſerved elſewhere (73), that he declared himſelf openly for the doctrine of the two principles. He hints the ſame again in this place by his reflection on Pericles's anſwer. He does not aſſert, like Epicurus, that God enjoys the tranquillity of an idle Being; he aſcribes action and providence to him, but it is only a kind providence, which beſtows favours, and happineſs. It is not a providence, which is ſometimes angry, which chaſtiſes and puniſhes, which loads mankind with miſeries. He does not approve that Pericles ſhould bear the ſirname of Olympius, that is to ſay, the Heavenly, the Godlike, becauſe his eloquence lightned, thundered, and whirled thunderbolts, but becauſe he never uſed his credit to revenge himſelf, and never made any family wear mourning. Plutarch's taſte was not very common; there are numberleſs perſons who acknowledge Jupiter's divine nature in thunder and lightning (74), much more than in his diſtributing of favours. The Religious Ceremonies of the Heathens were much more deſigned to avert the misfortunes which were dreaded from above, than to obtain the bleſſings that might be expected from thence. And yet there was a general notion which prevailed among men, which was, that there is nothing more agreeable to the divine nature than to do good. The epithet of moſt good went always before that of moſt great when Jupiter was commended. Sed ipſe Jupiter, id eſt juvans pater, quem converſis caſibus appellamus à juvando Jovem, à Poëtis Pater Divum, hominumque dicitur; à Majoribus autem noſtris Optimus, Maximus, & quidem antè Optimus, id eſt beneficentiſſimus, quàm Maximus: quia majus eſt, certeque gratius prodeſſe omnibus, quàm opes magnas habere (75). i. e. "But even Jupiter himſelf, that is, "the helping Father, whom in the oblique caſes we "call Jove, from juvare, to help and aſſiſt, is by "the Poets ſtyled the Father of the Gods and men; "but by our Anceſtors the moſt good, and moſt "great; and the moſt good, that is the kindeſt and "moſt benevolent, before the moſt great; becauſe "it is greater, and even more acceptable, to be uſe-"ful to all, than to enjoy great riches." Conſult the remark [G] of the article JUPITER. Plutarch relates, that King Amaſis having ſeveral queſtions to ſolve, in which the ſuperlative was required, I mean, the higheſt degree of things, as for inſtance, what is the moſt antient, the moſt great, the moſt wiſe, the moſt beautiful, the moſt common, the moſt uſeful, the moſt pernicious (76)? anſwered with regard to the two laſt articles, God and the Devil, or Demon. Τὶ ὠφελιμώτατον; θεός· Τὶ βλαβερώτατον: δαίμων. What is there moſt uſeful? God. What moſt pernicious? The Devil or Demon (77). We may obſerve by the by, that we have here the Doctrine of the two Principles, and even what the Chriſtians aſſert of the Devil, or evil Spirit. I cannot tell whether any perſon ever took notice of theſe words, or of this notion of the Δαίμων of the Antients. But to return. The Philoſopher Antipater defined God an happy and immortal animal good towards men (78). There were no men whom people were more inclined to deify than thoſe who had invented ſome uſeful things. Perſæus ejuſdem Zenonis auditor, eos dicit eſſe habitos Deos, à quibus magna utilitas ad vitæ cultum eſſet inventa, ipſaſque res utiles & ſalutares Deorum eſſe vocabulis nuncupatas: ut ne hoc quidem diceret, illa inventa eſſe Deorum, ſed ipſa divina (79). i. e. "Perſeus, the "ſame Zeno's Diſciple, ſaid, that they were held "Gods, who invented ſomething of great uſe in "civil life, and theſe uſeful things were called by "the names of the Gods; ſo that he did not only aſ-"ſert they were inventions of the Gods, but even "themſelves Divine." This was the way to a deification, if we may believe Pliny. Deus eſt mortali juvare mortalem, & hæc ad æternam gloriam via. Hac proceres iere Romani: hac nunc cæleſti paſſu cum liberis ſuis vadit maximus omnis ævi rector Veſpaſianus Auguſtus, feſſis rebus ſubveniens. Hic eſt vetuſtiſſimus referendi bene merentibus gratiam mos, ut tales numinibus adſcribantur. Quippe & omnium aliorum nomina Deorum, & quæ ſupra retuli ſiderum, ex hominum nata ſunt meritis (80). i. e. "It is Godlike for a mortal man to re-"lieve another; this is the way to an everlaſting "glory. In that way the great Rulers of the Ro-"mans walked; in that road walks now with his "children, the greateſt Prince who ever lived, Veſ-"paſianus Auguſtus, who retrieves the affairs of the "State. The moſt antient method of rewarding "thoſe who deſerve well of the publick, is to admit "them among the Gods. For all the other Gods, "and the Stars themſelves which are reckoned a-"mong them, as I have obſerved before, come ori-"ginally from the good which men have done to "their fellow creatures." Others, explaining this after a more reaſonable manner, aſſerted that the Gods inſpired men with the invention of the arts.

(70) Amyot, in his translation of the Life of Pericles, p. 621, 622.

(71) Ibid. p. 622, 623.

Κεῖνοι γὰρ τέχνας πολυκερδέας ἀνθρώποισι
Δῶκαν ἔχειν, ἠὲ πᾶσαν ἐπιφροσύνην ἐδίδαξαν.

i. e. The Gods themſelves inſpired men with their uſeful arts, and taught them wiſdom (81).

Laſtly, it was ſaid that the beſt method to imitate the Gods was by doing good (82), and that a man never came nearer the Divine Nature, than when he ſaved another's life. Homines ad Deos nulla re proprius accedunt, ſaid Tully to Cæſar towards the end of his Oration in Ligarius's defence, quam ſalutem hominibus dando. Nihil habet nec fortuna tua majus, quàm ut poſſis, nec natura tua melius, quàm ut velis conſervare quamplurimos. i. e. "Men are never more like the "Gods than when they preſerve the lives of o-"thers. There is nothing greater in your happi-"neſs than the power you have to ſave many, nor "is there any thing more praiſe-worthy in your cha-"racter than in the inclination you have to ſave "them." Here follows what the Scythians repreſented to Alexander. If you be a God, you ought to do good to men, and not to rob them of their property. Si Deus es, tribuere mortalibus beneficia debes, non ſua eripere (83). All theſe notions of the antient Heathens are agreeable to ſound Divinity. There are an hundred paſſages in Scripture, which teſtify that God is infinitely more inclined to uſe mercy than ſeverity. Add to this that noble paſſage from Gregory of Nazianzen, who tells us that a man becomes a God to his neighbour, when he relieves him. Γίνου τῷ ἀτυχοῦντι θεὸς τοῦ ἐλέου θεοῦ μιμησάμενος· ἐδὲν γὰρ

(72) Καθάπερ τὸ τῶν θεῶν γένος ἀξιοῦμεν, αἴτιον μὲν ἀγαθῶν, ἀναίτιον δὲ κακῶν πεφυκὸς, ἄρχειν καὶ βασιλεύειν τῶν ὄντων, οὐχ ὥσπερ οἱ ποιηταί. Sicut dignam arbitramur deorum gentem, quæ per ſe eſt propitia, & nullius autor mali, ut rebus præſit & moderetur, non ut Poetæ. Plut. in Pericle, p. 173, C.

(73) In the art. MANICHEANS, rem. [C]. See alſo the rem. [G] of the art. PAULICIANS.

(74) Cælo tonantem credidimus Jovem regnare. Horat. Od. 5. lib. 3. i. e.
"His thun-
"d'ring proves
"that mighty
"Jove
"With won"drous force
"rules all above.
Creech.
Namque Dieſpiter Igni coruſco nubila dividens, &c. Idem, Od. 34. lib. 1. i. e.
"For angry
"Jove——
"ſhot through
"the Heav'n
"with pointed
"flame.
Creech.

(75) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. 2. cap. 25.

(76) Compare this with what is obſerved above in the text of the art. PAULICIANS, towards the end, and quotation (133).

(77) Plut. in Septem Sapientum Convivio, p. 153, A.

(78) Ζήνων μακάριον καὶ ἄφθαρτον καὶ συμπτικὸν ἀνθρώπων. Plut. de Repug. Stoic. p. 1051.

(79) Cicero, de Natura Deor. lib. 1. cap. 15. Virg. Æn. lib 6. ver. 663, places them only in the Ælifian fields.
Inventas aut qui vitam excoluere per artes
Quique ſui memores alios fecere merendo.
i. e. "And
"ſearching wits
"of more me-
"chanick parts,
"Who grac'd
"their age with
"new invented
"arts.
"Thoſe who
"to worth their
"bounty did
"extend,
"And thoſe
"who know
"that bounty to
"commend.
Dryden.

(80) Plin. lib. 2. cap. 7. p. m. 143, 144.

(81) Oppian. lib. 2.

(82) Strabo, lib. 10. p. m. 322. I tranſcribe his words hereunder, quotation (85).

(83) Q. Curtius, lib. 7. cap. 8. num. 26. See Freinſhemius, ibid. where he quotes ſeveral ſentences to the ſame purpoſe.

it. That proof is grounded on that Hiſtorian's aſcribing a jealous temper, and envious γὰρ εἶτώς ὡς τὸ εὖ ποιεῖν, ἄνθρωπε· ἔχει θεός. Be a God to the unfortunate, by imitating God's mercy; for there cannot be any thing more Divine in a man than to do good to others (84).

(84) Nazianz. Orat. de Amore Pauperum.

Strabo has limited that thought within narrower bounds. He pretends that a happy life, that is to ſay, which is ſpent in holy-days, in being merry, in philoſophizing, and in ſinging, is a better imitation of the Divine Nature, than the beſtowing of favours is. His words deſerve to be tranſcribed. Εὖ μὲν γὰρ εἴρηται κ τοῦτο, τοὺς ἀνθρώπους τότε μάλιστα μιμεῖσθαι τοὺς θεούς, ὅταν εὐεργετῶσιν· ἄμεινον δ' ἂν λέγοι τὶς ὅταν εὐδαιμονῶσι· τοιοῦτον δὲ τὸ χαίρειν, κ τὸ εὐφραίνειν, κ τὸ φιλοσοφεῖν, κ μουσικῆς ἅπτεσθαι. It has indeed been well obſerved, that men imitate the Gods beſt when they do good to others. But yet it were more reaſonable to ſay, that it is when they live happy, which conſiſts in being merry, in faſting, in philoſophizing, and in playing upon inſtruments, or in ſinging (85).

(85) Strabo, lib. 10. p. 322.

I have read in Sir Francis Drake's travels, that the inhabitants of new Albion took the Engliſh for Gods, and paid divine honours to them, becauſe having ſhewed their wounds to them, they received ſalve and plaiſters from them, by which they were ſoon cured. The Spaniards, on the contrary, were taken for Gods in America, becauſe of the miſchief they did with their canons. Their ſhip was taken for a bird, which carried them down from heaven upon earth (86). This ſhews, that two oppoſite things are proper to make God known unto men; the one is the power he has to hurt, which power he exerts ſo ſeverely; the other is the goodneſs with which he diſperſes a thouſand favours among mankind. It might be propoſed as a queſtion, whether of theſe two things make him better known. Tacitus pretends, that the Gods are more inclined to puniſh men, than to ſuffer them to live quietly. Nec enim unquam, ſays he (87), atrocioribus populi Romani cladibus magiſve juſtis judiciis approbatum eſt, non eſſe curæ Deis ſecuritatem noſtram, eſſe ultionem. i. e. "Never did it appear more plainly by "the great misfortunes of the Romans, and the juſt "judgments againſt them, that the Gods do not mind "our ſecurity, but only take care to puniſh us." A Journaliſt aſſerts, that the effects of goodneſs, are more extenſive than the effects of wrath. Here follow his words. Of all God's perfections, his goodneſs would appear moſt evidently, if men knew how to reflect. What an effect of Goodneſs is it, not to have ordered things ſo, that all the neceſſary actions of life be attended with pleaſure, and to have made us capable to receive pleaſure a thouſand different ways? It is to no purpoſe to ſay, that we are ſtill more liable to grief and pain, this is not true; and if it were, yet we ought not for all that to be unmindful of God's great goodneſs, ſince it is eaſy for us to perceive, that the pleaſures we enjoy, flow from the Laws of Nature which he eſtabliſhed himſelf, and that on the contrary, moſt of our vexations are owing to the ill uſe we make of our reaſon. But it is not true, that man in this world ſuffers more evil, than he enjoys good; it is our ungratefulneſs, our pride, and our unſatiable temper, which make us ſpeak thus; falſo queritur de natura ſua genus humanum; mankind complains of his fate without reaſon, was very juſtly obſerved by a celebrated Hiſtorian in his preface to the Jugurthine War. Mankind is more happy than it deſerves; and it is literally true, that man has a thouſand pleaſures, againſt one pain; except perhaps a few unfortunate ſouls, which an Heathen would aſſert, were framed at a time when the Deſtinies were out of humour (88). Obſerve by the by, that the difference he takes notice of, and which he accounts for by the ill uſe we make of our liberty, would not be capable to ſatisfy a difficult adverſary; for he would urge, that man's making an ill uſe of his reaſon to vex himſelf without a cauſe, is a great misfortune, which muſt abſolutely be taken into the account of our afflictions, ſo that if we pretend to make a compariſon between the good and the evil which Providence beſtows on mankind, we muſt reckon the evils which are owing to the weakneſs of our reaſon, as well as diſtempers, hunger, cold, &c.

(86) See La Motbe la Vayer, Diſcours de l'Hiſtoire.

(87) Tacit. Hiſt. lib. 1. cap. 3.

(88) Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for Aug. 1684. art. 6. p. m. 603, 604.

(89) Si numeres anno ſoles & nubila toto,
Invenies nitidum ſæpius eſſe diem. Ovid. Triſt. lib. 5. Eleg. 8. ver. 3. See the rem. [F] of the art. XENOPHANES.

Ovid obſerves, that there are more fine days in the year, than dark and cloudy days (89); we may alſo aſſert, that the days in which man is in health, are more numerous than thoſe in which he is out of order. But there is perhaps alſo as much evil in a fortnight's diſtemper, as there is good in fifteen months of good health: for a good is ſuch only, as much as it is perceived; now men do not much feel their own health, when they enjoy it without interruption. But take notice, that I conſider health here, only as ſeparated from the other pleaſures which it ſuffers us to enjoy. The Journaliſt I have mentioned, might have quoted a beautiful paſſage from Cicero, in which, after an accurate enumeration of the benefits which the plants and animals procure to men, he obſerves, that one would think Providence laboured to afford pleaſures to mankind, as though ſhe had been an Epicurean. Ex quibus tanta percipitur voluptas, ut interdum Pronæa noſtra Epicurea fuiſſe videatur (90). However it be, man is more inclined to acknowledge the character of the Divine Nature in the effects of goodneſs, than in the diſpenſation of puniſhments and misfortunes. The ſervices, which eminent men did their own country, have been looked upon as particular favours of Providence. Multos præterea & noſtra civitas & Græcia tulit ſingulares viros, quorum neminem niſi juvante Deo talem fuiſſe credendum eſt . . . . nemo igitur vir magnus ſine aliquo afflatu divino unquam fuit (91). i. e. "There have alſo "been moſt eminent men both in our Commonwealth "and in Greece, and we muſt believe that none of "them were ſuch, without God's aſſiſtance . . . ne"ver therefore was any man great, but by ſome "divine inſpiration." And Seneca aſſerts in general, that no man is virtuous or great, but by the aſſiſtance of Heaven. Bonus vir ſine Deo nemo eſt. An poteſt aliquis ſupra fortunam, niſi ab illo adjutus, exſurgere? ille dat conſilia magnifica, & erecta. In unoquoque virorum bonorum, (Quis Deus incertum eſt) habitat Deus. . . Si hominem videris interritum periculis, intactum cupiditatibus, inter adverſa felicem, in mediis tempeſtatibus placidum, ex ſuperiore loco homines videntem, ex æquo deos: non ſubibit te veneratio ejus? non dices: iſta res major eſt altiorque, quàm ut credi ſimilis huic, in quo eſt, corpuſculo poſſit? Vis iſtuc divina deſcendit: animum excellentem, moderatum, omnia tanquam minora tranſeuntem, quicquid timemus optamuſque ridentem, cœleſtis potentia agitat. Non poteſt res tanta ſine adminiculo Numinis ſtare. Itaque majore ſui parte illic eſt unde deſcendit (92). i. e. "No man can be good, without the aſ"ſiſtance of God. For is it poſſible for any one to "raiſe himſelf above the accidents of this life, un"leſs he be ſupported by him. He alone inſpires "noble and bold deſigns. In every good man dwells "a God; (but which God, is unknown) . . . . When "you behold a man undaunted in the greateſt dan"gers, unmoved by the paſſions, eaſy even in adver"ſity, unconcerned in the midſt of violent ſtorms, "looking down on men as it were from an exalted "place; and in a manner on a level with the Gods, "can you forbear revering him? Will you not ſay, "that which dwells in him is too great, too noble to "be thought of the ſame nature with the body. "Some Divine influence came down into it; a ce"leſtial power animates that excellent and moderate "mind, which overlooks every thing below as mean "and contemptible, and laughs at all we fear or deſire. "There could never be ſo great a ſoul, without "God's aſſiſtance. It muſt therefore by the greateſt "part of itſelf be there, from whence it came "down." As to evils, men uſed a thouſand ſhifts rather than charge the Gods with them: they imagined a fantaſtical Being, which they called fortune, and to which they aſcribed their misfortunes. They repreſented to themſelves I know not what Beings naturally miſchievous: and here we ſee Plutarch who declares that the Gods can do nothing but good. In another place he ridicules Chryſippus for aſcribing evil to the negligence and to the wickedneſs of the genius's, to whom Jupiter left the government of ſome things. Τὸ δὲ φαύλους δαίμονας ἐκ προνοίας ἐπὶ τὰς τοιαύτας ἐπιστασίας καθίσασθαι πῶς οὐκ ἔστιν ἔγκλημα τῷ θεῷ, καθάπερ βασιλέως κακοῖς κ ἐμπλήκτοις σατράπαις κ ζηλήτοις δεικήτας ἐπιτρέποντος, κ πικροῖς; ὑπὸ τούτων ἀμελημένους κ παροινουμένους τοὺς ἀρίστους; κ μὴν εἰ πολὺ τὸ τῆς ἀνάγκης μίμικλαι τοῖς

(90) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. 2. cap. 64. Compare together what David obſerves in Pſalm 8, concerning God's goodneſs in making the animals ſubſervient to the happineſs of mankind, and what Seneca aſſerts, de Benefic. lib. 4. cap. 5, 6, and 7. uſque in delicias amamur. i. e. "We are "beloved (by "the Gods) as "their dar"lings." I quote this more at length in the rem. [F] of the art. XENOPHANES.

(91) Cicero, ib. cap. 66.

(92) Seneca, Epiſt. 51. p. m. 236. See alſo Epiſt. 73. p. 305.

vious Spirit to the Divine Nature [L]. Valerius Maximus had committed a miſtake, which τοῖς πράγμασιν, ὅτι κραῖῖ πάντων ὁ Θεὸς, ὅτι πάντα κατὰ τὸν ἐκείνου λόγον διοικεῖται. But why ſhould not Jupiter be to blame for appointing bad genius's to perform theſe offices, ſince he acts like a King, who ſhould appoint bad and wicked Governors over his Provinces, and ſuffer the beſt men to be deſpiſed and ill uſed by them? But if a great many things be ſubject to fate, it follows that Jupiter's power does not extend to all, and that all things are not governed by his wiſdom (93). In another place he charges an Hiſtorian (94) with a malicious impiety, for making Solon ſay, Muſt you aſk me whether man be happy or not, me, I ſay, who know that the Gods are envious and turbulent? Τοῖς δὲ Θεοῖς λοιδορουμένῳ ἐν τῷ Σόλωνι προσωπείῳ ταῦτα εἴρηκεν, ὦ Κροῖσε, ἐπισάμενόν με τὸ Θεῖον πᾶν ἐὸν φθονερόν τε καὶ ταραχῶδες ἐπαιφωτᾶς ἀνθρωπηίων περὶ πραγμάτων, ἃ γὰρ αὐτὸς ἐφρόνεε περὶ τῶν Θεῶν, τῷ Σόλωνι προσῤῥιβόμενος, κακοήθειαν τῇ βλασφημίᾳ προσλίθησι. Speaking evil of the Gods, under the character of Solon, ſince I knew, Cræſus, ſays he, that all the Gods are envious and tumultuous, why do you aſk me queſtions about human affairs? Thus he aſcribes his own opinion concerning the Gods to Solon, adding malice to his impiety or blaſphemy (95). I am ſure he would have laughed at the mitigating gloſs of the antient Etrurian Prieſts. They gave Jupiter two kinds of thunderbolts, the one favourable, the other fatal, and they aſſerted that he never flung the latter but by the advice of the other Gods; but he uſed to dart the former of his own accord, without any one's advice. Plutarch would not be ſatisfied with this: he did not think that a goodneſs, ſuch as that of kind Princes, was ſufficient for God. Kind Princes take a delight in beſtowing favours themſelves, but they give their Miniſters the commiſſion to chaſtiſe. They make haſte to reward, but they are ſlow when they muſt puniſh (96); they do good with pleaſure, and harm with reluctancy. This is being like a father; but, once more, Plutarch would not have liked that gloſs of the Tuſcans, he would perhaps have ſaid of their Jupiter, what others obſerved of an Emperor (97), who very much perſecuted the Chriſtians, but would not begin the perſecution, without the advice of his Counſellors. Placuit ergo amicorum ſententiam experiri. Nam erat hujus malitiæ. Cùm bonum quid facere decreviſſet, ſine conſilio faciebat, ut ipſe laudaretur. Cùm autem malum, quoniam id reprehendendum ſciebat, in conſilium multos advocabat, ut aliorum culpæ adſcriberetur quidquid ipſe deliquerat (98). i. e. "He reſolved therefore to aſk the advice of his "friends. For ſuch was his wickedneſs, that when "he deſigned to do any good, he did it without con"ſulting any man, that he might have all the glory "of it to himſelf, but when he intended to do "ſome ill, knowing that it would be cenſured, he "called many perſons together to conſult them, that "others might be blamed, for what he himſelf had "done amiſs." This is the craft and artifice of an old Politician. I refer it to the judgment of Pope Pius IV. When he was preſſed to decide the diſpute about precedency between the moſt Chriſtian King's Embaſſadors, and thoſe of his Catholick Majeſty, he uſed evaſions and delays, and adviſed them at laſt to ſubmit to the determination of the ſacred College. He would not expoſe himſelf alone to the bad conſequences of the determination; he would even ſay with a joke, that he only followed Jupiter's example. Ad extremum utrique occultè ſuadere ut ad ſacram Cardinalium Collegium cauſam integram remitterent: interea à publicis in Pontificio ſacello cæremoniis abſtinerent. Ratus eâ ratione ob diverſa Cardinalium ſtudia producendum infinitè judicium, ſe certè à ferendæ ſententiæ neceſſitate, atque adeò ab invidiâ ſubtrahendum. Nempe imitandum Principi Jovem facetè dicebat: qui (ut eſt vetus Etruſcorum diſciplinæ commentum) ex duplici fulminum genere, proſperum ipſe per ſe, at infauſtum adhibito Deorum conſilio contorquere ſolitus ſit (99).

Thus then did the mind of man, which is too ſhallow to comprehend how the miſeries and crimes, which overflow the whole earth, can be reconciled with the notion of a Being infinitely good, run into the hypotheſis of the two principles. And that is what I had to ſay concerning Plutarch's obſervation.

I muſt add a word or two more. The Greek proverb (100), I hold for a God every thing that maintains me, miſleads men more than we are aware of. See the anſwer that was made to Philip de Comines (101), and that of a Chirurgeon to a Monk of St. Denys. "It is certain, that the pox was not known in "France, before the time of Charles VIII. the "greateſt part of that Prince's army died of it; be"cauſe the diſtemper being not yet known, it was "impoſſible to find remedies to cure it, which ſhews "it was not the leproſy. Neceſſity made men at laſt "find out a cure, by which a great many Chirurge"ons grew rich; one of whom being very grateful "for that happineſs, went one day to St. Denys, "and fell on his knees before Charles the Eighth's "ſtatue, to give him thanks. But a Monk telling "him he was miſtaken, and that it was not the "image of a Saint; hold your tongue, anſwered "he, I know very well what I am about, he is a "great Saint to me, ſince he made me get thirty "thouſand livres a year; it is therefore but juſt, "that I ſhall thank him for it (102)." The Author of the Moyen de parvenir does not ſuppoſe the ſum was ſo large, and he names the Chirurgeon. Here follow his words. You put me mind of that Monk of St. Denys in France, who pretended to ſhew his learning, when he ſaw Maſter Thierry de Hiery on his knees before Charles the Eighth's ſtatue. Friend, ſaid the Monk to him, you are miſtaken, the image before which you are praying, is not that of a Saint. I know it very well, ſaid he, I am not ſuch a blockhead as you are, I know it is the figure of Charles VIII. for whoſe ſoul I pray, becauſe he brought the pox into France, which made me get ſix or ſeven thouſand livres a year (103.) We muſt not cloſe this remark without quoting Virgil. He was very much inclined to deify his benefactors: his lands having been ſpared by a particular favour of Octavius, he ſtyled him a God.

O Melibœe Deus nobis hæc otia fecit:
Namque erit ille mihi ſemper Deus: illius aram
Sæpè tener noſtris ab ovilibus imbuet agnus (104).

"Theſe bleſſings, friend, a Deity beſtow'd:
"For never can I deem him leſs than God.
"The tender firſtlings of my woolly breed
"Shall on his holy altar often bleed. Dryden.

Honeſt Mathurin Cordier (105), by a pious fraud which is very pardonable, made his little ſchool-boys believe, that there was a great deal of devotion in theſe lines: he tranſlated them into French verſe, which begins thus:

Melibée ce bien vous vient d'un Dieu ſeul ſage.

"Theſe bleſſings a wiſe Deity beſtow'd.

This was not Virgil's meaning; he ſpeaks only of Auguſtus (106).

[L] One of his proofs of Herodotus's wickedneſs, and what has been anſwered to it. That proof is grounded on that Hiſtorian's aſcribing a jealous temper . . . to the Divine Nature.] See Plutarch's words, which I have tranſcribed above (107). I wonder he mentioned only Solon's anſwer to King Cræſus, and that he did not hint at leaſt, that many ſuch paſſages were to be met with in Herodotus. This would have ſtrengthened his charge againſt him, by giving the Reader to underſtand, that one could not juſtify that Hiſtorian, by urging that this little ſatyrical ſtroke againſt the Gods dropt unawares from his pen; it would have ſhewed that a man, who makes often the ſame reflection, muſt be deeply affected with the poiſon concealed under it, and be deſirous to ſpread it, and to infect his Readers with it. It is certain, that Herodotus has very often repeated the ſame maxim, which he makes Solon utter. See above (108) what he made Artabanus ſpeak; here follows what he ſuppoſes a King of Egypt wrote to Polycrates, Tyrant of Samos. I hear with pleaſure, that a man, who is my friend, is happy. But I do not like your great proſperity, for I know how envious the Deity is.

(93) Plut. de Stoic. Repugn. p. 1051. D.

(94) Herodotus.

(95) Plut. de Malign. Herodoti, p. 857, 858.

(99) Sed piger ad pœnas princeps ad præmia velox, Quique dolet quoties cogitur eſſe ferox. Ovid. de Ponto, lib. 1. Eleg. 2. ver. 123.

(97) Dioclefian.

(98) Lactantius, de Mortibus Perſecutorum, cap. 11. p. 99, 100, of Monſieur Bauldri's beautiful edit. See his notes, and thoſe of Columbus, ib. part 2. p. 287.

(99) Famianus Strada, Dec. 1. lib. 1. p. m. 175. See Seneca, Nat. Quæſt. lib. 2. cap. 41 & ſeq. Compare with this what has been obſerved above, quotation (96), and (97) of the article NESTORIUS.

(100) Τὸ γὰρ τρέφον με τοῦτ' ἐγὼ κρίνω Θεόν.

(101) See the art. GREGORY I. quotat. (54).

(102) Furetierana, p. 113, of the Dutch edit.

(103) Moyen de parvenir, p. m. 578, 579.

(104) Virgil. Eclog. 1. ver. 6.

(105) See his Colloquies.

(106) Compare the 19th line. Sed tamen ille Deus qui ſit, da, Tityre, nobis. "But tell me, "Tytirus, what "heavenly "power, "Preſerved your "fortunes in "that fatal "hour;" with line 43, &c. Hic illum vidi juvenem, Melibœe, quotannis Bis ſenos cui noſtra dies altaria fumant. Hic mihi reſponſum primus dedit ille petenti: Paſcite, ut ante, boves, pueri, ſubmittite tauros. "There firſt "the youth of "heavenly birth "I view'd, "For whom "our monthly "victims are re"new'd. "He heard my "voice, and "graciouſly de"creed, "My grounds "to be reſtor'd, "my flocks to "feed." Dryden.

(107) Quotat. (95).

(108) Quotation (7), of the art. ARTABANUS the ſon of Hyſtaſpes.

Ἐμοὶ αἱ σαὶ μεγάλαι εὐτυχίαι ἐκ ἀρέσκουσι, τὸ Θεῖον ἐπισταμένῳ ὡς ἔστι φθονερόν. Tuæ magnæ proſperitates mihi non placent, qui intelligo, QUAM INVIDUM NUMEN SIT (109). Henry Stephens, who vindicates that Hiſtorian as well as he can, with regard to ſeveral other imputations, does not ſpend his time in refuting Plutarch with regard to this charge. I have not found that he gives us any hint of his being acquainted with it. He has carefully collected together ſeveral maxims and obſervations of Herodotus, which may prove that he was piouſly orthodox with regard to providence; he even reckons among thoſe proofs a paſſage from the ſeventh book, in which Artabanus inſiſts very much upon the envious temper of the Gods. Artabanus repreſents the Deity as hurling his thunder-bolt only on great bodies (110): for, adds he, God takes a delight in depreſſing whatever is eminent. Φιλέει γὰρ ὁ Θεὸς τὰ ὑπερέχοντα πάντα κολούειν. Gaudet enim Deus eminentiſſima quæque deprimere (111). Hence it comes that a great army is beaten by a ſmall one, when God being envious (112) ſtrikes the ſoldiers with terror, or caſts his bolts about. Thus ſome have been brought to greater misfortunes than were conſiſtent with their dignity, becauſe God ſuffers none beſides him to have a greater opinion of themſelves. Διὶ ὧν ἰσφάλησαν ἀναξίως ἑωυτῶν· ὑπὲρ γὰρ ἐᾷ φρονέειν ἄλλον μέγα ὁ Θεὸς ἢ ἑωυτόν. Propterea quidem ſecus ac dignitas ſua poſtulabat in calamitatem inciderant; quia Deus neminem alium quam ſeipſum ſinit magnifice de ſe ſentire (113). This is one of the inſtances which Henry Stephens gives us of Herodotus's piety; a piety, ſays he, as great as it could be in a man, who was deſtitute of the light of the Goſpel. He pretends even that Herodotus's opinion of God's power and providence is the ſame which Chriſtians ought to hold; he aſſerts that it is impoſſible to ſay any thing more divine than what that Hiſtorian obſerved (114). Multæ ſententiæ ſive γνῶμαι tum quas aliis locis adhibuit, tum quas narrationibus vel præfixit, vel tanquam Corollaria adjunxit, tanta illum pietate præditum fuiſſe teſtantur, quanta in hominem Chriſtianæ Religionis ignarum cadere poteſt: imo vero ea de divina potentia providentiaque ſenſiſſe, quæ Chriſtianum ſentire et deceat et oporteat. Hujuſmodi ſunt hæc in Thalia: SED profecto . . . Conſideremus et hæc in Polymnia VIDEN ut Deus (115) . . quid, obſecro, de divina potentia divinius iſtis dici potuit? He quotes afterwards four Greek lines (116), which are to the ſame purpoſe with ſome of Horace (117), which he alſo quotes, and which ſignify that God can make the higheſt things the loweſt, humble the great, and exalt the mean: whence he infers that the commendations, which are beſtowed on that ſentence, are very well grounded; but that Herodotus goes farther ſtill, & meritò quidem certè illam veteris Poëtæ ſententiam laudibus extollunt: ſed quanto tamen ulterius progreditur hic noſter hiſtoricus? I cannot conceive what miſt Henry Stephens had before his eyes, which made him miſtake things a little. He ſees only their fair ſide, and takes no manner of notice of the moſt viſible defect. He is enchanted with the grand notion Herodotus gives of God's power, and does not perceive that a power can be but odious and defective, when it is directed by a jealouſy of another's happineſs. Herein lyes the ſtreſs of Plutarch's objection.

Camerarius, who attempted to vindicate Herodotus, before Henry Stephens undertook it, knew very well wherein the difficulty lay: but he found no other way to ſolve it but by evading it, and by ſtyling the chief point of the difficulty a mere cavil. Nam quòd exagitat (Plutarchus) *præclaram ſententiam de inſtabili & incerta fortuna rerum humanarum, quam Herodotus * Soloni attribuerit (cui quidem ſimiles & alibi leguntur) nimiæ ſapientiæ & pietati hominis concedatur: qui veritus ſit, ne ſi ita de Deo loquamur, ut humanus intellectus quæ dicuntur percipere poſſit, parum pii eſſe videamur. Cur ergo Deo oculos, manus, pedes, aures attribuimus? cur dicimus Deum iraſci? cur ulciſci? etiam vereri profectò, tentare, pœnitere, lætari, dolere.* πόῤῥω γὰρ λύπης καὶ χαρᾶς ἴδρυται τὸ Θεῖον: ſine quibus illa ne intelligi quidem poſſunt. Quid Xenophon? (quo nemo fuit numinis colentior, nemo obſervantior, nemo impietatis erga Deum acrior hoſtis) nonne eandem ſententiam ponere non dubitavit in præclaro illo opere ſuo hiſtoriæ rerum Græcarum? Sic enim aut †, καὶ ὁ Θεὸς δὴ, ὡς ἔοικε, πολλάκις χαίρει τοὺς μὲν μικροὺς μεγάλους ποιῶν, τοὺς δὲ μεγάλους μικρούς. Hæc igitur ſacrilega eſt in Herodoto ſententia, quia ſecundum hominum intelligentiam φθονερὸν dixit eſſe τὸ Θεῖον. Sed hæc quàm ſint futilia quis non videt (118)? i. e. "For Plutarch's cenſure of that noble ſentence "concerning the uncertain and changeable condition "of human affairs, which Herodotus aſcribes to Solon, "(though we meet with many ſuch ſentences in o-"ther Authors) that cenſure, I ſay, may be over-"looked, conſidering the man's great wiſdom "and his piety: for he feared leſt we ſhould ſeem "diſreſpectful towards God, if we ſpoke of him ſo "as to be underſtood by the mind of man. But "why then do we aſcribe eyes, hands, feet, and ears, "to God? Why do we ſay, that God is angry, and "that he revenges himſelf? or why indeed, that he "fears, that he tempts, that he repents, that he re-"joices, that he is ſorry? Why ſhould we ſay that "the Divine Nature is not ſubject to grief nor to joy, "without which the reſt cannot be underſtood? But "what ſays Xenophon? (than whom no man ever "revered and worſhipped the Deity more; nor was "a greater enemy of impiety.) Did he ſcruple in the "leaſt to aſſert the ſame opinion in his moſt noble "Hiſtory of Greece? For he ſpeaks thus: God, it "ſeems, delights often, in raiſing them that are low, "and in humbling them that are high. Is it therefore "a blaſphemous opinion in Herodotus to aſſert, that "according to human reaſon the Deity is envious? "But who does not ſee that theſe are mere cavils?" It is plain that Camerarius miſleads us here, for Herodotus was not cenſured for aſſerting that the condition of human things is very changeable; but he was blamed for maintaining that God's jealous temper is the cauſe of that inſtability; and in order to make men ſenſible of the inſtability of fortune, it is by no means neceſſary to urge a notion which repreſents the Deity as a Being, who envies men's happineſs. But farther; there is a very great difference between the things which other Authors, and even the Holy Scripture aſcribe to God, and the jealouſy, which Herodotus imputes to him. Eyes, hands, anger, repentance, joy, fear, may ſerve as ſo many images to repreſent to the people the conduct of providence; for we do not look upon theſe things as weakneſſes inconſiſtent with the character of an honeſt man, and of an excellent Prince. To be jealous of one's glory, not to ſuffer it to be uſurped, does not paſs for a fault among men; it is even thought to be a qualification becoming great Kings and Hero's: wherefore the Scripture does not ſcruple to aſcribe ſuch a jealouſy to God. But to be jealous of another's happineſs, to ruin men becauſe their proſperity makes us feel the ſtings of envy, is one of the moſt ſhameful qualities that can be conceived: the meaneſt handicrafts men could not bear to be charged with it. Few perſons can avoid that diſtemper, but none dare to confeſs they labour under it. We will indeed own moſt publickly that a noble emulation to equal or excel alone the merit and glory of great men animates us to honourable undertakings, but not that the jealouſy we entertain of a neighbour's proſperity engages us to promote his ruin. Camerarius does not therefore deſerve much to be excuſed for making uſe of the compariſons he urges. Xenophon's expreſſions are not much to the purpoſe, when quoted to vindicate Herodotus. For if they ſignify that God takes often a delight in turning things topſy-turvy, by bringing the great down to the condition of the little ones, and by raiſing the little ones to the condition of the great, if they ſignify, I ſay, that God does this for a diverſion and a paſtime, almoſt as Princes divert themſelves on the one hand, by having large animals killed in a bull-baiting, and on the other, by loading a lap-dog with kindneſs, they are as impious as Herodotus's expreſſions. This therefore would be juſtifying one impiety by another. But there is no neceſſity to take Xenophon's words in that ſenſe. They may be underſtood in a very reaſonable ſenſe, if we ſuppoſe that he meant, God delights in that frequent viciſſitude of conditions, becauſe his title of Judge and Father of mankind requires it of him (119). The great make an ill uſe of their power; their downfall muſt therefore be a leſſon to others; it muſt alſo prevent the evil they would have done, and comfort thoſe whom they oppreſſed. And ſince the condition of men is ſuch, that it is impoſſible they ſhould all be in the higheſt poſts at the ſame time, the dignities muſt circulate, and the common Father of mankind muſt diſpoſe (109) Herodot. lib. 3. cap. 40. p. m. 178.

(110) Ibidem.

(111) Idem, lib. 7. cap. 10. p. 388. Valeſius, in Ammian. Marcell. lib. 14. cap. 12. p. 59. quotes this as though it were extracted from the 6th book of Herodot.

(112) Ἐπειάν σφι ὁ Θεὸς εθουνήσας. Quoties Deus iis quibus invidet. Ibid.

(113) Ibidem.

(114) Henr. Stephanus, in Apologia pro Herodoto, præfixa Editioni Latinæ Herodoti, Francof. 1595, in 8vo. p. 24, 25.

(115) He tranſcribes here what I have quoted from the 7th book of Herodot. chap. 10.

(116) From Heſiod.

(117) Valet ima ſummis
Mutare & inſignem attenuat
Deus,
Obſcura promens.
Horat. Od. 34. lib. 1.

* Clione, cap. 32.

† Hellenican. lib. 5.

(118) Joach. Camerarius, Proœmio in Herodot. p. 5. edit. Genev. 1618, in fol.

(119) Compare this with the remark [F] of the art. LUCRETIUS.

which muſt not be paſt unobſerved, and which will afford us an opportunity to ſet down here

poſe of them now in favour of ſome, and then in favour of others. The little ones muſt be raiſed in their turn, as the great ones muſt in their turn be depreſſed. Thus Xenophon intended probably to repreſent the matter; and not only to hint the idea of God's ſupreme authority over men's fortunes and conditions. It would not become the infinitely perfect Being to pull down the great ones, and to raiſe the little ones with no other deſign but to ſhew his power. There is no Prince but would be blamed, if only out of pride, and to exert his power, he applied himſelf to level mountains, to fill up valleys, to drain marſhes, and to overflow in other places ſandy plains. Publick utility muſt be the ſcope of ſuch undertakings, otherwiſe they are nothing but a vain oſtentation, and a tyrannical luxury: they are only a ſubject of offence, and of well grounded complaints. Read theſe words of Salluſt. Nam quid ea memorem, quæ niſi iis, qui videre, nemini credibilia ſunt, à privatis compluribus ſubverſos montes, maria conſtructa eſſe? Quibus mihi ludibrio videntur fuiſſe divitiæ, quippe quas honeſte habere licebat, per turpitudinem abuti properabant (120). i. e. "For why ſhould I mention thoſe things, "which non can believe, but they who were eye-"witneſſes to them? Namely, that many private "perſons have levelled mountains, and formed new "ſeas. In my opinion, they made only a ſport of "their riches, which though they may be honeſtly "enjoyed, yet they waſted them away as faſt as they "could." Read alſo theſe words of Suetonius concerning the Emperor Caligula. In exſtructionibus prætoriorum atque villarum omni ratione poſthabita, nihil tam efficere concupiſcebat quam quod poſſe effici negaretur. Et jactæ itaque moles infeſto ac profundo mari, exciſæ rupes duriſſimi ſilicis, & campi montibus aggere æquati, & complanata foſſuris montium juga, incredibili quidem celeritate, cum moræ culpa capite lueretur (121). i. e. "In the building of palaces and country-ſeats, he "had not the leaſt regard for reaſon, but wiſhed no-"thing more than to effect what was thought im-"practicable. High Fabricks were caſt into the "deep and raging ſea; rocks as hard as the hardeſt "flints were cut down; mountains made level with "the plains, and high hills built up in the fields; "all with an incredible ſpeed, for it was death not "to finiſh the work out of hand." And to add a modern inſtance to thoſe of antiquity, read the following paſſage, which relates to Monſieur Fouquet: Fouquetus . . . . . Lucullianis ſumptibus naturam poſſeſſor domuit, & contumaciam ſitus repugnantem in delicias ſuas manſueſcere coegit nullo læſo, niſi ſe & arca Regia (122). i. e. "Fouquet being immenſely rich, forced "nature herſelf at an expence, which Lucullus could "hardly have bore, and the ſituation of the place "not anſwering his deſign, he brought it to ſubmit "to his pleaſure, to no man's injury but his own, "and that of the King's Exchequer." I do not queſtion but Xenophon gave an orthodox ſenſe to the maxim he ſet down. He had made ſo good an uſe of his Profeſſor's (123) Lectures, that he was not capable to aſſert, that if God takes a delight in raiſing the little ones, and pulling down the great, it is only to divert himſelf, or to make a ſhew of his power. He believed, no doubt, that God did it only for the publick good of mankind, and conſequently Camerarius quoted him very impertinently in behalf of Herodotus, who was cenſured for charging God with a jealous temper, which was, according to him, the cauſe of the overturning of men's fortunes. Obſerve that it is no matter for the earth or for the rocks, whether they be in a vale, or in an elevated place: they are inſenſible bodies, all kinds of ſituations are equally good or indifferent to them. Water is neither more nor leſs happy, when it runs down in the channel of a river, than when it is made to ſpout out of a tube as high as the Sky. But the ruin of a King, the downfall of a Prime Miniſter, and ſuch other overthrowings of men's fortunes, overwhelm a very great number of perſons with grief. It would therefore be a leſs diſorder, to turn ſome parts of the earth topſy-turvy, only with a deſign to gratify one's fancy, or to make a ſhew of one's riches, than to ruin the great and mighty, with no other view than to divert one's ſelf, or to exert one's power. Whence you may infer that all they, who think judiciouſly, underſtand Xenophon's maxim in the ſenſe I have put upon it. They believe, no doubt, that the downfall of great men is an act of juſtice, in which the misfortune of ſome private perſons is balanced by the greater good which accrues to the publick.

The turn, which Valeſius gave to his vindication of Herodotus, is a little more ingenious than that of the other Apologiſts. See his Commentary on a paſſage, wherein Ammianus Marcellinus gives us the character of the Goddeſs Nemeſis. This Hiſtorian having mentioned the tragical end of ſome noted criminals, continues thus. Hæc & hujuſmodi quædam innumerabilia ultrix facinorum impiorum, bonorumque præmiatrix aliquoties operatur Adraſtia (atque utinam ſemper) quam vocabulo duplici etiam Nemeſim appellamus. . . Hæc ut regina cauſarum, & arbitra rerum ac diſceptatrix, urnam ſortium temperat, accidentium vices alternans; voluntatumque noſtrarum exorſa interdum alio, quàm quò contendebant, exitu terminans, multiplices actus permutando convolvit. Eademque neceſſitatis inſolubili retinaculo mortalitatis vinciens faſtus tumentes incaſſum, & incrementorum detrimentorumque momenta verſans, ut novit, nunc erectas montium cervices opprimit & enervat; nunc bonos ab imo ſuſcitans, ad bene vivendum extollit (124). i. e. "Theſe, and many ſuch other things, "does Adraſtia, who puniſhes the wicked, and re-"wards the good, ſometimes perform (would ſhe did "it always!) we call her alſo Nemeſis. . . . She, "as the Queen and Sovereign Judge and Diſpenſer "of all things, manages the urn of fate, making "men's fortunes to ebb and flow among them: "ſometimes ſhe directs the determination of our "will otherwiſe than we deſigned, and thus ſhe "brings many things ſucceſſively to paſs. She holds "alſo in her hand the undiſſolvible chain of neceſſity, "with which ſhe keeps under the vainly ſwelling "pride of mortal men, directing their happineſs, or "their miſery, according to her will and pleaſure, "now depreſſing and pulling down the exalted minds, "now raiſing the good from a low condition, and "encouraging them to the practice of virtue." You ſee here, that he ſuppoſes this Goddeſs preſides over the viciſſitudes of exaltation and humiliation, which are obſerved in the courſe of human affairs, and that it is ſhe who directs that game at ſee-ſaw, which I have mentioned ſomewhere (125), with regard to an anſwer of Æſop, which is much like Xenophon's maxim; but let us not forget to obſerve, that he ſuppoſes alſo, ſhe diſpenſes that alternate ſucceſſion with the utmoſt equity (126). Valeſius obſerves, 1. That ſhe is called Nemeſis, becauſe ſhe gives every one his due. 2. That Plato, in the 4th book of his Republic, ſtyles her the Meſſenger of Juſtice. 3. That Dio Chryſoſtomus, in his 64th oration, obſerves that Fortune, being conſidered as equitable, was called Nemeſis. Τὸ θεῖον τὸ ἴσον αὐτῆς Νέμεσις. Æquitas ejus (Fortunæ) Nemeſis dicta eſt. 4. That the antients aſcribed to God a certain power, which humbled the proud, and ruined all that was exalted. 5. That that power was called, either Envy Φθόνος, or Indignation Νέμεσις. 6. That there is a great affinity between Indignation or Nemeſis, and Envy, and that in the 2d book of Ariſtotle's Ethicks, Nemeſis, Indignation, is put between Envy, and the Vice which makes one rejoice at another's misfortune (127). 7. That this was the reaſon why Herodotus made Solon ſay, that all the Deities are envious, and Artabanus, that God is envious. Artabanus apud eundem Herodotum in lib. 7. iiſdem verbis alloquitur Xerxem: ὁ δὲ θεὸς γλυκὺν γεύσας τὸν αἰῶνα, φθονερὸς ἐν ἀυτῷ ἰδρίσκεται ἐών. At Deus qui ſuavi perfruitur ævo, invidus ipſe eſſe deprehenditur. Quæ quidem Herodoti verba immeritò reprehendit Plutarchus (128). 8. That Plutarch cenſured theſe words of Herodotus, without any reaſon (129); for if Nemeſis (Indignation) be aſcribed to God, why ſhould not Envy be alſo aſcribed to him? One of theſe vices is not meaner than the other among men: but when ſuch things are ſaid of God, they are ſuppoſed to be free from all defects, and one muſt put a favourable conſtruction upon them: otherwiſe, Plutarch himſelf would be proved guilty of the ſame

(120) Salluſt. de Bello Catilin. p. m. 28. See alſo p. 53. in Catiline's Oration. Quis mortalium, cui virile ingenium eſt, tolerare poteſt illis divitias ſuperare, quas profundant in exſtruendo mari, & montibus coæquandis, nobis rem familiarem etiam ad neceſſaria deeſſe? i. e. "Who, that "has a manly "heart, could "bear, that "they ſhould ſo "abound with "riches, as to "waſte them "away by build-"ing in the "very ſea, and "by levelling "mountains to "the ground, "whilſt we "want even the "neceſſaries of "life."

(121) Sueton. in Calig. cap. 37.

(122) Priolus, de Rebus Gallicis, lib. 9. cap. 2. p. m. 320, 321.

(123) Who was Socrates.

(124) Amm. Marcellin. lib. 14. cap. 11. p. m. 59, 60.

(125) Above, rem. [I] of the art. of the 1ſt ÆSOP.

(126) Jus quoddam ſublime numinis efficacis . . . ſubſtantialis tutela . . . quam Theologi veteres fingentes juſtitiæ filiam ex abdita quadam æternitate tradunt omnia deſpectare terrena. Amm. Marcellin. lib. 14. cap. 11. p. 59. i. e. "Some "ſuperior law "of a powerful "Deity . . . or "an effectual "protectrix . . . "whom the an-"cient Divines "feigned was "the daughter "of Juſtice, "from ſome "hidden eterni-"ty, and whom "they ſuppoſed "to take notice "of all things "upon earth."

(127) Ex Henrico Valeſio in Marcellin. p. 59.

(128) Valeſius, in Marcellin. p. 60. You will ſee towards the end of this rem. why I tranſcribe this paſſage.

(126) Obſerve, that Valeſius's diſcourſe is not methodical: for Plutarch does not cenſure Artabanus's words, but thoſe of Solon, which Valeſius quotes, before he tranſcribes Artabanus's words.

here an aphoriſm of Politicks [M]. Cimon's ſiſter ventured one day to cenſure Pericles's conduct, ſame ſin (of impiety), ſince he obſerved in the Life of Paulus Æmilius (130), Οὐδενὶ γὰρ δὲ τῶν ἀγαθῶν ἐπίφθονον, πλὴν εἴτι δαιμόνιον. . . &c (131); that is to ſay, according to Amyot's tranſlation. "Æmilius "was publickly commended, bleſſed and honoured "by all the world, and neither hated nor envied by "any honeſt man; unleſs there be ſome Deity, "whoſe proper office it be to thwart and leſſen al-"ways that happineſs, which ſeems too great and "exorbitant, and ſo to mingle the affairs of human "life, with a ſenſe of good and evil, that no man "be entirely free from misfortunes; but (as Homer "obſerves) they muſt be thought happy, to whom "fortune gave an equal ſhare of good and evil. "Which I obſerve, &c." You will meet with the reſt of this paſſage hereunder (132).

(130) Plut. in Paulo Æmilio, p. 273, F.

(131) Ex Valeſio, in Ammian. Marcellin. p. 59.

(123) After the quotation (135).

Let us make ſome obſervations on that apology of Herodotus, which Valeſius affords us. I obſerve in the 1ſt place, that all the heathen Authors, who aſcribe the functions of Nemeſis to the Deity, are not to blame: they who do it according to the notions we have ſeen in the paſſage from Ammianus Marcellinus, or according to that equality and equity mentioned by Dio Chryſoſtomus, aſcribe nothing to God, that is unworthy of him, or that wants to be freed from any moral imperfection. But there have been, I know not how many Poets, and Orators, and other perſons, who underſtood by Nemeſis, a peeviſh nature, whoſe greateſt delight was to ruin men's fortunes, and to ſpoil, by ſome croſs accidents, thoſe events which could give illuſtrious perſons the greateſt pleaſure. In that ſenſe, it were as impious to uſe the word Nemeſis, with regard to God, as to uſe the word φθόνος envy: ſo that Valeſius could not pretend to excuſe the latter by the former. I obſerve in the 2d place, that the chapter of Ariſtotle's Ethicks, to which he refers us, is nothing to his purpoſe. It is true, we find there, that there are three ſorts of Envy's, two in the extremities, and one in the middle. That which is in the middle, is called νέμεσις Nemeſis; it conſiſts in being ſorry that a man ſhould be happy, who does not deſerve it. The extremity by exceſs is called φθόνος, and conſiſts in being ſorry there ſhould be happy men; the extremity by defect is called ἐπιχαιρεκακία, and conſiſts in rejoicing at other people's misfortunes (133). This doctrine is not well grounded, and has been effectually refuted by the Commentator Euſtathius. He ſhews that a man, who rejoices at another's misfortune, is alſo ſorry for another's happineſs; and conſequently, that the paſſion called φθόνος, and the paſſion called ἐπιχαιρεκακία, belong both to the ſame perſon, and not the former to one, and the latter to another. They are not therefore two extremities, between which the paſſion called νέμεσις can be placed. But waving that controverſy, I ſhall only obſerve, that the popular ſtyle, which was uſed in matters relating to religion, did not admit of thoſe nice diſtinctions, which Ariſtotle made uſe of in treating of Ethicks, and which moſt part of the time are nothing but logical abſtractions. We ought not therefore to imagine, that the difference which that Philoſopher obſerved between νέμεσις Indignation, and φθόνος Envy, was the rule according to which the Goddeſs Nemeſis was thought to act by thoſe who dreaded her, and ſpoke of her conduct. Let us obſerve in the 3d place, that nothing could be more againſt the Apologiſt's deſign, than the uſe he pretended to make of Ariſtotle's Ethicks: for according to that Philoſopher, the word φθόνος ſignifies in general, the ſorrow occaſioned by another's proſperity; whether the happy perſon deſerve his happineſs or not. He who is ſubject to that paſſion is called φθονερὸς envious (134). He is worſe than him who is ſtyled νεμεσητικὸς, that is to ſay, who feels within his breaſt, what is called νέμεσις, the vexation occaſioned by the happineſs of the unworthy. Now it is certain, Herodotus gave God the epithet of φθονερὸς, and conſequently he is more to blame, according to Ariſtotle's doctrine, than if he had made uſe only of the word νέμεσις or νεμεσητικὸς. To quote the 2d book of Ariſtotle's Ethicks, is therefore affording proofs to Herodotus's accuſers, and not to his Apologiſts. Where then were Valeſius's thoughts? What was become of his wonted accuracy, ſince his deſign being to prove, that both φθόνος and νέμεσις, envy and indignation, are equally bad among men, he confirmed his opinion by that Philoſopher's doctrine? I maintain in the 4th place, that he was very much in the wrong to aſſert, that when envy, or ſuch other imperfections are aſcribed to God, they loſe their vicious quality, and muſt be favourably underſtood. This ought not to be extended to moral imperfections, or to that kind of defects which we judge to be inconſiſtent with the character of an honeſt man; ſuch are fraud, cruelty, perfidiouſneſs, and that kind of baſe envy, which cannot bear the proſperity of others, and makes a man perſecute all thoſe who excell. All the blaſphemies of the Poets, and all the impious doctrines on which the heathen religion was grounded, and which the fathers of the church have ſo effectually refuted, might be excuſed, if Valeſius's maxim were admitted: let us explode it therefore, and not ſpend our time in explaining Herodotus's expreſſions in a figurative ſenſe. Let us rather aſſert, that he took the word envy in an odious ſenſe. We ought to judge of this, as we do of the murmurs which the Heathens uttered againſt Heaven in their misfortunes. The evil they ſpoke of Fortune, the cruelty with which they charged the Gods, were not underſtood in a metaphorical ſenſe, but in a literal ſenſe. They intended to abuſe the Gods in words, juſt as they deſigned to abuſe them by their actions, when they ſtoned the temples; did the Romans purify the notion of cruelty, did they ſtrip it of ſomething vitious, when they murmured againſt Fortune at the time of Paulus Æmilius's triumph? Let us quote Plutarch's words, which follow immediately after thoſe we have tranſcribed above (135). They relate properly to the Goddeſs Nemeſis, or to that pretended divine property, which Herodotus called Envy. "This "I obſerve, becauſe Æmilius had four ſons, two "of whom were adopted into other families. . . . "the other two which he had by a ſecond wife, "and were yet but young, he brought up in his own "houſe. One of theſe died at fourteen years of age, "five days before his father's triumph: the other at "twelve, three days after: ſo that there was no "Roman without a deep ſenſe of his ſuffering, and "every one dreaded the cruelty of Fortune, that did "not ſcruple to bring ſo much ſorrow into a houſe "repleniſhed with happineſs, rejoicing, and ſacri-"fices, and to intermingle tears and complaints "with ſongs of victory and triumph." It is ſo true that the word Envy was taken in the moſt odious literal ſenſe, that there were ſome judicious men, who in order to oppoſe that impiety, ventured to aſſert plainly and expreſsly, that the Gods are not ſubject to that paſſion. We have mentioned above (130) the obſervation of a celebrated Platoniſt, and we meet in Stobæus with four lines of Phocylides, in which it is declared that there is no Envy among the Gods, ἄφθονοι ἁρανίδαι, &c. 5. I obſerve in the laſt place, that Plutarch cannot be guilty of the ſame fault with Herodotus, ſince he ſpeaks only doubtfully; he makes uſe of an if, and confines his obſervation to one certain God, whoſe particular commiſſion or office would be, to diſturb man's happineſs. Whereas Herodotus aſſerts, that all the Gods are jealous and turbulent. Let us infer from all this, that Valeſius's attempt to vindicate Herodotus, and to refute Plutarch's cenſure, did not prove very ſucceſsful.

(133) See Ariſtotle's Ethicks, b. 2. chap. 7. p. m. 19. and Andronicus's Paraphraſe, p. m. 410.

(134) Ὁ μὲν γὰρ νεμεσητικὸς, λυπεῖται ἐπὶ τοῖς ἀναξίως εὐπραγοῦσιν· ὁ δὲ φθονερὸς ὑπερβάλλων τοῦτο ἐπὶ πᾶσι λυπεῖται. He who is ſubject to indignation, grieves at the happineſs of thoſe who do not deſerve it: but the envious man, going farther, grieves at the happineſs of all whoever they be. Ariſtoteles, ubi ſupra.

He explains (137) a paſſage in Herodotus otherwiſe than I do. I give my Reader notice of it here, and I confeſs that his tranſlation is more literal than that of Laurence Valla, which I have followed (138). I ſcrupled a little to follow it; but conſidering on the one hand that Henry Stephens did not cenſure it, and on the other, that it made Herodotus argue more ingeniouſly, and more plainly, I preferred it before that which the learned Henry Valeſius followed. But I was perhaps in the wrong.

(135) After the Quotation (132).

(130) Quotat. (110), of the art. PAULICIANS.

(137) Above, Quotation (128).

(138) In the art. of ARTABANUS, ſon of Hyſtaſpes, quotation (7).

[M] Valerius Maximus's miſtake will afford us an opportunity to ſet down here an Aphoriſm of Politicks.] He obſerves, that Ariſtophanes, in one of his plays, brings Pericles in, coming from Hell, and decl r g, that conduct, and was well paid for it. The anſwer he made her ſhews that he had a great preſence of mind [N]. I have given the reader hopes that he would meet here with the Hiſto-that it is not proper to nurſe up a lion; but if he be nurſed up, and ſuffered to grow, he muſt be obeyed. Ariſtophanis quoque altioris eſt prudentiæ præceptum, qui in comœdia introduxit remiſſum ab inferis Athenienſem Periclem, vaticinantem, non oportere in urbe nutriri leonem; ſin autem ſit alitus, obſequi ei convenire. Monet enim, ut præcipuæ nobilitatis & concitati ingenii juvenes refrænentur. Nimio verò favore ac profuſa indulgentia paſti, quò minus potentiam obtineant, ne impediantur: quòd ſtultum ſit, & inutile, eas obtrectare vires, quas ipſe foveris (139). It is Æſchylus, and not Pericles, who ſays this in Ariſtophanes. Here follow that Poet's lines.

(139) Valer. Maxim. lib. 7. cap 2. num. 7. in Externis.

Οὐ χρὴ λέοντ' σκύμνον ἐν πόλει τρέφειν,
Μάλισθα δὲ λέοντα μὴ 'ν πόλει τρέφειν.
Ἢν δ' ἐκτραφῇ τις, τοῖς τρόποις ὑπηρετεῖν.

Catulum ne alas leonis in republica,
Ac maxime ipſum leonem ne alas ibi.
Quod ſi quis alitus; obſequendum moribus (140).

(140) Ariſtophanes, in Ranis, Act. 5. Sc. 4. p. m. 264.

This is Eraſmus's tranſlation: he obſerves, that Valerius Maximus quotes this paſſage (141), but he does not cenſure him for miſtaking Pericles for Æſchylus (142). He underſtood that ſentence better than Valerius Maximus did. The latter argues thus: ſince you raiſed a man, you ought to conſider his power as your own work: you would therefore be mad, if you endeavoured to deſtroy it; nay, you could not do it if you would. This is a wretched reaſoning. Nor was it ever the Poet's meaning. He meant, no doubt, that in order to avoid the misfortunes which ariſe from the oppoſition that is made to a power, which was ſuffered to become too great, it is better to give way to it, than to endeavour to refrain it. Admonet ænigma, theſe are Eraſmus's words (143), non eſſe fovendam potentiam quæ leges poſſet opprimere: quod ſi forte talis quiſpiam extiterit, non eſſe è rep. decertare cum illo, quem nequeas niſi magno reip. malo devincere. Tyrannus aut ferendus eſt, aut non recipiendus. Men commit a great fault in a Commonwealth, when they ſuffer a factious and enterprizing ſubject to get too great an authority: but it is a greater fault ſtill to oppoſe that man, after he was ſuffered to make himſelf Maſter. There are a thouſand grievances, which one ought to prevent, but when once they have got ground, it is often a leſſer evil to ſuffer them, than to attempt to redreſs them. They who undertake it, do almoſt always like Sylla, they uſe a remedy worſe than the diſtemper (144). An Hiſtorian obſerved very judiciouſly, that it were better to let the diſtempered and wounded Commonwealth alone, than to diſturb her by giving her remedies and attempting to dreſs her wounds. Expediebat quaſi ægræ ſauciæque Reipublicæ requieſcere quomodocunque, ne vulnera curatione ipſa reſcinderentur (145). I might quote an hundred things concerning the inconveniences of certain remedies, with which ſome perſons would cure publick evils: but this would look too much like a compilation of common-place topicks.

(141) Eraſm. Adag. 77. Chil. 2. Centur. 3. p. m. 451.

(142) Leopardus, Emendat. lib. 8. cap 12. and Pighius, Comment. in hunc locum Val. Maximi, cenſure Valerius Maximus for that blunder.

(143) Eraſ. Adag. 77. Chil. 2. Centur. 3. p. m. 451.

(144) Ingratus L. Sylla, qui patriam durioribus remediis quam pericula erant, ſanavit. Seneca, de Beneficiis, lib. 5. cap. 16.

(145) Florus, lib. 3. cap. 23. See Balzac's Letters to Chapelain, p. 106.

[N] Pericles's Anſwer to Cimon's ſiſter, ſhews that he had a great preſence of mind.] There was a great oppoſition between Pericles and Cimon, they being at the head of two different parties. The former got the better of the latter, and had him baniſhed (146). This was not the only advantage he gained: he contributed alſo to have Cimon recalled: this proof of his great credit, by which he did and undid things again, raiſed only the jealouſy of Cimon's family the higher: Pericles's victories added new ſtrength to that paſſion. So that Elpinice, Cimon's ſiſter, being diſpleaſed with the encomiums, which were beſtowed on Pericles's victories, had ſo little power over her anger, that ſhe could not forbear finding fault with his conqueſts; but he paid her off ſmartly, by repeating a line to her, the ſenſe of which was, do not paint, you are too old for it. But let us tranſcribe Plutarch's words according to Amyot's tranſlation (147). "Pericles therefore having conquered the city of Samos, returned to Athens, where he took care to have the remains of thoſe, who died in that war

(146) Plut. in Pericle, p. 156.

(147) Amyot, in his tranſlation of the Life of Pericles, p. 601, 602, of Vaſcoſan's edit. in 8vo.

"honourably buried, and he himſelf made a funeral "oration, as it is the cuſtom, in their commendation, "for which he was highly eſteemed and admired. "As he came down from the place, from which he "delivered his ſpeech, the other Ladies of the city "came and kiſſed his hands, and put garlands and "crowns on his head, as was uſually done to thoſe "who carried the prize at the publick games. But "Elpinice coming up to him, Theſe are indeed great "deeds you have done, ſaid ſhe, which deſerve crowns "and garlands, to have loſt us brave and worthy men, "not in a war againſt the Medes, or the Phœnicians, "and Barbarians, as my brother Cimon does, but by "deſtroying a city of our own country and nation, and in "alliance with us. To theſe words Pericles replied "gently with a ſmile this line from Archilochus.

"Old as you are, you ſhould no longer paint (148)."

(148) Ταῦτα τῆς Ἐλπινίκης λεγούσης, Περικλῆς μειδιάσας ἀπρέπεια, λέγεται τὸ τοῦ Ἀρχιλόχου πρὸς αὐτὴν εἰπεῖν, Οὐκ ἂν μύρρισι, γραῦς ἐὼν ἐπλάττου. Sic fata Elpinice, ſubriſit Pericles, & ſubmiſſe hoc ei reſpondit Archilochi, Quando anus es, ungi minus tibi convenit Plut. in Pericle, p. 167.

Could he ſay any thing more proper to mortify that Lady? There is another anſwer reported of Pericles, which is not ſo much to his honour. He was one of Cimon's accuſers in a capital affair. Elpinice came moſt humbly to make application to him, deſiring him not to prejudice her brother. You are too old, anſwered he, to ſucceed in a ſuit of this kind. Ἐλθούσης δὲ πρὸς αὐτὸν τῆς Ἐλπινίκης ὑπὲρ δορυάλου, μειδιάσας εἶπεν, Ὦ Ἐλπινίκη, γραῦς, εἰ, ὡς πράγματα τηλικαῦτα διάσειν. Elpinice coming to make humble application to him (in her brother's behalf) you are too old, ſaid he, with a ſmile, to undertake ſuch an affair as this is (149). Does not this ſignify, if your youth could make me think, that by granting me the uſe of your body, you would requite the favour I might do your brother, I would ſerve him: but you are not of an age to make me wiſh for that proof of your gratitude; therefore you have nothing to expect from me? One may anſwer two things in Pericles's behalf: the firſt, that he did not ſpeak ſeriouſly: the other, that he meant only the contempt, which other perſons, whom Elpinice might endeavour to prevail upon, would have for her old age. A young and beautiful Lady who ſolicits a buſineſs, will get a thouſand things, which the prayers of an old woman can never procure. Plutarch obſerves, that notwithſtanding that anſwer, Pericles was very remiſs in proſecuting the charge againſt Cimon, and did it only for form's ſake. Others ſay that he liked Elpinice very well, and enjoyed her as a reward for the ſervices he did her brother. The words, I ſhall quote, acquaint us, that that woman was not very ſcrupulous, for ſhe lay with her own brother. Καὶ Κίμωνος δ' Ἐλπινίκη τῇ ἀδελφῇ παρανόμως συνόντος, εἴθ' ὕστερον ἐκδιδόντος Καλλίᾳ τῷ Φυγαδευθέντι, μισθὸν ἴλαβε τῆς καθόδου αὐτὸ ὁ Περικλῆς τὸ τῇ Ἐλπινίκῃ μιχθῆναι. Cimon lying with his ſiſter Elpinice, which was againſt the laws, (he married her afterwards to Callias) and being condemned to baniſhment, Pericles procured his return, for which favour Elpinice ſuffered him to enjoy her (150). Not to mention her proſtituting herſelf to a painter (151). Obſerve, 1. That Athenæus ſuppoſes, on Antiſthenes's authority, that Elpinice prevailed with Pericles to conſent to her brother's return, by granting him the laſt favour (152). 2. That according to Plutarch, ſhe received from Pericles the unkind anſwer about her old age, when ſhe was making application to him to favour Cimon in a criminal cauſe, before the time mentioned by Athenæus (153). It is proper to take notice of this; for if Plutarch had mentioned an application made to Pericles after Cimon's return, we might have reaſons to think, that Pericles was favourable to him, only with a deſign to requite his ſiſter's kindneſs. This is the opinion, to which the anſwer recorded by Plutarch would lead us. Elpinice remembring that her courteſy to Pericles determined him to conſent that Cimon be called back from his baniſhment, would again have made application to him, to deſire him not to declare againſt her brother who was proſecuted in a criminal cauſe: But Pericles would have anſwered her to this purpoſe. Do not expect any thing from your application to me; you are not now the ſame you was, when the laſt favour you granted me, determined

(149) Idem, ibid. p. 157, F.

(150) Athen. lib. 13. p. 189, F.

(151) To Polygnotus. See Plut. in Cimone, p. 480.

(152) Athen. lib. 13. p. 589, F.

(153) Plut. in Pericle. p. 157, E. See alſo the ſame in Vita Cimonis, p. 487, where he quotes Steſimbrotus, a contemporary Hiſtorian.

Hiſtory of the famous ASPASIA [O], and I ſhall keep my promiſe. See the remark [O]. I ſhall mined me to do a kindneſs to your brother; you are now too old to requite my favours with yours. But, as I have already obſerved, Plutarch ſuppoſes that this anſwer was made before Cimon's baniſhment. However it be, Athenæus tells us, that our Pericles was very much inclined to love (154).

(154) Ἦν δὲ ὅτος ἀνὴρ πρὸς ἀφροδίσια πάνυ κατακεκμηκώς. Fuit quidem ille ad Venerem multum propenſus. Athen. lib. 13. p. 589, F.

[O] I have given the Reader hopes, that he would meet here with the hiſtory of . . . . ASPASIA.] This woman was of Miletus; ſhe followed the ſteps of Thargelia, who by her wit and beauty won the friendſhip of the chief men of Greece, who were in Ionia, and perſuaded them to ſupport the King of Perſia's intereſt (155). Aſpaſia was ſo learned, that Socrates himſelf uſed to viſit her, and take his friends to her houſe (156). Let us ſpeak more plainly, and obſerve that it was ſhe who taught him Rhetorick and Politicks. Ἀσπασία μέν τοι ἡ σοφὴ τῷ Σωκράτει διδάσκαλος τῶν ῥητορικῶν λόγων. Aſpaſia, a wiſe woman, who taught Socrates Rhetorick (157). Πλάτων ἐν τῷ Μενεξένῳ τὸν Σωκράτην παρ' αὐτῆς φησὶ μαθεῖν τὰ πολιτικά. Plato aſſerts in his Menexenus, that Socrates ſtudied Politicks under her (158). What is more wonderful ſtill is, that they who uſed to viſit her, took their wives along with them to her houſe, to hear her diſcourſes and lectures, though ſhe kept ſeveral courtezans at home. Τὰς γυναῖκας ἀκροασομένας εἰ συνήθεις ἦγον εἰς αὐτὴν, καίπερ ἐκ κοσμίου προεστώσαν ἐργασίας, οὐδὲ σιμνῆς ἀλλὰ παιδίσκας ἑταιρούσας τρέφουσαν. (They who uſed her company) would carry their wives along with them to her, to hear her diſcourſe, though her employment was not very decent and creditable, ſince ſhe educated young girls at home to proſtitute them (159). She was very well ſkilled in politicks, and Pericles was ſaid to adhere to her, becauſe ſhe underſtood the maxims of politicks admirably well. But there were alſo other cauſes of their intimacy. Love was one of them. Pericles did not care for his wife, and gave her up very willingly to another, after which he married Aſpaſia, and was paſſionately in love with her. The Hiſtorian (160) from whom I borrowed theſe particulars, relates, as a moſt remarkable proof of his love, a circumſtance which would at this time be looked upon as a moſt ridiculous proof. Pericles, ſays he, never went to the Senate, and never came back without ſaluting Aſpaſia with a kiſs. Αὐτὸς δὲ τὴν Ἀσπασίαν λαβὼν, ἔστεγξε διαφερόντως· καὶ γὰρ ἐξιὼν, ὡς φασι, καὶ εἰσιὼν ἀπ' ἀγορᾶς, ἠσπάζετο καθ' ἡμέραν αὐτὴν μετὰ τῆς καταφιλεῖν. Aſpaſiam uxorem duxit, quam mire dilexit, nam, ſive rediret à foro, ſalutabat ſemper eam oſculo (161). This Author did not perhaps take the true ſenſe of what he read upon that ſubject. I ſhould rather think, as it is hinted by the Author whom Athenæus (162) quotes, that Pericles uſed to viſit Aſpaſia twice a day, and that he kiſſed her when he came in, and when he went away. Which refers us to the time when he had not yet married her. It has been reported that he turned his wife out of doors, and that lodging with Aſpaſia, a Courtezan of Megara, he gave himſelf over to voluptuouſneſs, and ſpent a conſiderable part of his eſtate with that proſtitute (163). Περικλέα δὲ τὸν Ὀλύμπιον φησὶν Ἡρακλείδης ὁ Ποντικὸς ἐν τῷ περὶ ἡδονῆς, ὡς ἀπήλλαξεν ἐκ τῆς οἰκίας τὴν γυναῖκα, καὶ τὸν μεθ' ἡδονῆς βίον προείλετο, ᾧκει τε μετὰ Ἀσπασίας τῆς ἐκ Μεγάρων ἑταίρας, καὶ τὸ πολὺ μέρος τῆς οὐσίας εἰς ταύτην κατανάλωσε. Periclem Olympium Heraclides Ponticus ſcribit, libro de voluptate, exacta domo uxore voluptati ſe tradidiſſe, cum Aſpaſia ſcorto Megarico (164) habitaſſe, & magnam rei familiaris partem in eam dilapidaſſe. After Pericles's death ſhe kept company with a man of mean extraction, and raiſed him to the higheſt poſts in the Commonwealth (165). Which ſhews that her artful wit, and powerful eloquence, found nothing impoſſible. She muſt indeed have been well ſkilled in rhetorick, ſince ſeveral Athenians ſtudied that art under her. She gained ſo great a reputation, that Cyrus the younger gave the name of Aſpaſia to a miſtreſs whom he loved and eſteemed moſt particularly (166). Our Aſpaſia was the cauſe why the Republick of Athens attacked the Samians. They waged war with the Mileſians, on account of the city of Priene, to which both parties claimed a right. The Samians gained the victory. So that Aſpaſia, to ſerve her countrymen, deſired Pericles to perſuade the Athenians to declare againſt thoſe of Samos (167). It is alſo aſſerted, that ſhe was the cauſe of the war of Megara, which proved the beginning of the Peloponneſian war: and that ſhe was influenced by a very ſhameful motive. Some young Athenians having drank too freely, went to Megara, and carried away a famous proſtitute. The Megarians uſed repriſals, and took two Ladies of pleaſure belonging to Aſpaſia. This was the cauſe of her anger; this, they ſay, made her employ all her credit, to have the Megarians attacked, to which Pericles was of himſelf well enough inclined. Μεγαρεῖς δὲ . . . τὰς αἰτίας εἰς Ἀσπασίαν καὶ Περικλέα τρέπουσι, χρώμενοι τοῖς περιοίκοις καὶ δημόσιοι τούτοις ἐκ τῶν Ἀχαρνέων εἰσῳδίοις, Πόρνην δὲ Σίμαιθαν, ἰόντες Μεγάραθεν νεανίαι κλέπτουσι μεθυσοκότλατοι· καθ' οἱ Μεγαρεῖς ὀδύναις περφυσιγγωμένοι, ἀντεξέκλεψαν Ἀσπασίας πόρνα δύο. But the Megarians---- threw the whole blame on Aſpaſia and Pericles, quoting thoſe celebrated and commonly known lines out of Ariſtophanes's play, called Acharnes. " Some young men of " Athens, being fuddled, went to Megara, and ſtole " away a celebrated proſtitute, called Simætha. At " which the Megarians being exaſperated, came and " carried off two Ladies of pleaſure belonging to Aſ- " paſia (169)."

(155) Plut. in Pericle, p. 165.

(156) Idem, ib.

(157) Athen. lib. 5. p. 210. See alſo Lucian. de Saltatione, p. m. 923. Tom. 1.

(158) Harpocration, Voce Ἀσπασία.

(159) Plut. in Pericle, p. 165, C.

(160) Idem, ib.

(161) Idem, ib. D.

(162) Ἀντισθένης δὲ ὁ Σωκρατικὸς ἱστορῶν φησὶν αὐτὸν Ἀσπασίας, δὶς τῆς ἡμέρας εἰσιόντα καὶ ἐξιόντα ἀπ' αὐτῆς ἀσπάζεσθαι τὴν ἄνθρωπον. Antiſthenes Socraticus narrat amatorem illum Aſpaſiæ, bis quotidie ſalutaturum ad eam introire, exireque inde ſolitum. Athen. lib. 13. p. 589, E.

(163) Idem, lib. 10. p. 533.

(164) She was a Mileſian according to Plutarch; but Heraclides calls her perhaps a woman of Megara, becauſe ſhe had kept a bawdy houſe there before ſhe went to Athens.

(165) Plut. in Pericle, p. 165, D. See alſo Harpocration, Voce Ἀσπασία, and Valeſius's notes.

(166) See the rem. (C) of the art. CYRUS.

(167) Plut. in Pericle, pp. 165, 166, cle,

(168) Idem, p. 168, E.

Plutarch had done well to quote the two lines which follow theſe four; for they contain the concluſion which the Poet draws from that narration, and which is, that three harlots were the cauſe of the war which raged throughout all Greece (169).

Κἀντεῦθεν ἀρχὴ τῷ πολέμῳ κατερράγη
Ἕλλησι πᾶσιν, ἐκ τριῶν λαικασμάτων.
Hinc initium belli prorupit
Univerſis Græcis, ob tres meretriculas.

(169) Obſerve that Plutarch does not take this particular to be true. See the rem. [H] at the break, or à linea.

Athenæus, who has quoted theſe ſix lines from Ariſtophanes, had obſerved juſt before, that Aſpaſia's ſchool peopled the whole country with Ladies of pleaſure (170). Καὶ Ἀσπασία δὲ ἡ Σωκρατικὴ ἐπεπορεύσατο πλῆθη καλῶν γυναικῶν, καὶ ἐπλήθυνεν ἀπὸ τῶν ταύτης ἑταιρίδων ἡ Ἑλλὰς, ὡς καὶ ὁ χαρίεις Ἀριστοφάνης παρασημαίνεται λέγων τὸν Πελοποννησιακὸν πόλεμον, ὅτι Περικλῆς διὰ τὸν Ἀσπασίας ἔρωτα, καὶ τὰς ἁρπασθείσας ἀπ' αὐτῆς θεραπαίνας ὑπὸ Μεγαρέων, ἀνερρίπισε τὸ κατὰ Μεγαρέων ψήφισμα τὸ δεινὸν (171). Dalechamp tranſlates this Greek paſſage thus. Aſpaſia Socratica formoſas mulieres, & eas quidem multas, Athenis præbuit. Jam inde ſcortis abundavit Græcia, ut indicat facetus Ariſtophanes, Peloponneſiaci belli cauſſam explicans, nempe ob amorem Aſpaſiæ, & raptas à Megarenſibus ejus ancillas, Periclem decretum luctuoſum illud de bello Megarenſibus indicendo, velut ignem flabello, excitaſſe, & accendiſſe. i. e. " Aſpaſia, " the Socratic, afforded many beautiful women to " the Athenians; ſo that ſince her time Greece a- " bounded with Ladies of pleaſure, as the facetious " Ariſtophanes hints, where he mentions the cauſe of " the Peloponneſian war: namely, that for Aſpaſia's " ſake, and on account of her maids carried off by " the Megarians, Pericles made that ſad decree, by " which it was reſolved to declare war againſt thoſe " of Megara, as though he had been ſtirring and " blowing the fire." Let us not forget to mention the two crimes, with which the Comedian Hermippus charged Aſpaſia; they were not bare ſlanders of the ſtage or of the comic writers: for Hermippus ſet up for her proſecutor before the Judges, according to all the forms of the law: he charged her with impiety, and with inticing women to her houſe for Pericles's pleaſure (172). I do not know whether or not it was pretended ſhe play'd the bawd after Pericles had married her: in which caſe her ſecond crime would be as extraordinary as the firſt: for it is almoſt as uncommon to ſee a woman who is a bawd to her own huſband, as it is to ſee one, who has no religion. Whilſt the cauſe was depending, Pericles employed ſo many prayers and tears with the Judges, that he got Aſpaſia cleared. He had no hopes to meet with the ſame ſucceſs with regard to Anaxagoras, who was alſo then charged with impiety, becauſe he accounted for the meteors by natural cauſes (173): he obliged him to retire from Athens, to eſcape the danger he was in. Ἀσπασίαν μὲν οὖν ἐξητήσατο πολλὰ πάνυ παρὰ τὴν

(170) Athen. lib 13. p. 570.

(171) Idem, ib. p. 569, 570.

(172) Ἀσπασία δίκην ἔφευγεν ἀσεβείας, Ἑρμίππου τοῦ κωμῳδοποιοῦ διώκοντος, καὶ προσκατηγοροῦντος αὐτῇ Περικλεῖ γυναῖκας ἐλευθέρας εἰς τὸ αὐτὸ φοιτώσας ὑποδέχεσθαι. Aſpaſia violatæ religionis eſt rea facta, accuſatore comœdiarum ſcriptore Hermippo: objecit præterea eam liberas fœminas, quibus illudebat Pericles, recipere. Plut. p. 169, D.

(173) Ψήφισμα Διοπείθης ἔγραψεν, εἰσαγγέλλεσθαι τοὺς τὰ θεῖα μὴ νομίζοντας, ἢ λόγους περὶ τῶν μετεώρων διδάσκοντας· ἀπειρηκότος εἰς Περικλέα δὶ' Ἀναξαγόρου τὴν ὑπόνοιαν. Rogationem tulit Diopithes, nomina ut deferrentur eorum qui eſſe deos negarent, aut qui ſermones de rebus æthereis ſererent, ea ſuſpicione perſtringens Anaxagoræ cauſa Periclem. Idem, ib.

I ſhall alſo make a collection of ſome errors relating to that woman [P]; nor ſhall I forget τὴν δίκην, ὡς Αἰσχίνης φησὶν, ἀφεὶς ὑπὲρ αὐτῆς δάκρυα, καὶ δεηθεὶς τῶν δικαστῶν. Ἀναξαγόραν δὲ, φοβηθεὶς, ἐξέπεμψε καὶ προὔπεμψεν ἐκ τῆς πόλεως. Pericles got Aſpaſia off by his prayers, for he ſhed a great many tears for her, whilſt the cauſe was pleading, as Æſchines writes, and thereby he prevailed upon the Judges to acquit her. But fearing for Anaxagoras, he ſent him out of the city (174).

(174) Idem, ib. E.

Athenæus quotes another Author, who relates the ſame particular, and who obſerves alſo, that Pericles ſhed fewer tears when his own life was in danger, than he did when Aſpaſia was in danger of her life. Καὶ φευγούσης πολὺ αὐτῆς γραφὴν ἀσεβείας, λίγων ὑπὲρ αὐτῆς, πλείονα ἐδάκρυσεν, ἢ ὅτε ὑπὲρ τοῦ βίου καὶ τῆς οὐσίας ἐκινδύνευσεν. Et cùm impietatis accuſata fuiſſet, orationem pro illa habuiſſe, effuſiùs lacrymantem, quàm cùm vitæ ac fortunarum periculum adiiſſet (175). Monſieur le Fevre, in his lives of the Greek Poets, page 81, wraps up the charge brought in againſt Aſpaſia, under ſuch expreſſions, as every one cannot underſtand. Aſpaſia, ſays he, ... deſerves that honour very well, ſince ſhe was the miſtreſs of a man, who was maſter of all Attica, and of all the iſles in the Ægæan ſea: ſince ſhe was the Juno of the Olympian Pericles: ſince ſhe wrote poems and orations: and ſince, laſtly, ſhe underſtood rhetorick as well as Prodicus and Gorgias the great Cymbaliſt of Greece. But ſhe knew ſomething elſe beſides, which I would never mention to you, were I not determined to give you ſome account of HERMIPPUS, the comic Poet, who lived at the ſame time with her. This Hermippus . . . . . wrote ſome verſes againſt Pericles, and charged even Aſpaſia with following a certain trade, which Pericles did not diſlike. What trade? This puzzles me. Let us ſee however, whether we cannot explain that obſcene ſubject with chaſte expreſſions. Let us obſerve, Sir, that ſhe did for Pericles, what Livia did for Auguſtus, when he was out of taſte, and the nights ſeemed too long to him. What Monſieur le Fevre obſerves of Livia, is to be met with in Suetonius's Life of Auguſtus, chapter 71. Circa libidines hæſit, poſtea quoque ut ferunt, ad virgines promptior, quæ ſibi undique ETIAM AB UXORE conquirerentur. i. e. "At firſt "he did not ſeem to be much inclined to luſt; but "afterwards, as it is reported, he was more diſpo- "ſed to abuſe virgins, whom his own wife procured "him from every place." Amyot has given us, with great frankneſs, the full ſenſe of Plutarch's words: I ſhall tranſcribe the whole paſſage, that the Reader may know the whole crime with which Aſpaſia was charged: you will ſee that ſhe debauched, not ſlaves, or ſtrangers, but the noble Ladies of Athens. About that time Aſpaſia was alſo charged with diſbelieving the Gods; her accuſer was Hermippus, a writer of comedies, who charged her alſo with being a bawd to Pericles, and receiving into her houſe citizen's wives, whom Pericles enjoyed. Diopithes propoſed at the ſame time a decree, that information ſhould be made againſt thoſe unbelievers, who gave no credit to things divine, and taught a new doctrine concerning meteors and other appearances in the ſky; thus ſtriking at Pericles through Anaxagoras's ſide (176). See the remark [C].

(175) Athenæus, lib. 13. p. 589, ex Antiſthene Socratico.

(176) Amyot, in his tranſlation of the Life of Pericles, p. m. 608.

[P] Some errors relating to Aſpaſia.] Quintilian is miſtaken, where he mentions the queſtions, which were put to Xenophon's wife. She was aſked; If your neighbour's gold were better than yours, which would you like beſt, your own or hers? She anſwered, hers. If her clothes and jewels were richer than yours, would you not like hers better than your own? She replied, yes. But if her huſband were better than yours, would you like him better than your own? This queſtion made her quite aſhamed, and ſhe returned no anſwer. Cicero relates this (177); and obſerves expreſsly, that Aſpaſia put thoſe queſtions to Xenophon's wife. But Quintilian aſſerts that they were put to Aſpaſia, Xenophon's wife. Ut apud Æſchinem Socraticum male reſpondit Aſpaſia Xenophontis uxor: quod Cicero his verbis tranſfert (178). i. e. "As in Æſchines the Socratic's "work, Aſpaſia, Xenophon's wife, anſwers wrong; "which Cicero tranſlates thus." Voſſius criticiſed that blunder, and was miſtaken in his turn (179); for he imagined that Quintilian ſuppoſed there had been two Aſpaſia's (180). His blunder does not conſiſt herein, but in his thinking that the Aſpaſia mentioned in Cicero's book, was Xenophon's wife. Monſieur Colomiés has criticiſed that miſtake of Quintilian (181), and obſerved that Bruſonius followed it (182). I cannot think that this blunder is owing to any thing, but to the Tranſcriber. I believe that Quintilian wrote apud Æſchinem Socraticum male reſpondit Aſpaſiæ Xenophontis uxor. i. e. "In Æſchines "the Socratic's work, Xenophon's wife made a "wrong anſwer to Aſpaſia." Some almoſt half-learned Tranſcriber ſhall have taken it into his head, that we muſt read Aſpaſia, and imagined, that Quintilian gave us the proper name of Xenophon's wife. Obſerve, that when Aſpaſia, by her captious queſtion, had reduced the woman ſo far, that ſhe did not dare to anſwer, ſhe applied herſelf to the huſband, put the ſame queſtions to him, and made him bluſh at the third, reducing him alſo to have nothing to reply, after which ſhe gave them both a very judicous leſſon (183). The learned Leopardus did not know that Quintilian's book, ſuch as it is at preſent, occaſioned Bruſonius's blunder; he cenſures only that modern writer. Idem Bruſonius, ſays he (184), eodem capite: Aſpaſia, inquit, Xenophontis uxor quum eſſet (ut muliebre ingenium eſt) rerum alienarum appetens atque invida, interrogata, ſi vicina tua, &c. i. e. "The ſame Bruſonius in the ſame chapter, "ſays, that Aſpaſia, Xenophon's wife, being cove- "tous of other people's goods, and envious (as it is "the character of the women) was aſked, if your "neighbour's wife, &c." Here is a fault, which Leopardus did not cenſure. Bruſonius, upon no other authority but his own, ſuppoſes that Aſpaſia, Xenophon's wife, was covetous and envious. Where did he meet with that particular? Is it lawful to invent ſuch things? And to what purpoſe is his Parentheſis? Let me obſerve, that I communicated my correction of Quintilian's paſſage to a learned Humaniſt, who approved it, and ſhewed me a few days after in his edition of Quintilian Variorum, that Turnebius had already corrected the paſſage after the ſame manner.

(177) Cicero, de Inventione, lib. 1. folio m. 30, A.

(178) Quintil. lib. 5. cap. 11. p. m. 243.

(179) Voſſius, Inſtitut. Orator. lib. 3. cap. 5. p. m. 406.

(180) Quintiliani lapſus in duabus Aſpaſiis. Id. ibid. in Indice rerum & verborum.

(181) Falſus eſt Fabius, quique eum ſecutus eſt Bruſonius in Apophthegm. Colomeſius, Notis ad Quinctil. p. m. 224. Opuſculor.

(182) Here follow all that Author's titles. L. Domitius Bruſonius, Contorſinus, Lucanus. He has made a collection of Apophthegms, with this title, Septem Facetiarum Libri.

(183) See Cicero, de Inventione, lib. 1. folio 30, A.

(184) Leopardus, Emendat. lib. 12. cap. 13.

Suidas aſſerts erroneouſly that Pericles had two ſons by Aſpaſia, Xanthippus and Pericles: he had them by his other wife.

Lloyd robbed our Aſpaſia of a paſſage in Xenophon, which might have made her very proud: Lloyd, I ſay, who tells us that another Aſpaſia, wife to Cleobulus, is meant there. He is plainly miſtaken: for in the firſt place, the name of Xenophon's Dialogiſt is not Cleobulus, but Critobulus: in the ſecond place, Socrates, who is the other Dialogiſt, does not ſpeak of Critobulus's wife, but of Aſpaſia the Rhetorician, the learned woman: he aſſerts that ſhe would give Critobulus better precepts, than he, Socrates, could do. Συσήσω δέ σοι ἐγὼ καὶ Ἀσπασίαν ἢ ἐπιστημονέστερον ἐμοῦ σοὶ ταῦτα πάντα ἐπιδείξει. Ego tibi exempli cauſa Aſpaſiam conſtituam, quæ doctius hæc omnia quam ego tibi monſtrabit (185).

(185) Xenophon, in Oeconomico, p. m. 482.

A Commentator of Minutius Felix is not accurate in the words I ſhall ſet down here. De Pythagora referunt Diogenes Laërtius, Lib. VIII. & Lucianus in Gallo eum dixiſſe ſe primum fuiſſe Æthalidem Mercurii filium, inde Euphorbum Panthi filium, mox Aſpaſiam nobile Periclis ſcortum, deinde Cratem Cynicum (186). i. e. "Diogenes Laertius in his 8th book, and Lu- "cian in his Cock, relate, that Pythagoras ſaid he "was firſt Æthalides Mercurius's ſon, then Euphor- "bus Panthus's ſon, afterwards Aſpaſia Pericles's "whore, and then Crates the Cynick." Here then are three ſucceſſive removals of Pythagoras; he paſſed from Æthalides's body into that of Eupherbus, then into Aſpaſia's, and laſtly into Crates's. If the Commentator were accurate, we ſhould meet with this entire liſt both in Diogenes Laertius, and in Lucian: but we find but a part of it in one, and the reſt in the other. This is a bad way of quoting, which I reckon for the firſt miſtake of that Author. The ſecond is his giving us Diogenes Laertius's account erroneouſly; for that Author tells us Pythagoras boaſted he had been ſucceſſively Æthalides, Euphorbus, Hermotimus, Pyrrhus, Pythagoras. 3. He does not give us Lucian's account more accurately: for if he had tranſcribed it exactly, he would have ſaid that Pythagoras's ſoul was firſt in the body of Euphorbus, then in that of Pythagoras, then in Aſpaſia's, then in (186) Ouzellus, in Minutium Felicem, p. 325, edit. 1672, in 8vo.

I forget Moreri's blunders [Q], nor thoſe of his Continuator, nor thoſe of another French in Crates's; afterwards in that of a King, &c. and laſtly in that of a Cock. 4. To act reaſonably and with judgment he ought not to have quoted upon this ſubject an Author, who only banters, and takes a Century poſterior to Pythagoras: he ſhould have quoted thoſe only, who relate what Pythagoras uſed to ſay himſelf, when he mentioned how far he had been concerned in thoſe tranſmigrations of the Soul.

Moreri's blunders are not very numerous: I ſhall cenſure him with regard to one particular only, which is his aſſerting that Aſpaſia was very well ſkilled in Philoſophy, and in Eloquence, and chiefly in Poetry. I do not pretend to deny that woman's knowledge in Philoſophy, nor her eloquence: it is not in that reſpect I ſet up for a cenſurer of Moreri. I obſerve only that he was in the wrong to aſſert, that Poetry was the ſcience in which ſhe chiefly excelled. This is ſo falſe that there are good reaſons to queſtion whether ſhe ever wrote verſes. Athenæus is I think the only Author who might be quoted, if one would maintain that ſhe underſtood Poetry; but that Writer's authority is very weak in this reſpect: for he ſays only, that there were ſome lines, which were aſcribed to Aſpaſia (187), and publiſhed by Herodotus. To give an exact account of what ſhe excelled in, we muſt confine ourſelves to Rhetorick: herein lay her greateſt ſtrength. Pericles did not ſcruple to deliver the orations, which ſhe compoſed (188). She underſtood Politicks better than ſhe did Philoſophy, and ſince Pericles conſulted her about the art of Government, we ought not to wonder that ſome other great Politicians ſhould make a great account of a woman's advice. I have obſerved above that ſhe taught Socrates that ſcience.

[Q] Moreri's blunders.] I. I queſtion very much, whether the maſters who taught Pericles Philoſophy, were jealous of the univerſal knowledge he acquired in that ſcience. None of the three Authors, whom Moreri quotes (189), mention any thing of this. I have not met with that particular in any antient Author; yet I dare not aſſert that Moreri invented it. I obſerve only that his conſtant practice of quoting nothing but in a very general manner prevents me from calling many particulars downright falſities, and determines me to propoſe only a doubt. II. Since Plutarch aſſerts only that Pericles gained a victory over the Sicyonians at Nemea (190), why does Moreri ſay near the great River * Nemea? III. However it be, that river is not conſiderable enough to be called a great River (un Fleuve). The following errors are in the Supplement. IV. Pericles did not fortify the Iſthmus of Corinth with a ſtrong wall. The Author of the Supplement has taken two things for one and the ſame, though they differ widely. Pericles cauſed to be built at Athens what was called the long wall (191). But to fortify the Iſthmus of Corinth was the buſineſs of the Peloponneſians rather than of the Athenians. V. Plutarch and Herodotus are not quoted to any good purpoſe. The latter does not mention either Pericles's apophthegms or his actions; and the other relates but a part of the particulars, which are rehearſed in the Supplement. The witty ſaying, amicus uſque ad aras, friends as far as conſcience permits, not being to be met with in the life of Pericles, it had been proper to quote the book where Plutarch mentions it (192). The article of Pericles's ſon is a very indifferent one. One cannot read it without imagining, that that man was the Commander in chief of the Athenian Fleet, which beat that of the Lacedæmonians near the iſlands, called Arginuſæ. He did wonders in that expedition, as we are told, and burnt the enemy's fleet. Thus an Author would have expreſſed himſelf, had he ſpoke of a man who was the only Commander. We had been told juſt before, that the Athenians choſe him to take Alcibiades's place; this is ſtill more capable to miſlead thoſe, who knew that Alcibiades was Captain General of the Athenians (193). The truth of the matter is, that they appointed ten Generals in Alcibiades's room, and that Pericles was one of theſe ten (194). Xenophon aſſerts it very poſitively, and he does not ſay that the Lacedæmonian Fleet was burnt, but only that it was beat, and that it retired, having loſt threeſcore and ten ſhips (195). Obſerve that it was not Pericles but Thraſybulus who commanded on the day the battle was fought (196): if it be objected, that it appears from this very Supplement to Moreri, that Pericles had Collegues, ſince we read there that he was condemned to be beheaded with the ſeven other Captains of the army; I anſwer that my cenſure is nevertheleſs well grounded. An Author, who contradicts himſelf by uſing inconſiſtent phraſes, does not well relate a ſtory; he only perplexes and miſleads his Reader. Here is another blunder. Suppoſe the laſt phraſe had undeceived the reader, who might otherwiſe have thought that Pericles was Commander in Chief, will not that ſame phraſe make him think that there were but eight Commanders in that Fleet? He will then be miſtaken, for there were ten of them. It is true there were but eight ſentenced to death: the Author of the Supplement ought therefore to have expreſſed himſelf thus, he was condemned with ſeven other, and not with the ſeven other Commanders. Xenophon obſerves that there were but ſix of them put to death, the other two being abſent (197). He or Diodorus Siculus ſhould have been quoted in the Supplement, and not Plutarch, who mentioned Pericles's ſon but occaſionally (198), and without giving a particular account of the cauſes of his puniſhment. They were ſo unjuſt, that there never was perhaps any thing ſo abominable done under the moſt abſolute Monarchs. Six Generals were put to death, who had gained the moſt glorious victory, which the Greeks ever won over thoſe of their own nation, and who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves on ſeveral other occaſions; they were put to death, I ſay, becauſe they had not buried thoſe who were killed in the battle; nor was there any regard had for what they urged in their own defence, which was, that they to whoſe care the burial was committed, were prevented by a great ſtorm from executing their commiſſion (199). Socrates, one of the judges of theſe Generals, oppoſed that unjuſt ſentence as much as lay in his power; but no account was made of his arguments (200). The manner, in which theſe brave men died, was very proper to make that piece of injuſtice more execrable ſtill. Diomedon ſpoke for them all: and inſtead of imprecations or complaints, inſtead of repreſenting their great ſervices, which were ſo ill rewarded, he wiſhed only that their death and puniſhment might prove fortunate to their country, and deſired the aſſembly to accompliſh the vows they had made to get the victory. Τὰ μὲν περὶ ἡμῶν κυρωθέντα συνενέγκαι τῇ πόλει· τὰς δὲ ὑπὲρ τῆς νίκης εὐχὰς ἐπισωθῆναι ἡ τύχη κεκώλυκεν ἡμᾶς ἀποδῶναι, καλῶς ἔχον ὑμᾶς φρονῆσαι, καὶ τῷ Διὶ τῷ σωτῆρι καὶ Ἀπόλλωνι καὶ ταῖς σεμναῖς θεαῖς ἀπόδοῦναι· τοῦτοις γὰρ εὐξαμένοι, τοὺς πολεμίους καλῶναυμαχήσαμεν. Quod in capita noſtra jam decretum eſt, id fauſtum ac felix civitati huic eveniat. At vota pro victoriâ Diis nuncupata, quia fortuna reddere nos prohibuit, vos accurare pium & honeſtum eſt. Jovi igitur ſervatori & Apollini & venerandis Deabus illa perſolvitote. Horum enim numine invocato hoſtes profligavimus (201). The Hiſtorian, from whom I borrow theſe words, adds a reflection to them on the furious madneſs, which made the people commit that injuſtice; the people, I ſay, who were exaſperated by their Orators. Οὕτω δὲ ὁ δῆμος τότε παρεφρόνησε, καὶ παροξυνθεὶς ἀδίκως ὑπὸ τῶν δημαγωγῶν, τὴν ὀργὴν ἐπέσκηψεν εἰς ἄνδρας οὐ τιμωρίας ἀλλὰ πολλῶν ἐπαίνων καὶ στεφάνων ἀξίους. Thus did the people rage, being ſo exaſperated by their Orators, againſt all right and reaſon, that they vented their fury on theſe men, who not only deſerved no puniſhment, but who merited all ſorts of praiſes, and the moſt glorious crowns (102). But muſt ſuch men be ſtyled Orators? Has not an Orator been deſcribed under the character of an honeſt man, who underſtands the art of ſpeaking, Vir bonus dicendi peritus (103)? We ought not therefore to give the name of an Orator, or of a Preacher, to a factious, ſeditious, and wicked man, who makes an ill uſe of his eloquence and of the ſtrength of his lungs, to ſtir up the people to violent proceedings. We have obſerved in another place (204), that Thomas Hobbes having a mind to inſpire the Engliſh with a diſguſt of the Republican Government, undertook a tranſlation of Thucydides. This was a good thought enough; but he had done better ſtill, if he had compoſed a work of the

(187) Ἐντοῖς φερομένοις ὡς αὐτῆς εἶναι ἀπὸ Ἡρόδικος ὁ Κρατήτιος παρέθηκε. In carminibus ipſi attributis, & ab Herodico Cratetio publicatis. Athen. lib. 5. p. 219. Gyraldus de Poetis Græcis, p. 170. edit. 1696. aſſerts that Athenæus mentions ſome poems of Aſpaſia in other paſſages, which he, Gyraldus, does not quote. I have not time now to examine whether this be true or not.

(188) Plato, in Menexeno, p. m. 517.

(189) Plutarch, in his Life, Diodorus Siculus, lib. 12. Thucydides, lib. 1, 2, & ſeq.

(190) Ἐν δὲ Νεμέᾳ, apud Nemeam. Plut. in Pericle, p. 163, D.

* Le Fleuve.

(191) Μακρὸν τεῖχος, longum murum. Idem, ibid. p. 160, init.

(192) It is the treatiſe de vitioſo Pudore, p. m. 531. See alſo Aulus Gellius, lib. 1. cap. 3.

(193) See Plutarch, in the Life of Alcibiades, p. 210.

(194) See Xenophon, lib. 1. de Geſtis Græcorum, p. m. 259. See alſo Diodor. Siculus, lib. 13. cap 100.

(195) Xenophon, ibid. p. 262.

(196) Diodor. Siculus, lib. 13. cap. 97.

(197) Xenophon, lib. 1. de Geſtis Græcor. p. 265.

(198) Plut. in Vita Periclis, ſub fin. p. 172.

(199) See Xenophon, de Geſtis Græcorum, lib. 1. p. 263.

(200) See the Life of Socrates, written in French by Monſieur Charpentier, p. m. 168, &c.

(201) Diodor. Siculus, lib. 13. cap. 102. p. m. 533. it is p. 221, of the Greek and Latin edition, printed in the year 1604, in folio.

(102) Idem, ib.

(103) See Quintilian, lib. 12. cap. 1. p. m. 552.

(234) Above, in the article of HOBBES, in the Text, towards the beginning.

French Writer concerning Pericles [R]. This will give me an opportunity to make the reader take notice of the injuſtice and diſorders, which often prevailed at Athens under the Republican Government [S].

The

the domeſtick affairs of the Athenians. The hiſtory we have of that people is fit almoſt only to miſlead us. It ſtrikes us, becauſe it is ſet off to the beſt advantage; we are dazzled by the battles of Marathon, and of Salamine; by their armies by land and by ſea; by their conqueſts; by the riches of their citizens; by the pomp of their publick ſhows; by the ſtateline ſs of their publick buildings. All this makes us think that it is ſlavery to live under any other form of Government. But if we were to read an Hiſtory, in which all theſe things were but ſlightly touched upon, but which contained a particular account of their tumultuous aſſemblies; of the factions which divided that ſtate; of the ſeditions which ſhaked it; of the moſt illuſtrious ſubjects, who were perſecuted, baniſhed (205), or capitally puniſhed, at the mere fancy of a violent declaimer, we ſhould be perſuaded that that nation, who boaſted ſo much of her liberty, was really a ſlave to a ſmall party of men, whom they ſtyled Demagogues, and who led the people ſometimes one way, ſometimes another, according as they were ſwayed by their private paſſions, juſt as the waves roll now one way, and then another as the wind moves them (206). You would in vain look into Macedonia, which was a monarchy, for ſo many inſtances of tyranny as the hiſtory of Athens affords. But this is enough, or perhaps too much: the digreſſion is ſomewhat long. See the remark [S].

(205) Hos libros tum ſcripſiſſe dicitur (Thucydides) quum à Rep. remotus, atque id quod optimo cuique Athenis accidere ſolitum eſt, in exilium pulſus eſſet. Cicero, de Oratore, lib. 2. folio 73, D. i. e. "It is "ſaid Thucydides wrote "theſe books "when he was "removed from "publick buſineſs, and baniſhed; which "was the cuſtomary fate "of every good "and honeſt "man at Athens."

(206) Compare this, with what is obſerved above, quotation (75) of the article EDWARD IV.

[R] The blunders of another French Writer concerning Pericles.] He has not prefixed his name to his work, which is a book printed at Paris in two volumes in 12mo, in the year 1669, entitled, Hiſtoire generale de la Grece, i. e. "A general Hiſtory of "Greece." We find there, that Phidias was charged with having by him ſeveral ſums of ſacred money, which were given him by Pericles (207). That the Athenians accuſed Pericles of that ſacrilege, and charged his tutor Anaxagoras with being concerned in the ſame crime, and with having thus taught his pupil (208). That Author did not well underſtand the Writer from whom he tranſcribed; for here follows what we read in Diodorus Siculus. Phidias was charged with embezzling a large ſum of money, to which Pericles was privy, who had ordered him to make a ſtatue of Minerva. Whereupon Pericles's enemies perſuaded the people to put Phidias in priſon, and to bring in an information againſt Pericles for ſuch a ſacrilege. They charged alſo Anaxagoras with impious doctrines, and involved Pericles in the ſame accuſation (209). One cannot deny but that an Hiſtorian who relates theſe particulars as the modern Author does, falſifies and miſrepreſents them conſiderably. Some pages lower he obſerves, that Pericles having delivered the funeral Oration, which is to be met with in the ſecond book of Thucydides . . . . . was loaded with kindneſs and careſſes by the Athenian Ladies, who took him round the waiſt as he came down from the pulpit, kiſſed his hands, and crowned his head with flowers, as though he came triumphant from the Olympick Games (210). This is miſtaking the times: the Oration of Pericles mentioned by Thucydides was delivered in commendation of thoſe who were killed in the beginning of the Peloponneſian War. But at that time the Ladies ſhewed no kindneſs to the Orator. If our modern Writer had carefully examined Plutarch whom he quotes, he would have known that Pericles was careſſed by the Ladies after the funeral Oration delivered to the honour of thoſe who died in the war againſt Samos (211). There paſſed about ten years between theſe two Orations (212). Let us take notice of another miſtake of that Author. Having related what happened in the two firſt Campaigns of the Peloponneſian War, he obſerves that Pericles being angry with the people for their reproaches, harangued the Council of Athens, and repreſented many things, which did not make a very deep impreſſion on the people's mind (213), ſince that great man was fined (214). But, adds the Hiſtorian (215), he was again elected General of the army of Athens, which honour he did not enjoy long, ſince he died a year and an half after. He muſt therefore have lived till the fifth year of the Peloponneſian War; and yet, according to Thucydides, who was very well acquainted with this (216), he died two years and an half after the beginning of that war. If that general Hiſtory of Greece was thus carefully examined throughout, I imagine we ſhould meet every where with ſuch blunders.

(207) Hiſt. generale de la Grece, Tom. 2. p. 390.

(208) Ibid. p. 391.

(209) Diodor. Siculus, lib. 12. cap. 39.

(210) Hiſt. generale de la Grece, Tome 2. p. 409.

(211) See the remark [N] quotation (147).

(212) The Samian war was carried on in the 84th Olympiad, and the Peloponneſian war began in the 87th Olympiad.

(213) Hiſt. generale de la Grece, Tom. 2. p. 413.

(214) Ibid. p. 415.

(215) Ibid. p. 416.

(216) Thucydides, lib. 2. p. m. 118.

[S] The injuſtices and diſorders which often prevailed among the Athenians.] See in the remark [Q] what I have obſerved upon this by way of digreſſion. I would add nothing to it, did I not know, that ſome perſons diſliked that digreſſion, and even aſſerted that I was the only perſon who ever made ſuch an obſervation. I muſt then ſhew them that they have not read much, and that the authorities that might be quoted are not much more favourable to them, than right reaſon. I ſay, reaſon, for can we have a good opinion of a Government in which the oppoſite factions of declaimers were a neceſſary evil? Ὁ μὲν οὖν Μελάνθιος εἴτε παίζων εἴτε σπουδάζων, ἔλεγε διασώζεσθαι τὴν Ἀθηναίων πόλιν ὑπὸ τῆς τῶν ῥητόρων διχοστασίας καὶ ταραχῆς. οὐ γὰρ ἀποκλίνειν ἅπαντας εἰς τὸν αὐτὸν τοῖχον, ἀλλὰ γίνεσθαί τινα τῇ βλάπτοντι ἀνθιλκὴν ἐν τῇ διαφορᾷ τῶν πολιτευομένων. Melanthius obſerves indeed, either out of joke, or ſeriouſly, that the Republick of Athens was preſerved from ruin by the oppoſite factions and ſeditions of her Orators. All did not run againſt the ſame wall; but there was in the oppoſition of intereſt among thoſe who governed, ſomething which prevented the downfal of the whole State (217). Pray, compare together two paſſages in Ariſtotle, that in which he deſcribes the diſorders of Democracies, and that in which he obſerves how a democratical Government came to be eſtabliſhed at Athens. Compare theſe two paſſages, and you will find, that he muſt have looked upon the Government eſtabliſhed at Athens after the victories gained over the Perſians, as a downright tyranny. He obſerves, that ſince Solon put the whole authority into the hands of Judges choſen by the people, men began to flatter the people, as they uſe to flatter tyrants; that Ephialtes and Pericles leſſened the power of the Areopagus; and that the other Demagogues, following the example, eſtabliſhed the Democracy which prevailed at laſt. He pretends that Solon's intentions were not followed herein: but that the people's pride, after the glory they had gained in the war againſt the Perſians, and the bad qualities of the Demagogues produced thoſe effects (218). Here then he confeſſes that a Democracy was eſtabliſhed at Athens, that is to ſay, according to the deſcription he gives of that kind of Government in another paſſage of his work (219), a State in which every thing, even the laws themſelves, depend from the multitude ſet up as a tyrant, and governed by the flatteries of ſome declaimers. Is not the ſentence, which Boetius makes Philoſophy ſay, very much to the honour of the Athenians? Si cujus oriundus ſis patriæ reminiſceris, non uti Athenienſium quondam, multitudinis imperio regitur, ſed εἷς κοίρανος ἐστὶν, εἷς βασιλεύς: qui frequentia civium non DEPULSIONE lætatur (220). i. e. "If you remember "what country you are it is not, governed, like "Athens of old, by the multitude; it has but one "Prince, one King, who loves to have a great "number of citizens, and not to baniſh them." One can hardly meet with any thing more ſmart and ſatyrical againſt the people of Athens, than Julius Cæſar Scaliger's Verſes, which have been extremely approved by a learned Profeſſor of Hiſtory in the Univerſity of an Imperial City. I obſerve this, that the reader may ſee that a Profeſſor who was paid by a Republick, did not think himſelf under any obligation to have a regard for the Government of Athens. He does not only quote the invective of Scaliger the Father, but adorns it with commendations, and even corroborates it with inſtances, and with an apoſtrophe of Demoſthenes to Minerva. O Goddeſſes, ſays that Orator, as he was going into baniſhment, how comes it that you love ſo much three very miſchievous beaſts, the owl, the dragon, and the people? Cum nulla cœna tam parca ſit, in

(217) Plutarch, de audiend. Poetis, p. 20, C.

(218) Ariſtotel. Politic. lib. 2. cap. 12. p. m. 252.

(219) Idem, ib. lib. 4. cap. 4. p. 278.

(220) Boetius, de Conſol. Philoſ. lib. 1. p. m. 16. See Renatus Valinus's notes on that paſſage of Boetius.

The expedition againſt Samos, the motives of which I have hinted in one of my remarks (e), was of all Pericles's actions the moſt odiouſly miſrepreſented by the Writers, who put the worſt conſtruction upon it (f). Plutarch will acquaint you with this; but he has omitted an odious circumſtance, which he might have met with in Alexis of Samos's ſecond book concerning the limits of Samos. That Author obſerved, that the lewd women, who followed Pericles in that expedition, got ſo conſiderable a ſum of money, that they built at Samos the Temple of Venus, ſirnamed the Reeds, or of the Marſhes [T]. This was charging that General with taking but little care to have the Military Diſcipline ſtrictly obſerved.

(e) Above, quotat. (167).

(f) See Plutarch, in the Life of Pericles, p. 166, &c.

qua non hilaritatis poculum circumeat; propinabo ejus loco lepidiſſimos hoſce verſus Julii Scaligeri de inſaniente Athenienſium vulgo:

Nulla eſt, puto, Reſpublica nationè vera,
Commentitia, fictavè cogitatione,
Aut ſtultitiâ aut nequitiâ Atticâ priores.
Ita conſiliis flagitiiſque Demagogos
Tetris nugivoram excruciaſſe cerno plebem:
Fecem pelagi turbine turbulentiorem.
Juſtos opibus, patria & exuiſſe vita.

Nihil ſolemnius hoc poſtremo; & exemplo eſt Diomedon apud Valerium noſtrum, qui non meritum ſupplicium ductus nihil aliud locutus eſt, quam ut vota pro incolumitate exercitus ab ipſo nuncupata ſolverentur. Fertur, cum Demoſthenes jam exulaturus urbe cederet, extenſis verſus arcem manibus exclamaſſe? O Domina Polias (ita Minervam cognominabat) quid ita gaudes tribus moleſtiſſimis beſtiis, Noctua, Dracone, & Populo (221). i. e. "As there is never ſo moderate an "entertainment, but a merry glaſs goes round, I "ſhall afford you inſtead of it, theſe pretty lines of "Julius Cæſar Scaliger, concerning the raging multitude at Athens. I do not think there ever was a "Commonwealth, either real, or fictitious, and imaginary, that came up to the Athenian in folly and wickedneſs. The Demagogues tormented the idle and ſilly "multitude by their wicked councils, and ſcandalous "deeds: the people, I ſay, who are more turbulent than "the waves of the ſea; and robs the beſt citizens of "their eſtate, their country, and their lives. There "can be nothing more grave and ſolemn than this "laſt obſervation: which may be confirmed by an "inſtance from Valerius Maximus, who obſerves that "Diomedon, going to the place of execution, to "ſuffer a puniſhment, which he had not deſerved, "deſired nothing but that the people would perform "the vows he had made for the preſervation of the "army: and Demoſthenes, going into baniſhment, "and lifting up his hands towards the Temple, is "ſaid to have cried out, Oh Minerva, &c."

(221) Chriſtophorus Adamus Rupertus, Diſſertat. in Valerium Maximum, lib. 1. cap. 1. p. 33, 34. edit. Noriberg. 1663. What he obſerves of Demoſthenes, is to be met with in Plutarch, in Vita Demoſthenis, p. 858, B.

[T] The lewd women . . . . . got ſo conſiderable a ſum of money, that they built . . . . . the Temple of Venus . . . . of the Marſhes.] Athenæus is the Author who acquaints us with theſe particulars, Ἀλέξις δ' ὁ Σάμιος, ſays he, ἐν δευτέρῳ ὡρῶν Σαμιακῶν τὴν ἐν Σάμῳ Ἀφροδίτην, ἣν οἱ μὲν ἐν Καλάμοις καλοῦσιν, οἱ δὲ ἐν Ελειαλικαῖς φησὶν, ἑταῖραι ἱδρύσαντο αἱ συνακολουθήσασαι Περικλεῖ, ὅτε ἐπολιόρκει τὸν Σάμιον, ἐργασάμεναι ἱκανῶς ἀπὸ τῆς ὥρας. Alexis Samius libro ſecundo de Samiorum finibus ſcribit, ædem Veneris in Samo, quam in arundinibus quidam vocant, alii in paluſtribus, meretrices Periclem ſecutas, cùm obſideret Samum, ædificaſſe, ingenti quæſtu proſtituta forma ditatas (222). Let us wonder here at the blindneſs of the mind of men; here we have conſcientious proſtitutes, who conſecrate to religious uſes a conſiderable part of the money they got by their abominable diſſoluteneſs. With whom can they more properly be compared than with thoſe receivers of a King's revenues, who, after they are grown rich by devouring the very ſubſtance of the people, build a ſumptuous Chapel, and adorn the great Altar of a Cathedral Church with their offerings

(222) Athenæus, lib. 13. cap. 4. p. 572.

Si l'on vient à chercher pour quel ſecret myſtere
Alidor à ſes frais bâtti un monaſtere,
Alidor, dit un fourbe, il eſt de mes amis,
Je l'ai conu laquais, avant qu'il fût Commis:
C'eſt un homme d'honneur, de pieté profonde,
Et qui veut rendre â Dieu ce qu'il a pris au monde (223).

(223) Boileau, Sat. 9. ver. 159.

"Theſe ſoft-mouth'd Satyriſts would thus declaim
"At M—r whoſe charity records his name.
"The Knight has known how needy wretches fare,
"His parents were, it ſeems, the Pariſh care.
"A Saint profound—To make his reck'ning ev'n,
"The wealth he ſtole from men, he gave to Heav'n."

Boileau's Works by ſeveral hands.

All the Heathens did not want judgment like thoſe of Samos. Do you think that the Emperor Alexander would have ſuffered the Courtezans of Rome to ſpend part of their gain in building a Temple?-He would not even ſuffer the tax that was laid on proſtitutes and pimps to be carried to his Exchequer, but ordered it to be employed in repairing the Amphitheatre, &c. Lenonum vectigal & meretricum, & exoletorum in ſacrum ærarium inferri vetuit, ſed ſumptibus publicis ad inſtaurationem theatri, circi, amphitheatri, & ſtadii deputavit (224).

(224) Lamprid. in Alexandro Severo, cap. 24. p. m. 917, 918. Tom. 1. Hiſtor. Auguſtæ Script.

PERIERS (BONAVENTURE DE), born in Bar on the river Aube in Burgundy, was Valet de Chambre to Margaret de Valois Queen of Navarre, and ſiſter of Francis I. (a). There is extant of his a volume of French Poems, printed after his death, in Lyons, by John des Tournes, anno 1544, 8vo: a tranſlation (b) of Terence's Andria (c), and ſeveral Tales in proſe, entitled, Nouvelles Recreations (d) [A]. I never ſaw his Cymbalum

(a) La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. Franc. p. 36.

(b) In French verſe.

(c) Du Verdier Vau-Privas, Biblioth. Franc. p. 131.

(d) La Croix du Main, Biblioth. Franc. p. 36.

[A] There is extant of his . . . ſeveral . . . Tales . . entitled, Nouvelles Recreations.] According to La Croix du Maine, the two firſt Authors of this work were James Peletier du Mans, a Phyſician and Philoſopher; and Nicolas Deniſot, ſirnamed the Count of Alſinois (1). Stephen Paſquier ſays otherwiſe, in a letter written by him to Tabourot, Sieur des Accords, Author of the Bigarrures. "I find, ſays he to him (2), "that in this ſecond edition, you aſcribe the recrea"tions of Bonaventure du Perier to James Pelletier. "You will excuſe me when I obſerve, that I be"lieve you have been miſinformed. I was one of "James Pelletier's moſt intimate friends, and he "made no ſcruple to impart his moſt ſecret thoughts "to me. I know the books which he told me were "written by him, but this he never once mentioned "to me. He was a true Poet, and very jealous of "his reputation; and therefore I am ſure that he "would not have diſowned it: this book being ſo "valuable, on account of the ſubjects it treats upon, "that it does not deſerve to be diſowned by its "Author, any more than the Facetiæ, in Latin, of "Poggius the Florentine. They were writ by Du "Perier, as alſo the book entitled Cymbalum Mundi, "which is written after the manner of Lucian; and "deſerves to be committed to the flames, with the "Author, if he were living." An undoubted circumſtance is, that this Author did not compoſe all the tales or ſtories which are in his Nouvelles Recreations. He could not have writ that which is the firſt in the edition, which Vouet has not mentioned. It is that of Roan 1606, printed by Raphael du Petit-Val. It is ſaid in the firſt ſtory, that this work is publiſhed very ſeaſonably, in order to furniſh the Ladies with a diverting work, during the Civil Wars which brought ſo many calamities upon the nation. Now

(1) Biblioth. Franc. p. 36. See alſo p. 193.

(2) Paſquier, Lettres, Liv. 8. Tom. 1. p. 493. Paris edit. 1619, 8vo.

Cymbalum Mundi, which is ſaid to be a very impious book [B]. He came to an unhappy end;

Now it was impoſſible that Du Perier ſhould have writ thoſe words; he dying long before the firſt civil wars of France. Here follows the judgment of that famous Divine. Eum (librum) carptim percurrens, offendi nihil aliud eſſe quam colloquia prava; hoc eſt, narrationes & diſſertationes, meris morologiis, vanitatibus, obſcœnitatibus, nominis divini abuſibus refertas, quo quidem nemini niſi Epicureis (quibus voluptas ſummum bonum) placere poteſt. Et tamen librum cum auctore in cœlum tollit, quiſquis præfationem præfixit . . . . . ſuffecerit ex primâ novella quæ inſtar præambuli eſt, annotaſſe, quod dicat ſe libellum illum oportunè tunc edere, ut in mediis bellis civilibus & publicis calamitatibus habeant unde ſe oblectent imprimis matronæ & virgines, quas ad lectionem nominatim ſcurrilium quæ ibi occurrunt, contentioſe invitat. Summam autem & maximè convenientem huic vitæ noſtræ doctrinam eſſe: Bene vivere & lætari: quod poſtea interpretatur: ridere (3). "Running my eye "over this book, I found it to conſiſt of nothing "but wicked dialogues; that is relations and diſſertations, filled with mere buffoonry, vanity, obſcenity, and profanations of the ſacred name of "God; and therefore it can be pleaſing to none but "Epicureans, who make pleaſure the chief good. "Notwithſtanding this, the perſon who wrote the "preface praiſes the book, and its Author, to the "ſkies. . . . . I will only obſerve from the firſt tale "or ſtory, which ſerves as the introduction, that he "ſays this book was publiſhed then very ſeaſonably; "that it might prove an entertainment, in the midſt "of the civil wars and publick calamities which then "reigned; particularly to Ladies and young Maidens, "who are exhorted, in the ſtrongeſt terms, to read "it, and eſpecially the ſcurrilities contained in it. "That the principal and beſt adapted doctrine, for "the conduct of this life is, to rejoice and live well, "which he afterwards explains, to laugh." Des Periers is not the only Author who wrote ſuch tales. The neuf Matinées (nine mornings) of the Seigneur de Cholieres are in the ſame caſt, licentious and recreative, and very obſcene. I believe that this book was firſt printed in 1685, at Paris, for John Richer, 8vo. with his Majeſty's licence.

(3) Gisb. Voetius, Diſput. Theolog. vol. 1. p. 200.

[B] His Cymbalum Mundi, which is ſaid to be a very impious work.] He wrote it firſt in Latin, and afterwards tranſlated it into French, under the name of Thomas du Clevier, printed at Paris in 1537. La Croix du Maine, who ſpeaks in this manner (4), affirms that it is a deteſtable work, and filled with impieties. The reader has ſeen above, that Stephen Paſquier formed the ſame judgment of it. I have found a ſort of epitome of this Cymbalum Mundi in du Verdier-Vauprivas's Bibliotheque Francoiſe; and as moſt of my readers cannot have recourſe conveniently to that Bibliotheque, they will be extremely glad to meet with the following extract from it. "Thomas du Clevier has tranſlated out of Latin in- "to French, a treatiſe, entitled, Cymbalum Mundi: "containing four poetical Dialogues, very antient, "jovial and facetious, printed at Lyons in 16°. by "Benedict Bonnyn 1538. I did not find any "thing that deſerved cenſure in this work, except "Ovid's Metamorphoſes, Lucian's Dialogues, and the "books on wanton ſubjects and fictions. In the firſt "Dialogue, the Author introduces Mercury, Bryphanes, and Curtalius, who meeting in an inn at "Athens, at the ſign of the white coal, where Mercury happened to come, being diſpatched from "" Heaven by Jupiter, who had given him a "book in order to get it bound: thoſe two knaves, "whilſt he went to divert himſelf, take out of a "pocket he had left on the bed this book; ſteal "it, and leave, in its place, another containing "all the love-intrigues and wanton tricks of Jupiter; "as when he aſſumed the form of a bull to carry off "Europa; when he metamorphoſed himſelf into a "ſwan, to viſit Leda; when he came under the "borrowed form of Amphytrion, &c. . . . . In the "ſecond Dialogue ſome Philoſophers are introduced, "ſearching for ſome pieces of the Philoſopher's "ſtone in the ſand of the Theatre, where, as they "formerly were diſputing about it, and Mercury "having ſhewed it them, the ſimpletons in queſtion "importuned him ſo much by their entreaties, that "not knowing on whom to beſtow it all, he broke "it to pieces, and beat it quite to duſt; and afterwards mixed it with the ſand, that every one "might have a little of it, bidding them look for "it very narrowly; and aſſuring them that, if they "found ever ſo ſmall a portion of it, they would do "wonders, ſuch as the tranſmutation of metals, "breaking the bars of doors, healing people who "are ſick; and obtain eaſily from the Gods whatever they might deſire, provided it was lawful and "what might happen naturally, as rain after fair "weather, flowers and mildew in ſpring, heat and "duſt in ſummer, fruits in autumn, cold and dirt in "winter: in all which the Author ridicules the idle "purſuits of Alchymiſts (5). . . . . In the third Dialogue he reſumes the ſubject of the firſt, with regard to the book ſtoln from the Author of all "thefts, entitled, Quæ in hoc libro continentur: Chronica rerum memorabilium quas Jupiter geſſit antequam eſſet ipſe. Fatorum præſcriptum, ſive, eorum, quæ futura ſunt, certæ diſpoſitiones. Catalogus Heroum immortalium, qui cum Jove vitam victuri ſunt ſempiternam. i. e. The contents of this book are as follow: Chronicles of the memorable acts atchieved "by Jupiter, before he had a being. An injunction "or decree of fate, or certain diſpoſitions of things "which will occur. A liſt of immortal heroes who "are to live eternally with Jupiter. Herein the "Author firſt laughs at the idolatrous Heathens, and "their falſe God Jupiter, as intimating that he never "exiſted; or that, if he did exiſt, he was a man, "and never performed any memorable acts, nor ſuch "as have been fictitiouſly aſcribed to him. By the "ſecond head of the title of the book, he laughs at "fate, and fatal neceſſity, and tacitly at judicial "Aſtrology. By the third, he laughs at thoſe who, "on account of their grandeur, conſider themſelves "as Gods. He afterwards introduces Mercury, diſcourſing of the commiſſions which each of the "Gods and Goddeſſes had given him, to deſcend to "the earth; and the ſame Mercury, by the power "or virtue of certain words which he mutters, makes "a horſe named Phlegon ſpeak and argue with his "groom. In the fourth and laſt Dialogue, two dogs "..... diſcourſe together about ſeveral whimſical "and merry particulars (6)." Du Verdier Vau-Privas does not ſeem to have found any poiſon in this work, but only a ridicule upon the Heathen Religion, &c. Moſt other readers are of opinion that Bonaventure des Periers, upon pretence of laughing at the religion of the Heathens, had attacked the true religion. Father Merſenne formed this judgment of it. This Author, ſays he, introduces the fables of Jupiter, Mercury, &c. intending merely to open a way for ridiculing the Catholick Faith, and rejecting the greateſt truths which we ſpeak and believe concerning God. Per quas (fabulas) fidem catholicam irridere, & ea quæ de Deo veriſſima eſſe dicimus & credimus, rejicere velle videtur (7). He declares that Bonaventure des Periers was only the tranſlator of the Cymbalum Mundi; and that he was a completely impious knave, impiiſſimum nebulonem, and that many perſons took him for an Atheiſt. Voetius, who had not ſeen this book, does not ſay that the Author was an Atheiſt; nay, he diſcharges him from any blemiſh of that kind, provided the Cymbalum Mundi is only a banter upon purgatory, and upon ſeveral other inventions of Chriſtians. He adds, that it is impoſſible a man ſhould inſinuate Atheiſtical or Epicurean Principles, in facetious pieces filled with fictions; and that ſuch artifices are employed by Authors, in order that they, in caſe of a proſecution, may have an opportunity of eſcaping. He adds that, in a Dramatic piece, entitled, Iphigenie, for inſtance, he may laugh at Hecate who had three ſeveral ſhapes; ridicule ſuch Deities as require human victims; and level as many cenſures as they pleaſe againſt thoſe Prieſts who exhort to ſuch ſacrifices. The deſign of ſuch a Dramatick Poet may be to burleſque the trinity and the paſſion of the ſon of God, and open a door to Deiſm or Mahomedan Socinianiſm; but he alſo may aſſert, in caſe it be neceſſary, that thoſe who conſi-

(4) Biblioth. Franc. p. 36, 37.

(5) Du Verdier Vau-Privas, Biblioth. Franc. p. 1177.

(6) Idem, ibid. 1178.

(7) Merſennus, in Geneſim, p. 669. apud Voetium Diſputat. Theologic. Tome 1. p. 199.

end; he killing himſelf with a ſword, which, in the utmoſt height of madneſs and diſtraction, he thruſt into his belly (e). Several Authors ſpeak of this action [C]. Allard ſays, that our Bonaventure's name was Perier; that he was born in the bailiwick of Ambrunois, and wrote an Apology in verſe for Marot, when abſent, againſt Sagon, in 1580 (f). It is certain, that he wrote this apology, but not in that year. He was dead before the year 1544.

(e) La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. Franc. p. 37.

(f) Allard, Biblioth. de Dauphine, p. 172.

der it in that view are ſlanderers, and that his only intention was, to ridicule the fables of the Heathens. Here follow Voetius's words, which ſeem to hint as if ſomething like this had been exhibited on the Stage in ſome city in Holland. Quibus reponi poteſt: nihil vetare, quin Lucianum omneſque prophanos & impios poëtas atque antiquos literiones imitando quis ſubdole Atheiſmum, Epicureiſmum, Gentiliſmum hominum animis inſtillet; quamvis ſtylum ludicris ambiguitatibus, & jocis, item mimeſibus, proſopopœiis, &c. ita moderetur, ut ſi quis hæc ad examen revocet, colore aliquo eludere & elabi poſſit. Quomodo meminimus à Sceptico-Libertinis & Epicureis nebulonibus alicubi in Belgio omnem pietatem & fidem Chriſtianam dicteriis quibuſque apud homines traductam eſſe, exempli gratia, Tragœdia ſcribitur, & in theatro exhibetur tit. Iphigenia: in qua Ethnica illa, de Hecate triformi, de diis ſanguine humano, idque ex conſilio ſacerdotum, placandis perſtringuntur. Si quis pius metuat (ut quidem autores illos novit) eos myſterium Trinitatis, & redemptionis noſtræ per ſanguinem Chriſti velle deridendum proponere & ſic Epicureiſmo, Deiſmo, aut Turco-Sociniſmo viam munire: quomodo hoc evincet; cum promptum ſemper ſit effugium; rideri tantum fabulas Gentilium (8).

(8) Voetius, ubi ſupra.

The reaſons of this Profeſſor in Divinity are very juſt. There are two ways of laughing at ſuperſtitions, the one very good, the other very bad. Such Fathers of the Church as have expoſed all the ridiculouſneſs of the falſe Deities deſerve great praiſe for ſo doing; for their aim was, to open the eyes of the Heathens, and confirm the faithful. They were not ignorant that, in inſpiring people with contempt and averſion for the religion of the Heathens, they ſtrengthened them in the true Faith, and furniſhed Chriſtians with good weapons to reſiſt perſecution. But Lucian, who has laughed ſo much at the falſe Deities of the Heathens, and given the utmoſt life and beauty to the deſcriptions he has exhibited of the impertinence and frauds of the religion of the Greeks, deſerves nevertheleſs to be deteſted; ſince, inſtead of being prompted to this from a good motive, his only view was, to indulge his ſcoffing temper, and open a way to his ſatyrical ſtyle; and has ſhewn no leſs indifference and averſion to truth than to falſhood. Here we have two patterns, that of the Fathers of the Church, and that of Lucian, whence we may form a rational judgment of ſeveral ſatyrs written in theſe latter ages, againſt abuſes in religion. Rabelais ought to be conſidered as the copiſt of Lucian, and I believe the ſame muſt be ſaid of Bonaventure des Periers; for I find the Proteſtants (9) were as much exaſperated againſt the Cymbalum Mundi, as the Roman Catholicks. It muſt only be obſerved, that there have crept into the Chriſtian Religion, a great number of abuſes, which reſemble ſo much the irregularities in the religion of the Heathens; that it is impoſſible to write any thing againſt the Heathens, without affording many devotees with a pretence to declare, that the Chriſtian Religion has been wounded through the ſides of that of the Heathens. It is the buſineſs of thoſe, who give occaſion for theſe reproaches, to examine, in their own conſciences, what was their real intention; and whether their only view was, to have the deſcription they give of the irregular practices of the Heathens, conſidered as the repreſentation of modern abuſes. Some Diſſenters, among the Engliſh, are accuſed of repreſenting, in very ſtrong colours, the corruptions of the antient Romiſh Clergy, in no other view, but to draw characters which might bring an odium on the preſent State of the Epiſcopalians. We are told in Milton's life (10), that his Hiſtory of England, till the reign of William the Conqueror, was printed in 1670, but not in the terms in which he wrote it; for the licenſers ſtruck out ſeveral paſſages, in which he related the ſuperſtition, pride, and artifices of thoſe Eccleſiaſticks who lived under the Saxon Kings: the licenſers imagining that the Clergy under Charles II. were ſtruck at through their ſides. It is added (11) that, Sir Robert Howard being told, that he was accuſed of having ſcourged, in a certain book, the Engliſh Clergy on the backs of the Heathen, and Popiſh Prieſts, he anſwered maliciouſly and craftily: What buſineſs had they there (12)?

(9) La Croix du Maine, whom I cited above, and Henry Stephens, whoſe words will be inſerted in the following rem.

(10) Toland's Life of Milton, p. 138.

(11) Ibid.

(12) The Reader will perhaps call to mind on this occaſion, the comedy entitled, le Pedant joué, where, when the Pedant is deſired to ranſom his ſon, he often asks, What the Devil had he to do there?

[C] Several Authors ſpeak of this action.] I ſhall quote only Henry Stephens (13): "I will not omit "Bonaventure des Periers, Author of a deteſtable "book, entitled, Cymbalum Mundi, who, notwithſtanding the ſtrictneſs with which he was watched, "(upon its being obſerved that he was in a deſpairing "condition, and intended to make away with himſelf) was found transfixed with his ſword, the handle of which he had fixed againſt the ground, "ſo that it went in at his breaſt and came out at his "back." See alſo John Chaſſanion, Chapter XXVI. Book I. of memorable Hiſtories of the great and wonderful judgments and puniſhments inflicted by the Almighty (14).

(13) Henry Stephens's Apology for Herodotus, chap. 18. ſub fin. p. m. 231. See alſo chap. 27. p. 309.

(14) Page 170. Geneva edit. 1586. 8vo.

PERIMEDE, a famous Sorceres, whom Theocritus equals with Medea and Circe (a), and who, according to the Scholiaſt in that Poet, was the ſame perſon with Agamede, mentioned in the Iliad. This Agamede was the eldeſt daughter of Augeas King of Elis (b) and wife of Mulius, a brave man, killed by Neſtor (c), who was very young at that time (d). I take notice of this circumſtance, in order to ſhew the time in which Perimede lived, if ſhe was not the ſame perſon with Agamede. It is thought Propertius ſpoke of Perimede [A].

(a) Theocr. Idyll. 2. ver. 16.

(b) Homer. Iliad. lib. 11. ver. 739.

(c) Idem, Iliad. 11. ver. 637 & ſeq.

(d) Idem, Ibid. ver. 683, 718.

[A] It is thought Propertius ſpoke of Perimede.] The MSS differ greatly in the paſſage relating to this ſubject; and therefore in ſeveral editions we read as follows.

Non hic herba valet, non hic nocturna Citeis
Non per Medeæ gramina cocta manus (1).

"Ceteis baleful weeds have no effect,
"Nor herbs by fam'd Medea boil'd.

Muretus having conſidered that Citeis ſignifies Medea, was of opinion, that Medea is not ſpoke of in the following verſe, and therefore thought it ought to be read as follows:

Non Perimedeæ gramina cocta manu.

"Herbs boiled by Perimede ſerve for nought.

and he obſerves, that Beroaldus found that reading in ſome antient manuſcripts (2). Grævius followed it in his edition of Propertius, as has alſo Broekhuſius, who approves of Muretus's reaſoning. I'll obſerve by the way, that inſtead of cocta he would read lecta, and that he confirms his conjecture in a very learned manner (3).

(1) Propert. lib. 2. Eleg 4.

(2) Muret. Not's in Propertium, Eleg. 4. lib. 2.

(3) See his excellent edition of Propertius.

☞ PERIZONIUS (JAMES), a very learned Writer in the 18th century, was deſcended of a family originally of Schutorp, a ſmall town in the county of Benthem, in Weſt-

Weſtphalia. His anceſtors took the name of Voorbroek, from an eſtate, which they had, ſituated in a low and marſhy place, as the Dutch word ſignifies. One of them thought proper to change this word for a Greek one of the ſame meaning, as he did by publiſhing a copy of verſes upon a marriage, which he ſubſcribed by the name of Perizonius, which continued among thoſe of the family, who applied themſelves to learning, whilſt the reſt, who followed other employments, kept their antient name. James Perizonius was the eldeſt of the children of Anthony Perizonius [A], Rector of the ſchool of Dam, and afterwards Profeſſor of Divinity and the Hebrew languages at Ham, and at laſt at Deventer. He was born at Dam, October the 26th, 1651; and ſtudied at Deventer, under Theophilus Hogerſius, then Profeſſor of Hiſtory and Eloquence, and Giſbert Cuper, who ſucceeded Hogerſius. He removed to Utrecht in 1671, where he attended the Lectures of Grævius. The year following, the war obliged him to leave that Univerſity, and return home. His father deſigned him for the ſtudy of Divinity, and the Miniſtry; but upon his death, which happened Nov. 1, 1672, our Author purſued his inclination for the ſtudy of Polite Learning, Hiſtory, and Antiquity. In 1674, peace being reſtored to the United Provinces, he went to Leyden, in order to continue his ſtudies under Theodore Ryckius, Profeſſor of Hiſtory and Eloquence in that city. Upon his return to Deventer, which was the place of his reſidence, ſince his father had been choſen Profeſſor of Divinity there in 1661, he applied himſelf more vigorouſly than ever to his ſtudy. After he had been for ſome time Rector of the Latin ſchool at Delft, he accepted the Profeſſorſhip of Hiſtory and Eloquence, which was offered him by the Curators of the Univerſity of Franeker, in 1681. In 1684, the Curators, by way of acknowledgment of his merit and learning, which made their Univerſity flouriſh, augmented his ſtipend with the addition of an hundred crowns. Theodore Ryckius, Profeſſor of Hiſtory and Eloquence, dying in 1690, he was offered the vacant Profeſſorſhip; but the Curators of Franeker engaged him to continue with them, by adding an hundred crowns more to his ſtipend. However, he left them in 1693, and went to Leyden, to fill the place of Profeſſor of Hiſtory and Eloquence, and the Greek language; in which employment he continued till his death. If we conſider the great number of books which he publiſhed [B], and the continual employments of his Profeſſorſhip, it muſt be allowed, that he was a perſon of indefatigable induſtry; eſpecially if we conſider, that he committed nothing to the preſs, without having reviſed and examined it with the utmoſt care. His exceſſive application to his ſtudies was the occaſion of the indiſpoſition which proved fatal to him. He was of a very delicate conſtitution, and took no care to ſtrengthen it by exerciſe; his ſpirits were exhauſted inſenſibly; and a ſlow fever, which never quitted him, at laſt put an end to his life, April 6, 1715. He was then ſixty three years and five months old. He was interred on the 12th of that month, in St. Peter's Church at Leyden. In his laſt Will, he appointed the linen, which ſhould be put upon him after his death, according to the cuſtom in Holland; and ordered, that after he ſhould expire, his body ſhould be dreſſed in his clothes, and ſet up in a chair, and a beard made for him; a circumſtance, which would appear ridiculous and unworthy of his character, if we do not conſider his deſign in it, which was, that Mr. de Moor, who had begun his picture, might finiſh it, in order that it might be placed over the manuſcripts and books, which he left to the library of the Univerſity. In his perſon he was well made, of a good mein, and a grave and ſerious air, but far from every thing which which ſavoured of pedantry and affectation. He had the phyſiognomy of a man of ſenſe and genius. He had a great penetration, a ſolid judgment, and a firm and happy memory. He was affable, and agreeable in converſation, which he always choſe to turn upon ſubjects of literature and importance; and was ſo modeſt, that he never ſpoke of himſelf and his writings, except when he was aſked about them. He was zealouſly attached to the duties of religion, and in his laſt ſickneſs, behaved with the greateſt piety and reſignation to the will of God. He was never married, his inclination to ſtudy determining him to chooſe a ſingle life (a).

[A] Anthony Perizonius.] He publiſhed at Deventer in 1669, in 12mo, a treatiſe under the following title: Ant. Perizonii de ratione Studii Theologici Tractatus ad ejus Emendationem præcipue ſpectans: in quo de Artium, Philoſophiæ, Literarum, & Linguarum in S. S. Theologiâ uſu ac neceſſitate, Divinæ Scripturæ ſtudio, Verſionum nævis ac defectu, Novi Teſtamenti ſtylo, &c. copioſè diſputator. He died at Deventer, November 1. 1672, in the 46th year of his age, after having been Profeſſor of Divinity and the Oriental Languages with great reputation for eleven years in that city. He left three ſons, James, Chriſtian, and Gerard, and one daughter named Aleide (1).

(1) See Schulting's Funeral Oration on James Perizonius; and Hiſt. Critique de la Republique des Lettres, Tom. 9. p. 400, 401.

[B] The books which he publiſhed.] They are as follow. 1. Diſſertationum trias: quarum in primâ de Conſtitutione divinâ ſuper ducenda defuncti Fratris uxoris; ſecunda de Lege Voconia, fœminarumque apud Veteres Hæreditatibus; tertiâ de variis Antiquorum Nummis agitur. Deventer 1679, in 8vo. 2. Marci Tullii Ciceronis Eruditio. Franeker 1681, in 4to. This is an inaugural Oration, which he pronounced, when he was inſtalled in his place of Profeſſor at Franeker, January 19, 1681. 3. Diſſertatio de Auguſteâ Orbis Terrarum deſcriptione, & loco Lucæ eam memorantis. Franeker 1682, in 4to. This Diſſertation is greatly eſteemed. It was reprinted in 1696, in 8vo. at the end of his other Diſſertations De Prætorio, &c. 4. Diſſertatio Hiſtorica de duobus maximè inſignibus L. Flori locis. Franeker 1684, in 4to. 5. Animadverſiones Hiſtoricæ, in quibus quam plurima in priſcis Romanarum rerum, ſed utriuſque Linguæ Autoribus notantur, multa etiam illuſtrantur atque emendantur, varia denique antiquorum rituum eruuntur, & uberius explicantur. Amſterdam 1685, in 8vo. 6. Franciſci Sanctii Minerva, ſive de Cauſis Latinæ Linguæ Commentarius: cui accedunt Animadverſiones & Notæ Gaſparis Scioppii, & longè uberiores Jac. Perizonii. Franeker 1687, in 8vo. It was reprinted in 1693 at Franeker, and in 1702 at Amſterdam, with great additions, and in 1714 in the ſame city, conſiderably enlarged. 7. Diſſertatio Philologica, de origine, ſignificatione, & uſu vocum Prætoris & Prætorii, veroque ſenſu Loci ad Philippenſes i. 13. Franeker 1687, in 4to. 8. Diſſertatio Philologica de Prætorio Cæſarum ejuſque Præfecto. Franeker 1688, in 4to. Our Author having in the preceding Diſſertation aſſerted, that when St. Paul ſaid, that his innocence was known to all the Prætorium, he did not mean the place, where juſtice was adminiſtered, but the Prætorian cohorts, or the Emperor's guard, which was encamped near Rome, Ulric Huber, a Senator and Profeſſor of Civil Law at Franeker, attacked this opinion in a little tract, entitled, De Officio Præfecti Prætorio; and it was in anſwer to this, that Perizonius wrote this ſecond Diſſertation, in which he has inſerted his antagoniſt's piece. Mr. Huber replied, and our Author rejoined in the following Tract:

(a) See his Funeral Oration, pronounced by Mr. Schulting, Profeſſor of Civil Law at Leyden, May 30. 1715. Hiſtoire Critique de la Republique des Lettres, Tom. 9. p. 395 & ſeq. Acta Eruditor, Amm. 1716, p. 95. & Nouv. Litter. Tom. 1. p. 205.

Tract: 9. Abſterſio cenſuræ Huberianæ in nuperas Reſponſiones Jacobi Perizonii ad Librum ſingularem Ulrici Huberi de Prætorio. Franeker 1690, in 8vo. Perizonius reprinted theſe three pieces with others relating to the ſame ſubject, at Leyden 1696, in 8vo. 10. De Origine & Naturâ Imperii imprimis Regii à libero & ſui juris Populo ſimpliciter delati. Franeker 1689, in 4to. This diſcourſe was pronounced by him, when he quitted the place of Rector Magnificus. 11. Specimen Errorum ſupra centum & viginti ex uno & primo Tomo Hiſtoriæ Civilis V. A. Ulrici Huberi, in uſum Academicæ Juventutis collectum. Præmiſſa eſt Præfatio Apologetica Dedicationi iſtius Tomi repoſita. Subjectæ Reſponſiones & Animadverſiones in nuperrimas Diſputationes Eunomicas. Franeker 1693, in 8vo. 12. De uſu atque utilitate Græcæ Romanæque Linguæ, Eloquentiæ, & Antiquitatis in gravioribus Diſciplinis 1693. This is the Diſcourſe which he pronounced July 7, 1693, when he entered upon the Profeſſorſhip of Hiſtory, Eloquence, and the Greek language in the Univerſity of Leyden. 13. Laudatio Funebris Mariæ II. Angliæ Reginæ ex authoritate Lugdunenſis Academiæ Curatorum & Civitatis Conſulum, dicta poſtridie Idus Martias 1695. Leyden 1695, in 4to. 14. In 1696 he publiſhed three or four pieces under the name of Valerius Accinctus againſt Peter Francius, Profeſſor of Eloquence at Amſterdam. One of theſe pieces is entitled, Epiſtola ad P. Franciſcum Barbarum de noviſſimo ejus Carmine ad Scurram Litterarium, in 4to. 15. Orationes duæ de Pace, quarum altera factam laudans dicta eſt ex auctoritate publicâ Academici Senatûs, A. D. 6. Eidus Novemb. 1697. Altera ad ſuadendum compoſita, quum Legati Principum & populorum undique Hagam & Delphos jam convenirent ad tentandas Pacis faciendæ rationes. Leyden 1697, in 4to. 16. Cl. Æliani Sophiſtæ Varia Hiſtoria ad MSS. Codices nunc primum recognita & caſtigata, & perpetuo Commentario, &c. Leyden 1701, in 8vo. James Gronovius having attacked a paſſage in our Author's notes, the latter wrote in his defence the following books, which occaſioned ſome replies from Gronovius. 17. Diſſertatio de Morte Judæ & verbo ἀπάγχεσθαι, in quâ explicantur & conciliantur loca, Matt. xxvii. 5. & Lucæ Actor. i. 18. ac vindicantur quæ ad Æliani Variam Hiſtoriam, L. v. 8. erant notata. Leyden 1702, in 8vo. 18. Reſponſio ad nuperam notitiam de variis Æliani aliorumque Auctorum locis. Leyden 1703, in 8vo. Reſponſio II, ad notitiam ſecundam de Lucæ Actorum i. 18. & variis Æliani aliorumque Auctorum Locis. Leyden 1703, in 8vo. As this diſpute grew warm, the Curators of the Univerſity of Leyden interpoſed by their authority, and put a ſtop to it. 20. Q. Curtius Rufus in integrum reſtitutus, & vindicatus per modum ſpeciminis à variis accuſationibus & immodicâ atq; acerbâ nimis Criſi V. C. Joannis Clerici. Leyden 1703, in 8vo. Monſieur Le Clerc anſwered this book in his Bibliotheque Choiſie, Tome 3. p. 171 & ſeqq. 21. Oratio de Fide Hiſtoriarum contra Pyrrhoniſmum Hiſtoricum. Leyden 1703, in 4to. This diſcourſe was pronounced February 6, 1702, when he entered upon the Profeſſorſhip of Hiſtory. 22. Æther Britannis & Batavis militans, ſeu propitium Dei numen manifeſta prorſus ratione illis præſens in rebus geſtis & victoriis anno 1708, in Belgicâ partis, ac Panegyricâ Oratione ex Auctoritate publicâ expoſitis. Leyden 1709, in 4to. This oration was pronounced February 4. 1709. 23. De Doctrinæ ſtudiis nuper poſt depulſam Barbariem diligentiſſimè denuò cultis & deſideratis, nunc verò rurſus neglectis ferè & contemptis. Leyden 1708, in 4to. 24. Rerum per Europam ſæculo ſexto decimo maximè geſtarum Commentarii Hiſtorici. Leyden 1710, in 8vo. 25. Origines Babylonicæ & Ægyptiacæ. Leyden 1711, two volumes in 8vo. 26. Diſſertatio de Ære gravi. Leyden 1713, in 12mo. This book, which was deſigned againſt Kuſter, treats of the ſignification of Æs grave, among the antient Romans.

He left all his papers relating to his intended edition of Pomponius Mela, to Charles Andrew Duker. His notes upon Turſellinus's Univerſal Hiſtory were handed about in manuſcript. He had taken great pains upon Valerius Maximus, and cites his own notes on that Author, in his Animadverſiones Hiſtoricæ, c. 2. p. 67, &c. He had laboured likewiſe upon Faber's Theſaurus (2). T.

(2) See Hiſt. Critique de la Republique des Lettres, Tom. 9. p. 416, 422, 423, 424.

PEROT (NICHOLAS) in Latin Perottus *, born at Saſſoferrato in Italy, was one of the moſt learned men of the 15th century. He was deſcended from a family, which had formerly made a conſpicuous figure in the place of his birth [A]; but it was fallen into an eſtate of obſcurity, in ſome meaſure, as may be ſuppoſed from the narrowneſs of his circumſtances, and his being obliged to teach the Latin tongue, this being his firſt profeſſion (a). He was very ſucceſsful in teaching, ſo that pupils flocked to his ſchool. He drew up in a better order, and in a ſhorter method, the rudiments or accidence of the Latin tongue, and publiſhed it with theſe improvements, to the great advantage of his ſcholars. He afterwards went to Rome, and there applied himſelf very intenſely to the ſtudy of the Greek tongue. Being deſirous of ſhewing the publick the progreſs he had made

* His true name is Perotti.] Remark by the Tranſl.

(a) Huic quum deeſſent opes, corporis vires municipali frugalitate, atque duritia conſtitutæ, perpetuis incubrationum vigiliis minime defuerunt. Juvenis in ludo pueros honeſtos docuit, &c. Jovius, Elog. cap. 18. p. m. 45.

[A] He was deſcended from a family, which had formerly made a conſpicuous figure in the place of his birth.] It is ſaid, in the inſcription on the tomb-ſtone ſet up in his honour, anno 1624, that the city of Saſſoferrato was freed from tyranny by his anceſtors, and that it was indebted to them for the liberty and felicity it enjoyed (1). James Philip Thomaſini explains this particular. He relates (2), that whilſt Innocent VI. reſided in Avignon, thoſe cities of Italy which belonged to the patrimony of St. Peter, were expoſed to numberleſs calamities. Seditions were frequent in that country, and there was a tyrant in every town. Innocent VI. to remedy theſe diſorders, beſtowed the Government of this province on Cardinal Giles Albornoti, a Gentleman well ſkilled in the military art, and who, in other reſpects, was extremely well qualified for that poſt. Accordingly he made war on all thoſe petty tyrants who oppreſſed the country; and was extremely well ſeconded on this occaſion by ANDREW PEROT, and particularly in building the fortreſſes which are ſtanding in Saſſoferrato, whereby the ſecurity and peace of this province were ſo well eſtabliſhed, that thoſe who had tyrannized over it during a very long time, had no hopes of re-eſtabliſhing themſelves. This Perrot was father of JUSTINA PEROT, a Lady famous for her genius and love for learning. Petrarch had a great eſteem for her; and anſwered a ſonnet ſhe had addreſſed to him, and which is inſerted in the Petrarcha redivivus of Tomaſini (3). See alſo Menage's Meſcolanze (4). I am to obſerve, that Tomaſini calls this Lady JUSTINA DE LEVIS PEROTA, and ſays (5), that Andrew de Levis Perot, her father, was of the family of Levis, one of the nobleſt and moſt illuſtrious in France; and this extraction

(1) See Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. Tom. 7. p. 1169.

(2) Jac. Phil. Tomaſinus, in Petrarcha redivivo, p. 111.

(3) Page 111, 112.

(4) Page 279 & ſeq. of the Rotterdam edition, 1692.

(5) Tomaſinus, in Petrarcha redivivo, p. 110.

made in it, he, for that purpoſe, undertook to give a Latin verſion of Polybius, and his tranſlation was greatly eſteemed [B]. He engaged in another work, and introduced in extraction is proved, not only by antient records, but alſo by letters which the Lords of that family had writ from France, to Rome, to Torquato Peroti, Chamberlain of Pope Urban VIII. They acknowledge in theſe letters, that he was deſcended from the ſame ſtock with them, quibus (litteris) illum unius ſecum ejuſdemque radicis & familiæ ingenuè agnoſcunt (6). If this may be depended upon, it muſt be confeſſed, that our Archbiſhop of Siponto was very well deſcended, the houſe of Levi being one of the moſt illuſtrious in France. I read in a book (7) printed at Paris in 1657, that it comes originally from Levi, one of the twelve tribes of Iſrael, from whom the Virgin Mary iſſued, whom Meſſieurs de Vantadour (8) calls their couſin. [" The noble extraction of Perot, found- " ed on the relation that is made of Andrew Perot, " is not proved in any manner, unleſs it had been " ſhewn that the particulars related of Andrew are " taken from Authors of credit, and that our Nicho- " las was of the ſame family as Andrew *."]

(6) Idem, ibid.

(7) Entitled, The preſent State of France, ſee p. 439.

(8) It is a branch of the houſe of Levi.

* From the remarks to the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. Tom. 4. p. 971.

[B] His tranſlation of Polybius was greatly eſteemed.] He undertook it at the command of Pope Nicholas V. It was judged to be ſuperior to the verſions of Thucydides, Diodorus Siculus, Plutarch and Appian; and ſome envious perſons imagined, that it had been writ by an antient Author, and that Perot had ſtole it. Non defuêre tamen ex æmulis, qui ejus auctoris traductionem antiquiſſimam fuiſſe, furtoque ſurreptam exiſtimarint, quòd Thucydidem, Diodorum, Plutarchum, & Appianum, clariſſima ingeniorum certamine converſos, unus Polybius egregia fide Latinus, æquabili, & prædulci Romani ſermonis puritate prorſus antecedat (9). It is very probable that our Perot excelled the Tranſlators who had appeared ſome time before; and that his verſion was a maſter-piece, conſidering it was the work of a man who lived at a time when the ſtudy of learning was but reviving; but abſolutely ſpeaking, and even in compariſon of the Tranſlators of the 14th century, his tranſlation can ſcarce be looked upon as a tolerable one; and therefore Varillas could not have more flagrantly diſcovered his ignorance, in the Belles Lettres, than in the paraphraſe he has given us of the paſſage abovementioned from Paulus Jovius. " He attempted a tranſlation of Polybius, which he " performed in ſo beautiful a manner, that it was " doubted whether he was the Author of it; and " whether he had not found ſome old verſion of Po- " lybius, and printed it under his own name (10). . . " The perſon, who wrote his epitaph, had reaſon to " make it conſiſt only of the following words; here " lies the Tranſlator of Polybius; for if Perot was " really the Tranſlator of this work, none of thoſe, " who tranſlated the Greek Authors into Latin, can " be put in parallel with him, but are greatly " inferior to him (11)." How would this Writer have bluſhed, had he been ſhewn what Caſaubon ſays of this work of Perot? He does not deny but that this Tranſlator of Polybius was a man of learning, both in Greek and Latin, for the age he lived in (12); he alſo ſays, that Perot might be conſidered as a great ſcholar, conſidering the great ignorance with which he was ſurrounded; but charges him with having very ill diſcharged the commiſſion which Pope Nicholas V. had given him. Jam ille eruditus Italus, quo ipſe (Nicolaus Quintus) uſus eſt interprete, partim ſæculi vitio, partim propria culpa, provinciam ſibi demandatam, ita geſſit malè, facilè ut appareat, non ob ſingularem aliquam eruditionem, in Græcis præſertim literis, Polybium interpretari fuiſſe juſſum; ſed quia nemo erat qui amplius ſciret, velut coclitem inter cæcos captum, qui in vacuam ſtationem pro tempore ſubſtitueretur (13). It would be ridiculous to ſuppoſe, that Caſaubon ſpoke in this manner out of envy; for of what uſe could it be to him, to leſſen the glory of a Writer who had been dead an hundred years? eſpecially when we find him own, that ſuch parts of Polybius, as Perot underſtood, were ſo happily tranſlated, that they had all the air of an original. Nicolaus Perottus, ſays he (14), Literarum Latinarum, quas perdiu docuit, exquiſitè, ut illa erant tempora, fuit peritus, & cumprimis curioſus. . . . Erat prætereà in hoc viro non vulgaris induſtria in Græcis ita vertendis (quæ quidem intelligeret) ut nullum perſæpè Græci Idiomatis in Latinâ ejus Verſione veſtigium appareret: quam interdum eſſe opus αὐτοφυὲς dicas, non alieni Interpretationem. Quòd ſi par fides reſponderet, inter excellentiſſimos Interpretes poterat ſine dubio Perottus recenſeri. Nemo enim illis temporibus Italorum erat, qui amplius Græcè ſciret, quàm hic Interpres: pauci qui tantum, quantum ille. i. e. " Ni- " cholas Perot, was, for the age in which he lived, " extremely well ſkilled in, and ſtudious of the La- " tin tongue, which he taught a great many years. . . " He likewiſe had ſo uncommon a talent, in tranſ- " lating Greek (whenever he underſtood it) into " Latin, that very frequently not ſo much as the " leaſt traces of the Greek idiom can be diſcovered " in his Latin verſion; inſomuch, that one would " ſometimes ſuppoſe it to be an original, and not a " tranſlation. Had Perot been equally faithful, he " doubtleſs might have been ranked among the ex- " cellent Tranſlators: for none of the Italians, in " that age, underſtood the Greek better than he did, " and few ſo well." We therefore ought to believe him, when he cenſures the compoſition of this tranſlator. He affirms, that it is a copy which is ſo unlike the original, that Polybius is quite diſfigured in it. Nos verò affirmamus, Perottum à fidelis Interpretis laude tantum abeſſe, quantum qui longiſſimè. Nullo enim pacto ferendus aut excuſandus eſt hic Interpres, homo Bellicarum rerum & totius Tacticæ adeo rudis & imperitus, ut qui in cæteris partibus Hiſtoriæ Polybianæ multa neſciret, in deſcriptionibus Præliorum omnia ignoraret, omnia peccaret; atque eâdem operâ tanto Scriptori, quod erat ferè præcipuum ejus decus adimeret. Omninò prælium nullum, facinus militare nullum, à Polybio fuerat paulò diligentiùs narratum, in quo graviſſima & momenti maximi peccata ab hoc Interprete non ſint admiſſa (15). i. e. " With regard to my ſelf I affirm, that Perot " does not deſerve the leaſt applauſe as a faithful " Tranſlator. He is not to be excuſed in any man- " ner, being quite ignorant of military affairs, and " the art of drawing up forces, and unſkilled " in a great number of other things which occur in " that hiſtory: in the deſcription of battles he is eſ- " pecially ignorant, and therefore quite depraves this " Author's ſtyle, for which he is moſt famous. Not " a ſingle battle, not a ſingle military exploit, which " Polybius has related with great accuracy, but is " tranſlated in the moſt erroneous manner, by this " Writer.". He blames him, in other places, for inſerting, in his tranſlation, ſeveral words of Livy, inſtead of thoſe of Polybius; and for not tranſlating ſcarce ſo much as one ſingle period, without committing ſome miſtake (16). He goes on. Non neſcimus fuiſſe olim, & nunc quoque eſſe quibus Perotti verſio, propter aliquam Latinitatis ſpeciem, mire arrideat. Sed quò iſta Latinitas ſi deeſt fides, abeſt veritas? Nihil dicam de locis infinitis quos propterea aut tranſiit, aut malè interpretatus eſt Perottus, quia vel codices erant corrupti, vel occurrebat dictio aut phraſis aliqua minus vulgaris: cujuſmodi multas ſanè habet Polybius. Verum ubi nihil erat ejuſmodi, quis ferat longè adeo ab auctoris ſui verbis diſcedentem? aut quis neget flagitium eſſe inſigne, tot locis verba, periodos, atque adeo pericopas integras è Livio deſumpſiſſe, & lectoribus Græcæ linguæ imperitis obtruſiſſe pro Polybianis? ubi fides? ubi pudor? in tanta igitur errorum omnis generis copia, ſingula velle perſequi, quod petiverunt à nobis nonnulli, ejus ſit hominis, qui vetus dictum velit tollere in lente unguentum (17). i. e. " I " am not ignorant that there have been, and ſtill " are, ſome perſons who are greatly pleaſed with " Perot's tranſlation, from a certain beauty which " they fancy they ſee in it. But of what uſe is a " Latin ſtyle, if it has neither fancifulneſs nor truth? " I ſhall not take notice of a numberleſs multitude of " paſſages which Perot either omitted or falſly tran- " ſlated; either becauſe the manuſcripts were corrupt- " ed, or becauſe ſome uncommon phraſe or expreſſi- " on, of which there are a great number in Poly- " bius, occurred. But when there was nothing " of this kind, who could bear to find him depart ſo " much from the ſenſe of his Author? Or who will " deny but that it is a great crime to have frequent- " ly borrowed from Livy, ſo many words, periods,

(9) Jovius, Elog. cap. 18. p. m. 46, 49.

(10) Varillas, Anecd. de Florence, p. 170.

(11) Ibid. p. 171.

(12) Partem illius (Polybii) librorum aliquam nactus (Nicolaus Quintus) ejus in Latinum ſermonem transferendæ, viro Græcæ & Romanæ linguæ ut erat captus ejus ætatis non ignaro, munus delegavit. Caſaub. Epiſt. dedicat. Polybii.

(13) Caſaub. ib.

(14) Idem, in Præfat. ad Lectorem.

(15) Idem, ibid.

(16) Multa quidem in ſingulis fere periodis Perottus perperam interpretatur. Idem in Commentario in Polybium, p. 112.

(17) Idem, ibid. p. 60.

in it all the treaſures of his erudition. This was a Commentary on Martial [C] ; but as he was raiſed to a very high employment, and a very exalted ſtation in the Church, he did not think it proper to publiſh this Commentary ; he looking upon it as beneath him, and no ways ſuitable to the decorum of his archiepiſcopal character, becauſe of the obſcenities which are found in Martial (b). This work was publiſhed after his death. Our Author had had a great ſhare in the beneficence and eſteem of Cardinal Beſſarion ; but it is ſaid that, through his imprudent conduct, he prevented his being raiſed to the Pontificate [D]. The Emperor Frederick III. preſented him in the city of Bologna with the poetical crown (c), and honoured him with the title of his Counſellor. That employment was much leſs real than the Government of Perugia and Umbria, which was beſtowed on

(b) Extracted from Paul Jovius, Elog. cap. 18. p. 45.

(c) Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. Tom. 7. p. 1168.

" and entire paragraphs ; and to have put them off, " on ſuch readers as are ignorant of the Greek " tongue, for thoſe of Polybius ? Where is the juſ- " tice and modeſty of this ? As therefore he is ſo full " of faults, of every kind, to point out every one of " them ſingly, as ſome perſons adviſed me to do, " would be beſtowing pains upon a thing that no " way deſerves." What would Varillas have ſaid, had his friends ſhewn him, that his opinion was ſo very oppoſite to that of ſo excellent, ſo learned, and ſagacious a critick as Caſaubon ? Had Varillas, the firſt time he preſumed to paſs raſh judgments like theſe, been reproved by ſuch means, ſuch a Critick would have done him great ſervice. I am to obſerve that Perot has not tranſlated all the books which are extant of Polybius : only the firſt five books of his hiſtory having been diſcovered at that time, and to theſe the Tranſlator confined his labours. The abridgment of the twelve following books, and the Excerpta Legationum were diſcovered ſince. Beſides this tranſlation Perot has alſo given one of Hippocrates's oath.

(18) It is only a Commentary on the Spectacula and the 1ſt book of Epigrams of Martial.

(19) In the text of this article.

[C] A Commentary on Martial (18)]. He entitled it Cornucopiæ. I have already (19) given the reaſon why he did not publiſh it : but it was publiſhed by his Nephew PYRRHUS PEROT, after the Author's death. He ſays in his preface, that he had added but very few particulars, except his having explained more at large ſome obſcene places which his uncle had but ſlightly touched upon. Nihil fere de meo addidi, præterquam quod loca quædam, quæ ille, quoniam impuritate quadam atque obſcœnitate verborum caſtis ac pudicis auribus execrabilia viderentur, curſim breviterque tetigerit, ipſe latius expoſui (20). From hence we may ſuppoſe, that M. Du Cange is miſtaken, when he ſays, that Nicholas Perot, Biſhop of Siponto, publiſhed in 1470, a large volume of Commentaries on the Latin tongue ; Cui Cornucopiæ nomen indidit cum duobus ſingularum dictionum indicibus, Græco altero, altero Latino, qui juſti Dictionarii vicem præſtant (21). It muſt be remembered that our Perot lived till the year 1480. Geſner obſerves, that the Cornucopiæ was printed at Venice by Aldus, and at Baſil by Curio and Valderus more than once, in folio. He omits the principal circumſtance, he not taking notice of this date of the firſt edition. I myſelf cannot tell it, and can only ſay, that the Straſburg edition of 1506 was preferable to the preceding one, or preceding ones ; and that of Venice of 1513 was more accurate than that of Straſburg (22). Geſner adds, that there is a great deal of learning in this work. Plena Philologiæ & eruditionis variæ, ex optimis quibuſque veterum denſiſſima teſtimonia citans, multiplici cum ad rerum, tum ad vocabulorum cognitionem uſu (23). i. e. " Abounding with various kinds of " erudition, and a very great number of citations from " the beſt of the antients ; and of a vaſt ad- " vantage for acquiring the knowledge both of things " and words." Perot is charged with copying what others had written, without once naming them. Martinius objects this to him, after proving his having ſtole a paſſage from Laurentius Valla ; and here follows what he obſerved in his Preface : Ambroſius Calepinus . . . . judicio uſus barbara à Latinis ſegregavit, & auctoritate veterum verba ſua firmavit : rectius, quàm Perottus qui ſuum copiæ cornu diligenter quidem, at latenter, contexuit, ut eorum nomina à quibus ſua ſumpſerat, ferè ſubticeret (24). i. e. " Ambroſe Calepin " . . . . . diſtinguiſhed the barbarous words from the " Latin in a judicious manner, and corroborated his " opinion by the authority of the antients : in which " he conducted himſelf with greater ſincerity than " Perot, who indeed compiled his Cornucopiæ with " diligence, but at the ſame time with ſecrecy ; he " ſuppreſſing the names of the greateſt part of the Au- " thors to whom he was indebted for his materials." Many people will be ſurpriſed to ſee, in this paſſage, Calepin's ſincerity preferred to that of Nicholas Perot ; great complaints having been made againſt Calepin, as being an impudent plagiary of Perot (15). " To be ſtill more circumſtantial with regard to the " conduct of Calepin, the reader muſt be told, that " not being a ſcholar, he had abſolutely no thoughts " of ſetting up for an Author, till having met with " Nicholas Perot's Cornucopiæ ; and being informed " that Perot ſeemed reſolved to diſown and give up " this fruit of his ſecular and profane ſtudies ; and " give up the title of father, upon the ſuppoſition " that that of Archbiſhop would have been diſho- " noured by it * ; he thought he might take ad- " vantage of Perot's diſtaſte ; and therefore reſolved " to inſert this work in his own, as though he had " been the Author of it. Floridus Sabinus † ſays " that he did this in a moſt wretched manner ; he " blending this Cornucopiæ with a vaſt quantity of " filthy traſh, gathered from the worſt Authors of " the moſt barbarous and ignorant ages. He adds, " that this contributed on one hand, to celebrate the " merit of Perot, and to make people enquire for " his original work ; and, on the other, to ſhew " the impertinence of Calepin, and the incorrectneſs " of his Dictionary. The ſame judgment is alſo " formed by the anonymous Author of the Apology " for the Latin Poets , the German Author of the " Bibliographia Curioſa ††, and Leonardo Nicodemus, in his additions to Toppi *." [D] Through his imprudent conduct he prevented . . . . Cardinal Beſſarion, from being raiſed to the Pontificate.] This incident is related by Varillas. " It " is known, ſays he (26), that this Cardinal would " have been elected Pope after Paul II. had it not " been for the imprudence of Nicholas Perotty . . . . " who was one of the conclaviſts †. One evening " when Beſſarion was ſtudying, according to his uſual " cuſtom, without once minding the intrigues of his " Collegues ; three Cardinals, the heads of ſo many " cabals in the conclave, who at laſt had agreed to " elect him, went to his cell, and deſired to ſpeak " with him. Perotty ſuppoſed, that their only de- " ſign was, to ſue for his patron's vote ; and as he " knew him ſo well as to be perſuaded, that the ſoli- " citations of theſe Cardinals would not avail in this " particular, he therefore thought it would not be " proper to interrupt Beſſarion in his ſtudies ; for " which reaſon he refuſed abſolutely to admit them, " and to inform his patron that they wanted to " ſpeak with him. And the moſt whimſical cir- " cumſtance in this adventure was, that the more " Perotty was intreated, careſſed, conjured, and " threatned, the faſter he kept the door ſhut ; be- " cauſe he was confirmed ſtill the more in his chime- " rical ſuppoſition, that the only motive of their in- " ſiſting ſo much to come in, was, in order to ſue " for the only vote they wanted for the perſon whom " they had reſolved among themſelves to elect. The " conteſt laſted ſo long, that the patience of the " three Cardinals being at laſt quite exhauſted, they " ſaid among themſelves, that it would not be pro- " per to raiſe, to the Holy See, a man who not on- " ly would not think himſelf obliged to them for " his election, but would make them dependent " on the caprice of his domeſticks, whenever they " ſhould deſire to ſpeak with him. Spite and indig- " nation made them then take other meaſures ; and " as Cardinal Riairo ſtruck their fancy moſt at that " inſtant, (20) Pyrrhus Perottus, in Præfat. Cornicopiæ, apud Geſner. Bibliotb. folio 523.

(21) Du Change, Præf. Gloſſarii Latin. p. 41.

(22) See Borrochius, in Analectis ad Cogitata de Lingua Latina, in Appendice, p. 42.

(23) Geſner, Bibliotb. folio 523.

(24) Matthias Martinius, in Lexico Philolog. voce ſarcina.

(25) Baillet, Jugem. des Scavans, num. 630 of the Latin Grammar. See alſo num. 303 of the Crit. Gram. Borrichius ubi ſupra. Citat. (22).

* Becauſe the Romiſh Clergy are not allowed to marry.] Rem. by the Tranſl.

† Franc. Florid. Sab. Apolog. lib. 1. p. 111.

 Ap. Obert. Giffan. p. 505. item ap. G. M. Konig. Bibliotb. V. & N. p. 153.

†† Bibliogr. cur. Philologic. biſt. p. 28.

* In additionib. ad Bibliotb. Neapolit. Nic. Topp. p. 184.

† Conclaviſt, is a domeſtic whom a Cardinal makes choice of to attend upon him, and is ſhut up in the conclave with him.] Rem. by the Tranſl.

(26) Varillas, Anecd. de Flor. p. 174, 175.

on Perot (d), and then the Archiepiſcopal See of Siponto (e), to which he was raiſed the 17th of October 1458 (f). He built a country houſe near Saſſoferrato, and named it Fugicura [E], implying it to be a retreat where he unbent himſelf after his fatigues, and paſſed his hours unvexed with cares. He died in that place (g) anno 1480. He had quarrelled with Domitius Calderinus [F]. He was endued naturally with a talent, which is very well adapted to make a man make a great progreſs in knowledge, which was, whenever he was told of any curious thing to which he was a ſtranger, he would devote himſelf to the finding of it out (h); would abandon the purſuit of every thing elſe, and even intrench upon the hours proper for ſleeping, to purſue it the more cloſely. TORQUATO PEROT, who was of the ſame family, Chamberlain to Pope Urban VIII. and Biſhop of Ameria, cauſed a monument to be ſet up in the great Church at Saſſoferrato, in 1624 (i), with a beautiful inſcription (k), wherein it is related, among other particulars, that the Popes Eugenius IV. Nicholas V. Calixtus III. and Pius II. had a great affection for him, eſpecially becauſe of the great ſervices he had done, in endeavouring to bring

(d) Jovius, Elog. cap. 18. p. 45.

(f) Jovius, Elog. cap. 18. p. 45.

(g) Idem, ibid.

(b) Volaterr. lib. 21. p. m. 776.

(i) Jovius, ibid.

(e) The modern name of this Archbiſhoprick is Monfredonia; but in Latin it is always Archiepiſcopus Siponti-nus.

(k) It is found entire in Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. Tom. 7. p. 1168.

" inſtant, they elected him Pope, though they had " agreed together before, not to give their votes " to any Monk, becauſe Riairo had been a Fran- " ciſcan Frier. The pleaſure which they ima- " gined would accrue to them, from the regret " which Cardinal Beſſarion would have, for his loſing " the Pontificate through his conclaviſt's fault, " prompted them to inform him of this whole tranſ- " action. Nevertheleſs, Beſſarion did not change " his countenance or behaviour towards them; but " contented himſelf with telling Perotty, that he had " prevented him from making him (Perotty) a Cardi- " nal." Few paſſages are better adapted than this, to ſhew the egregious liberty which this Writer took, to blend his whimſies and conjectures with the hiſtories which he extracted from other Authors. All this long account he has given us, is a paraphraſe of the following Latin paſſage of Paulus Jovius. Paulo morte ſublato, in comitiis fatalis caſus tantæ ſpei Fortunam avertit. Ferunt enim tres ſummæ auctoritatis Cardinales, quum eo decreto, ut Pontificem ſalutarent, abditum in cella conclavis adiſſent, nec admitterentur à Nicolao Perotto janitore, quòd tum vir ineptus lucubranti parcendum diceret, uſque adeò ſtomachatos, ut ſeſe indignanter avertentes, reſponderent, Ergo nec prenſanti, nec roganti quidem, ſumma dignitas erit inculcanda: ut quum è cœlo ſuffragia expectet, ſuperbis demum ac ſtolidis janitoribus pareamus? ſtatimque ſuffragio Xyſto detuliſſe, quo repentè renunciato, adoratoque, Beſſarion dixiſſe fertur: Hæc tua, Nicolae, intempeſtiva ſedulitas, & tiaram mihi, & tibi galerum eripuit (27). i. e. " Pope Paul hav- " ing left the world; a fatal accident, in the conclave, " deprived him (Beſſarion) of the exalted ſtation to " which he had flattered himſelf he ſhould be raiſed. " For it is related, that three Cardinals who had the " greateſt ſhare of authority, having formed a reſo- " lution to chooſe him Pope, came, according to his " call, to the conclave, where he was ſhut up: " being refuſed admittance by Nicholas Perot, the " door-keeper or conclaviſt, who was ſo ſtupid as to " tell them that they ought not to interrupt him " ſince he was ſtudying, the Cardinals in queſtion " were ſo much offended, that turning about with " indignation they ſaid, ſhall we force a man to ac- " cept of the Pontificate who neither was for, nor " deſires it; that when he expects votes from Hea- " ven, we at laſt may pay obedience to proud, ſilly " door-keepers? Saying this they immediately gave " their voices for Sixtus, who being inſtantly de- " clared Pope, and worſhipped; it is related that " Beſſarion ſaid as follows: Your unſeaſonable dili- " gence (O Nicholas) has deprived me of the Pontifi- " cal Crown, and yourſelf of a Cardinal's hat." I quote this Latin paſſage, in order that my readers, by comparing it with that of the French Author, may ſee the particulars he added to the Latin text were his original. He has given them what form he pleaſed, which is intolerable. Such Hiſtorians as write laſt ought not to embelliſh an incident, but ſhould relate it exactly in the ſame manner as they find it in Authors. It may be obſerved by the way, that if this French Writer had really read all the MSS. cited by him, (a circumſtance which is very much doubted); we nevertheleſs might naturally ſuppoſe that he publiſhed a thouſand particulars which were merely the product of his invention; for as he has preſumed to flouriſh on Paul Jovius, who is a printed Author; he conſequently thought he might be more at liberty to romance with regard to MSS. relations, which he has juſt pointed out in a very random manner. Gyraldus aſcribes Beſſarion's ill ſucceſs to another cauſe (28); but he alſo mentions what is related of Perot the conclaviſt; and is much more conciſe on this ſubject than Paul Jovius. Menage ſuppoſes, that Perot committed this blunder in the conclave when Paul II. was elected (29). But it is my opinion that we ought to credit, with regard to this particular, the two Italian Authors cited by me, rather than Menage (30).

(27) Jovius, in Elog. cap. 24. p. 57, 58.

(28) Gyrald. de Poet. ſuor. tempor. Dialogo 1. p. m. 551.

(29) Menag. Meicolanze. p. 280.

(30) Paulus Jovius, and Lilius Gregorius Gyraldus.

[E] He built a country houſe near Saſſoferrato, and named it Fugicura.] Moreri did not underſtand any part of this, and has altered it in ſuch a manner, that it is downright nonſenſe. Nevertheleſs, nothing can be plainer than the following words of Paulus Jovius: Exceſſit è vita ſenex apud Sentinum in villa viridariis & fontibus peramœna, quam à pingui otio Fugicuram appellavit (31). i. e. " He died in an ad- " vanced age at Saſſoferrato, at a country ſeat, which " the fountains and gardens rendered moſt delightful, " and which he called Fugicura, from the ſweet eaſe " and leiſure he enjoyed there." Moreri puts Figurica inſtead of Fugicura, even in the verſes of Myrteus quoted by him, and which turn on the alluſion of flying from cares.

(31) Jovius, Elog. cap. 18. p. 46.

[F] He had quarrelled with Domitius Calderinus.] The paſſage, which I am going to quote from Alexander ab Alexandro, informs us of a particular, which Paulus Jovius has not taken notice of, and which he ought not to have omitted, viz. that Nicholas Perot read publick lectures to the youth of Rome. He and Calderinus explained, at the ſame time, ſome paſſages of Martial, and made it their endeavours to contradict one another, rather than explain that Poet. This occaſioned floods of injurious expreſſions and empty words; ſo that, after all, Martial's ſenſe was leſs underſtood than if they had ſaid nothing. Nicolaus Perottus Sipontinus præſul, homo fuit accurato ingenio, & lectione multa exercitus: eum Domitius Calderinus, vir, ut in ea tempeſtate, doctus, & æmulatione doctrinæ, & morum diſſimilitudine oſum habebat: jurgiiſque & conviciis apud ſuos ſectatores plerunque inceſſebat, ſæpiuſque apud ſtudioſos in invidiam illum crimenque vocabat: & ut ſunt fere ingenia, in explicandis auctoribus ſi quid in controverſiam veniret, uterque potius, quo pacto diverſus ab altero diſſentiret, quam quid veræ lectionis eſſet, rimabatur. Cum autem in ſcholis Romæ eodem tempore Martialis apophoreta publice lectitarent, cujus hoc diſtichon fuit. i. e. " Nicetus Perot, Archbiſhop " of Siponto, was maſter of a happy genius, and " vaſt reading, This Perot was hated by Domitius " Calderinus (a learned man for the age in which he " lived) which was owing to an emulation in learn- " ing and a diſſimilitude of manners. Accordingly " he often abuſed and reviled him to his followers, " and frequently made him odious to his pupils. " And accordingly, as it commonly comes to paſs " among ſcholars, whenever any conteſt happened " in explaining of Authors, both of them ſtrove to " wrangle and combat one againſt another, rather " than to ſearch for the true reading. As Martial's " Apophoreta (gifts given at banquets) were publickly " read by them, at the ſame time, in the ſchools at " Rome, a diſtich of which was thus;"

In precio ſcopas teſtatur palma fuiſſe,
Ocia ſed ſcopis nunc analecta dabunt.

bring about a reunion with the Greek Church, during the Council of Ferrara. The abovementioned Torquato intended to procure a new edition of the works of our Nicholas Perrot (l), which consiſt of tranſlations, letters, ſpeeches, and in Commentaries on Statius, Martial, &c. He deſigned likewiſe to publiſh the elogies of the illuſtrious men of Saſſoferrato. He compoſed ſome Italian verſes which were printed with thoſe of Anthony Brunus (m).

(l) Allatius, in Apibus Urbanis.

(m) Urbanis, Idem, ibid.

(32) Tiraquellus has the following note here, Perottus in Cornucopia ſecus interpretatur, quam hic accuſatur.

(33) Alexander ab Alexandro, Genialium Dier. lib. 4. cap. 21. p. 1157. edit. Lugd. Batav. 1673.

Ita iſtos verſus uterque interpretatus eſt (32), ut poſt multa deblatterata verba, vix aliquem ſenſum illorum ex dictis elicere queas, cum modo mendum in verſu poſtremo fuiſſe alter aſſeveret, & pro otia, precium poni oportere, modo aſarota, non ab à privativa, ſed intentiva dicta eſſe affirmet: alter ita plevaque nugalia jurgiis & maledictis plena effundat, ut equidem ſingula enarrare & referre pigeat (33). i. e. " Both gave ſuch an interpretation " of this diſtich, that after a deal of babbling, " ſcarce a word of ſenſe could be found in what ei- " ther of them ſaid; the one ſometimes aſſerting " that there was a fault in the latter line, and that " pretium ought to be put for otia; or affirming, " that aſarota, (a kind of pavements) was derived " from a intenſive, and not from a primitive: whilſt " the other invented a flood of impertinent trifling " ſtuff, to repeat every circumſtance of which would " be tedious." Here follows another paſſage, which informs us that Perot examined and criticiſed, in his Epiſtles, Caldrinus's Notes on Martial's Epigrams; and that Calderinus was accuſed of having ſtole from Perot. Domitii Calderini in Martialem commentarios notans, quamvis ſuppreſſo nomine, & furta ex ſcriptis patrui ſui, ſubdit: Recognoſci autem furta facillime paterunt ex errorum multitudine, cujus commentarii ejus undique ſcatent, quorum bonam partem patruus meus duob. Epiſtolarum, Romanarum ſcilicet ac Peruſinarum, præclaris voluminibus oſtendit (34). i. e. " Speaking of " Domitius Calderinus's Commentary on Martial, " (but not mentioning his name) and of his plunder- " ing his uncle's works, he adds, his thefts may be " ſoon found out, by the numberleſs multitude of er- " rors with which his Commentators abound: my " uncle pointed out a conſiderable part of thoſe in " his two fine volumes of Roman and Peruſian Epiſ- " tles." Angelus Sabinus, being engaged in a paper war with Calderinus, was aſſiſted by Perot. The latter was pointed at under the name of Fidentinus in Calderinus's writings, and the other under that of Protheus. See Gyraldus, Dialogue I. de Poëtis ſuorum temporum (35).

(34) Geſner. Biblioth. folio 523.

(35) Page 532. Operum Gyraldi. edit. Lugd. Bata. 1696.

PERROT (FRANCIS), Author of an Italian book refuted by Bellarmin. See the cloſe of the remark of the following article [A].

PERROT (NICHOLAS) Sieur d'Ablancourt, one of the firſt genius's of his age, was born in Châlons on the river Marne (a), April the 5th 1606 (b). He ſprung from a family which had made a conſpicuous figure in the Law [A], and the greateſt care was beſtowed on his education. He was ſent to purſue his ſtudies, in the College of Sedan (c); and he made ſo great an improvement by his maſter's inſtructions, that, at thirteen years of age, he had gone through a courſe of claſſical learning [B]. His father then ſent for him home, and got him an able maſter, not only to go over his whole courſe of ſtudy with him, but alſo to give him ſome tincture of Philoſophy. After having continued theſe exerciſes about three years, he was ſent to Paris, where he ſtudied the law five or ſix months. At eighteen

(a) And not at Vitry in Francois, as is affirmed in the Menagiana, p. 324. 1ſt Dutch edit.

(b) Ablancourt's Life, in Tom. 2. of Patru's works, Dutch edit. 1692. p. 334.

(c) Ibid. p. 335.

[A] He ſprung from a family which had made a conſpicuous figure in the law.] PAUL PERROT de la Salle his father, famous for his works, both in proſe and verſe, and who had a hand in the Catholicon, was grandſon of EMILIUS PERROT, Counſellor of Parliament, and ſon of NICHOLAS PERROT, Counſellor of the great Chamber. He went through a courſe of ſtudies in Oxford, where he turned Proteſtant; and returning to France, he retired to Chaalons, where part of the Parliament of Paris was at that time, and of which his elder brother Cyprian PERROT was a Counſellor. In Chaalons he married a Lady of noble extraction, Anne des Forges, who brought him Nicholas Perrot Sieur d'Ablancourt, and two daughters, the eldeſt whereof was mother of Mr. Fremont d'Ablancourt (1), whom I ſhall mention below (2). CYPRIAN PERROT, uncle of him whoſe article I am writing, was the father of JOHN PERROT, Preſident of the Inqueſts; who left a ſon named CYPRIAN PERROT, who was maſter of the Requeſts. The Perrots of Geneva, Father Paul's good Perrotto, my Lord Perrot who was in favour for ſome time with Queen Elizabeth, the Perrots of Malmaiſon, one of whom was Provoſt of the Merchants, and the Princeſs of Conti's beautiful Perrot, are all of the ſame family. Chriſtopher de Thou (Thuanus) firſt Preſident in the Parliament of Paris, married a Perrot. Chancellor Boucherat was grandſon of another Perrot, not to mention a great many alliances more with perſons of the long robe (3). Theſe particulars are extracted from a manuſcript letter. Ablancourt's life, written by Patru, may ſerve as a printed proof. It begins with the following words. " The family of the " Perrots has belonged during a long ſeries of years " to the Parliament, and allied to the moſt illuſtrious perſons of the long Robe (4)."

Thuanus (5) enumerates, among thoſe who were killed in the maſſacre on St. Bartholomew's day in Paris, DENYS PERROT (a), the very worthy ſon of EMILIUS PERROT, Counſellor in Parliament of Paris, and was illuſtrious for his probity as for his knowledge. The reader may ſee elſewhere (6) that I am of opinion that this Æmilius Perrot is the ſame perſon with him, who makes a very ſhining figure in Bunel's letters.

(1) Extracted from a letter which Mr. Fremont d'Ablancourt wrote to me, the 14th of April, 1693.

(2) In the rem. [D].

(3) Extracted from the ſame letter.

(4) Patru's works, Tom. 2. p. 334, Dutch edit. 1692.

(5) Thuan. lib. 52. p. m. 1077.

(a) In my copy of the Memoirs of the State of France, under Charles IX. are writ the following words, Ex Libris Dionyſii Perroti 1584. Rem. Crit.

(6) Rem. [A], of the article FERRET.

Father Paul's good Perotto, mentioned in the manuſcript letter, is doubtleſs the ſame FRANCIS PERROT mentioned in Book LXXXII. of Thuanus's Hiſtory (7), as Author of a piece, in which Pope Sixtus's bull againſt the King of Navarre is refuted. This piece was entitled, Aviſo piacevole dato alla bella Italia (8). " This book which Bellarmin refuted, is a cenſure " of the Court of Rome, but its ſtyle is ſo very beau- " tiful, that the Italians themſelves admired it. The " Author's name is Perrot, a native of France, who, " according to Thuanus's Hiſtory, under the year " 1585, accompanied, in his younger days, Gabriel " Aramont, his Majeſty's Embaſſador to Sultan Soly- " man. Coming afterwards to Italy, he got ac- " quainted with ſeveral perſons of eminence; and, " among other great men, with Father Paul, a Divine " of the Republick of Venice, and had a great af- " fection for him till his death. On the other hand, " the Italians had a particular eſteem for him; call- " ing him generally the true Iſraelite, becauſe of " his candour and gentleneſs. This Perrot tranſlated " likewiſe, into Italian, Du Pleſſis-Mornay's truth " of the Chriſtian Religion, printed at Saumur in " 1612. Among our French Writers who applaud " him are, Lewis des Maſures in his Latin Poems, " Hubert Languet in his letters to Sir Philip Sidney, " and Mr. de Liques in du Pleſſis's life (9)."

(7) P. m. 33. ad ann. 1585.

(8) Colomeſius, Biblioth. Choiſie, p. 20, 21.

(9) Page 13. He is there ſtyled Lord of Mezieres, a Pariſian.

[B] At thirteen years of age he had gone through a courſe of claſſical learning.] I would not make any remark on this occaſion, if I was not to correct a fault that is very common among the Writers of Panegyricks. They take pleaſure in ſurpaſſing each other in the matter of beſtowing praiſe, and by that means adulterate the truth. Richelet (10), not thinking it enough that Ablancourt completed his courſe of claſſical learning at thirteen years of age, adds philoſophy to that courſe. However, we may correct this error, as we have the life of that illuſtrious perſonage written by Patru; but if that by Richelet only eighteen years of age he was admitted Advocate of Parliament, and frequented the bar (d): but he ſoon had a diſtaſte for it, and plainly diſcovered a diſinclination for the law. This diſpleaſed his uncle Cyprian Perrot, Counſellor of the great Chamber (e); however, he recovered his favour by quitting the Proteſtant Religion in which he was born. He abjured it at twenty years of age; but nevertheleſs could not be prevailed upon to acquieſce with his uncle's intention, viz. to make him take orders, in hopes that he would one day become a very great preacher (f). He ſpent five or ſix years in ſuch diverſions as ſuit perſons of his age (g); but without entirely neglecting his ſtudies (h). It was then he wrote the Preface to the Honnête Femme, for his friend Father du Boſc. Scarce was this Preface, which is a maſter-piece in our language, publiſhed, but at twenty five or twenty ſix years of age, he had a deſire to return to the religion he had quitted [C], the impreſſions of which had never been perfectly erazed from his mind (i). "That he might not do any thing raſhly, "he firſt began to ſtudy philoſophy, and afterwards divinity; and for that purpoſe choſe, "for his maſter, Mr. Stuart, a Scotchman, and Lutheran, but a very learned man. He "applied himſelf ſo very intenſely, that he uſed to ſpend twelve or fifteen hours a day "in ſtudy; and paſſed near three years in this manner, without hinting his deſign to "any perſon. . . . . He ſet out . . . . from Paris to go to Champagne, where he made a "ſecond abjuration in the Proteſtant Church of the village of Helme, near Vitry; and "very ſoon after he went to Holland, till the noiſe which his quitting his religion would "make was over. He was near a year in Leyden, where he learnt the Hebrew, and "contracted a friendſhip with Salmaſius. From Holland he went to England (k)." He returned to Paris, and after ſpending five or ſix weeks at Mr. Patru's, he took an apartment near Luxemburg, and ſent for two of his nephews to come and live with him (l) [D]. "He paſſed his days very agreeably; and though he devoted the greateſt part of his lei- "ſure to books, he nevertheleſs uſed to ſee company; and frequented the Ladies, and "all perſons of reputation for learning in Paris. Seldom a day paſſed but he went "to Meſſieurs Dupuy, that famous receſs where all perſons of an elegant taſte, and the "literati, uſed to meet (m). In September 1637, he was admitted a Member of the "French Academy with univerſal applauſe, a little after which he undertook a tranſlation "of Tacitus. . . . . But whilſt he was engaged in that laborious taſk he was forced to "leave Paris, to go into the country to look after his eſtate that was not conſiderable, and "which the wars leſſened daily. He therefore broke up houſe-keeping; and retired, "with his ſiſter, to his eſtate called Ablancourt, and lived there till his death. In the "beginning

(10) Richelet, Vie des Auteurs Francois, p. 34. Dutch edit. 1699.

(d) Ibid. p. 339.
(e) Ibid. p. 336.
(f) p. 336.
(g) Ibid.
(b) Ibid. p. 337.
(i) Ibid.
(k) Ibid. p. 338.
(l) Ibid. p. 339.
(m) Ibid.

only were extant, we ſhould at once give credit to whatever he ſays, and publiſh it as a kind of prodigy, for there were ſix claſſes or ſchools in Sedan. Scholars were removed only once a year, and the courſe of philoſophical ſtudies laſted two years at leaſt.

[C] At twenty five or twenty ſix years of age, he had a deſire to return to the religion he had quitted.] The continuator of Moreri, extracting this article of Ablancourt from Patru, has faultered on this occaſion. He did not take notice, that the Author of the original whence he copied, ſuppoſes three years between the deſign and the execution. He affirms that our Perrot quitted the Church of Rome at twenty five years of age; went to Holland, ſtayed near a twelvemonth at Leyden, and contracted a friendſhip with Salmaſius. His firſt error was the occaſion of his falling into a ſecond; he ſuppoſing that Ablancourt left Leyden before he was full ſix and twenty, that is, before the fifth of April 1632: but Salmaſius was not then in Leyden; he not coming to that city till the end of that year (11). It it ſcarce poſſible for a writer to miſplace an incident, without making a ſeries of chronological errors. ["Some neceſſary dates "are wanting here, for inſtance the following. Du "Boſc's Honnête femme was not finiſhed at preſs till "the 7th of February 1633, and Ablancourt wrote "the preface to it. Scarce was this Preface, ſays "Patru, copied by Bayle, publiſhed, but Ablancourt, "at twenty five or twenty ſix years of age, had a de- "ſire to return to the religion (the Proteſtant) he had "quitted, at twenty years of age. Inſtead of ſaying "25 or 26 years of age, it ſhould be 27 years; ſince "it was after the month of February 1633. . . . . "Theſe dates are of ſome conſequence, becauſe Pa- "tru adds that Ablancourt, that he might not do any "thing raſhly, firſt began to ſtudy philoſophy, and after- "wards divinity . . . . . and paſſed near three years in "this ſtudy. . . . . Afterwards he ſet out . . . . . from "Paris to go to Champaign, where he made a ſecond "abjuration. Patru does not ſay in what year this hap- "pened, but according to his calculation, Ablancourt "would not have abjured the Romiſh Religion till "the beginning of the year 1636. The fact is, we "ought to ſubſtract almoſt the half of, near three "years; it being certain that Ablancourt abjured the "Romiſh Religion as early as 1634, leſs than eighteen "months after the publication of his preface to the "Honnête Femme. Here follows the proof of that "date. Ablancourt, after making this ſecond ab- "juration, went preſently into Holland, which muſt "have taken up ſome time. He ſtaid near a twelve- "month in Leyden. . . . . From Holland he went into "England. We are not told how long he ſtaid there, "however, he continued at leaſt ſome months. He "afterwards returned to Paris. Since therefore it "cannot be doubted but that he was in that city, "the beginning of the year 1636, we are forced to "conclude, that he had left France a very little af- "ter the middle of the year 1634. Hence it fol- "lows, that ſince he was not deſirous of returning to "the Proteſtant Religion till after February 1633, "it is falſe to aſſert that he paſſed three years in or- "der to inſtruct himſelf, that he might not do any "thing raſhly. . . . . The firſt work which Ablan- "court printed, after his return to Paris, was, his "tranſlation of the Octavius of Minutius Felix. He "finiſhed it before Auguſt 1636, and gave the copy "to Camuſat, who obtained a licenſe to print it, "the 3d of September following, and was finiſhed at "the preſs the 24th of December of the ſame year 1636. "Ablancourt dedicated this book to Philander, (Mr. "Conrart) with whom he had got acquainted "the beginning of that year; that Gentleman hav- "ing prompted him to engage in that tranſlation. "This proves what I have ſaid above, that Ablan- "court was returned to Paris the beginning of the "year 1636. He had been ſome time in that "city when he had got acquainted with Mr. Con- "rart *."

(11) Antonius Clementius, in Vita Salmaſii, p. 42.

* From the rem. to the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. Tom. 4. p. 972.

[D] He ſent for two of his nephews to come and live with him.] Theſe were his eldeſt ſiſter's ſons, and their names were Fremont. "No children ever "had a better education. The ſecond is dead; but "Mr. de Fremont d'Ablancourt, the eldeſt of the "two, has plainly ſhewn that education was beſtowed "upon him to good purpoſe. He wrote the dia- "logue of the letters of the Alphabet, and the Sup- "plement to the true Hiſtory, annexed to his uncle's "tranſlation

" beginning of his retirement into the country, he uſed to come pretty often to ſpend " the winter in Paris. . . . . But at laſt he quite left that city, and viſited it upon no other " account but to get his works printed (n). . . . . He had been troubled with the gravel " all his life time : and there was a time in which he could not either ride on horſeback " nor go in a coach, and was forced to make uſe of a cane in walking : but afterwards, " for exerciſe ſake, working in his garden, this leſſened his diſorder in a great degree, " and reſtored his ſtrength in ſome meaſure, inſomuch that he could ride in any kind of " vehicle, and even throw aſide his cane, which he nevertheleſs was forced to make uſe " of ſoon after. . . . . In the beginning of October 1664, he had ſo violent a fit of the " gravel, that he expected to die every moment : nevertheleſs his pain was aſſwaged " three or four days after (o), but it returned a little after, and continued till his death. . . . " He ſubmitted very patiently to the tedious, acute pains with which he was then afflicted " [E]. He was viſited during the whole courſe of his ſickneſs by the Proteſtant Mini- " ſter of Vitry, and by Mr. du Boſc, a famous Proteſtant Miniſter of Caen, " then baniſhed to Chalons." At laſt he died in the arms of his ſiſter and his nephew Ablan- court, the 27th of November, aged fifty eight years, eight (p) months, and twelve days (q). [" He died the 17th of November 1664, in the fifty ninth year of his age *."] Moreri has given a catalogue of his works, the greateſt part of which conſiſt in tranſlations. The reaſon which made him chooſe to be a tranſlator rather than an Author, deſerves to be mentioned [F] ; as alſo the reaſon why he thought it neceſſary for Princes to under-ſtand Latin [G]. He never entered into the marriage ſtate ; nor was of a very amorous complexion, and had a blunt way with him which did not very well ſuit the paſſion of love (r).

(n) Ibid. p. 340.

(o) Ibid.

(p) It ſhould be ſeven.

(q) Ablancourt's Life, p. 342.

* Niceron, Hommes illuſtres, Tom. 6. p. 325.

(r) Ibid. p. 349.

" He " tranſlation of Lucian, which met with ſo favour- " able a reception from the publick. One of the " greateſt Princes of Europe invited him to educate " one of his ſons ; and the important employments " he has ſo worthily filled, are ſufficient proofs of " his genius and capacity (12)." Patru might here have added, the eſteem which Marſhal Turenne had for Fremont d'Ablancourt. It was that Marſhal who procured him that employment of Envoy to the King of Portugal in 1663 (13), and that of Reſident of France at Straſburg in 1675. Mr. Fremont returned to France after the death of his patron, and ſpent his days very happily, in the ſtudy of good Authors and the converſation of perſons of genius, till the laſt efforts of the perſecution obliged him to go in ſearch of liberty of conſcience in foreign countries. He made ſome ſtay in Groningen, after which he came and ſettled at the Hague, where he was highly eſteemed by the Prince and Princeſs of Orange ; had the honour of being appointed hiſtoriographer, and a handſome penſion ſettled on him. He died at the Hague about ſix or ſeven years ago (14). He was a man of merit, greatly zealous for the Proteſtant Religion, and who did not ſcruple to write a French Catechiſm. He knew a numberleſs multitude of particulars, which are extremely well adapted to converſation, and he delivered them in a graceful manner. As he diſcovered ſo much kindneſs and humanity in his behaviour, the publick were ſurpriſed at the peruſal of a little piece publiſhed by him againſt Amelot de la Houſſaye in 1686 (15). He was angry, and carried his paſſion to a much greater height, than could have been expected from a perſon of his gravity and years, who had left his native country for religion's ſake. Several perſons endeavoured to make his apology, by aſcribing this warmth to the regard he had for the memory of his dear uncle Ablancourt : but as the conteſt did not relate to his uncle's character, as a man of probity ; but only to enquire whether his tranſlation of Tacitus deſerved cenſure, inſtead of enjoying the high reputation to which it attained, I am of opinion that his apology might have been drawn up in more gentle terms. He publiſhed ſome dialogues in 1684, which are mentioned in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (16). A few days ſince (17) were publiſhed his Memoirs, containing the Hiſtory of Portugal, from the treaty of the Pyrenees in 1659, till the year 1668. They are very well worth reading.

(12) Patru's works, in Ablancourt's Life, p. 339.

(13) See Ablancourt's Memoirs, p. 127 & ſeq.

(14) I writ this in January 1701.

(15) See Nouv. de la Republique des Lettres, for Dec. 1686, p. 1460 & ſeq.

(16) Under March, in the catalogue of books juſt publiſhed. Numb. 4. p. 90 & ſeq.

(17) I writ this in January 1701.

[E] He ſubmitted very patiently to the tedious, acute pains with which he was then afflicted.] We do not meet with the following particular, which I ſhall here cite from the Menagiana (18), in Patru's relation. " Mr. d'Ablancourt . . . . . was ſtudying over " the oven, in the winter ſeaſon, at a paſtry-cook's " (19). Being about ſixty three years of age (20), " and tormented with the ſtone, of which his fa- " ther died, he was deſirous of coming to Paris, in " order to be cut for it ; but reflecting that it being " then the month of November, he ſhould be then " obliged to wait till the ſpring, and that this would " put him to great expence ; he formed a reſolution " to abſtain from eating, the ſooner to end his evils, " and put it in execution. However, being ſtrongly " exhorted to take ſome ſuſtenance, he ſuffered him- " ſelf to be perſuaded ; but it was too late, ſo that " he died." Patru would very probably have ſuppreſſed this circumſtance, though he had known it to be certainly true.

(18) Menagiana, p. 324, 325, of the 1ſt Dutch edit.

(19) See the Menagiana, p. 397.

(20) There is a miſtake here, he not living quite fifty-nine years.

There are certain things, which perſons chooſe to ſuppreſs entirely, rather than ſhew the falſity of them. They even often think, that it will be more advantageous to the memory of their friends, not to have it known that they have been aſperſed, than to publiſh the falſity of the calumnies ſpread againſt them. But there are ſome occaſions, in which they think it a duty incumbent on themſelves to inform the publick, that innocence has been cruelly abuſed. This part Mr. le Gendre acted with regard to d'Ablancourt. " Heaven permitted Mr. du Boſc to viſit " him, in his expiring moments, to undeceive the " world with regard to the falſe reports, which were " ſpread, and which even reached the King's ear, " as if he had left the world in a deſpairing condi- " tion. But this was a horrid calumny, which Mr. " du Boſc invalidated in his letters to Mr. Conrart, " who was ſo much the more afflicted at the injury " which was done to his friend's memory, as it af- " fected all the Proteſtants : thoſe who ſpread this " falſe report to his Majeſty, adding, that all the " Huguenots in general died in this frame of mind " (21)."

(21) Le Gendre, Vie de du Boſc. P. 37.

[F] The reaſon which made him chooſe to be a tranſlator, rather than an Author, deſerves to be mentioned.] " His genius reſembled very much that of Mon- " tagne ; and had he thought proper to have written " as an Author, he was not wanting in any of the " qualities which conſtitute ſuch a one. He was " poſſeſſed of a very fruitful imagination, and had " acquired a large ſtock of the moſt valuable erudi- " tion. But when any one ſpoke to him about this, " he would anſwer, that he was neither a Divine nor " Lawyer, and conſequently not qualified to com- " poſe pleading or ſermons. That the world was " filled with treatiſes on politicks ; that all diſcourſes " in morality were only ſo many repetitions from " Plutarch and Seneca ; and that, to ſerve one's " country, a man ought rather to tranſlate valuable " Authors, than to write new books, which ſeldom " publiſhed any thing new (22)."

(22) Patin, Vie d'Ablancourt, P. 345, 346.

[G] The reaſon why he thought it neceſſary for Princes to underſtand Latin.] He uſed to ſay, that it was proper they ſhould learn that tongue, becauſe they thereby would learn, from the antients, ſeveral things which they otherwiſe could not be informed of : and ſee the virtuous and good men of antiquity condemning ſuch Princes, as are wanting in the duties of their function (23). There is ſmartneſs in this thought, and a certain

(23) Menagiana, P. 389, 390.

" He ſlept, eat, and wrote indifferently at all hours either of the day or night: but after " he had worked about two hours, he uſed to unbend himſelf, either by walking or read- " ing ſome agreeable work; and after amuſing himſelf about half an hour he uſed to " return to his writing. He wrote a very bad hand, inſomuch that, in his later years, " he often could not read his own manuſcript." He drank but little wine, but had a " ſtrong head, and bore wine well, ſo that he was never injured by it (s). He was ſon " to a man who had compoſed an hundred thouſand verſes, and yet our Ablancourt could " never write two together (t)" He was delightful in converſation [H]. The hints of his friends were of great ſervice to him in correcting his compoſitions; but they might have been of ſtill greater advantage [I], had he not been ſo eager of returning back to his houſe in the country, whilſt his works were printing. His manner of tranſlating did not pleaſe univerſally, though it was admired by all perſons of genius and learning of this age. He indeed ſometimes takes liberties (u). He has apologized for this in his Prefaces, and ſhewn, that he propoſed to himſelf the true idea of a good tranſlator, who ought to render the ſenſe of his original, without diveſting it of any parts of its ſtrength or graces. . . . . This is what he has ſo happily practiſed; and his lively and bold expreſſions are ſo far from ſervileneſs, that his tranſlations ſeem to be originals, and not tranſlations (x). Such is the character that is given in his elogium; but ſome are of opinion that he took ſome improper liberties (y). He poſſeſſed a great fund of erudition, and applied himſelf in a very

(s) Ibid. p. 347.

(t) Ibid.

(u) Ibid. p. 345.

(x) Ibid.

(y) See Baillet, Jugement des Savans, ſur les traducteurs Francois, num. 950. Menage called Ablancourt's tranſlation of Tacitus, The Faitbleſs Beauty. Menagiana, p. 324. 1ſt Dutch edit.

tain luſtre which may dazzle and charm thoſe who do not go to the bottom of things, A ſatyrical ſtroke, ſtrongly expreſſed, gives a great beauty to a moral picture, and eſpecially when human grandeurs are the object of ſuch cenſure. This is the preſent caſe. Ablancourt's reflection impoſes upon us by that means, and draws its chief beauty from thence; but this is no more than an exterior beauty. Examine his aſſertion carefully, fathom it, and it will appear like gilded wood: it is mere outſide, a mere ſuperficial ornament. There is no ſuch nation, where learning flouriſhes, but tells their Princes, in their mother tongue, the truths they ought to know; and may inſtruct them as well in their duties as well as the Latin Authors. I would aſk in what manner the books of the antient Romans can furniſh leſſons to Princes in theſe latter ages? It is not by ſaying to them, you have committed a great error, an act of injuſtice by ſuch and ſuch an action. It is only by cenſuring the injuſtice and faults which were committed antiently. But are there books wanting, written in the modern languages, which exhibit the faults of Princes in the ſtrongeſt light? and which blacken the memory of thoſe who have ſwayed the ſcepter unjuſtly, either lately in foreign countries, or formerly in the very country where ſuch books are writ? To ſay nothing of ſermons or political pieces; let us only conſider the Hiſtorians, Mezerai for inſtance, who was contemporary with Ablancourt. I confeſs that he did not give the hiſtory of his own times; but he comes infinitely nearer to it than Livy, Tacitus, or any other of the antient Latin Authors; and he cenſures with great ſtrength and freedom, the evil adminiſtration of ſuch Kings of France as he treats of. Both themſelves and their Miniſters are, whenever truth requires, laſhed in his Hiſtory, as if they were ſo many little boys. Varillas takes the ſame liberty, though ſo great a flatterer of his contemporaries; and we generally find that thoſe who flatter moſt the tranſactions of the preſent times, cenſure moſt ſharply the faults of paſt times (24). Conſequently the reaſon given by Ablancourt, why Princes ought to underſtand Latin, is falſe. It is ſo much the worſe reaſon, as he could not but know, that for theſe three hundred years the compoſitions of the antient Romans have been tranſlating perpetually. And if he thought it of ſo much advantage to Princes to ſtudy that language, why did he himſelf furniſh them with ſo fair a pretence not to ſtudy it? They need only ſay, that his tranſlations diſpenſed them from it. His own actions deſtroyed therefore his theſis.

(24) See citat. (17), of the article of MARSHAL DE MARILLAC.

(25) Patru's Life of Ablancourt, p. 349.

(26) Vigneul de Marville is therefore in the right, when he ſays in his Melanges (Miſcellanies), p. 324. Tom. 1. that the Prince of Conde had ſome of thoſe Petits Maitres. His obſervation with regard to the origin and character of thoſe people is curious enough. Add to this what the Continuator of la Bruyere, or the Modern Theophraſtus, ſays of this, p. 322 & ſeq. of his Nouveau Caracteres ſur les mœurs, Dutch edit. See alſo Bordellon's Diverſitez curieuſes, part. 10. p. 359, Dutch edit.

[H] He was delightful in converſation (25).] " In " his younger days, no man could poſſibly be ſprightlier. He was all vivacity and wit; all which was " heightened with a certain turn, which is learnt only in the polite world . . . . . He preſerved his " gaiety of temper till his death. In the ſuburbs of " St. Germain, he got acquainted with all thoſe Noblemen who formed the Prince's court, and who " were then called the Petits-Maîtres (26). But he " was prodigiouſly careſſed by Monſieur de Colligny " and de la Mouſſaye. When any of them went to " Vitry or Châlons, or to ſome place that was not very far from the place where he lived, they always " ſent for him; and an entertainment would have " been nothing without Mr. Ablancourt. He had a " perpetual fund of diſcourſe at meals or in converſation. He ſpoke much, but never tired the hearers, what he ſaid being always new and agreeable. One would have concluded, that he had ſtudied all he ſaid, ſo pertinent were his ſtrokes of " raillery; but theſe were employed always to defend himſelf, without diſpleaſing any perſon. I ſhall confirm this by a paſſage from the Menagiana. D'Albancourt uſed to ſay ſo many valuable and agreeable things in converſation, that Peliſſon ſaid, it was pity a Clerk was not always ſtanding by him, to write down all he ſpoke (27).

(27) Menagiana, p. 525. 1ſt Dutch edit.

[I] The hints of his friends were of great ſervice to him . . . . but they might have been of ſtill greater advantage.] The following paſſage not only forms a conſiderable part of Ablancourt's character, and the hiſtory of his ſtudies, but will alſo be an inſtruction to other Authors, if they avoid ſuch things as are defective in this example. At firſt he conſulted no one but Mr. Patru; but after he had got acquainted with Mr. Conrart and Mr. Chapelain, he conſulted them alſo; but eſpecially Mr. Conrart in concert with whom he uſed to reviſe all his works; and with ſo much the more pleaſure, becauſe he did not underſtand either Greek or Latain, and for that reaſon gave him leſs trouble. For, whenever he came to Paris to put any work to preſs, he wanted to get back as ſoon as poſſible; for which reaſon, whenever his friends uſed to ſtart any difficulties, he would defend his compoſitions with great warmth, and be almoſt angry; becauſe theſe difficulties gave him trouble, and conſequently delayed his return. And this temper gained ſo great an aſcendant over him, that, in the latter part of his life, and when he compoſed his laſt tranſlations, he did not conſult, at leaſt would not be directed by any perſon. Now this was not the effect either of preſumption or vanity; it was only haſte, and a too eager deſire to get rid of his burthen: for, whenever he had finiſhed a book at preſs, he would gladly receive any hints which might be given him; and even entreated his friends to favour him with their criticiſms, for the ſecond edition. On this occaſion it will be proper to mention a pretty remarkable particular. Hitherto he had reviſed all his works with Mr. Patru; but ever ſince his tranſlation of Arrian, the whole of which they examined together in eight or ten afternoons, he printed all the firſt editions of his books without communicating them to him, becauſe he gave him too much trouble. He did the ſame with regard to his verſion of Lucian; but after it was printed and publiſhed, he intreated this dear friend to reviſe it. This dear friend complied with his requeſt, and ſent him his remarks. Moſt of them were approved of by him; and as for thoſe which he would not agree to, he referred them to Meſſ. Conrart and Chapelain; when Mr. Patru joined with them, and then they ſettled, in concert, the ſeveral difficulties. For this reaſon, the ſecond edition, printed after theſe obſervations, is much more correct than the firſt (28).

(28) Patru's Life of Ablancourt, p. 346, 347.

[K] He

very particular manner to the ſtudy of the bible [K]. Here follow his notions with regard to the immortality of the Soul [L]. See his elogium by Patru, from which I have extracted moſt of the above-mentioned particulars. It contains a great many more, which [K] He poſſeſſed a great fund of erudition, and applied himſelf in a very particular manner to the ſtudy of the bible.] " He poſſeſſed a lively, penetrating " genius. Whenever he attempted to examine any " difficult point, he immediately ſaw through every part of it. He was well ſkilled in Philoſophy, " Divinity, Hiſtory, and Polite Literature in general. He underſtood Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Italian and Spaniſh. He had a perfect knowledge of " religion, and was more knowing in it, than was requiſite for his ſalvation. However, ſo great a variety of knowledge, ſo vaſt a fund of the deepeſt erudition, neither dulled his genius, nor confuſed or " clouded his judgment. He ſaw clearly into all " things, in antient as well as in modern Authors. " In the latter part of his life, he ſtudied ſcarce any " thing but the ſacred writings, and the relations " and hiſtories of America; but particularly the ſacred writings, which we may call his moſt tender, " his laſt amours. He had all the good Commentators on the Bible, whether general or particular: " and there was not a ſingle difficulty in it, but " was cleared by him, and with which he was thoroughly acquainted (29)." [I am of opinion, that Patru has flattered Ablancourt too much, and every part of his panegyric appears to me ſtrained *].

(29) Patru's Life of Ablancourt, p. 348, 349.

* From the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. Tom. 4. p. 972.

[L] Here follow his notions, with regard to the immortality of the ſoul.] Having aſſerted in converſation, that religion, not natural reaſon, teaches the immortality of the ſoul (30), he drew up a diſcourſe, and ſent it to Mr. Patru to juſtify his opinion (31). He affirms in this diſcourſe, " That it is above the ordinary " ſtrength of our minds, to attain to a perfect knowledge of the ſoul; and there is not any reaſon " which can prove its immortality (32)." He mentions the chief of thoſe reaſons, and adds, that they are good indeed to confirm, in that belief, a ſoul which is already enlightened by grace; but that they are not capable of ſatisfying a man, who is guided by no other light than that of nature. He ſpeaks of (33) the blindneſs and ignorance of Philoſophers in that matter, and how confuſed Ariſtotle's doctrine is in that point; but obſerves that this is no wonder; for that the light of the Goſpel had not yet illuminated the world; and that, as this truth is ſuperior to man's reaſon, it ſtood in need of a ſupernatural aid, in order to its being known (34). . . . You muſt confeſs, ſays he (35), to his friend Patru, that it is faith, not natural reaſon, which makes us Chriſtians; and that I may be allowed to ſay, (ſpeaking as a Naturaliſt) that the reſurrection is impoſſible, provided I believe that God, by his infinite power, can do things which are naturally impoſſible. I therefore ſpoke as I ought to have done, when I aſſerted, that human reaſon could not make me comprehend that our ſouls are immortal; but that the ſcriptures, and the revelations that God indulged to his church, had taught me this truth, which is the foundation of all our religion. He then aſſerts, that his opinion is much better than it would be, were it grounded upon philoſophical proofs (36). " You believe the immortality of the " ſoul, becauſe your reaſon ſhews it you; and I, in " oppoſition to my ſenſe, believe our ſouls to be immortal, becauſe our religion commands me to believe in that manner. Conſider theſe opinions, " and you doubtleſs will confeſs that mine is greatly preferable. Yours is not ſo much as Catholic. . . . (37). As it is not ſufficient, in order for " our being virtuous, to do good actions, but our intentions muſt alſo be innocent, and our actions reſult from a laudable motive; in like manner it is " not ſufficient, in order for our being good Catholicks, not to doubt of any thing, which the church " enjoins us to believe; but we likewiſe muſt believe " as Chriſtians; and our faith ought to be the effect of humility, not of preſumption. . . . (38). " That man does not rely entirely upon God, who " depends upon reaſon with regard to ſuch things as " he will have us believe. If indeed our reaſon never deceived us, and we had a perfect knowledge " even of ſuch things as fall under our ſenſes, our " raſhneſs would perhaps be excuſable; and it would " not be ſurprizing, that not finding any thing here " below capable of fixing us, we therefore ſhould be " prompted to ſearch for things above us. But you " know better than I do, how far the knowledge " of mankind extends; and that there are ſo many " things in nature, in which Philoſophy is totally " blind, that we very juſtly diſtruſt our ſtrength and " reaſon. None but a Novice in Philoſophy, will " think that all kinds of queſtions may be eaſily reſolved. Thoſe who dive farther into the knowledge of things, meet with much greater difficulties. Frequently two contrary opinions are found " equally probable; and if they declare for one of " them, it is rather from inclination than reaſon. " Man cannot judge with certainty of any one " thing in the world; his reaſon commits miſtakes, " as does his ſenſes: we live in the midſt of doubts " and errors; and there are few certain truths here below, except ſuch as God hath revealed to his church. " View all the ſchools of the Philoſophers, examine " what is done, and what is taught in them; in " the one thou wilt find preſumption, in another " obſtinacy; but ignorance, error and weakneſs in " all. Our weakneſs is certainly of uſe, in order to " keep us to our duty . . . (39). If our reaſon is ſo " vaſtly weak, that the leaſt difficulties check its " progreſs; and that it is every moment miſtaken, " we muſt take great care not to truſt ourſelves to the " conduct of ſo blind a guide, and eſtabliſh our belief on ſo rotten a foundation. We muſt not rely on our arguments, but on him who made hea" ven and earth . . . (40). We ſhould always call " to mind, that we ought to believe in God, and " not in ourſelves; and that to make uſe of our " reaſon in divine things, would be acting like that " Cynic, who, not contented with the light of the " ſun, ſought for a good man, at noon-day, with a " candle."

(30) Patru's works, in Ablancourt's Life, p. 355.

(31) The whole is inſerted in Tom. 2. of Patru's works, p. 354 & ſeq.

(32) Ibid. p. 356.

(33) Ibid. p. 357.

(34) Ibid. p. 358.

(35) Ibid.

(36) Ibid. p. 361.

(37) Ibid. p. 362.

(38) Ibid. p. 363.

(39) Ibid. p. 364.

(40) Ibid. p. 365.

Des Cartes, and his moſt zealous followers, might object to certain particulars in ſome of the thoughts mentioned above; but this would be only as mere Philoſophers; for the inſtant they ſhould conſider themſelves as Chriſtians, they would entirely approve of Ablancourt's opinion. They are perſuaded that their proofs of the ſoul's immortality are demonſtrative: and therefore would have been diſpleaſed at his ſuppoſing, that the light of reaſon does not exhibit good proofs of this immortality: but after all, they would conſider him only as heterodox in philoſophy: and would confeſs that, as a Chriſtian, he was fully orthodox (41). Perſuaſion, grounded on the light of nature, ought to be conſidered in a Chriſtian, as eloquence in a philoſopher, embelliſhments in a Hiſtory, or beauty in a wreſtler or champion (42). Theſe are things, the privation of which is no great evil, though it is no diſadvantage to poſſeſs them. A Philoſopho ſi afferat eloquentiam, non aſperner: ſi non habeat, non admodum flagitem (43). i. e. " Was " a Philoſopher to ſhew eloquence, I would not diſ" dain it; but were he not to exhibit any, I would " not require it." It is an advantage, to be able to reconcile the truths of the Chriſtian Religion with the principles of the philoſophers; this is a happy effect that ought not to be neglected, but on the contrary, ought to be cultivated as much as poſſible; but we ſhould always be very ready to loſe it without any regret, whenever we are not able to extend ſo far as thoſe doctrines which are out of its reach; and which, from the nature of myſtery, are above the reach of our reaſon. Men ſhould be diſpoſed or affected with regard to that advantage, as wiſe men are with reſpect to fortune. If ſhe makes her favours permanent, wiſe men are very glad: but if ſhe takes her flight, they are not troubled at it. I praiſe her, ſays Horace, when ſhe reſides with me; but the inſtant I ſee her prepare to leave me, I return her the preſents ſhe gave, and wrap myſelf in my virtue.

(41) Compare this with rem. [M], of the art. DICEARCHUS.

(42) Lucianus in libello de hac re, unum ait eſſe opus Hiſtoriæ, unumque finem, utilitatem: jucundum vero ſi & ipſum ſequatur, melius hoc eſſe: perinde atque in athleta vires requiruntur, forma ac venuſtas laudantur. Famian. Strada, Proluſ. 2. lib. 2. p. m. 223.

(43) Cicero de Finibus, lib. 1. cap. 5.

Laudo

which cannot but pleaſe thoſe, who are deſirous of knowing the particular circumſtances relating to the lives of famous men. I am to obſerve, that Patru repreſents our Ablancourt as poſſeſſed of the moſt excellent moral qualities.

Laudo manentem. Si celeres quatit
Pennas, reſigno quæ dedit, & meâ
Virtute me involvo (44).

(44) Horat. Od. 29. lib. 3.

" Whene'er ſhe ſtays with what ſhe brings,
" I'm pleas'd, but when ſhe ſhakes her wings,
" I ſtrait reſign my juſt pretence.
" I give her back her fading gold ;
" Myſelf in my virtue fold :
" And live content with want and innocence."
CREECH.

In this manner Chriſtians behave with regard to philoſophical knowledge. If after they have proved ſome tenet in religion, it oppoſes them, and ſerves the contrary tenet ; we let it go, ſay they, and wrap ourſelves up in our faith. This is a thick vail, which is quite proof againſt all the inclemencies of the air or weather, that is, againſt all the aſſaults of natural reaſon. Ablancourt acted in this manner. Nothing can be more judicious or ſolid than his reflections on the nature of faith, and the good uſe we ought to make of the uncertainty of reaſon. The certainty of divine faith is above that of ſcience or knowledge. That man would therefore be very unjuſt, who ſhould aſſert that a Chriſtian ſtood in need of philoſophical proofs, in order to be certainly ſure that his ſoul will not die. Is it not enough that he is certain of it by his ſubmiſſion to the authority of Heaven, and by a firm perſuaſion, that no foundation is ſo firm and immoveable as the word of God ? And muſt not a Chriſtian, if he is deſirous of acting as ſuch, believe the immortality of the Soul, becauſe God promiſes us eternal life ? If ſuch a one believe the immortality of the Soul merely from philoſophical reaſons, this would not be an act of faith ; and yet he muſt exert ſuch an act, if he is deſirous of complying with the duties of religion, and making himſelf agreeable to God. Chriſtians in an act of faith have no regard to the light of nature ; but rejecting it entirely, they rely on God's veracity. See what ſchoolmen ſay, when they enquire, whether opinion, knowledge and faith, can exiſt in our minds, at the ſame time, with regard to the ſame object.

I here have a very fine opportunity to quote a paſſage which I promiſed before (45). Mr. Locke was much in the ſame caſe with Mr. Ablancourt : he being cenſured for aſſerting, that the Soul's immortality was not clearly proved by the light of reaſon. Here follows his opinion (46). " This your accuſation of " my leſſening the credibility of theſe articles of " faith, [the immortality of the Soul, and the reſur- " rection of the body] is founded on this, that the " article of the immortality of the Soul abates of " its credibility, if it be allowed, that its immateria- " lity (which is the ſuppoſed proof from reaſon and " philoſophy of its immortality) cannot be demon- " ſtrated from natural reaſon : which argument of " your Lordſhip's bottoms, as I humbly conceive, on " this, that Divine Revelation abates of his credibi- " lity in all thoſe articles proportionably, as human " reaſon fails to ſupport the teſtimony of GOD. " And all that your Lordſhip in thoſe paſſages has " ſaid, when examined, will, I ſuppoſe, be found to " import thus much, viz. Does God promiſe any " thing to mankind to be believed ? It is very " fit and credible to be believed, if reaſon can de- " monſtrate it to be true. But if human reaſon comes " ſhort in the caſe, and cannot make it out, its " credibility is thereby leſſened ; which is, in effect, " to ſay, that the veracity of God is not a firm and " ſure foundation of faith to rely upon, without the " concurring teſtimony of reaſon, i. e. with reverence " be it ſpoken, GOD is not to be believed on his own " word, unleſs what he reveals be in itſelf credible, " and might be believed without him. I could not " have imagined to find this in a book, written in " defence of the myſtery of the Holy Trinity. Your " Lordſhip ſays, You do not queſtion whether God can " give immortality to a material ſubſtance ; but you ſay " it takes off very much from the evidence of immorta- " lity, if it depends wholly upon GOD's giving that, " which of its own nature it is not capable of. To which " I reply, any one's not being able to demonſtrate " the ſoul to be immaterial, takes off not very much, " nor at all from the evidence of its immortality, if " GOD has revealed that it ſhall be immortal, becauſe " the veracity of GOD is a demonſtration of the truth " of what he has revealed ; and the want of another " demonſtration of a propoſition, that is demonſtra- " tively true, takes not off from the evidence of it. " For where there is a clear demonſtration, there is " as much evidence as any truth can have, that is " not ſelf-evident (47) . . . Can any one who admits " of divine revelation . . . . think this propoſiiton " leſs credible, the bodies of men, after the reſur- " rection, ſhall live for ever ; than this, the ſouls of " men ſhall, after the reſurrection, live for ever ? " For that he muſt do, if he thinks either of them " is leſs credible than the other. If this be ſo, rea- " ſon is to be conſulted, how far GOD is to be be- " lieved ; and the credit of divine teſtimony muſt re- " ceive its force from the evidence of reaſon, which " is evidently to take away the credibility of divine " revelation, in all ſupernatural truths, wherein the " evidence of reaſon fails."

(47) Locke, ibid. p. 420, 421.

The Reader will find in the article POMPONATIUS ſeveral particulars relating to this ſubject ; but it muſt be obſerved, that many Schoolmen have aſſerted, that the reaſons, from the light of nature, for the ſoul's immortality, are not convincing and demonſtrative. Naturæ rationes Henricus atque Scotus probabiliter ſuadere ajunt, non neceſſario demonſtrare (48). Cajetanus, who had rejected that opinion in a haughty and publick manner (49), at laſt embraced it. I believe, ſays he, that our ſoul is immortal, but I do not know it to be ſo : ſe credere quidem animam rationalem incorruptibilem eſſe, at neſcire tamen (50). Himſelf and Scotus, and Joannes de Janduno, after having examined all the proofs alledged by Thomas Aquinas, declared that they were not demonſtrative : Pronuntiarunt tandem rem non eſſe demonſtratam, ſed creditam (51). Scotus anſwered all theſe proofs of Thomas Aquinas. The laſt mentioned writer propoſed twenty one probable reaſons for the ſoul's mortality, to which Joannes Janduno has added ſeveral others (52).

(48) Melchior. Canus, Locor. Commun. lib. 12. cap. ult. p. m. 724.

(49) Idem, ib.

(50) Idem, ib.

(51) Idem, ib. p. 725.

(52) Idem, ib. p. 727.

(45) Citation (63), of the art. DICEARCHUS.

(46) Mr. Locke's Reply to the Biſhop of Wincheſt. Anſwer to his ſecond Letter, p. 418, 419. See alſo Nouv. de la Republ. des Lettres, Nov. 1699. p. 510.

PERSIUS (CAIUS (a), was one of the moſt learned men of his time [A]. He was queſtor of Rome in 608, and Prætor two years after (b). Lucilius the Poet dreaded him ;

(a) Pliny calls him Manius, in Father Hardouin's edition. See the remark [A].

(b) According to Voſſius, de Poet. Latin. p. 41.

[A] One of the moſt learned men of his time.] Cicero mentions him two or three times. He introduces Craſſus the Orator declaring, that, like the Poet Lucilius, he does not require quite ignorant judges, nor ſuch as are very learned : and on this occaſion he informs us that Perſius, one of thoſe whom that Poet did not deſire to have for one of his readers, was one of the moſt learned men that had been ſeen in Rome (1). Nam ut Cajus Lucilius homo doctus & perurbanus dicere ſolebat, ea quæ ſcriberet neque ab indoctiſſimis neque ab doctiſſimis legi velle, quod alteri nihil intelligerent, alteri plus fortaſſe quàm ipſe de ſe ; quo etiam ſcripſit ; Perſium non curo legere, hic enim fuit, ut noramus, omnium fere noſtrorum hominum doctiſſimus ; Lælium Decimum volo, quem cognovimus virum bonum & non illiteratum, ſed nihil ad Perſium ; ſic ego ſi jam mihi diſputandum ſit de his noſtris ſtudiis, nolim equidem apud ruſticos, ſed multo minus apud vos, malo enim non intelligi orationem meam, quàm reprehendi. i. e. " For " as Caius Lucilius, a man of great learning and po- " liteneſs, uſed to ſay, that he would not willingly " have his compoſitions peruſed either by the moſt " learned or moſt ignorant men ; becauſe the latter " underſtood nothing, and the former perhaps knew " more him; and ingenuously confeſſed, that he did not write for ſuch people; and deſired to have readers leſs learned than he. Some were of opinion, that Perſius wrote the ſpeech which was ſpoke by the Conſul Caius Fannius, againſt Caius Gracchus, the year of Rome 631 (c). The reaſon of this was, Fannius was but an indifferent Orator, and at the ſame time his ſpeech was ſo beautiful, that others imagined that many perſons of great learning and talents had ſhared in the writing of it (d). It was not very extraordinary in that age, for one man to draw up an Oration, and another to ſpeak it: nevertheleſs Tully refutes thoſe who did not aſcribe this Oration to Fannius. Some writers have been ſo ſtrangely miſtaken in chronology, as to confound our Perſius with the Poet of the following article [B].

(1) Cicero, de Oratore, lib. 2.

(c) Alii à C. Perſio literato homine ſcriptam eſſe ajebant, illo quem ſignificat valde doctum eſſe Lucilium; alii multos nobiles quod quiſque potuiſſet in illam orationem contuliſſe. Cicero, in Bruto.

(d) Eam ſuſpicionem propter hanc cauſam credo fuiſſe, quod Fannius in mediocribus Oratoribus habitus eſſet, oratio autem vel optima eſſet illo quidem tempore orationum omnium. Cicero, in Bruto.

" more than himſelf: he alſo ſaid, that he was not " willing to have his writings read by Perſius, whom " he knew was very near the moſt learned man a- " mong the Romans: but he deſired to have ſuch " readers as Lælius Decimus, who was allowed to be " a man of probity and no ways illiterate, but infi- " nitely inferior to Perſius. Thus, with regard to " myſelf, were I to argue upon my ſtudies, I would " not like to do this in preſence of ignorant people, " much leſs before you; for I had rather my oration " ſhould not be underſtood than to have it meet with " cenſure." Cicero, in another place (z), declares, that he is not of Lucilius's temper; for that reaſon he ſhould be glad to be read by Perſius. Nec enim ut noſter Lucilius recuſabo quo minus omnes mea legant. Utinam eſſet ille Perſius; Scipio vero & Rutilius multo etiam magis, quorum ille judicium reformidans Tarentinis ait ſe & Conſentinis & Siculis ſcribere. i. e. " I will " not, like Lucilius, be againſt every perſon's read- " ing my compoſitions. I ſhould be glad were they " read by ſuch men as Perſius; and much more by " Scipio and Rutilius, whoſe judgment being dreaded " by him, he therefore ſays that he wrote to the " Tarentines, the Conſentini, and Sicilians." Pliny, being deſirous of employing Lucilius's thought, choſe to borrow it from Tully rather than from its Author; and he ſeems to have had an eye to a paſſage of Tully, where this particular was told with explanations different from thoſe which the latter has already ſeen. Præterea, ſays Pliny (3), eſt quædam publica etiam eruditorum rejectio. Utitur illa & M. Tullius extra omnem ingenii aleam poſitus, & (quod miremur) per advocatum defenditur. Nec doctiſſimis: Manium Perſium hæc legere nolo, Junium Congum volo (4). Quod ſi hoc Lucilius qui primus condidit ſtylo naſum dicendum ſibi putavit: ſi Cicero mutuandum, præſertim cum de Republica ſcriberet, quanto nos cauſatius ab aliquo judice defendimus. i. e. " Farther, one " may reject publickly, in ſome meaſure, the deci- " ſion of learned men. Tully does this, though he " had no occaſion to be under any apprehenſions; " and, what is a ſurprizing circumſtance, has an ad- " vocate to defend him. I would not be read by men " of the greateſt erudition, ſuch as Manius Perſius, but by " thoſe like Junius Congus. Now if Lucilius, who " was the firſt writer of ſatyr, thought proper to do " this if Tully was pleaſed to copy after him in " this reſpect, particularly when he wrote concern- " ing the Republick, how much more ought I " to be defended by ſome judge?" This paſſage of Cicero was doubtleſs in the Preface to his books De Republica, He thought at that time, no like what we meet with in book I. De Finibus, but as in book II. De Oratore. But we ought not to wonder at theſe variations, for the ſubjects are different. It is more ſurprizing, that every time he mentioned that reflection of Lucilius, he ſhould introduce various perſons different from Perſius; now Lælius Decimus; another time the Sicilians and Tarentines, a third Junius Congus. The reaſon of this may be, either becauſe Lucilius had mentioned, in the ſame place, ſeveral perſons whoſe ſagacity and penetration he did not fear in any manner; or becauſe he made uſe of the ſame reflection in ſeveral places, ſometimes againſt one man, at other times againſt another; for when a writer declares his fear of being criticiſed by a perſon on account of his great learning, this may immediately ſuggeſt a ſatyrical fling againſt other perſons whom he is deſirous of repreſenting as ignorant or half learned creatures. This was infinitely more Lucilius's view than to applaud Perſius's erudition. He might, in both of theſe caſes, have given Tully an occaſion of diverſifying the perſons he oppoſes to Perſius: and therefore Father Hardouin had reaſon to expunge from Pliny, Lælius Decimus, and to ſubſtitute there, on the authority of the beſt and moſt antient manuſcripts, Junius Congus. See the remark [F] of the article LUCILIUS.

(z) De Finib. lib. 1. cap. 3.

(3) In Præfat.

(4) So Father Hardouin reads. In the other editions it is thus: Hæc doctiſſimum Perſium legere nolo, Lælium Decimum volo.

[B] Some writers . . . . confound our Perſius with the Poet of the following article.] Fungerus (5), ſuppoſing very improperly the following words of Tully, nihil ad Perſium, to be ſpoken proverbially, imagined, with ſtill greater impropriety, that they meant Perſius the ſatyrical Poet, born about the end of Tiberius's reign. Theſe two errors were taken notice of by Voſſius: who expreſſes his ſorrow at his meeting with ſo many blunders of this kind in antient as well as modern Authors. I wiſh (ſays he) our youth would hence conſider, how uſeful chronology is, an ignorance of which is ſometimes fatal to perſons, who, in other reſpects, are learned enough. But this (continues he) would not be ſo great a grievance, if Fungerus was the only Author who had erred ſo flagrantly in that particular: but I could quote ſix hundred more of the ſame kind from other Authors, a great number of which are from the antients themſelves. Vellem, ſays he (6), ut juventus hinc videat quàm neceſſaria ſit doctrina temporum, cujus neglectu ſpiſſe fœdeque peccatur à viris alioqui non ineruditis. Quamquam nec tanti id foret, ſi unus ille (Fungerus) ſic exorbitaret. Sexcenta id genus poteram ex aliis adferre, pluſcula etiam ex veteribus ipſis.

(5) In Nova Proverbior. Farragine, apud Voſſium, Inſtit. Orat. lib. 4 cap. 11. and de Poet. Lat. p. 41.

(6) De Poet. Lat. ibid.

PERSIUS (AULUS PERSIUS FLACCUS) [A], a ſatyrical Poet in Nero's reign,

[A] Aulus Perſius Flaccus.] Thoſe who affirm that he was ſirnamed Flaccus, becauſe of his imitating Horace, did not conſider that this was his father's ſirname (1); and have not been more lucky in their gueſs, when they aſſerted that he was called Severus, becauſe he profeſſed the Philoſophy of the Stoicks. I am obliged to Caſaubon (2) for theſe two remarks. He believes that, with regard to the ſecond, that an inſcription found in Volaterra, occaſioned that error. The inſcription is as follows. A. Perſius A. F. Severus V. an. 8. M. 3. D. 19. This ſuppoſes that thoſe, whom this famous Critick cenſures, had affirmed that the title Severus had been given Perſius as the ſirname of a family, in which view they merited cenſure; but had they conſidered this title no otherwiſe than as an epithet, like that of ardens, which Juvenal beſtowed on Lucilius (3), no one, in my opinion, ought to cenſure thoſe perſons, for having an eye to our Poet's fondneſs for the Stoical Philoſophy; nor could it be ſaid, that they had any regard to the inſcription of Volaterra. No Writer ever deſerved more the elogium of Severe, than our Poet, if we conſider the impetuous ſtyle of his invectives and ſatyrs, for which reaſon Barthius beſtowed this elogium on him. It was therefore not juſt to apply to him that rigorous reprimand of Caſaubon. The perſon I now hint at is Magyrus (4); for after quoting the following words of Barthius (5), he ought not to have made ſuch an application as he did. Severum veteres libri ab auctoritate caſtigandi & invectione in malos mores nominant, he adds, ſed videtur huic vaniſſimo commento occaſionem præbuiſſe inſcriptio illa memoria avorum Volaterris inventa, ubi Aul. PERSII cujuſdam octennis pueri fit mentio, cui cognomen

(1) Sueton. in Vita Perſii.

(2) Notis in Vitam Perſii.

(3) Sat. 1. So Perſius beſtows the epithet Vafer on Horace; and Ovid that of Doctus on Catullus.

(4) Eponymolog. Critic. p. 648.

(5) 4 Adverſar. 1.

reign, was born at Volaterra in Tuſcany [B]. He was a Roman Knight, and related both by blood and marriage to perſons of the higheſt rank. He was educated, till twelve years of age, in Volaterra; and afterwards continued his ſtudies at Rome under Paleman the Grammarian, Virginius the Rhetorician, and a Stoick Philoſopher named Cornutus, who had ſo great an eſteem for him, that it grew to an intimate and moſt laſting friendſhip. Perſius has immortalized this friendſhip in his Poems, and his gratitude for the good offices of this friend (a). He expreſſed this ſtill more ſtrongly by a codicil, he bequeathing him his library and a conſiderable ſum of money (b): but Cornutus accepted only of the books, and left the money to the heirs (c). He adviſed his friend's mother to ſuppreſs certain Poems which her ſon had writ in his early youth. He without doubt judged, that they would not be worthy of the exalted reputation the reſt that were publiſhed had gained, and which was ſo great, that the copies were immediately bought. This may ſerve as a pattern for thoſe to imitate, who publiſh ſo many poſthumous bad books, in hopes that the fame and reputation of the deceaſed Author will be their paſſport. Among other compoſitions of Perſius ſuppreſſed on this occaſion, were the verſes which he wrote on Arria, that illuſtrious Roman Lady, who ſtabbed herſelf, as an example for her dear huſband to do the like. Moreri ſuppoſes falſely that this was a ſatyr againſt Arria [C]: but it was rather a panegyrick; and this cannot be reaſonably doubted, when we conſider the great friendſhip which our Author had for Thraſeas, ſon-in law to Arria, his relation (d). He and Lucan ſtudied under Cornutus; on which occaſion he gained his fellow-pupil's love to ſuch a degree, that whenever Perſius read his verſes, Lucan

(a) Perſius, Sat. 5. paſſim.

(c) i. e. To Perſius's ſiſters.

(d) Ipſe etiam decem fere annis ſumme dilectus apud Thraſeam eſt, ita ut peregrinaretur quoque cum eo aliquando, cognatam ejus Arriam (daughter of her who killed herſelf) uxorem habente. Suetonius, in vita Perſii. Inſtead of dilectus apud Thraſeam, Lipſius, in Annal. Tacit. lib. 16. corrects it thus, dilectus à Pæto Thraſea.

(b) Twenty-five thouſand crowns, according to the calculation of ſome perſons. See the preface to Father Tarteron's tranſlation.

nomen fuit Severo. Caſaub. i. e. "He is called Severus by antient Authors, from the freedom with "which he cenſured and inveighed againſt vice; "but this ſilly fiction ſeems to have aroſe from an "inſcription found at Volaterra, in the memory of "our fore-fathers, wherein one Aul. PERSIUS, a boy "of eight years old, and firnamed Severus, is mentioned."

[B] Born at Volaterra in Tuſcany.] All Authors are not agreed as to this particular, Hetruria and Liguria contending on this ſubject. Perſius might boaſt his having a conſiderable ſhare in Homer's fate; two very conſiderable Provinces diſputing for the honour of his birth. The Hetrurians ground their pretenſions on the teſtimony of ſome antient Authors, who declare that Perſius was born in Volaterra (8); whilſt the Ligurians ground theirs on the following lines:

(6) The Author of Perſius's Life; Euſebius in Chron; Caſſiodorus in Faſt.

Mihi nunc Ligus ora
Intepet, hibernatque meum mare, qua latus ingens
Dant ſcopuli, & multa littus ſe valle receptat
Lunai portum eſt operæ cognoſcere cives (7).

(7) Perſ. Sat. 4. ver. 6.

"For me my warmer conſtitution wants
"More cold, than our Ligurian winter grants;
"And, therefore, to my native ſhores retir'd,
"I view my coaſt old Ennius once admir'd;
"Where clifts on either ſide their points diſplay;
"And, after, opening in an ampler way,
"Afford the pleaſing proſpect of the Bay.
"'Tis worth your while, O Romans, to regard
"The Port of Luna, ſays our learned Bard."
DRYDEN.

They pretend that the Poet ſpeaks of his native country, and conſequently that he was born in Portus Lunæ, now called the Gulph Della Spetie. Don Gaſparo Maſſa has treated this controverſy with great learning, in a Diſſertation printed at Genoa in 1667. Della vita, origine, è patria di Aulo Perſio Flacco. As he believes that the city called Luna was ſituated in Tuſcany (8), he is far from granting that our Poet was born there; for Perſius not being born in Volterra would a ſignify little to him, if he could not deprive Tuſcany of the glory of his birth, and prove that he was born in the river of Genoa. He therefore declares him to have been born in Tigulia, near Portus Lunæ, ſituated in Liguria, eighty ſtadia from Luna (9). The reader may pleaſe to take notice, that the town of Luna and the Port of Luna are not the ſame. Lewis Aproſio is of the ſame opinion with Gaſparo Maſſa, as is manifeſt from his Diſſertation Della patria d' A. Perſio, printed at Genoa in 1664. See how little one can rely on Moreri. He ſays Aproſio aſſerts, that Perſius was a native of Volaterra; and that, according to Caſpar Maſſa, he was born in Luna or della Spezzia. This is a very falſe aſſertion with reſpect to Aproſio, and no ways accurate with regard to Maſſa. By the way, though the arguments of theſe writers are not of ſuch a nature as to admit of any good reply to them, they yet are probable enough; and, were I to chooſe, I had rather follow their opinion (10) than that of Euſebius. The reader is to know, that Soprina, not ſatisfied with having inſerted Perſius in the catalogue of the writers of Liguria (11), and given ſome reaſons for this, has annexed the two diſcourſes above-mentioned to his work.

(8) Page 40.

(9) Aproſio, della Patria d' A. Perſio, p. 14.

(10) It is that of Bartholomew Fontius, in his Commentary on Perſius, printed at Venice in 1491, and of Hippolyto Landinelli, nell' origine di Luni, cap. 11. apud Michael Juſtiniani, Scritt. Liguri, p. 108.

[C] Moreri ſuppoſes falſely that this was a ſatyr againſt Arria.] I believe we need not look elſewhere for the cauſe of this miſtake than in the following words: Scripſerat in pueritia Flaccus . . . . paucos in ſororem Thraſeæ & in Arriæ matrem verſus quæ ſe ante virum occiderat (12). The Criticks (13) have thus corrected it, in ſocrum Thraſeæ Arriæ matrem, or Arrian (14) matrem. The propoſition in is equivocal (15), it ſometimes ſignifying againſt, and ſometimes upon. Now any perſon who gives ever ſo little attention, will ſee that it ought to be underſtood here in the ſecond manner; for is it ever ſo little probable that Perſius ſhould have writ verſes againſt a Lady who was his relation, mother to the wife of his beſt friend, and famous for dying a moſt heroic death, according to the Doctrines of a Sect in which our Poet was educated? The friendſhip between Perſius and Thraſea, that Lady's ſon-in-law, ſubſiſted near ten years: which ſignifies, as Caſaubon obſerves, that Perſius did not live but about ten years, after the ſtrict friendſhip he had contracted with Thraſea. Now as he lived but till the age of eight and twenty it is manifeſt that their friendſhip commenced whilſt Perſius was ſtudying philoſophy under Cornutus; and it is probable that he made the lines in queſtion, after he had contracted the friendſhip here hinted at.

Cum primum pavido cuſtos mihi purpura ceſſit,
Bullaque ſuccinctis laribus donata pependit,
Me tibi ſuppoſui (16).

(11) Printed at Genoa, in 4to, anno 1667.

(12) Sueton. in Vita Perſii.

(13) Caſaub. Not. in Vitam Perſii.

(14) Gronovius, in eamd. Vitam, in edit. Sueton. Græviana.

(15) See Caſaub. in Perſii, Sat. 1. p. 110.

(16) Perſius, ad Cornutum, Sat. 5.

"When firſt my childiſh robe reſign'd the charge,
"And left me, unconfin'd, to live at large;
"When now my golden Bulla (hung on high,
"To houſhold Gods) declar'd me paſt a boy,
"And my white ſhield proclaim'd my liberty:
. . . . . .
"Juſt at that age when manhood ſet me free,
"I then depos'd myſelf, and left the reins to thee."
DRYDEN.

The word pueritia is applied, by the beſt Authors in the Latin tongue, to perſons of eighteen or even twenty years of age. I will here give a catalogue of the reſt of Moreri's errors. He ſays that Perſius had writ a book againſt Arria, which his maſter Cornutius obliged him to throw into the flames. But taking this for granted, it would not have been a book, but a ſmall number of verſes, paucos verſus. His maſter's name was Cornutus, not Cornutius; and it was not till after the Author's death, that he adviſed his mother

Lucan could ſcarce refrain from breaking into acclamations: an example rarely ſeen in Poets of equal rank; and ſometimes too common merely through artifice and vanity [D]. Perſius was not acquainted with Seneca till very late, and could never approve of his genius. He was a good friend, and a better ſon, brother and relation [E]. He was perfectly chaſte, though a very handſome man; he was ſober, gentle as a lamb, and modeſt as a young virgin: ſo true it is, that we muſt not always judge of a man's morals from his writings, for Perſius's ſatyrs are very licentious, and full of rancour and gall. It is thought that he even did not ſpare the cruel Nero; but had pointed him out ſo plainly, that Cornutus thought proper to alter ſome of his expreſſions (e) [F]. He died at twenty ther to ſuppreſs thoſe verſes, and all ſuch as her ſon had writ in his youth. Omnia autem Cornutus auctor ſuit MATRI ejus ut aboleret (17). By this paſſage, we prove the Author of the epiſtolary Preface to the new tranſlation of Perſius to have committed an error. His words are as follow (18): "He wrote "ſome verſes on that ſubject (19) which were no "ways in commendation of ſo generous and ſo faithful a wife (20); but he followed the advice that "was given him; ſuppreſſed the verſes, and acted "prudently." Moreri gives the name of Virginius Fulvius to the Rhetorician under whom Perſius ſtudied; whereas he ſhould have called him Verginius Flaccus. He ſays that this pretended Virginius Fulvius, and Rhemnius Palemon, had ſuperintended Lucan's education. To what purpoſe is this remark, ſince he was not to ſay any thing of Lucan's friendſhip for Perſius? But farther; none of the Authors cited by him ſpeak of this pretended education. It is with regard to Cornutus, that the Author of Perſius's life obſerves that he taught Lucan and Perſius at the ſame time. I ſhall take notice hereunder (21) of the chronological miſtake committed by Moreri.

(e) Extracted from his Life, written, as is conjectured, by Suetonius.

(17) Sueton. in Vita Perſii.

(18) The Epiſtle prefixed to Tarteron's Tranſlation of Perſius.

(19) Upon the action of Arria.

(20) This is an error which I refute.

(21) In the rem. [G].

Mr. Marais has been ſo kind as to inform us, that Moreri might very probably have taken from Mr. Geffrier (22) the particulars he relates with regard to Arria; for Mr. Geffrier was ſo tender of that Lady's reputation, that, in order to repair the injury, which he pretends Perſius had done to her, he prefixed, to his tranſlation, a ſonnet written by Father le Moine in honour of Arria, inſerted in the Galerie des Femmes fortes.

(22) Whom I ſhall mention in the cloſe of rem. [F].

[D] An example . . . . . ſometimes too common through artifice and vanity.] This a modern Author has expreſſed very freely, and without ſaying that Lucan's conduct was exempt from this defect. "Perſius, "ſays he (23), was much better pleaſed with Lucan, "who perhaps had ingratiated himſelf into his favour, by applauding the beautiful paſſages of his "ſatyrs, and by ſaying frequently, and with an air of "admiration (24), How excellent are theſe pieces! For "how modeſt ſoever an Author may be, he is eaſily enſnared by the charms of ſuch flattering encomiums, given aloud, by a good judge, in an aſſembly of people. Had not Lucan (Sir), his "views in this? Did not he expect a return? You "know that Authors and Poets ſeldom beſtow ſuch "elogiums for nothing; and when they endeavour "to rival one another with compliments and applauſes, they are no ways ſparing, but make very ſtrong paſſes at one another. You and I are "acquainted with ſome who are conſidered, in the "article of wit, if I may uſe that expreſſion, for the "Boutevilles of this age; they challenge the moſt "expert; and, whether by way of rencounter, or "by a duel in form, which his Majeſty never prohibited, they endeavour to conquer one another; "and are in no manner ſparing of the moſt obliging expreſſions and polite compliments; and that "even in print, that poſterity may not be under the "leaſt doubt with regard to that matter. In this "kind of duels, the weakeſt is always the aggreſſor, and he always even ſends or carries the challenge. This (Sir) is Horace's metaphor, and you "cannot but look upon it to be equally whimſical "and bold: It is in the epiſtle to Florus. With "regard to myſelf; if the title of Writer made me "greedy of praiſe, I would infinitely rather be applauded by a good Author, with whom I had not "the leaſt acquaintance, one whoſe name was even "unknown to me, whom I had never ſeen, and who "would not gain any thing by applauding me: ſuch "encomiums could not be ſuſpected."

(23) Epiſtle prefixed to Tarteron, the Jeſuit's, tranſlation of Perſius.

(24) Lucanus adeo mirabatur ſcripta Flacci, ut vix retineret ſe illo recitante à clamore quin illa eſſe vera poemata diceret. Sueton. in Vita Perſii.

[E] He was a good friend, and a better ſon, brother and relation.] The Author from whom I borrowed theſe words, ſhall alſo furniſh a Commentary to them. You are perhaps, ſays he (25), ſurprized at this, and you poſſibly may have your reaſons for it: however, it is certainly fact; and thoſe who were beſt acquainted with him, ſay that he might have been propoſed as a pattern in this reſpect (26). And indeed, he had a real and ſolid friendſhip for his ſiſters, and a reſpectful tenderneſs for Fulvia his mother, though ſhe was married to a ſecond huſband; and if he was but a child when his father died; if he was but ſeven or eight years old when ſhe committed . . . I had like to have ſaid folly (but we ought to be ſomewhat reſerved in favour of ſuch women;) he yet had ſenſe enough at that time to know that this was not right: for reaſon diſplays itſelf ſtrongly on thoſe occaſions; it animates itſelf; and does not always wait the uſually allotted time to make its reflections; eſpecially when it is a perſon who is of a ſatyrical diſpoſition. But I muſt tell the whole truth; the ſecond huſband died in a ſhort time, and left Perſius in a condition to reſpect and love his mother as ſincerely as he did when he was but a child (27). I cannot ſay whether Fulvia took great care of her ſon's education; and whether ſhe was not too fond of herſelf, to neglect an article of ſo much importance: this I will not pretend to anſwer for; for ſecond marriages divert parents very much from this ſort of cares, and even the condition of a young widow; but a circumſtance I can aſſure you is, that this Roman Knight, how young ſoever he might be, endeavoured as much as poſſible to be as perfect as I have repreſented him. I will add to this agreeable Commentary the following words from Suetonius, Reliquit circa H-SXX matri & ſorori . . . Cornutus ſublatis libris pecuniam ſororibus, quas frater hæredes fecerat, reliquit. i. e. "He bequeathed about "five and twenty thouſand crowns to his mother "and ſiſter . . . Cornutus took the books, but paid "the money to the ſiſters, whom their brother had "made his heirs." What ſhall we think of an Hiſtorian, who, in the ſame leaf, where he declares twice that Perſius had but one ſiſter, obſerves that Perſius bequeathed his eſtate to his mother and ſiſter, and appointed his ſiſters his heirs?

(25) Epiſtle prefixed to the new tranſlation of the Satyrs of Juvenal and Perſius, by Father Tarteron.

(26) Sueton. in vita Perſii.

(27) Pater ejus Flaccus pupillum reliquit moriens, annorum fere ſex. Fulvia Siſennia mater nupſit poſtea Fuſio, Equiti Romano: & eum quoque extulit intra paucos annos. Sueton. in vita Perſii.

[F] It is thought . . . . he had pointed out Nero ſo plainly, that Cornutus thought proper to alter ſome of his expreſſions.] He had employed the following words in his firſt ſatyr.

Auriculas aſini Mida rex habet.

"King Midas has got aſſes ears.

Cornutus would have them changed as follows,

Auriculas aſini quis non habet (28)?

"Who has not aſſes ears?

(28) Ibid.

If Cornutus thought that Nero was too plainly hinted at here, he acted very prudently, though perhaps that Emperor had not then begun to plunge himſelf in wickedneſs, he being a good Monarch for five or ſix years. But how came it that Cornutus did not animadvert on four verſes inſerted in the ſatyr in queſtion, and which were borrowed from a tragedy of Nero? Was there any danger to be apprehended, in ſaying King Midas has aſſes ears; at the ſame time that his verſes might, without incurring any danger, be propoſed as a pattern of ridiculous poetry? I meet with ſome kind of difficulty here; and perhaps the four verſes following:

Torva

Torva Mimalloneis implerunt cornua bombis,
Et raptum vitulo caput allatura ſuperbo
Baſſaris, & Lyncem Mænas flexura corymbis
Evion ingeminat: reparabilis adſonat Echo (29).

(29) Perſius, Sat. ver. 99.

" Their crooked horns the Mimallonian crew
" With blaſts inſpir'd; and Baſſaris who ſlew
" The ſcornful calf, with ſword advanc'd on high,
" Made from his neck his haughty head to fly.
" And Mænas, when with ivy-bridles bound,
" She led the ſpotted Lynx, then Evion rung around;
" Evion from woods and floods repairing Echo's ſound. DRYDEN.

the abovementioned lines, I ſay, were, at moſt, but an indirect, hidden, and altogether oblique raillery; for if Nero had writ thoſe verſes, how could any one be ſo bold as to cite them verbatim, merely to laugh at them, ſince it was thought neceſſary to correct theſe words, auriculas aſini Mida rex habet? The contraſt is too ſtrong; on one ſide a great deal of cowardice is ſeen, and on the other, a great deal of raſhneſs. But I will inform my Readers of all my ſcruples. Cornutus ſeems to me to ſpoil his friend's thought, without any neceſſity for his ſo doing; and his fears appear to me ill-grounded. Perſius having been told, that it is dangerous to cenſure the faults of other people, and that he ought not to mention them, even ſo much as to a pit; replies, that he, at leaſt, will tell his book under ground, what he has ſeen, viz. that King Midas had aſſes ears.

Men' mutire nefas, nec clam nec cum ſcrobe? nuſquam.
Heic tamen infodiam. Vidi, vidi ipſe, libelle,
Auriculas Aſini Mida rex habet *.

* Perſius, Sat. 1.

. . . . . " and is my muſe controul'd
" By ſervile awe? Born free, and not be bold?
" At leaſt I'll dig a hole within the ground;
" And to the truſty earth commit the ſound;
" The reeds ſhall tell you what the Poet fears,
" King Midas has a ſnout, and aſſes ears. Dryden.

This is a very plain alluſion to the ſtory of Midas's barber, which was very well known to Nero.

. . . . . Secedit humumque
Effodit & domini quales aſpexerit aures
Voce refert parva, terræque immurmurat hauſtæ (30).

(30) Ovid. Metamorph. lib. 11. ver. 186.

" Reſtleſs, at laſt, a private place he found,
" Then dug a hole, and told it to the ground;
" In a low whiſper he reveal'd the caſe,
" And cover'd in the earth, and ſilent left the place. CROXALL.

It was not therefore very probable, that the Prince in queſtion ſhould be diſguſted at any perſon, for giving a faithful relation of the fineſt ſtroke in that hiſtory, auriculas aſini Mida rex habet. If we change theſe words into the following, auriculas aſini quis non habet, theſe are no longer the barber's own words, but a vague imitation of them. If it ſhould be objected to me, that a Writer had better leſſen the beauty of a thought, than exaſperate a tyrant, I will ſay as I did before; Why don't you ſuppreſs the four verſes; you ought to force the Author to expunge them, not only if they are borrowed from one of Nero's poems, but alſo if they ſhould only include ſome of his phraſes. We need not doubt but Malherbe would have been diſguſted at the following lines of Boileau, even tho' he had not named him:

Irai-je dans une ode en phraſes de Malherbe,
Troubler dans ſes roſeaux le Danube ſuperbe,
Delivrer de Sion le peuple gemiſſant,
Faire trembler Memphis & palir le Croiſſant,
Et paſſant du Jourdain les ondes allarmées
Cueillir mal à propos les palmes Idumées (31)?

(31) Des Preaux's Sat. 9. ver. 251.

" Shall I, like Malherbe, in a lofty ode,
" Diſturb the haughty Danube in its reeds;
" Free from their bonds ſad Sion's groaning people,
" Make Memphis trouble; the bright creſcent pale;
" And croſſing ſwift the frighted waves of Jordan,
" Gather untimely Idumea's palms.

Boileau names no perſon when he ſays:

Tout chantre ne peut pas ſur le ton d'un Orphée,
Entonner en grands vers la diſcorde étouffée:
Peindre Bellone en feu tonnant de toutes parts,
Et le Belge effrayé fuyant ſur ſes remparts (32):

(32) Idem, ibid. ver. 39.

" 'Tis not for ev'ry Bard, to ſing, like Orpheus,
" In ſounding verſe, dread Diſcord's overthrow;
" To paint Bellona thundering round the globe,
" And frighted Belgium flying from its ramparts.

Nevertheleſs, would any one doubt but that it would raiſe the indignation of that man, who ſhould ſee that his verſes are here ridiculed? In my opinion therefore, the torva Mimalloneis, &c. cannot be a fragment either from Nero's poems, or parody for imitation of his verſes; for once again, if he was capable of being diſguſted at the auriculas aſini Mida rex habet, which was an old ſtory, how could it be expected that he ſhould bear with patience to have ridiculous centos made of his own expreſſions. For this reaſon, with ſubmiſſion to the old Scholiaſt, I will not ſubſcribe to the following words of Boileau, till my ſcruples be removed: If we examine, ſays he (33), Perſius, who wrote under the empire of Nero; he does not merely cenſure the compoſitions of the Poets his contemporaries, but even attacks the very verſes of Nero. For every one knows, and all Nero's court was ſenſible, that the four Latin verſes torva Mimalloneis, &c. which Perſius ridicules ſo ſharply in his firſt ſatyr, were Nero's verſes. Nevertheleſs, we don't find Nero, though ſo cruel a Monarch, puniſhed Perſius; and this Tyrant, though ſo great an enemy to reaſon, and ſo very fond of his works, as is well known, was yet ſo reaſonable as to permit his own verſes to be ridiculed; and thought that, on ſuch an occaſion, it did not become the Emperor to concern himſelf about the affairs of the Poet. I ſhall ſay no more of this ſcruple. Caſaubon is of opinion, that the four verſes in queſtion were taken from a tragedy (34). And to prove that Nero had writ ſuch a piece, he cites Dion, who ſays only, that Nero acted that part of the Muſician in the repreſentation of the Bacchæ (35). But is this a proof that he wrote them? not to mention that hexameter verſes were not (I believe) employed in tragedy; and yet the four verſes in queſtion are hexameters. Had this learned Commentator compared his reflection on torva Mimalloneis with his preface on the fourth ſatyr, I queſtion whether he would have perſiſted in that opinion. And indeed, it is affirmed in this preface, that Perſius's chief view in writing the 4th ſatyr, was to cenſure Nero's conduct; but to prevent his coming into trouble, he diſguiſed his deſign in ſuch a manner, that he did not employ a ſingle expreſſion to point out that Prince; and that he had contrived to make his eſcape, in caſe he ſhould be accuſed of levelling his ſatyr at the Government. Caſaubon obſerves alſo, that this ſatyr was writ before this Prince had quite ſhewn to the world what a wretch he was. Cujus (ſatiræ quartæ) etſi præcipuus erat ſcopus in Neronem invehi, atque ipſum ſatirico ſale defricare . . . . ſic tamen poeta in hoc argumento indignationi ſuæ habenas laxavit, ut neque palam neque plenis velis in flagitioſiſſimum principem inveheretur, verum tectè & longè mollius quam vel natura ipſius ferebat, vel Neronis flagitia ac ſcelera merebantur. Nos autem putamus tum ſcriptam eſſe hanc ſatiram cum nondum totus innotuerat Nero, cujus principium laude digna habuit multa. . . . Probè verò norat Perſius cum ad hanc ſatiram ſcribendam ſe accingeret, quantam rem & quàm periculoſam moliretur. Quamobrem conſilio prudentiſſimo hoc argumentum Platonis imitatione ſibi tractandum cenſuit, non ſolum nominibus inde petitis, ſed etiam ſententia propemodum univerſa; ut ſi quis forte Corycæus aut Cercops nomen ipſius deferret, probabili excuſatione poſſet factum ſuum defendere quaſi exercendi tantum ſtili cauſa petitum è libris ſummi philoſophi argumentum latinis verſibus tentaſſet complecti. Quare etiam ab omnibus illum videmus abſtinuiſſe, quæ Neronis perſonam propriè erant denotatura. . . . . " Though the chief aim of his " fourth ſatyr was to cenſure Nero, and ſatyrize him " in a ſtrong manner, . . nevertheleſs, the Poet ſo " checked his indignation, that he did not inveigh " againſt that moſt wicked Prince, either openly or " directly; but obliquely, and with much more gen- " tleneſs than his own temper or Nero's crimes de- " ſerved.

(33) Idem, Diſcourſe on Satyr.

(34) Hinc intelligimus Bacchas Neronis ejuſdem argumenti fuiſſe eum Bacchis Euripidis. Caſaub. in Sat. 1. Perſ. p. 142.

(35) Sunt autem Neronis verſus ex ejus Bachis, cujus carminis etiam Dio nominatim facit mentionem. Idem, ibid. p. 140. Vide etiam, p. 134.

twenty eight years of age [G]. Whatever his panegyriſts may ſay, it muſt be confeſſed that he wrote in a harſh, obſcure manner [H], inſomuch that he may almoſt be called

" ſerved. It is my opinion, that this ſatyr was writ at " a time when Nero was not perfectly known, he " having done many good things in the beginning " of his reign. . . . Perſius, when he firſt began to " write this ſatyr, was very ſenſible that he was en- " gaging in a moſt dangerous attempt: for this rea- " ſon he thought it would be proper for him to treat " this ſubject after Plato's manner; he not only " borrowing the names from thence, but even the " greateſt part of his thoughts; in order that, if a- " ny malicious perſon might take it into his head to " inform againſt him, he might make the plauſible " defence following, viz. that it was merely to exer- " ciſe his pen, he had attempted to work up, into " Latin verſe, the argument of that great Phi- " loſopher: for which reaſon we find that he for- " bore every kind of expreſſion that might denote " the perſon of Nero." May we not juſtly wonder, that a Writer who is of this opinion, ſhould have imagined that Perſius preſumed to ridicule Nero's verſes, and that he cited them word for word, without the leaſt diſguiſe? It will be anſwered, that this Prince was no ways ambitious of the title of Poet; but good proofs ought to be given of this, or ſuch an aſſertion ſhould not be advanced; for moſt perſons are commonly fond of their poetical compoſitions (36). A crown and ſceptre cannot root out this defect; and we know in particular, that Nero was more ſenſibly touched, when cenſured for his muſic, than when ſatyrized for his crimes (37). We may naturally ſuppoſe, from his being a Poet, that he could not bear to be ſatyrized. Did not he baniſh Cornutus, was he not going to put him to death, for having preſumed to ſay, that Nero would make too many verſes, ſhould he compoſe four hundred books of them; and that Chryſippus ought not to have been alledged as an example, ſince the books of that Philoſopher were of uſe for the conduct of life (38)? Was not he jealous of Lucan, becauſe he attempted poetry? and did he not forbid him to write any (39)? Lucanum propriæ cauſſæ accendebant, quod famam carminum ejus premebat Nero, prohibueratque oſtentare, vanus adſimulatione (40). i. e. " Lucan was " fired by motives of ſelf-intereſt, becauſe Nero en- " deavoured to ſuppreſs the reputation of his poems, " and commanded him not to publiſh any more, " &c." Lucan was ſo exaſperated at this prohibition, that he aſſociated with the Conſpirators, who endeavoured to kill that Emperor.

I ſhould never have done, if I undertook to quote all the Authors (41) who imagine that the four verſes, which are ſo ſtrongly ridiculed by Perſius, were writ by Nero. I ſhall only quote the notes that have been added to the new verſion of Petronius (42): Liberty has been allowed in all ages, to criticize all bad works that are publiſhed. Defects in genius may be attacked every where, and this liberty is coeval with the world. The Torva, &c. which was read in Juvenal (43), ſhews that Nero himſelf, though ſo very cruel, was not offended at it, and that he never intended to impeach thoſe who criticized his works, as guilty of high treaſon on that account: he being out of humour with thoſe only, who wrote verſes better than he did.

I am to obſerve that the Life of Perſius, written, as is ſuppoſed, by Suetonius (44), does not ſay that the torva Mimalloneis bore any relation to Nero. It gives no other example of the liberty which this Poet took to criticize him, than the verſe in which Mida rex was introduced, and which Cornutus obliged him to retouch. Thus we have but one teſtimony for the torva Mimalloneis, viz. the old Scholiaſt on Perſius. An Engliſh Author, who wrote good notes on Perſius's ſatyrs, does not affirm, as ſo many others have done, that Nero was Author of the four verſes in queſtion: ſive à Nerone, ſays he (45), ſive ab alio quopiam nobili Romano compoſita i. e. " Whether they were writ " by Nero, or by any other noble Roman." Mr. Marais pointed out to me this paſſage of the Engliſh Commentator. He alſo informed me in a letter, that the Sieur Geffrier, who publiſhed at Paris, in 1658, a French paraphraſtic tranſlation of Perſius, affirms that theſe four verſes were wrote by Nero.

[G] He died at twenty-eight years of age.] This appears from the Conſulſhips under which he was born and died. He was born the 4th of December, under the Conſulates of Fabius Perſicus and L. Vitellius; and died under the Conſulates of Rubrius Marius and Aſinius Gallus, November 24. Now as there was but an interval of 28 years between theſe Conſulſhips, it follows that Perſius died at 28 year of age, within a few days. Conſequently the Author of this Life made a very wrong calculation, when, after having given ſo very exactly the day and years of his birth and death, he afterwards ſays that he died in the thirteenth year of his age. St. Jerom is not ſo much miſtaken, and yet he is not accurate enough. He ſays that he was born the 2d year of the 203d Olympiad, and died in the 29th year of his age, the ſecond of the 210th Olympiad. Now this cannot be true, but by ſuppoſing that he was born in the firſt month of the year, and died ſome months later; but beſides that, St. Jerom does not make theſe diſtinctions, we have ſhewn that Perſius was born in December, and died in November. I am more ſurprized to ſee Scaliger approve St. Jerom's calculation, than at St. Jerom's miſtake. Scaliger ſays, that this Father juſtly computed twenty-nine years, from the number 2050, to the number 2078. He likewiſe finds twenty-nine years between the two Conſulſhips abovementioned; but he ſhould rather have found twenty-eight. The firſt of theſe Conſulſhips anſwers to the year of Chriſt 34, the 20th year of Tiberius, and the 786th of Rome: and the ſecond anſwers to the year of Chriſt 62, the 8th year of Nero's reign, and the 814th of Rome, according to Calviſius's chronology. Moreri is quite inaccurate in this whole affair. He fixes the birth of Perſius to the end of the 32d year of Chriſt; and his death, at the age of 29 years, the 9th of Nero's reign, and the 62d of our Saviour. Now to affirm this with any ſhew of reaſon, he ſhould have added, that he died in the beginning of the 62d year of the Chriſtian Æra; but this would have been falſe, ſince he died the 24th of November. It is therefore certain that, according to Moreri's calculation, Perſius muſt have died at near thirty years of age. Farther, the 32d year of Chriſt anſwers, according to him, to the 18th year of Tiberius (46): now it is certain that, from the 18th year of Tiberius's reign, to the 9th of that of Nero, there muſt have paſſed an interval of 31 years: and conſequently Perſius muſt have died at 31 years of age. The Dutch edition fixes his death under the year of our Lord 26; an error that aroſe from a tranſpoſition of figures, which the printers are but too apt to make. Augoſtino Oldoini has committed ſome childiſh errors in his calculation of Perſius's life. He declares that he was born the year of Rome 795, and died at thirty three years of age, in the 9th year of Nero's Empire. He is of opinion, that the time of his birth anſwers to the 203d Olympiad, and the 22d year of Tiberius's Empire (47). See Calviſius; and it will appear that the 1ſt year of the 203d Olympiad is the 785 of Rome; and that the 9th of Nero is the 815 of Rome; and that there is an interval of but twenty eight years between the 22d of Tiberius and the 9th of Nero.

Mr. Marais informs me in a letter, that the Sieur Geffrier fixes Perſius's death to the 203d Olympiad, the year of Rome 785, and the 22d year of Tiberius's reign.

[H] Whatever his Panegyriſts may ſay . . . . it muſt be confeſſed that he wrote in a harſh obſcure manner.] Among theſe rank Iſaac Caſaubon (48). I grant that the encomiums which he beſtows upon Perſius are leſs unallayed than thoſe which Quintilian and Martial beſtowed upon him: he blends ſome cenſures with them; but, after all, he acknowledges that Perſius was a man of great merit and parts, and he undertakes his defence againſt the great Julius Scaliger; but at the ſame time falls down, with the utmoſt humility, before the throne of that formidable antagoniſt. I ſhall take notice only of that part of their diſpute, which relates to the obſcurity of our Poet. Caſaubon is ſurprized that Scaliger ſhould ſpeak of it more than once; he to whom nothing was obſcure: but this, in my opinion, is falling into the ſophiſm called by the Logicians ignorationem elenchi, (36) Scripſit ſummo vir ingenio & ſcientia ſingulari Philoſophus artifices omnes opus ſuum adamare. Poetas tamen præcipue. Menagius, Epiſt. Dedic. Carmin.

(37) Nihil æque doluit, quam ut malum ſe citharœdum increpitum. Sueton. in Nerone, cap. 41.

(38) Xiphilin. in Nerone.

(39) Xiphilin. in Nerone & Tacit. Ann. lib. 15. cap. 49.

(40) Tacit. ib.

(41) See the rem. [K].

(42) Page 24. Tom. 1. Dutch edit. 1694.

(43) It ſhould be Perſius.

(44) Annexed to Suetonius's treatiſe de claris Rhetoribus.

(45) Joannes Bond, in Perſ. Sat. 1. p. m. 24.

(46) He declares, in the article of Tiberius, that this Emperor died the 23d year of his reign, and the 37th of our Lord.

(47) Oldoini, Athen. Liguſt. p. 80, 81.

(48) In the Prolegomena to the Commentary which he publiſhed on that Author at Paris, in 8vo, anno 1605. He inſerted it in the Dutch edit. of Juvenal and Perſius, printed in 1696, 4to.

called the Lycophron of the Latins [I]. The elder Scaliger, and ſeveral other excellent Criticks, have written againſt him with great ſeverity (f). Perhaps they run into a more pardonable extreme, than the beſtowing high encomiums on this Poet would be. I muſt obſerve, that the ſeverity of the times in which he lived, cannot plead his apology with regard to the obſcurity of his manner of writing [K], as ſome writers pretend. Some Italian chi, a miſtaking the ſtate of the queſtion; a ſophiſm as frequently found among the Criticks as the Philoſophers. Scaliger did not ſay that our Perſius was obſcure with regard to him; ſo far from it, he affirmed that he underſtood him throughout. He only ſays that this Poet's works were formerly ranked in the number of thoſe things which were unknown; and he accuſes him, as guilty of impertinence, for writing in order to be read, and not to be underſtood (49). He almoſt inſults him, for that the Commentators had defeated his deſign, by clearing up all the obſcurity which he had purpoſely thrown over his writings, in order to be eternally buried under it, and to the everlaſting admiration of fools.

(f) See Baillet, on the Poets, num. 1158.

(49) Perſii ſtilus meroſus, & ille ineptus qui cum legi vellet quæ ſcripſiſſet, intelligi noluit quæ legerentur, quamquam nunc à nobis omnia intelliguntur. At fuit tempus cum inter ignota haberetur. Jul. Cæſ. Scalig. Poetic. lib. 6. cap. 6 p. m. 773. See alſo chap. 97. book 3. p. 343.

Omnia enim ſtolidi magis admirantur amantque
Inverſis quæ ſub verbis latitantia cernunt (50).

" The more abſtruſe and difficult things ſeem,
" The more they raiſe a blockhead's admiration."

(50) Lucretius, lib. 1. ver. 642.

The encomiums, which Quintilian and Martial beſtow upon him, put me in mind of thoſe which are given to two of our French Poets. It is not the quantity and number of a man's compoſitions, which crown him with immortality. Two ſheets of paper have tranſmitted Perſius to us. Abbé de Ceriſi will deſcend to later poſterity, with only his ſingle Metamorphoſes of Philis's eyes into ſtars, rather than a great number of Authors who fill a conſiderable ſpace in our libraries; and the temple of death (51) will force its way along the ſtream of time, better than Biſhop Du Bellay's ſix hundred volumes (52). This remark is pretty conſonant to the Latin verſes following:

(51) By Mr. Habert of the French Academy.

(52) Gurre des Auteurs, p. 139.

Sæpius in libro memoratur Perſius uno,
Quam levis in tota Marſus Amazonide (53).

" Perſius has gain'd more glory by one book,
" Than by the whole Amazonis, mean Marſus."

(53) Martial. Epigr. 29. lib. 4.

as alſo to the following words: Multum & veræ gloriæ quamvis uno libro Perſius meruit (54). i. e. " Perſius " deſerved much ſolid glory by writing only one " book."

(54) Quintil. lib. 10. cap. 1.

[I] He may alſo be called the Lycophron of the Latins.] I have read ſomewhere (55), that the meaning of the flat, unweildy volumes of the Talmudiſts is ſo obſcure with regard to us, (from the envy they bore to their ſucceſſors) that we have greater reaſon to cut and tear their books, than a Father of the Church did Perſius's ſatyrs: ſaying, that ſince this Poet would not, like other writers, be underſtood exteriorly, he was determined to ſee whether he was more intelligible within. Here follows another paſſage, in which Lycophron and Perſius are put in parallel (56). Trithemius's book, in my opinion, ought to be ſawed in two; as ſome perſon formerly did Lycophron's Poem called Caſſandra, to ſee what was in the inſide of it, ſince nothing could be percieved on the outſide. Or as St. Jerom is formerly ſaid to have done with the ſatyrs of Perſius, the riddles and obſcurities of which not being ſufficiently underſtood by him; intellecturis ignibus ille dedit (57). i. e. " He threw them into " the flames, in order that they might be there un- " ravelled." I wiſh this laſt incident, and the reſt alſo, were well warranted: for I find that Caſaubon refutes the cenſures of Perſius, and the teſtimony of St. Jerom (58).

(55) Tom. 1. of Conferences du Bureau d'Adreſſe.

(56) Vigenaire, Traite des Chifres, p. 12.

(57) Ex Ovidio, Triſt. lib. 4. Eleg. 10.

(58) Certe aliud Quintilianus judicabat cum veræ laude dignum pronunciaret, aliud Hieronymus cum diſertiſſimum ſatiricum vocaret. Caſaubon in Prolog. Comment. in Perſium.

Mr. Marais furniſhed me likewiſe with the following obſervation. An elogium is given of the Commentary of John Bond, in a book where no reader would ever go to look upon it; I mean in the Preface to the Alboſiæ Sigeæ Toletanæ Satyra Sotadica (59). The words, which contain the elogium in queſtion, deſcribe ſtill better Perſius's obſcurity: Gratuleris tibi Aule Perſi. Obvolviſti te ipſe cæca nocte, videri nolebas, altam verſibus & verſuum ſenſibus profudiſti caliginem. Nolebas intelligi: forte & tu te non intelligebas. Non fecerunt ad te nox & caligo ut exerraret (Joannes Bond) venit, vidit, diſcuſſit noctem & caliginem. Perſpectum id omne habet, ut tute loqueris, quod latet arcanâ non enarrabile fibrâ. Eripuit tibi te neganti conſpectum. Latebas intra te, ne te curioſa & erudita inveniret ſagacitas. Eras ipſe involucrum tibi. Quis vero fuit furor ille tuus? i. e. " You yourſelf (Perſius) was de- " lighted with the thoughts of it. You ſhrouded " yourſelf in ſubſtantial darkneſs; you would not " be ſeen; and have thrown a thick miſt over your " verſes, and the meaning of them. Perhaps you " did not underſtand yourſelf. However, your gloom " was not able to miſlead John Bond. He came, he " ſaw, and diſpelled the dark night. He diſcovered " all that which, according to your manner of ex- " preſſion, lay concealed,

" And, thro' the vail of words, he view'd the naked mind.

" He got a ſight of you againſt your will. You lay " hid within yourſelf, to prevent the moſt learned " and ſagacious men from finding you out. You " were as a mantle or covering to yourſelf: but to " what could this mad conduct be owing?" By the way, this Commentary of Bond on Perſius was printed a year after the Author's death, under the direction of Roger Prowſe his ſon-in-law. I have the London edition of 1614 before me. If this was the firſt, as I ſuppoſe it to be, Bond muſt have died in 1613. No mention is made of this in the Sieur Witte's Diarium.

(59) The Preface to my edition of the Alboſiæ &c. Satyra Sotadica, has not the paſſage which Mr. Marais found in his edition.

(a) Si non vis intelligi, nec ego volo te intelligere. i. e. " If you do not care to be underſtood, I will not " underſtand you." A ſaying of Colucius with regard to Perſius the Poet, l. 5. n. 34. of the Forêt Nuptiale. REM. CRIT.

[K] The ſeverity of the times in which he lived, cannot plead his apology with regard to the obſcurity of his manner of writing.] I am ſorry that I cannot agree in opinion with the Author of the Preface, who furniſhed me with two ſuch entertaining Commentaries. I am ſenſible, ſays he (60), that Perſius is not ſo intelligible at firſt ſight; and that he might, had he thought proper, have expreſſed himſelf with greater clearneſs: but how could he do this under Nero? He was a cruel and blood-thirſty Monarch, who could not bear a jeſt. And as he had more reaſon than any perſon, to aſcribe to himſelf the ſharpeſt and moſt ingenious part of a ſatyr, provided it hinted ever ſo obliquely at him: I do not wonder that Perſius ſhould affect to be enigmatical and myſterious. When therefore Julius Scaliger calls him a feveriſh learned man, it is probable that he did not think on what he ſaid; I am ſure that this haughty and formidable Critick would himſelf have been ſeized with a violent ſhivering, and have felt an univerſal tremor over his whole body at the bare ſight of that Emperor. I even am ſurprized at Perſius's boldneſs, in his once attempting to ridicule that Emperor: for that part of the verſe Auriculas Aſini Mida Rex habet, was levelled particularly at him. Perſius would have been completely ruined had not the prudent, the diſcreet Cornutus ſtruck out the proper name, and ſubſtituted in its place a name in which all mankind are concerned. I even cannot conceive how this Philoſopher, who afterwards was ſent into baniſhment by the tyrant, becauſe his conſcience would not permit him to approve of the deſign of his Poem, permitted his Diſciple to run the hazard of publiſhing, with a malicious intent, (as an example of admirable verſe) the Torva Mimalloneis, &c. Here follow two obſervations on this paſſage.

(60) Epiſtle prefixed to Father Tarteron's tranſlation.

I. All who read Perſius attentively, plainly perceive that he wrote obſcurely, not out of policy, but becauſe it was his taſte, and that he had given his genius this turn; for had the fear of bringing himſelf into trouble, with regard to the Court, prompted him to conceal his thoughts under the thickeſt vail, he would have done this only in ſuch verſes as bore ſome relation to the life the tyrant led. But we find him twiſting and darkning his expreſſions, and employing ploying alluſions and enigmatical figures, even when his deſign is only to inſinuate a moral maxim, the cleareſt explication of which could not have given the leaſt cauſe of diſguſt to Nero. I ſhall not exhibit any example of this, but refer my readers to that Anthor's ſatyrs: as they are not many in number, any perſon may ſoon ſatisfy himſelf whether I am right or wrong in my conjectures. But if any one had rather not take that trouble, and chooſes rather to depend on the judgment of a learned Critick, he need go no farther. The judgment is as follows: Obſcuritatis hujus diverſas afferre cauſſas poſſumus, eaſque certiſſimas, in auctore ſunt aliquæ, aliæ extra illum, quædam in interpretibus. Non negabo perobſcura quædam eſſe in quarta, prima quoque: ſed poëtæ facilè ignoſco, cùm cogito crudeliſſimi & φοινικωτάτου tyranni, in quem illa erant, metu, de induſtria atramenti ſepiarum aliquid eſſe affuſum: neque dubito ſapientiſſimum præceptorum Cornutum ſcribenti adfuiſſe, qui vetus verbum crebrò illi inſuſurraret, Σκότισον. . . . . Cùm ſcribit idem βιογράφος, verecundiæ virginalis Partheniam noſtrum fuiſſe, aliud agens cauſſam nos docet cur ille locus tenebricosè fuerit tractatus, cui vix alius toto libro obſcuritate par, obſcænitate ſimilis nullus, τριτικοπὴν illam dico è quarta. At ſi unctus ceſſes. Etiam illud ultrò concedimus, nonnulla Perſii loca tropis parum uſitatis & audacioribus eſſe offuſcata, hujus quoque non culpam, ſed cauſſam, ita enim dicere æquius, ingenio poëtæ aſſignamus: quod cùm eſſet magnum, magna ſectabatur (61). . . . . Fuit præterea Flaccus noſter ὁ φιλόμωθός πως, ſed amans brevitatis: quæ res obſcuriorem eſt ubi illum reddit (62). i. e. "We may "give many reaſons, and thoſe very certain ones, "for his writing in ſo obſcure a manner: ſome relate "to the Author himſelf, ſome to exterior circum"ſtances, and others to his Commentators. I will "not deny but that we meet with ſome extremely ob"ſcure paſſages in the fourth ſatyr, as likewiſe in "the firſt: but I preſently forgive the Poet, when I "reflect, that the fear of that moſt cruel and blood"thirſty tyrant obliged him to cloud over his words "as much as poſſible. Nor do I doubt but that his "moſt wiſe maſter Cornutus aſſiſted him in his com"poſitions, and frequently inculcated this maxim to "him, be obſcure . . . . . Since that biographer "informs us, that our Poet was as modeſt as a maid; "he aſſigns another reaſon why he involved ſo much "in ſhades this paſſage, than which ſcarce any is ſo "obſcure in his whole book, and none ſo obſcene. "The place I mean, is that in the fourth Satyr.

Italian Genealogiſts declare, that the Falconcini of Volterra, deſcended from his father [L].

(61) Caſaub. in Prolegomenis, ad Perſium, folio m. e ij.

(62) Idem, folio e iij.

"At ſi unctus ceſſes.

"But if with oil anointed thou repoſe.

"I likewiſe muſt allow, that ſome paſſages in Per"ſius are rendered dark by the unuſual figures which "are of a bold turn; but that cauſe (for it is not "juſt to call it a fault) I aſcribe to the Poet's geni"us, which being great, aimed at great things. . . . "Farther, our Poet was not very talkative, but a lo"ver of brevity, a circumſtance that makes him "more obſcure." Here we find that Caſauboh aſcribes the obſcurity we meet with in Perſius to four cauſes. 1. His fear of Nero. 2. His modeſty. 3. The ſublimity of his genius. 4. His love for conciſeneſs. Now ought theſe four cauſes to be reduced to the firſt, as the Author of the preface to the new tranſlation has done?

II. As the Author in queſtion has aſſerted, that Perſius wrote in an obſcure ſtyle from his fear of Nero, he ſhould not have ſuppoſed that the torva Mimalloneis, &c. were that Prince's verſes. It was not enough for him to ſay, that he could not comprehend how Cornutus could permit this; he ought to have aſſerted poſitively, that he would not have conſented to it, and that Perſius had no occaſion for a Corrector. Otherwiſe this will involve us in a very ſilly argument; ſuch a one as ſeems to exceed all the caprices and extravagant whims of the human mind.

[L] Some Italian Genealogiſts declare, that the Falconcini of Volterra deſcend from his father.] Here follows a reaſon which Francis Stelluti (63) employs, to prove that Perſius was of Volterra. We have, ſays he, a tradition, that the family of the Falconcini is deſcended from Flaccus, a Roman Knight, Perſius's father; which is the more probable, becauſe the name of Perſius was preſerved in that family; and has conſtantly appeared in it for upwards of three hundred years: It is anſwered, that Perſius had no brother, nor any children: that the ſirname Flaccus, was ſpread over ſeveral cities in Italy; and that the noble and illuſtrious family of Perſius has ſubſiſted above four hundred years in Genoa. See Gaſparo Maſſa's diſſertation aforementioned: Hippolite Landinelli (64) informs us, that there is ſhewn, at Volterra, a houſe which is ſaid to have belonged to Perſius.

(63) The Life of Perſius, prefixed to the Italian paraphraſe of that Poet.

(64) Nell' de Origine di Lani, cap. 11. apud Mich. Juſtinian i Scritt. Ligari, p. 108.

PERSONA (CHRISTOPHER), by birth a Roman, and Prior of the Convent (a) of Santa Balbina (b), of the order of the Guillelmites (c), on Mount Aventine, was noted in the 15th Century for his ſkill in the Greek tongue. It is ſaid that he went into Greece to learn it (d). He tranſlated into Latin Agathias and ſome other Authors [A]. It is affirmed

(a) Jovius, Elog. cap. 116.

(b) Geſner, in his Bibliotheca, ſays Sancta Albina.

(c) Jovius, Elog. cap. 116.

(d) Konig. Bibl. vet. & nova.

[A] He tranſlated into Latin Agathias, and ſome other Authors.] He tranſlated into Latin the Hiſtory of the Goths, written by Procopius: but thoſe who affirm, with Paulus Jovius (1), that he alſo tranſlated Procopius's Hiſtory of the War of the Perſians, and the War of the Vandals, are miſtaken. The piece he publiſhed of Procopius ſhewed the fraud of Leonardo Aretino (2), which I mention elſewhere (3). He gave us ſeveral other tranſlations; that of Origin's books againſt Celſus, that of twenty five of St. Chryſoſtom's Homilies, that of ſome treatiſes of St. Athanaſius, and of ſome treatiſes of Theophylact's (4). The verſions in queſtion are not very good ones; but both Paulus Jovius, and ſo many other writers who mention him, are inexcuſable for not taking any notice of him. Du Pin is ſo much a Gentleman, that I am ſure he will not be diſpleaſed with me for ſaying, that the following words in his Tome I. are a little obſcure. Origen's treatiſe againſt Celſus is divided into eight books, which were long ſince publiſhed in Greek, with Gelenius's tranſlation, and with notes by Eſchelius and one Chriſtopher Perſona, printed at Rome in 1471, and afterwards very correctly in England in 1658 (5). I obſerve I. That the changing Hoeſchelius into Eſchelius may miſlead a reader. It would incline him to believe, that there is a writer named Eſchelius; and that he is not the ſame perſon with the learned man of Auſburg, who has obliged the world by publiſhing ſeveral Greek Authors. II. Du Pin expreſsly hints, that Perſona did not give a tranſlation of Origen's book in queſtion, but only ſome notes to illuſtrate it. Nevertheleſs Geſner (6) informs us, that this Author dedicated, to Sixtus IV. his Latin verſion of the eight books of Origen againſt Celſus. III. Du Pin's words ſignify, that theſe eight books were printed at Rome in 1471, in Greek, with Gelenius's tranſlation, and the notes of Eſchelius and Perſona. But he ſhould not have ſaid this; for Gelenius lived in the 16th Century; and the Greek edition, with Gelenius's verſion, was not publiſhed till 1605. It was a preſent made by Hoeſchelius.

(1) Jovius, Elog. cap. 9.

(2) Idem, ibid. and cap. 116.

(3) Rem. [F] of the article ARETINO LEONARDO.

(4) Geſner, Biblioth.

(5) Du Pin, Bibliotb. des Auteurs Eccl. Tom. 1. p. 133. Dutch edit.

(6) Geſner, Biblioth. folio 167 verſo.

Here follows a conſiderable Supplement from Mr. Simon. The printers have been guilty of two errors on that occaſion, they ſubſtituting the year 1581, inſtead of 1481 (7), and Suſchelius inſtead of Hoeſchelius. "We learn from Theodore Gaza *, that Pope Ni"cholas V. ſent a man purpoſely to Conſtantinople, "to fetch from thence the books which he wrote a"gainſt Celſus; and that the inſtant he received them, "he affirmed that he died of the plague in 1486 (e). Voſſius ſpeaks of him with the higheſt contempt [B]. Nevertheleſs there are diſputes about who ſhall have him for their own: the Auſtin Friers declare him to be of their Order; but the Servites claim him, and rank him in the catalogue of their Authors (f).

(7) I ſuppoſe that Simon had writ 1411, and not as Du Pin, 1471.

* Theod. Gaz. epiſt. ad Chriſtop. Perſon.

(e) idem, ibid. Baillet, Jugemens des Traduc. Latins. 312.

(f) Proſper Mandoſius, Bibliotb. Romana, Centur. 1. num. 82. p. 59.

" promiſed a conſiderable recompence to any perſon " who ſhould tranſlate them into Latin. But this " Pope dying, they were not printed at Rome, in " Latin only, till the year 1581, under the Pontifi- " cate of Sixtus IV. Gaza, not expecting to be as " well rewarded by Sixtus as by his Predeceſſor, pre- " vailed with Chriſtopher Perſona, Prior of Santa " Balbina, to tranſlate them into Latin; and there " was not any other tranſlation till Suſchelius publiſhed " them in Greek and Latin at Auſburg, from other " Greek manuſcripts, found by him in the libraries " of Germany. Laſtly, Spencer, an Engliſh Pro- " teſtant, publiſhed a very fine edition of them at " Cambridge in 1658, which does not differ in any " manner from that of Auſburg, becauſe he had no " Greek MSS. He only corrected the tranſlation, " and added ſome new notes (8)."

(8) Simon, Lettres Choiſies, p. 94. edit. of 1700.

[B] Voſſius ſpeaks of him with the higheſt contempt.] The publication of Procopius's Greek work, ſays he, was ſo much the more conſiderable preſent, as there were only bad tranſlations of that work. He adds, that the very impertinent Chriſtopher Perſona omitted a great many particulars, and publiſhed his own Chimeras rather than the thoughts of the Hiſtorian. Eſtque hoc egregii viri (Davidis Hœſchelii) beneficium eo majus, quòd Latini interpretes toties abeant à Græcis: imprimis ineptiſſimus ille Chriſtophorus Perſona quatuor rerum Gothicarum libros vertit; ſi vertiſſe, & non pervertiſſe dici is debet, qui multa adeò omittit, & in iis, quæ refert, toties nobis ſua narrat ſomnia (9). i. e. " We " are ſo much the more obliged to that excellent man " David Hoeſchelius, for his preſent, as the Latin " tranſlators vary ſo frequently from the Greek; and, " in particular, that moſt ſilly writer, Chriſtopher " Perſona, who has given us a verſion of four books " of the Hiſtory of the Goths: if we may give it " the name of verſion, and not perverſion, ſince he " has omitted ſo many particulars, and inſerted ſo " many chimeras of his own." I have taken notice elſewhere (10), of a miſtake of Voſſius, which Sandius, who wrote animadverſions upon him, has taken no notice of. Voſſius affirms, that Leonardo Aretino's Plagiariſms with reſpect to a book of Procopius, prompted Perſona to tranſlate Agathias (11). He ſhould have ſaid, that theſe prompted him to tranſlate Procopius's work in queſtion into Latin. Procopium Latine loquentem fecit, non dubia in Leonardum Aretinum confiata invidia, qui ſuppreſſo Græci authoris nomine Gothicam hiſtoriam tanquam è variis ſcriptoribus decerptam pro ſua Juliano Cæſarino Cardinali, qui ad Varnam ab Amurathe cæſus periit, nullo pudore nuncuparat (12). i. e. " He gave a Latin verſion of Pro- " copius, merely out of reſentment, (as is very plain) " to Leonardo Aretino, who ſuppreſſing the Greek Au- " thor's name, had, in a moſt barefaced and ſhame- " leſs manner, dedicated to Julianus Cæſarinus the " Cardinal, ſlain at Varna by Amurath, the Hiſtory " of the Goths, as though it had been his own " work, and by him collected from various Au- " thors." Voſſius, by citing this paſſage, has expoſed himſelf to the animadverſions of the Criticks.

(9) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Græcis, p. 269, 270. See alſo his de Arte Hiſtorica, p. 94.

(10) Rem. [F] of the article ARETINO (LEONARDO).

(11) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. p. 558.

(12) Jovius, Elog. cap. 116. p. 258.

PETAVIUS DIONYSIUS), in French Petau, born at Orleans in the year 1583, entered into the ſociety of the Jeſuits in the year 1605. He taught rhetorick in their College at Paris, and afterwards divinity with a wonderful capacity (a). I ſhall not give a character of his extenſive and deep learning: for you may meet with it in a book (b) which has not been long printed, and is to be had of all the booktellers. You may alſo conſult the funeral Oration of that Jeſuit, written in Latin by Henry Valeſius (c); you will alſo find in the Gallia Orientalis (d) a full account of ſeveral things which had been ſaid of him, with the titles of moſt of his works, and times when they were printed. You may alſo meet with the titles of them and their date in Moreri's Dictionary. Monſieur Baillet has collected a great many particulars which relate to this great Author. See his Jugemens des Savans ſur les Critiques Grammariens *, Chapter DXIII. ſur les Traducteurs Latins †, Chapter CMXX. and ſur les Poetes, Chapter MCDLXXIV. It is enough for me to refer you to theſe Authors, I ſhall only add, 1. That Dionyſius Petavius died at Paris (e) December the 11th (f), 1652, thirteen weeks after his antagoniſt Salmaſius [A]. 2. That

(a) Alegambe, Bibliotb. Script. Societ. p. 96.

(b) The Eloges des Hommes illuſtres by Mr. Perrault, Tom. 1. p. 63, &c. of the Dutch edit. 1698.

(c) It is inſerted in the Lives of illuſtrious Men, collected by Dr. William Bates, and printed at London, in the year 1681.

(d) Page 217 & ſeq.

* The Grammarians who are alſo Critics.

† The Latin Tranſlators.

(e) Gazette de Paris, for December the 14th, 1652, where it is obſerved, that ſeveral Princes, and particularly Pope Urban VIII. deſired to have him at their Court, but that he declined that honour, both out of modeſty, and to obey Lewis XIII. who thought it uſeful and glorious to his Kingdom, to keep ſo great a man there.

(f) And not in November, as F. Labbe aſſerts, Chronol. Franc. Tom. 5. p. 894.

[A] His antagoniſt Salmaſius.] The war they waged againſt each other laſted very long, and was very briſk: it had been impoſſible to match two champions more capable to reſiſt one another than theſe two were. It is a pity they did not write leſs paſſionately. Their direct controverſy began, if I am not miſtaken, ſoon after Salmaſius had publiſhed his Commentary on Tertullian's treatiſe de Pallio, in the year 1622. Petavius, concealing his name under that of Antonius Kercoëtius Aremoricus, cenſured (1) that Commentary. He was anſwered in a work printed (2) in the year 1623, and intitled, Confutatio Animadverſorum Antonii Kercoëtii ad Claudii Salmaſii Notas in Tertullianum de Pallio. Auctore Franciſco Franco J. C. Petavius replied in a work divided into 3 parts, the firſt of which was printed at Paris, in the year 1622, and the two others ſucceſſively the next year in the ſame city. The firſt is entitled, Antonii Kercoëtii Aremorici Maſtigophorus primus, ſive Elenchus Confutationis quam Claudius Salmaſius ſub ementito nomine Animadverſis Kercoëtianis oppoſuit. The ſecond is entitled, Antonii Kercoëtii Aremorici Maſtigophorus ſecundus, ſive Elenchi Confutationis. . . . Pars ſecunda: and the third, Antonii Kercoëtii Aremorici Maſtigophorus tertius, ſive Elenchi Confutationis . . . . pars tertia. I cannot tell whether his reply was refuted or not. But I know that after this firſt controverſy, he endeavoured to meet with his adverſary, and to attack him wherever he could. They who are acquainted with Salmaſius's character, will eaſily imagine that he defended himſelf, and attacked in his turn. He wrote ſome beautiful lines in Latin, which Monſieur Menage has inſerted in one of his books, as I have obſerved above (3), and which turn upon a particular which has been obſerved of Apes. Scaliger had made uſe of the ſame compariſon, not only againſt Lydiat (4), but alſo againſt Scioppius. Scioppius, ſays he (5), ſcripſit adverſus Jeſuitas. Scioppius wrote againſt the Jeſuits: he will aſcend too high, and is ridiculous like the monkey, who the higher he climbs, the more he ſhews his backſide. The Author of the Apology for Stephen Paſquier againſt Garaſſe made uſe of Salmaſius's Latin lines, without naming him; he gave a kind of Paraphraſe of them, and tranſcribed ſome. Here follows the paſſage (6). " There is a pleaſant apologue told of a " monkey, which I may very properly apply to Garaſ- " ſe's humour, and to his actions, which are mere " apiſh tricks. An old ape all bald behind, but full " of malice within, poſted once an advertiſement up " in all the publick ſtreets of the Republick of the " apes and baboons, giving notice, that whoever had a " mind to ſee a very fine ſhow, might reſort to ſuch a " place, and he promiſed to divert them well. The " day appointed being come, every one ſet out, apes " great and little, monkies and baboons, males and " females, with or without tails, all crowd to the " place, there never was ſuch a concourſe of them " ſeen before.

(1) This Cenſure, entitled, Animadverſorum Liber, was printed at Rennes, in the year 1622. 8vo.

(2) At Paris, and not at Middelburg, as is ſet down in the title.

(3) Quotation (111) of the art. HOSPITAL (Michael de l').

(4) See above, quotation (112), of the article HOSPITAL (Michael de l').

(5) Scaligerana, under the word Scioppius, p. m. 222.

(6) Defenſe pour Eſtienne Paſquier, Liv. 1. ſect. 7. p. 93, &c.

" Conveniunt

2. That he has done the Socinians great ſervice, though unawares, and againſt his intention [B]. 3. That it has been ſaid the Jeſuits were very much diſpleaſed with him for the " Conveniunt omnes, Cercopitheci, Simiæ,

" Clurinæ pecudes, omne genus Cercopium :
" Quæ ſunt caudatæ, quæ ſine caudis ambulant,
" Similes hominibus beſtiæ turpiſſimæ.
" Erat inter illos ingens expectatio :
" Quidnam editurus, & miri novi foret,
" Tam grandium Minator ille SIMIUS.

" Every one takes his ſeat, they waited a great while " for the Merry-Andrew: after he had kept them " four or five hours in ſuſpence, he arrives at laſt, and " gets on a tree which was to be his ſtage. He " jumps from branch to branch, up and down, gets " on the top of the tree, comes down again, laſtly, " having made his fifteen turns, he begins to turn " his back to the ſpectators, and ſhews them his " backſide, thus making fools of thoſe who truſted to " a monkey's promiſes. Poggius obſerves, that a cer- " tain buffoon played the ſame trick in the city of " Bologna; but we have a quite new inſtance of it " in Garaſſe." What we are told here by Poggius was applied to Laurence Valla; Monſieur Menage would perhaps have quoted it, if he had called it to mind. Here follows the ſtory, with the application of it. Perſimilis eſt Valla noſter homini ridiculo : qui cum aliquando ſe ex quadam turri volaturum certo die profiteretur : & populum ad id ſpectaculum conveniſſet : homines ſuſpenſos variis alarum oſtentationibus ad noctem uſque detinuit. Deinde omnibus volatum cupide exſpectantibus : populo culum oſtendit. Ita Laurentius noſter poſt multas atque ingentes verborum pollicitationes ; poſt tantam expectationem promiſſorum : tandem non culum, quidem ut ille, ſed volantis cerebri inſaniam, & pergrandem ignorantiæ ſupellectilem oſtendit (7). " Valla is ve- " ry much like a certain buffoon, who promiſed once " that he would fly from a high ſteeple, and having " got a great number of people together, he kept " them at bay till night, raiſing their expectations, " by diſplaying his wings before them: at laſt, as " they expected he was going to fly, which they ve- " ry much longed to ſee, he ſhewed them only his " back-ſide. Thus our Laurence, after many and " mighty promiſes, having raiſed our expectation " very high, ſhews us, not indeed his back-ſide, like " that buffoon, but the ſillineſs of his empty brains, " and the produce of a moſt profound ignorance."

(7) Poggius, Invectiv. lib. 1.

It cannot be denied, but the Jeſuit Petavius ſhewed too much arrogance, and too much bitterneſs, not only againſt Salmaſius, but alſo againſt Scaliger, and againſt many other perſons. They were in the right to obſerve this by way of parentheſis, in this Jeſuit's article in the Dutch edition of Moreri. I wonder that Monſieur Perrault choſe rather to paraphraſe a paſſage in Henry Valeſius's oration, than to omit it intirely. Tanta ejus viri (Scaligeri) auctoritas omnium prope præjudicio roborata Petavium noſtrum à ſcribendo minime deterruit. Immo vero ipſum eo magis impulit, ut quæ ab illo emendatore temporum peccata fuerant, ipſe in ſuis de doctrina temporum libris emendaret. Non quod illius viri gloriæ obtrectaret ; ſed ne plerique forte auctoritate Scaligeri inducti, minime diſcuſſa rei veritate, in errorem præcipites laberentur (8). Thus ſpeaks Henry Valeſius: and here follow Monſieur Perrault's words. Scaliger's work was looked upon as a rule, which all the world was to follow. But this did not prevent Father Petavius from attempting the ſame undertaking, and from correcting in his book of the doctrine of the times, many errors, which are to be met with in Scaliger's work of the Emendation of Chronology ; but he did it with all the decency and civility, which men of letters owe to one another, ſo that without drowning his predeceſſor's glory, he gained himſelf a very great reputation in the ſame ſcience (9). If you read a paſſage from Monſieur Morus, and another from Guy Patin (10), you will not have a very good opinion of the civility of this adverſary of Scaliger.

(8) Henricus Valeſius, in Orat. funebri Dionyſii Petavii, p. 682. Collect. Bateſianæ.

(9) Perrault, Hommes illuſtres, Tom. 1. p. m. 65, 66.

(10) See the Nouvelles Lettres contre Maimbourg, p. 182.

[B] He has done the Socinians great ſervice, though . . . againſt his inclination.] Let us tranſcribe a long paſſage from Monſieur Simon. It relates to this particular, and contains ſome other things which belong to Father Petavius's article. " I have heard " from Monſieur Hardy, that Monſieur de l'Aubeſ- " pine had alſo ſome controverſy with F. Petavius, " and threatened him that he would get ſome of his " notes on St. Epiphanius condemned; but I am " ſure that this learned Jeſuit would have defended " himſelf very well. If there be any thing to cen- " ſure in Petavius's works, it is chiefly in the ſe- " cond volume of his Theological Doctrines *, " that he ſeems to favour the Arians: it is " true that he ſoftened thoſe paſſages in his pre- " face; but as the body of the work continues en- " tire, and the preface, which is an excellent piece, " came only afterwards, it has not entirely prevent- " ed the harm which that book is like to do at this " time, when the new Unitarians boaſt that F. Pe- " tavius declared for them. I have ſeen ſome per- " ſons here, who imagine that Grotius, who had a " great correſpondence with Crellius, and with ſome " other Socinians, impoſed upon that learned Jeſuit; " but it is by no means probable, that ſo learned a " man, as Petavius was, would have ſuffered him- " ſelf to be miſled by Grotius who was his friend. " It is much more probable, that he wrote his own " thoughts honeſtly and with ſincerity. It would be " to the ſociety's reputation to continue their Fellow- " Jeſuit's doctrines throughout the reſt of the Syſtem of " Divinity, by following his method, which is ex- " cellent. It is certain that he had that deſign " himſelf; for I have ſeen a ſcheme he had drawn " up for that purpoſe; whereby I have known his " manner of ſtudying, of which I may give you an " account in another letter. A friend of mine told " me for certain, that he was not looked upon as an " able Divine among the Jeſuits, and that he was " often obliged to apply to ſome other Fathers who " lodged in the ſame houſe, when he had ſome " Theological argument to treat of. Several of our " people (11) ſay the ſame of Father Morin, who is " indeed a pitiful reaſoner. But whatever may be " ſaid of F. Petavius in his ſociety, I find him e- " very where admirable. Can there be any thing " more delightful than his fine Latin ſtyle in ſuch " difficult ſubjects? I only wiſh he had not been ſo " prolix in his expreſſions. A man who treats of " Doctrines, cannot be too conciſe; he muſt avoid " all long-winded periods as much as poſſible: here- " in did F. Sirmond excel, who had the art of " expreſſing himſelf in a few words, and very clear- " ly; and yet he was much inferior to F. Petavius " in point of learning (12)." Monſieur Simon was in the right to obſerve, that Father Petavius's preface was not a good remedy: for notwithſtanding that preface, the Socinians and the new Arians take a great advantage of that Jeſuit's collections, concerning the tradition of the three firſt centuries. Theſe collections encouraged Sandius to write a book, which has vexed the orthodox, and put a great deal of work on their hands. See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, in the account of a book written by Dr. Bull, an Engliſhman (13). See alſo Monſieur Jurieu, in his Tableau du Socinianiſme, p. 224, and 363. But obſerve, that this Miniſter pretending to make an advantage of Father Petavius's authority, falſified his words, and that the Biſhop of Meaux did not pardon him that fault. You will ſee the proof of this immediately.

* Dogmata Theologica.

(11) That is to ſay, the Fathers of the Oratory; for Monſieur Simon was among them, when he wrote this.

(12) Simon, Lettres choiſies, p. 12, 13.

(13) For Sept. 1685, in the catalogue of new books. num. 1. See alſo theſe Nouvelles for June 1685, art. 2. p. 611. and for June 1686, art. 8. p. 399. of the 2d edition.

Laſtly the Theology of the antient Fathers, theſe are Monſieur Jurieu's words (14), was ſo imperfect, with regard to the Doctrine of the Trinity, that the Jeſuit Petavius was forced to acknowledge in theſe very words, that they gave us only a rough draught of it *. Here follows the Biſhop of Meaux's anſwer (15). " Go " now and truſt your Miniſter, when he quotes paſſa- " ges to you. No, brethren, he does not read them, " or he reads them but careleſsly, he looks in them " only for difficulties, and not for ſolutions; he la- " bours to perplex people's minds, and not to inſtruct " them; he ſpares nothing to miſlead you. As for " inſtance, when having a mind to perſuade you † " that the theology of the antient Fathers is imperfect " with regard to the myſtery of the Trinity, he makes " Father Petavius ſay in theſe very words, that they " have given us only a rough draught of it. But that (14) Jurieu, 6 Lettre Paſtorale, of the 3d year, p. 154. edit. in 12mo.

* Theolog. Dogm. Tom. 2. Præfat. cap. 3.

(15) Boſſuet, premier Avertiſſement aux Proteſtans, num. 27 and 28. p. 28 of the Dutch edition.

† Lett. 6. p. 43.

the manner after which he ſpoke of St. Auguſtin's Hypotheſis concerning Grace [C]. 4. That his Dogmata Theologica, which were very dear and very ſcarce, are no longer ſo, ſince

" learned Father ſays quite the contrary in the paſſage " to which the Miniſter refers us, which is in the " Preface to the ſecond volume of his Dogmata Theo-  Theol. Dogm. " logica. For he  undertakes there to prove, that Tom. 2. Præf. " the Catholick Doctrine was always the ſame upon cap. 1. num. 10. " that ſubject, and in the very firſt chapter of that 12. " Preface he demonſtrates, that the chief and eſſenti- " al part of that myſtery has always been well known " by tradition; that the Fathers of the firſt Centu- " ries agree with us in the main, as to the ſubſtance and " the thing itſelf, though not always in the manner of ex- " preſſing it: which he continues to prove in the ſecond †† Ibid. c. 2. " chapter ††, by the authority of St. Ignatius, of " St. Polycarp, and of all the antient Doctors.  Ibid. c. 3. " Laſtly, in the third chapter , which is that " which the Miniſter objects to us, the learned Je- " ſuit, ſpeaking of St. Juſtin, againſt whom they " would raiſe the greateſt ſuſpicions, declares, that " this holy Martyr has admirably well and moſt clearly " propoſed all that is material in that myſtery: which he †† Ibid. n. 3. " proves †† alſo by the authority of Athenagoras, of " Theophilus of Antioch, and of the others, who all " held, ſays he, the chief and material part of that " Doctrine; whence he infers, that if we meet with " ſome obſcure paſſages in the works of theſe holy " Doctors, it is becauſe as they had to deal with " Heathens and with Philoſophers, they did not declare the " moſt ſecret and hidden part of the myſtery with the " greateſt ſubtilty and accuracy, in the books they pub- " liſhed: and in order to win theſe Philoſophers, they " give that myſtery ſuch a turn as agreed beſt with Plato- " niſm, which they had ſtudied: as was ſtill done a long " time after, in the catechiſms which were compoſed to " inſtruct thoſe whom they would win over to Chriſtia- " nity, to whom they gave only the firſt ſtrokes, or as the " Miniſter tranſlates it, the rough draught of the myſte- " ries: not but that they were well acquainted with " them, but becauſe thoſe minds being ſtill weak " were not judged capable to bear the whole weight " of them: ſo that it was thought proper to lead " them into ſo deep a myſtery with ſuch a regard as " became their weakneſs. This is in ſo many words, " what that Father aſſerts. Your Miniſter makes " him ſay quite contrary in ſo many words. He makes " him ſay, that their theology was imperfect, becauſe, " he ſays, they uſed ſome modifications, and pro- " portioned their doctrines to the capacity of the ig- " norant, and he miſtakes for an ignorance in the " teachers, the prudent modifications they uſed with " regard to their pupils." Monſieur de Meaux had obſerved juſt before, that Father Petavius's learned Preface was an explanation of all that he taught upon that ſubject (16). I think it is as reaſonable an explanation as a very able man could give: but yet it is plain nevertheleſs, that this Jeſuit has contradicted himſelf, or that he was under ſuch a perplexity of variations, as never fails to puzzle thoſe, who change parties, whilſt they are writing. His deſign was at firſt to repreſent ingenuouſly the doctrine of the three firſt Centuries. He did not miſrepreſent the opinions of the Fathers, who entertained falſe notions of the myſtery of the three Perſons. He pretended only to give a true account of things, and to add to it the moſt natural explications which the words could bear. This was letting the publick know that the Fathers had uttered moſt abſurd falſities with regard to the generation of the word, and the myſteries connected with that. This was giving riſe to a very ſtrong objection againſt the authority of the Canons of the Council of Nice: one might infer from thence, that the Doctrine of the Trinity is not a fundamental article in religion, ſince they who erred upon that article were nevertheleſs ſaved. The new Antitrinitarians might draw many conſequences from thence. Father Petavius had notice of it; and was obliged to afford ſome remedy againſt that evil. With this view he wrote his Preface; his aim, his motives altered from black to white; the queſtion was now only to aſſert the orthodoxy of the Fathers; he was under a neceſſity to give them ſatisfaction: in a word, he was obliged to contradict himſelf. Monſieur Jurieu underwent the ſame trial. He wrote a paſtoral letter (17), in which he laboured only to undermine the Hiſtory of the Variations. It was neceſſary for his purpoſe, to aſſert that the Fathers had erred in the moſt fundamental articles of the Chriſtian Faith: he brought them as low as he could, and expatiated on the abſurd notions they had of the Trinity. He minded only his preſent intereſt, nor was it poſſible for him to keep within bounds. But ſometime after (18), he had thoſe to refute, who aſſert that the Doctrine of the Trinity is not neceſſary to ſalvation, and that the Socinians muſt conſequently be tolerated: it was then neceſſary for him to aſſert that the Fathers were orthodox; and he aſſerted it accordingly: he made them whiter than ſnow, he ſet up for their apologiſt, and their panegyriſt, and for the accuſer of thoſe who deſpiſed them, and who did it even after his own example (19). This is making ſport with the publick, and expoſing one's ſelf to be loaded with ſhame: notwithſtanding all his variations, it was proved to him, that he had ſaved the Socinians, though very much againſt his will (20). Compare this with the remark [C] of the article RODON.

[C] The Jeſuits were very much diſpleaſed with him for the manner after which he ſpoke of . . . . . Grace.] It has been reported that the vexations they gave him had almoſt obliged him to leave their College. But they maintain it is a mere fable. Let us quote a printed book. Dom. Dionyſius Sammarthanus a Benedictine Monk obſerves (21), that it is pretended Father Petau corrected in the 10th book of the 1ſt volume of his Dogmata, what he had aſſerted in the 9th in favour of St. Auguſtin's doctrine. But ſome body has anſwered (22) that this was falſe, and that the ſociety never gave that learned old man the leaſt trouble on that account: and if they had deſigned him any mortification, they would have gone otherwiſe to work; for inſtead of obliging him to recant in the 10th book, they would have made him alter and correct the 11th, ſince theſe two books are parts of one and the ſame volume: whence it is inferred (23), that Father Petavius never thought of removing, and that this is only a little ſtory invented by the Janſeniſts, whoſe echo Sammarthanus is. However it is certain, that in the writings of the Janſeniſts (24), they have quoted ſome paſſages from Petavius, which are favourable to the Auguſtinian Hypotheſis, and that it has been aſſerted, when this Jeſuit wrote againſt the friends of Janſenius, he forſook his former opinions. Read the following paſſage from the Hiſtory of Janſeniſm. " F. Petavius " would not refuſe coming to his brethren's aſſiſtance, " to defend the honour and doctrine of his ſociety a " gainſt his own ſentiments, and at the expence of his " own reputation. He wrote firſt a treatiſe of Law " and Grace againſt Janſenius, which was publiſhed " that year: he endeavoured afterwards to refute " what Monſieur Fromond had written againſt his " diſſertation upon liberty; this work came out to- " wards the end of the ſame year, with this title: " Elenchus Theriacæ Vicentii Lenis, ſive Liberti Fro- " mondi, Doctoris Lovanienſis Pariſiis 1648 (25)." This is related under the year 1648. The following paſſage belongs to the year 1649. Father Dionyſius Petavius a Jeſuit, having taught in his Dogmata Theologica, the Doctrine of St. Auguſtin, as being that of the Church, which every one ought to follow, renounced it to defend the cauſe and opinions of his ſociety, and undertook to explain, according to Molina's ſyſtem, the diſtinction which St. Auguſtin makes between the grace by which one acts, auxilium quo, which is the efficacious grace, and the grace without which one can do nothing, auxilium ſine quo non, which is the ſufficient grace. He entitled that piece Diſſertatio brevis de Adjutorio SINE QUO NON, & de Adjutorio QUO; ad mentem B. Auguſtini (26).

That the reader may have a diſtinct and full account of what the Anti-Moliniſts publiſhed upon this ſubject, I ſhall tranſcribe another paſſage here. Father Petavius's " learning was almoſt univerſal, and " his name famous among the learned. If his judg- " ment had been anſwerable to his application, they " who have more regard for that qualification in a " man, (16) Boſſuet, premier Averтiſſement aux Proteſtans, num. 25. p. 25.

(17) The 6th of the 3d year; it is dated November the 15th, 1588.

(18) See his 6th and 7th Letter of his Tableau de Socinianiſme, printed in the year 1690.

(19) See Mr. Saurin, in his Examen de la Theologie de Mr. Jurieu, p. 670, &c.

(20) See the book entitled, Janua cœlorum reſerata, p. 126 & ſeq.

(21) See the book entitled, La Conduite qu'ont tenue les Peres Benedictins depuis qu'on a attaque leur Edition de S. Auguſtin, p. 56.

(22) See the ſame book, p. 57, &c.

(23) Ibid. p. 58, 59.

(24) See above, quotation (24) of the article St. AUGUSTIN, and the Hiſtoire abregée de la Congregation de Auxiliis, p. 73, &c. of the edit. printed in the year 1687.

(25) Hiſt. du Janſeniſme, Tom. 1. p. 247. under the year 1648. See alſo p. 377, 378, under the year 1650.

(26) Ibid. p. 505. ad ann. 1651.

(g) In the year 1700. See what Monſieur Bernard obſerved concerning that edition, in his Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for Aug. 1700, p. 180, &c.

ſince the new edition that was publiſhed of them at Amſterdam (g), with the addition of ſeveral treatiſes.

" man, than for an immenſe reading, and who think " that an able man, is a man, who with a reaſonable " ſtock of learning, knows how to judge well of " things, would like his works more than they do. " It is ſomething ſurpriſing and inconceivable, to " ſee how in his Dogmata, he gave up to the Arians " the Fathers of the three firſt centuries, and how he " ſuppoſed them all to have been favourers of Aria- " niſm. I am far from thinking that his faith was " any thing the leſs Catholick for it, and from infer- " ring from it the other exorbitant conſequences, " which the Calviniſts, the other Proteſtants, and the " Socinians inferred. It is true, he thought to make " ſome amends for his fault by a preface, which the " Doctors of the Sorbonne obliged him to write; " but this was only putting the remedy near the " wound, but not curing it. He ſhould have burnt " that wretched work, whereby he would have ſpared " a great deal of ſhame to himſelf. His judgment " does not appear much more in what he wrote con- " cerning Grace. For his ſuperiors having obliged him " to recant the very Auguſtinian Doctrine upon grace " and predeſtination, which he had admitted and " aſſerted as the doctrine of the church, in the 12th " book of his 1ſt volume; he declared in the 10th " againſt that doctrine, leſt he ſhould agree with his " ſociety's adverſaries; but without altering the " foundations he had laid down in the foregoing " book. —— I do not obſerve this with a deſign to " inſult that Author, who had certainly ſome merit, " nor to enjoy the wicked pleaſure of ſpeaking ill " of a Jeſuit; but to let the Reader know, that it is " proper to miſtruſt thoſe who write many and large " books, and who compile paſſages, and that we " muſt beware not to depend upon them, without " conſidering, 1, Whether they write with judgment, " and give themſelves time to reflect upon what they " write: 2, Whether they write with liberty, and " without any biaſs, that is to ſay, whether they be " not members of a body or corporation, which " make a publick profeſſion not to admit ſome opi- " nions, and to admit others, and which obliges " every member to ſubmit blindly to all the engage- " ments of the whole body, under the penalty of be- " ing forced to remove, as Father Petavius uſed to " ſpeak, when he mentioned to his friends the rea- " ſons why he altered his opinions; I am too old to " remove to other lodgings, ſaid he to the late Monſieur " de Marolles, Abbot of Villeloin (27)."

(27) Note ſur la 3 Reponſe du Prince de Conti au Pere des Champs, p. 74, &c.

(a) See the Short Chronology of his Life by Baron Huiſſen, in the 2d volume of The preſent State and Regulations of the Church of Ruſſia. By Tho. Conſett, M. A.

☞ PETER I. Czar [A] of Ruſſia, who raiſed that Nation and Empire from a very low condition [B] to a State of great power and grandeur, was born May 30th, 1672, old ſtyle (a), and was ſon of the Czar Alexis Michaelowits by Natalia Kirilouna Nariſkin his ſecond wife (b). This Czar dying in 1676, Feodor or Theodore, his eldeſt ſon by his firſt wife, ſucceeded to the throne, and died in 1682. Upon his deceaſe, Peter, though but

p. 405. edit. Lond. 1729, in 8vo.

(b) Monſieur de Fontenelle's Elogium upon Peter I. Czar of Ruſſia.

[A] Czar.] Mr. Thomas Conſett, Chaplain to the Britiſh Factory in Ruſſia, in his Preſent State and Regulations of the Church of Ruſſia (1), writes this word Tſar; and in his Preface (2) aſſures us, that the Sclavonians and Ruſſians both write and ſpeak it as he does; for Czar, ſays he, is a meer corruption of foreigners, who were led to this way of writing it, either from the reſemblance of the ſound to the title of the Emperor of Germany, to which they were accuſtomed, or from their ignorance of the language itſelf, or of the true force of the letters in it. He obſerves likewiſe, that Tſar ſignifies King, in the Sclavonian language, throughout the Bible. Mr. Philip John von Strahlenberg alſo tells us (3), that Czar in the Sclavonian tongue ſignifies King, and alſo ſometimes Emperor; becauſe in all Sclavonian books, as well ſacred as profane, all Kings are called Czar; as in the Sclavonian Bible, which was tranſlated from the Greek about 700 years ago, long before the Ruſſian grand Princes took the title of Czar, the Kings, Pharaoh, Saul, David, &c. are called Czars; and in this language there is no difference between the title of Emperor and King. He acquaints us likewiſe, that this title of Czar was firſt aſſumed by Iwan Waſielewitz, ſirnamed the Great, grandfather of Iwan Baſilowitz the Tyrant, after he had conquered the city of Cuſan, was crowned there with the crown of Cuſan, and had alſo ſeized upon all the Principalities which were appennages; for notwithſtanding the Ruſſian Princes often changed their reſidence, they formerly ſtyled themſelves only Grand Princes of Ruſſia. This Iwan Waſielewitz ſoon after dying, his ſon Baſilius, by means of civil diſſenſions, loſt the Kingdom of Cuſan, together with the title of Czar, and ſuffered beſides very much by the Tartars. But his ſon Iwan Baſilowitz the ſecond, ſirnamed Groſnoy, i. e. Tyrant, recovered all, conquered the two Kingdoms of Cuſan and Aſtracan, and reſumed the title of his grandfather, ſtiling himſelf Czar of Cuſan, Aſtracan, and Siberia, Grand Prince of Moſcow, Wolodimir, and Novogrod, Lord of Pleſcow, &c. Likewiſe Powelitel and Samoderſchetz of all the Ruſſians. The former of theſe two titles ſignifies Imperator, Commander; and the latter, Self-Preſerver or Sovereign. Theſe titles have been allowed him and his ſucceſſors by moſt Potentates, till in 1721, when Czar Peter made peace with Sweden, the Senate, Synod, and Generals deſired the Czar, in the name of the States of Ruſſia, to ſtyle himſelf the Great, and Father of his Country. But the Archbiſhop of Novogrod perſuaded the Czar, that he might change the title of Powelitel into Latin, and call himſelf Imperator; which, though other Potentates had formerly allowed him to uſe this title in the Ruſſian language, being turned into Latin, cauſed many diſputes in Europe.

(1) Printed at Lond. 1729, in 8vo.

(2) p. 68.

(3) Hiſtorico-Geographical Deſcription of the North and Eaſtern Parts of Europe and Aſia, but more particularly of Ruſſia, Siberia, and Great Tartary, chap. 7. p. 276. Engl. tranſlat. Lond. 1738, in 4to.

[B] Who raiſed that Nation and Empire from a very low condition.] Monſieur de Fontenelle (4) tells us, Ruſſia was yet in a ſtate of ignorance and ruſticity, almoſt equal to that, which is inſeparable from the infancy of nations. Not but the Ruſſians had ſparks of ſagacity and penetration; they were informed with a genius, and were capable of imitating what they ſaw; but then they were dead to all induſtry; the peaſant, born a ſlave, and oppreſſed by a rapacious and mercileſs Lord, contented himſelf with the produce of a rude and artleſs huſbandry, and did not care to labour for more, than what might furniſh them with a bare ſubſiſtence; for indeed he had no opportunity of improving his fortune, nor durſt he ſo much as attempt it. The Lord himſelf was afraid of appearing wealthy; and arts are the natural offspring of riches, and of a gentle and mild adminiſtration. The arts of war, no leſs neceſſary to a nation than huſbandry, languiſhed almoſt under the ſame neglect; for the Ruſſians had extended their power to the north and eaſt only, where they met with people more rude and barbarous than themſelves; but had not made the leaſt acquiſition either to the weſt or to the ſouth, where they border upon the Swedes, Poles, and Turks. The Czars, from political views, would not ſuffer any of their Nobility or Gentry to go into the field; who at laſt conſidered that inglorious ſtate and inactivity as an honourable exemption; and if any of them happened to ſerve, their birth made them Commanders, ſtanding them inſtead of experience, or any other accompliſhment. They had ſeveral German Officers in their troops, but moſt of whom had been no more than private Centinels in their own country, and would never have been raiſed to Officers any where but in Ruſſia, and as ignorant of their buſineſs, as before their advancement. The Ruſſian armies, levied by force and violence, and made up of the dregs of the people, ill diſciplined, and commanded by raw and unexperienced Officers, were not able to make head againſt a body of regular troops; and if ever they happened but ten years of age, was proclaimed Czar, in excluſion of John his elder brother, who being but of a ſickly conſtitution, was at the ſame time very weak in his underſtanding. The Streltſi, who were the eſtabliſhed guard of the Czars, being fomented and encouraged by the Princeſs Sophia, his half-ſiſter, who flattered herſelf with the hopes of enjoying a greater ſhare of authority under John, who was her brother by both father and mother, and wholly incapable of acting himſelf, made an inſurrection in favour of John [C] ; and to put an end to the Civil War, it was at laſt agreed, that the two brothers ſhould jointly ſhare the Imperial Dignity. Peter, who was now Czar in his tender years, had been exceedingly ill brought up, not only through the general defects of the Ruſſian education, but likewiſe through the arts of the Princeſs Sophia, who ſurrounded him with every thing, that might ſtifle his natural deſire of knowledge, deprave his mind, and debaſe and enervate it with pleaſures. Notwithſtanding this, his natural inclination for military exerciſes diſcovered itſelf in his tendereſt years. Czar Feodor delighted in magnificence of dreſs, and numerous ſets of horſes ; and Czar Peter, though he was even at that age offended with his pageantry and vain oſtentation, which in his eyes appeared not only uſeleſs but burthenſome, yet ſaw with pleaſure, that his ſubjects, who had hither diſcovered too great a neglect for every kind of pomp, began inſenſibly to have a taſte for it. He conſidered, that the force of his example might be employed to nobler purpoſes ; and accordingly formed a company of fifty men, commanded by foreign Officers, and clothed and exerciſed after the German manner [D]. This company he reinforced with ſeveral others, which were all commanded by foreign Officers, who made uſe of the German Diſcipline, till at laſt he had got together a conſiderable body of ſoldiers. As he had at that time no war upon his hands, he made his companies fight againſt one another, or form imaginary ſieges ; he made a trial of their valour, and laid the ſchemes of future victories. The Streltſi looked upon this no otherwiſe than as the amuſement of a young Prince : but the Czar, who ſaw they were too formidable, and intirely in the intereſt of the Princeſs Sophia, concealed the deſign, which he had formed of cruſhing them ; and for this, was ſecuring to himſelf a body of troops, better diſciplined, happened to overcome, which to them was a matter indifferent, it was entirely owing to fortunate and uncommon circumſtances, which threw the victory into their hands. The main ſtrength of the Empire lay in the Streltſi, a body little different from that of the Turkiſh Janiſaries, and which, like them, was formidable to the Sovereign, as well as to the people, whom they ſerved to keep in awe and ſubjection. Their trade, which was low and languiſhing, was entirely engroſſed by foreign merchants ; and the ignorance and indolence of the inhabitants of the country, furniſhed ſtrangers but with too fair an opportunity of over-reaching them. The Ruſſians had not as yet put to ſea, either ſhips of war, or trading veſſels ; ſo that the port of Archangel was only of uſe to foreign nations. Though the Chriſtian religion obliges its profeſſors, the Clergy at leaſt, to acquire ſome ſhare of learning, theſe were involved in as thick clouds of ignorance, as the moſt common of the people. All that they knew in general was, that they were of the Greek church, and that they were obliged to hate the Latin. Not a Clergyman among them, had either learning or genius ſufficient to preach even to ſo illiterate an audience. Scarce was a book to be met with in the moſt antient and richeſt monaſteries. An aſtoniſhing depravation of manners, as well as of opinions, prevailed univerſally, and which they did not, as in other nations, conceal under the ſpecious appearances of decorum, or ſo much as ſet off with any ſallies of wit, or ſuperficial graces. Yet was this nation at the ſame time inſufferably haughty, deſpiſing every thing, which did not come within the reach of their underſtanding ; and to be proud, is to be profoundly ignorant. To this the Czars themſelves contributed, by not allowing their ſubjects to viſit foreign countries ; which probably aroſe from the apprehenſion they were under, that travelling would give their people an opportunity of diſcovering the miſery of their condition. The Ruſſians, who were ſcarce known but to their neareſt neighbours, were looked upon as having nothing to do in the common intereſts of Europe. They had very little correſpondence with the other Powers, who thought them ſcarce worth their notice, and had bare curioſity to inform themſelves from time to time of the moſt conſiderable revolutions, that happened amongſt them. Such was the ſtate of Ruſſia, ſays Monſieur de Fontenelle, when Czar Peter I. was born.

(4) Elogium on his Imperial Majeſty Peter I. Czar of Ruſſia.

[C] The Streltſi . . . . being fomented and encouraged by the Princeſs Sophia . . . . made an inſurrection in favour of John.] Mr. Conſett (5) tells us, that the Princeſs's real intention was to be Regent herſelf, and to dethrone Peter ; " in which attempt, by the " aſſiſtance of the Streltſi *, who were the eſtabliſh- " ed guard of the Tſars, and whom ſhe had drawn " into her party, having engaged Gudunoff their " General, by a promiſe of giving her ſiſter, the " Princeſs Catharina, in marriage to his ſon, ſhe " ſucceeded ſo far as to get Ivan proclaimed Tſar, " in conjunction with his brother Peer Alexiewich. " But this point was carried with ſuch circumſtances " of barbarity and cruelty, as reflect heavily on the " memory of that Princeſs ; for the Streltſi animated " and incenſed by various pretences of the late " Tſar Feodore's being poiſoned by his Phyſicians, at " the inſtigation of ſome of the chief men at the " helm, whoſe names were artfully whiſpered about, " and of a deſign formed at court, to mix poiſon in " the liquor given them at his funeral ; and the Ge- " neral, with many of the chief Officers, who were " generally the younger brothers of the firſt families " in Ruſſia, being before engaged in her deſigns ; " and the army thus enraged againſt the court, they " began firſt with the murther of the two Phyſicians, " who had adminiſtered phyſick to the deceaſed " Tſar ; cut in pieces ſeveral of the chief Officers of " the Crown, who were pointed out for deſtruction, " and threw others from the balcony of the Royal " Palace upon the ſoldiers pikes, who ſtood under- " neath for that purpoſe, with their pikes planted " upright to receive them ; committed many other " violences, and put the city every where in an up- " roar ; till after ſome days their fury ceaſed, and " the Coronation of the two Princes was celebrated. " But this violent proceeding ſo alarmed the adhe- " rents to Peter, that Prince Burris Alexiewich Gallit- " ſin carried him to Troitſa (or Trinity) monaſtery, " a ſtrong place, 60 Ruſs miles from Moſco, to ſe- " cure his perſon ; where he remained ſome time, " till this hurry was over and quieted."

(5) Preface, p. 26, & ſeqq.

* Strelets in the ſingular is an Archer or Bowman ; in the plural Streltſi.

[D] Formed a company of fifty men, commanded by foreign Officers, and clothed and exerciſed after the German manner.] He entered himſelf into the loweſt poſt, that of a Drum. Nor was this only an idle farce, to amuſe and divert himſelf and his court. He had ordered his commanding Officers, intirely to forget that he was Czar. He performed the duties of his poſt with the greateſt diligence, and paid the utmoſt deference and ſubmiſſion to the orders of his ſuperiors.

plined, and whoſe fidelity was more to be relied on. At the ſame time he had another project in view, of equal importance with the former, and yet more difficult to be put in execution. The ſight of a ſmall Dutch veſſel, which he had met with on a Lake belonging to one of his pleaſure-houſes, where it lay uſeleſs and neglected, had made an impreſſion on his mind; and he carried his reflections ſo far, as to a deſign, next to impracticable in itſelf,, and which perhaps appeared little leſs in his own eyes, that of forming a Navy [E]. His firſt care was to get ſome Hollanders to build ſome ſmall veſſels at Moſcow, and afterwards four frigates of four guns each, on the Lake of Pereſlave. He had already taught them to combat againſt one another; and he paſſed two ſummers ſucceſſively on board Engliſh or Dutch ſhips, which ſet out from Archangel, in order that he might perſonally inſtruct himſelf in every branch of naval affairs. In the beginning of the year 1696 Czar John died, and Peter was now ſole maſter of the Empire. He began his reign with the ſiege of Aſoph, then in the hands of the Turks; but did not take it till 1697, after having ſent for Venetians, who built ſeveral gallies on the river Don, to ſhut up the mouth of that river, and prevent the Turks from relieving the place. This gave him a ſtronger idea than ever of the neceſſity and importance of a naval force, but he was ſenſible at the ſame time of the great diſadvantage which he lay under, from having none but foreign ſhips, or at leaſt none but what he was obliged to employ foreigners in building. He was deſirous of ſurmounting theſe diſadvantages; and as the affairs, which he projected, was too new and of too ſingular a nature, to be ſo much as conſidered in his Council; and as the execution of his views, if he had entruſted them in any other hands but his own, would have been almoſt impoſſible, or at leaſt gone on but very ſlowly; he reſolved ſingly to attempt ſo bold an undertaking. In 1698 he ſent an Embaſſy to Holland, at the head of which were Monſieur le Fort, a Genevois, and Count Golowin, the Great Chancellor; and he himſelf went incognito in the retinue, and viſited England ſuperiors. He fed upon his pay only, and lay only in a Drummer's tent in the rear of his company. He was ſometime after raiſed to a Serjeant, when, in the judgment of his Officers, whom he would have puniſhed, had they diſcovered the leaſt partiality in his favour, he was juſtly intitled to that advancement. And he never roſe otherwiſe, than as a ſoldier of fortune, whoſe advancement would even have been approved of by his comrades. Herein his deſign was to teach his Nobility, that birth alone was not a ſufficient title to military employments; and to let his ſubjects know that merit was the only one. The inferior employments, through which he had gradually paſſed, and the hardſhips he had ſuffered in them, gave him a juſter right to require their imitation in this particular, than he could have claimed from his abſolute authority (6).

(6) Fontenelle, ubi ſupra.

[E] Carried his reflections ſo far as to a deſign, next to impracticable in itſelf, and which perhaps appeared little leſs in his own eyes, that of forming a navy.] Mr. Conſett, in his ſecond volume, has publiſhed An Account of the Riſe and Naval Power in Ruſſia: Or the Story of the little Boat, which gave riſe to the Ruſſian Fleet. Being the Preface to the Sea-Regulations in Ruſſia, and ſaid to be written by the Tſar Peter Alexiewich himſelf. In this piece we are informed, that it happened, that the Czar was in the Flax-yard at Iſmaeloff (7), and walking by the magazines, where ſome remains of the houſhold furniture of Niketa Ivanowich Romanoff, his great uncle, were laid, ſpied, among other things, a ſmall foreign veſſel: and his native curioſity not ſuffering him to paſs it by without an enquiry, he preſently aſked Francis Timerman (who then lived with him, and taught him Geometry and Fortification) what that was? he told him it was an Engliſh boat. The Czar again aſking, Where was it made uſe of? Timerman anſwered, that it was uſed by ſhips to bring and carry goods. The Czar aſked, In what is it preferable to the Ruſſian veſſels? for he obſerved it to be built in a better and ſtronger manner than the Ruſſian: Timerman anſwered, that it goes with a ſail, with the wind, or againſt it. This greatly ſurprized him, and raiſed his curioſity to ſee a proof of it. Upon which, Timerman ſought out Carſtens Brand, the Carpenter, who had been ſent for by the Czar's father from Holland, to build ſhips in the Caſpian ſea. He repaired the boat, made the maſt and ſails, and ſailed up and down the river Yauſe (8) in the Czar's ſight, who was extremely pleaſed with it; and deſired to ſteer it himſelf. And becauſe he obſerved the boat not to anſwer her helm, but often to ſtrike againſt the bank, he aſked Brand the reaſon of it; who anſwered, it was becauſe the water was narrow, and the boat had not ſufficient way. Upon which the Czar ordered it to be carried into a water called the Proſian Pond; but this was nothing better, and his deſire was ſo inflamed, that he reſolved to carry it to the lake of Pereſlave; but his mother, who was extremely anxious for his ſafety, endeavoured to diſſuade him from this journey to the lake, which he at laſt found an opportunity of taking, under the pretext of performing a vow in Trinity monaſtery. After he had taken a full view of the extent of this lake, he entreated his mother to build there an houſe and veſſels; and Brand built two ſmall frigates and three yatchts, wherein the Czar diverted himſelf a few years. But afterwards, he thought this too ſmall a water, and deſigned to go to the lake Cubins, which is large and extenſive, but not deep enough. Then he reſolved to viſit the ſea itſelf; but here again he met with oppoſition from his mother's care; but notwithſtanding this, in the year 1694, he went to Archangel, and thence in his own yatcht, called the St. Peter, ſailed to Ponoia, in company with Engliſh and Dutch Merchant-ſhips, under the convoy of one Dutch Man of War, commanded by Captain Jolle Jolſon. He was ſo much delighted with his voyage, that he bent his thoughts wholly towards building a fleet; and when in the invaſion of the Tartars, he had taken Aſoph, he determined to execute his reſolution. A fit place for building ſhips was found in the river Verenez, which runs by a city of the ſame. Builders were ſent for from Holland; and in 1696, a new work was begun in Ruſſia, viz. the building of great ſhips, gallies, and other veſſels. And he took meaſures to bring the art itſelf into his own nation; for which end, he ſent great numbers of his Nobility and Gentry into Holland, and other countries, to learn ſhip-building and navigation. And what is ſtill moſt remarkable, he viſited Holland and England in Perſon, in order to make himſelf maſter of thoſe arts. Mr. Conſett (9) relates a curious ſtory, of which himſelf was an eye-witneſs, and which ſhews the affection that the Czar had for the little boat, which had given riſe to all his naval force; and tells us, that in 1723 (10), this boat was brought from Moſcow to Peterſburg, repaired and beautified, in order to make her laſt and moſt glorious appearance on the 12th of Auguſt. In June, the Czar ſailed to Revel with his fleet, and returned to Croonſtadt in the beginning of Auguſt; at which time a great number of yatchts and buyers, ſaid to be 200, and one galliot, were ordered to meet him there, and to attend on the little boat. After this fleet was arrived within half a league of that place with their charge, they had orders to caſt anchor, till the nine

(7) An old ſeat of his family near Moſcow.

(8) A ſmall river which runs by the ſuburbs of Moſcow.

(9) Vol. 2. p. 218, 219.

(10) Strahlenberg, c. 11. p. 311. ſays in 1721.

England as well as Holland, in order to inform himſelf fully in the art of ſhip-building [F]. The news of the revolt of forty thouſand Streltſi obliged him to ſet out ſuddenly for Vienna, and arriving at Moſcow about the end of the year 1699, immediately broke them all [G], thinking himſelf more ſecure in the reſpect they would pay to his intrepidity, than in that they owed to his orders. In 1700 he had got together a body of ſtanding forces, conſiſting of thirty thouſand foot, including the troops, which he had formerly raiſed and ſecured to his intereſts. And now the vaſt project, which he had formed, diſplayed itſelf in all its parts. He opened his Dominions, which had till then been ſhut up, having firſt ſent the chief Nobility of his Empire into foreign countries to improve flags in ſo many pinnaces came up to pay their reſpects to the mother of their great fleet. At the return of the flags, the yatchts, &c. weighed anchor, and went into the haven, except the galliot, which bore the little boat, that lay off at ſea till the day of the grand ſolemnity, when ſhe was received with uncommon ceremony. For the Czar a ſecond time viſited her with the flags alone, launched her, and graced her with his Imperial Standard, ſteering her himſelf, and two other Admirals rowing, with the Surveyor of the Navy Joan Michaelowich Golovin. At her launching the great Admiral General fired ſeven guns, as a ſignal to the whole Fleet, conſiſting of twenty two men of war of the Line, to fire at once. Then away ſhe came, and as ſhe rowed by each ſhip, was ſaluted by all the canon. After ſhe had paſſed through the whole Fleet, and rowed into the Haven, the whole Fleet paid their laſt compliment to their mother with one general ſalute of their canon. After this there was a dinner, and in the evening the Court and Flag-officers were rendezvouſed on the ſides of the Haven, and cloſed the ſcene with much drinking. A few days after the boat was brought back to Peterſburgh, and laid up in the Caſtle, where ſhe is preſerved with the utmoſt care.

[F] Viſited England as well as Holland, in order to inform himſelf fully in the art of ſhip-building.] Monſieur de Fontenelle tells us that he entered himſelf in the India Admiralty-Office at Amſterdam, and cauſed himſelf to be inrolled in the liſt of ſhip-carpenters by the name of Peter Michaelof, and not of Peter Michaelowitz, a name he ſhould have aſſumed, as being that of his grandfather; for this termination in the Ruſſian language diſtinguiſhes the man of quality from the vulgar; and he was reſolved not in the leaſt to take upon himſelf on account of his ſovereign dignity. He worked in the yard with greater aſſiduity and application than his companions, who were not actuated with motives comparable to thoſe, with which he was inſpired. The Czar's quality was known to all; and they ſhewed him to one another with a regard and veneration, which did not ſo much ariſe from the conſideration of his being a ſoverign Prince, as from the buſineſs he was come about. King William III. of England, who was then in Holland, and was himſelf, ſays Monſieur de Fontenelle, a perfect judge of perſonal merit, paid him all the regard and reſpect, which a Prince endued with ſuch uncommon qualities juſtly deſerved; and his diſguiſe only diſpenſed him from that, which was barely ceremonius and troubleſome. In the Preface to the Sea Regulations in Ruſſia, above quoted, we are informed (11), that "at Amſterdam, in the "wood-yard, called the Oſtend Wharf, the Czar "wrought with other voluntiers in the ſhips, and in "a little time made that proficiency as to paſs for a "good carpenter. After this, he deſired John Pool, "maſter of the yard, to inſtruct him in the proportions of a ſhip, which he learned in four days. "But becauſe in Holland this art was not taught perfectly in the mathematical way, but only ſome "principles of it, and the reſt muſt be acquired by "long practice and experience; and the aboveſaid "maſter told him, that they could not demonſtrate "this in lines; it gave him great uneaſineſs, that "he had taken ſo long a journey for that purpoſe, "and had failed of his end ſo much deſired. A few "days after, it happened, that his Majeſty was at "the houſe of John Theeſing a Merchant, where he "ſat in company very penſive for the aboveſaid reaſon; but when in the courſe of converſation he "was aſked the cauſe of his melancholy, he then declared the above reaſon for it, An Engliſhman in "the company, who heard this, told him, that in "England, this kind of ſtructure was in the ſame "perfection as other arts and ſciences, and might be "learned in a ſhort time. His Majeſty was glad to "hear this, and hereupon went in all haſte to England, and there, in four months time, finiſhed his "learning; and at his return brought over with him "two maſter ſhip-builders, John Deane and Joſeph "Noy." Mr. Conſett obſerves (12), that Baron Huyſſen, Counſellor in the College of War, in his Hiſtory of the Life of the Czar, relates, that the Czar perceived the method of building ſhips in England to be more regular, and much better, than that of Holland; and he was often heard to ſay, that if he had never gone to England, he had ſtill remained ignorant of that art. In England he met with a ſecond reception from King William, who, to make him a preſent agreeable to his taſte, and that might ſerve as a model of the art, which he was ſo deſirous of learning, gave him a magnificent yatcht (13). Mr. Conſett tells us (14), that as ſoon as he returned from England, he went down to Veronez, whither he carried the two Engliſh builders, Deane and Noy, the firſt of whom ſoon after deſired a diſcharge, which was granted, without his having given any proof of his art. The Czar himſelf and Joſeph Noy received orders from the Lord High Admiral Theodore Alexiewich Golovin, to build each of them a man of war. The Czar having taken upon himſelf the title of a maſter-builder, was pleaſed to ſubmit to the condition of that character; and in compliance with that order, gave the firſt proof of his ſkill in the art, which he had learned abroad, and continued afterwards to bear this title; and had at all times, notwithſtanding his great engagements in other affairs, one ſhip upon the ſtocks; and at his death left a ſhip half built, one of the largeſt ſhips in Europe, 180 foot long upon the deck, 151 broad, and 21 deep, with 110 guns, and is ſaid to be one of the fineſt that ever was ſeen, as indeed were all the reſt built by him. He drew himſelf the draught of this great ſhip at Riga, where was no maſter-builder beſides himſelf; and when he returned to Peterſburg, he gave the ſurveyor an account, that he had drawn his draught of the great ſhip, which he had orders to build from the Surveyor's Office; and according to the regulations of the Navy, preſented the draught to be examined. This ſhip was launched June 29, 1727, and is called Peter pervoie tworoi, i. e. The firſt and ſecond.

(11) Conſett, vol. 2. p. 214.

(12) Ibid. p. 215.

(13) Fontenelle, ubi ſupra.

(14) Vol. 2. p. 215.

[G] The revolt of forty thouſand Streltſi . . . . arriving at Moſcow about the end of the year 1699, he immediately broke them all.] Mr. Conſett obſerves (15), that "during the Tſar's abſence abroad at this time, "the Princeſs Sophia being uneaſy under her confine-"ment, and reſolved to regain her liberty, found the "means to correſpond with the Streltſi, who were "now quartered at a diſtance from Moſco in Ukrania, "and to inſtigate them to a third rebellion in her "favour. About ſix regiments of them mutinied "under a pretence of want of pay, and were on "their march towards Moſco, to make their de-"mands on the Government, when General Gordon "at the head of four Regiments of foreign Diſci-"plines, viz. Preobazenſki and Simonoffſki Regiments, "one of his own name, and by the name of le Fort, "with the Militia of the city and county com-"manded by Alexei Simonowich Shein, met them in "the way to Voſcreſenſki (or Jeruſalem) Monaſtery, "offered to give them all reaſonable ſatisfaction, and "deſired them to retreat peaceably to the poſt they "had left, and to deſiſt from thoſe hoſtile proceed-"ings. But the more he endeavoured to pacify "them, they grew the more inſolent and preſſing to "proſecute their intended journey; inſomuch that he "was

(15) Pref. 4. 35.

improve themſelves in knowledge and learning [H]. He invited into Ruſſia all the foreigners he could meet with, who were capable of inſtructing his ſubjects in any manner; and gave the kindeſt reception to all land and ſea Officers, ſailors, mathematicians, architects, men ſkilful in the diſcovery of mines, and working in metals, phyſicians, ſurgeons, and indeed artificers of every kind, who would ſettle in his Dominions. In the mean time this new ſcene of things, the novelty of which was alone ſufficient to make it diſliked, raiſed many diſcontents; and his deſpotic authority exerted upon that occaſion, was ſcarce powerful enough to ſuppreſs them [I]. In 1700 being ſtrengthened by the alliance of Auguſtus King of Poland, he made war upon Charles XII. King of Sweden: in which he was not deterred by the ill ſucceſs, which he met with at firſt, for he uſed to ſay, I know, that my armies muſt be overcome for a great while; but even this will at laſt teach them to conquer. However, he afterwards gained conſiderable advantages; and the acquiſitions he had made in Livonia and Ingria, Provinces ſubject to the Swedes, were ſo important, that he projected the building of a fortreſs, whoſe Port, ſituated on the Baltick, might be large enough to receive a Fleet; and accordingly laid the foundation of the city of Peterſburg in 1703, which is one of the ſtrongeſt in Europe. In 1706 having driven the Swedes out of Courland, and defeated them at Kaliſche, Dubrovna, and Leſnoy, and reduced to order the Zaporovian Coſſacks, he took from them Okzakow, the laſt Sanctuary of theſe Rebels. In 1709 he gained a complete victory over the Swedes at Pultowa [K], having ſhewn himſelf to be no leſs a great Captain, than a brave and intrepid Soldier; and obliged the King of Sweden to fly for ſhelter to Bender in the Turkiſh Dominions. He did not fail of making an advantage of the misfortunes and abſence of that King; and made a complete conqueſt of Livonia and Ingria, to which he added Finland, and a part of Swediſh Pomerania. The Turks having broken the truce, which they had concluded with him, he was incloſed by their army in 1712 on the banks of the Pruth; and that in ſo advantageous a ſituation, that he ſeemed inevitably loſt. In the midſt of the conſternation his army was under, the Czarina Catharine [L], who was reſolved to follow him into the field, dared alone to project

" was conſtrained to repulſe and fight them, which " he did very ſucceſsfully, and carried them priſo- " ners to Moſco; and making a decimation, exe- " cuted every tenth man. But the Tſar receiving " the news of this inſurrection, haſtened his return " home, and provoked beyond all patience with " the inſolence and impiety of their repeated revolts " and treaſon, proceeded to a new ſcrutiny for the " ringleaders in this rebellion, and made terrible ex- " amples of them by a total extirpation of their kin- " dred and families; yet took no other ſatisfaction " of his ſiſter the Princeſs, than to continue her con- " finement in the nunnery, and to hang the Prieſt, " who had carried her letters, on a gallows before " her window, holding with his right hand a letter " into it, which had been intercepted from her cor- " reſpondents."

[H] Sent the chief Nobility of his Empire into foreign countries, to improve themſelves in knowledge and learning.] Monſieur de Fontenelle tells us (16), that he ſent them to viſit different parts of Europe; pointing out to each of them, according to their various talents and inclinations, what they were to make their ſtudy. Some of them obeyed in a very aukward manner; and one in particular, who had been ſent to Venice, ſhut himſelf up four years together in his apartment, that when he came out, he might pleaſe himſelf with the agreeable thoughts of having neither ſeen nor informed himſelf in a ſingle inſtance. But in general the Czar's project had its deſired effect; the Noblemen improved themſelves in foreign countries, and Europe opened to them a new ſcene, with which they had been altogether unacquainted, and from which they reaped no ſmall benefit and advantage.

(16) Ubi ſupra.

[I] This new ſcene of things, the novelty of which was alone ſufficient to make it diſliked, raiſed many diſcontents; and his deſpotick authority, exerted upon that occaſion, was ſcarce powerful enough to ſuppreſs them.] Monſieur de Fontenelle tells us, that he had to do with a dull, heavy, untoward people, grown idle by the little fruit they reaped from their labours, inured to ſevere, cruel, and often juſt puniſhments. And the dreadful miſery, under which they groaned, made them out of love with life, perſuaded by long experience, that there was no poſſibility of attaining to any happineſs, and therefore intirely inſenſible to any appearance of it. The moſt trifling and indifferent changes, in dreſs for inſtance, or the obliging them to cut off their long beards, was very ſtiffly oppoſed, and was ſometimes alone a very ſufficient cauſe for an inſurrection. And indeed the Czar, to break his ſubjects to the moſt uſeful innovations, was obliged to exert himſelf with far greater vigour, than would have been neceſſary, if his people had been of a more gentle and tractable diſpoſition. Beſides, a circumſtance, which laid him under a yet ſtronger obligation to act with ſome ſeverity, was, that the Ruſſians conſidered grandeur and ſuperiority in no other light than as a power of doing evil; and an indulgent and gentle maſter would not have appeared to them a great Prince, nor would they have conſidered him as their ſovereign.

[K] In 1709 he gained a complete victory over the Swedes at Pultowa.] A great part of the Swediſh army were made priſoners. The Swediſh Generals, who were taken, were conſtantly entertained at his own table; and one day, when he had drank an health to his maſters, who had inſtructed him in the art of war, Count Rinſchild, one of the chief officers among the priſoners, aſked him, who they were whom he honoured with ſo glorious a title? Yourſelves, Gentlemen, ſaid he. Your Majeſty is then very ungrateful, replied the Count, to have ſo beaten your maſters. The Czar, to make ſome reparation for this glorious ingratitude, immediately gave order to return them all their ſwords; and he treated them with as much honour, as their own Sovereign could have done, had they made him victorious. The defeat of the Swedes at Pultowa gave him an advantage with reſpect to the eſtabliſhment of arts beyond what himſelf could ever have expected. Near three thouſand Swediſh officers were diſperſed up and down his Dominions, and particularly in Siberia, a country of a vaſt extent, which runs as far as the Confines of China; and whither they always ſend ſuch Ruſſians as are condemned to baniſhment. Theſe priſoners, who had no ſubſiſtence, and ſaw their return into their own country was very doubtful, at leaſt at a great diſtance, began to apply themſelves to the various profeſſions, which they were capable of; and excited by neceſſity, ſoon made a conſiderable progreſs in them. There were even maſters of languages and mathematicians among them. They ſoon formed a kind of Colony, which poliſhed and civilized the antient inhabitants of the country; and many arts, which tho' eſtabliſhed at Moſcow and Peterſburg, would not probably have reached Siberia under a long courſe of time, were thus ſuddenly ſettled there (17).

(17) Fontenelle, ubi ſupra.

[L] The Czarina Catharine.] Monſieur de la Motraye (18) gives us a curious account of her hiſtory, and tells us, that ſhe was born in a village called Rung-

(18) Voyages and Travels, vol. 3. c. 3.

hen,

project an expedient. She ſent to negotiate with the Grand Viſier, and let him privately ſee, that a great ſum of money was at his ſervice: he was tempted, and the Czar's prudence completed the work. To perpetuate the memory of this event, he cauſed the Czarina to inſtitute the Order of St. Catharine, of which ſhe was declared Sovereign, and into which none but women were to be admitted. The King of Sweden having at laſt quitted the Turkiſh Dominions in 1713, the Czar found this formidable enemy advancing to oppoſe him; but he was now ſtrengthened by an alliance with the King of Denmark. He carried the war into the Dutchy of Holſtein, which was in alliance with the Swedes; and at the ſame time purſued his obſervations and political ſtudies [M]. In 1714 he obtained a victory at ſea over the Swedes at Hangout near the coaſts of Finland; upon hen, on the banks of the lake Worthſy in Livonia, and not in the neighbourhood of Dorpt, as other Writers affirm, who, in order to make her extraction the more illuſtrious, have repreſented her father to have been Lieutenant-Colonel of the family of Albendel, and others to have been Colonel Roſen. But the common report is, that her father was a vaſſal of this Colonel, who dying when ſhe was but four or five years old, as her mother did ſoon after, there was nothing left for her ſubſiſtence; for it is rare, that the vaſſals of the Livonian and Ruſſian Nobility leave any thing to their children. The pariſh Clerk, who kept a ſchool, took her into his houſe, till Dr. Gluck, Miniſter of Marienbourg, happening to come to that village, liked the girl, and being willing to eaſe the Clerk, whoſe income was very ſmall, carried her home with him. Dr. Gluck treated her almoſt in the ſame manner, as if ſhe had been his own daughter; and his wife finding her endued with excellent diſpoſitions, ſhewed her equal affection. She was employed in buſineſs ſuitable to her age, as ſpinning, and ſewing, which ſhe performed extremely well. She had learned to read of the pariſh Clerk of Runghen. When ſhe left that place, ſhe ſpake only the language of the country, which a is dialect of the Sclavonian tongue; but at Dr. Gluck's ſhe learned the German language to perfection, and ſpent all her leiſure hours in reading. A Livonian Serjeant in the Swediſh army fell paſſionately in love with her; and ſhe agreed to marry him, if he could obtain the conſent of Dr. Gluck, whoſe circumſtances being very narrow, gave his conſent more readily than he would otherwiſe have done. This Serjeant was of a good family, had a ſmall eſtate of his own, and was in a fair way to preferment, being diſtinguiſhed for his bravery and ſobriety. It is ſaid, that Dr. Gluck performed the marriage ceremony himſelf. The next day, the Ruſſians, under the command of Lieutenant-General Baur, made themſelves maſters of Marienbourg, which is of itſelf a weak place, and was then defended only by a few Swediſh troops. The General ſeeing Catharine among the priſoners, and obſerving, notwithſtanding her tears, ſomething in her face, which ſtruck him, he aſked her ſeveral queſtions concerning her condition, to which ſhe made anſwers with more good ſenſe than is uſual in perſons of her rank. He bid her therefore fear nothing, ſince he would take care to ſee her well uſed; and immediately ordered her to be conducted to the place where his baggage was, where were ſome women, who waſhed his linen, and did other buſineſs ſuitable to their ſex; and finding her afterwards very proper to manage his houſhold affairs, he gave her a ſort of authority and inſpection over theſe women, and the reſt of his domeſticks, by whom ſhe was extremely beloved for her behaviour towards them, when ſhe inſtructed them in their duty. It happened, that Prince Menzikoff, who was the General's Patron, having ſeen her one day, obſerved ſomething very extraordinary in her air and behaviour, and aſking who ſhe was, and in what condition ſhe ſerved him, the General told him the particulars abovementioned. The Prince declaring, that he wanted ſuch a perſon in his family, the General anſwered, that he was too much obliged to his Highneſs to refuſe him any thing, and immediately called for Catharine, and told her, that was Prince Menzikoff, who had occaſion for a ſervant like herſelf; and that he had too much kindneſs for her, to prevent her receiving ſuch a piece of honour and good fortune. She only anſwered with a profound curteſy, which ſhewed, if not her conſent, at leaſt that it was not in her power to refuſe the offer made to her. In ſhort, Prince Menzikoff took her with him, or ſhe went to him the ſame day. He kept her in his ſervice till the year 1703 or 1704, when the Czar ſaw her one day, as he was at dinner with him, and ſpoke to her; and ſhe made ſo great an impreſſion upon his heart, that he at laſt married her.

It will be aſked, perhaps, what became of her young huſband, after the taking of Marienbourg? But this is very uncertain, as the Reader may ſee in Monſieur de la Motraye.

The ſame Writer tells us (19), that the Czarina, by her complaiſance and engaging behaviour, made herſelf miſtreſs of the heart and affection of the Czar; ſhe accompanied him every where, and ſhared with him in all the dangers and fatigues of the war; and had in ſome ſort the government of all his paſſions, and even ſaved the lives of many more perſons, than Monſieur le Fort was able to do. She acquired the eſteem of every one, ſoldiers, ſailors, &c. and would often go herſelf, before or after an engagement, followed by ſome of her ſervants, with bottles of ſtrong liquors, and fill out ſeveral glaſſes to give them with her own hand. Some perſons who had been almoſt about the Czar ever ſince the year 1704, aſſured Monſieur de la Motraye, that he had a perfect indifference for all other women; and that he never ſhewed the leaſt jealouſy but once, and that was a few weeks before he died, when he looked upon her as the innocent cauſe of it. For having ſuſpected his Chamberlain, who was one of the handſomeſt men of the country, of having ſome preſumptuous deſign upon her honour, becauſe he ſaw him kiſs her hand one day, as he gave her his arm to help her out of her chaiſe; and ſuppoſing, that his ſiſter, who was one of the Maids of Honour, favoured this bold attempt, ſo contrary to the reſpect due to her Majeſty, he went out alone one morning to the monaſtery of St. Alexander Newſky, and left orders to ſeize the Chamberlain and his ſiſter; to hang the firſt, and give the Knout to the other under the gallows, and to baniſh her; and to cut off the Chamberlain's head, and expoſe it on a poſt; which was put in execution in leſs than half an hour after his departure. This was told Monſieur de la Motraye, at his arrival at Peterſburg, by perſons who ſaw the execution; and added, that the Czar the next day went with the Empreſs to take the air, and ordered the chaiſe to paſs, both in going and coming, cloſe by the poſt. However, as a proof of his having no ſuſpicion of her virtue and fidelity, he cauſed the Nobility and Clergy, a few days before his death, to renew or confirm the oath, which he had obliged them to take, to acknowledge her as Sovereign of all Ruſſia after his death, as well as whomever ſhe ſhould name to ſucceed her. As ſoon as the Czar died, ſhe recalled the ſiſter of the Chamberlain from her baniſhment, and replaced her about her perſon. She did not forget her benefactors in the midſt of her grandeur, but gave a penſion to Dr. Gluck and his family, as ſoon as ſhe had it in her power ſo to do.

(19) p. 137.

[M] At the ſame time purſued his obſervations and political ſtudies.] He cauſed his Engineers to draw the plan of every city, and make deſigns of all the different mills and machines, that he had not in his country. He inſtructed himſelf in every part of huſbandry, and in all ſorts of trade, wherever he came. He engaged experienced artificers in his ſervice, and ſent them into his dominions. Being at Gottorp, then in the hands of the King of Denmark, he was much delighted with a large globe, in the concave of which the heavens were repreſented, and the upon which he entered with his Fleet triumphantly into the Haven of Peterſburgh [N]. In 1716, he, with his Conſort, paid a viſit to the King of Denmark at Copenhagen, where he ſpent three months [O] ; and from thence went to Hamburgh, Hanover, and Wolfenbuttel, and thence to Holland, where he left the Czarina, and went to France in 1617, and on the 19th of June that year viſited the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris [P]. It would be endleſs to enumerate all the different eſtabliſhments, for which the Ruſſians are obliged to him ; but we ſhall mention ſome of the principal in the note [Q]. In his laſt ſickneſs, notwithſtanding the moſt exquiſite and continual pains of the ſtrangury, earth on the outward convexity. It was made after a deſign of Tycho Brahe, and is ſo capacious, that twelve perſons may ſit round a table in the inſide, and by turning it about, obſerve the celeſtial motitions. The ſight of this ſo ſtruck the Czar, that he deſired the King of Denmark would make him a preſent of it, and ſent for a frigate from Peterſburg, on purpoſe to carry it thither, where it was placed by ſome Aſtronomers, who were there, in a large houſe, which he had built for that purpoſe (19).

(19) Fontenelle, ubi ſupra.

[N] Entered with his fleet triumphantly into the haven of Peterſburg.] The Author of The preſent State of Ruſſia ; being the Journal of a foreign Miniſter, who reſided in Ruſſia. Tranſlated from the High Dutch (20), gives us the following account of this triumph. On the 15th of September, the Czar arrived at Cronſlat, where he ſtayed two days, till the Czarina was brought to bed of a Princeſs ; and on the 20th he approached the fortreſs, with the Ruſſian and Swediſh ſhips, and was ſaluted with 150 guns. Firſt, came three Ruſſian gallies. Secondly, three Swediſh ſcherboats, of four guns each. Thirdly, ſix Swediſh gallies, of fourteen guns each. Fourthly, the Swediſh frigate, with the Rear-Admiral Oehrenſchield. Fifthly, a ſcampavie, with the Ruſſian Rear-Admiral, viz. the Czar himſelf, who would never ſuffer himſelf in the fleet to be called or diſtinguiſhed otherwiſe, than by his employment. Sixthly, three Ruſſian ſcampavies full of Ruſſian ſoldiers. Thoſe ſhips having caſt anchor, and the men being landed, they marched through the triumphal arch in the following order. 1. Major-General Gollowin, leading a company of the Preobrazinſky guards. 2. Ten pieces of canon, ſixty colours, and three ſtandards, taken by General Knees Gallizin, in the engagement near Waſa in Finland, againſt the Swediſh Major-General Arenfeld. 3. Two companies of the regiment of Aſtracan. 4. Two hundred Swediſh ſubaltern Sea-Officers, ſoldiers, and ſailors. 5. Two companies of the regiment Preobrazinſky. 6. Fourteen Swediſh Sea-Officers. 7. The flag of the Swediſh Rear-Admiral, carried by four Subalterns. 8. The Swediſh Rear-Admiral Oehrenſchield, in new clothes laced with ſilver, of which the Czar had made him a preſent. 9. The Czar, as Rear-Admiral, in a green ſuit, laced with gold. 10. The remaining companies of the regiment of Preobrazinſky cloſed the proceſſion. The triumphal arch was moſt magnificently adorned, and repreſented divers emblems. Among others was to be ſeen, the Roman eagle ſeizing an elephant, with this inſcription, Aquila non capit muſcas, i. e. " The Eagle does not catch Flies." The name of the Swediſh frigate, the Elephant, gave the explanation. In this order, the victorious and vanquiſhed proceeded to the fortreſs, where the Vice-Czar Romadonaſsky ſitting on a throne, ſurrounded by the whole Senate, cauſed the Czar, as Rear-Admiral, to be called before the Aſſembly, and received at his hands, a relation in writing, of the victory obtained. The ſame being read by Romadonoſsky and the Senators, they took it under deliberation, and propoſed ſeveral queſtions to the Ruſſian Rear-Admiral ; after which they unanimouſly declared him Vice-Admiral of Ruſſia, in conſideration of the moſt faithful ſervice which he had done to his native country ; of which proclamation being made, the whole room reſounded with Sdraſtwi Vice-Admiral, i. e. Health to the Vice-Admiral. The Czar having returned thanks, went on board his ſloop, on which he hoiſted the flag of Vice-Admiral, and having received the congratulations of the foreign Miniſters, he went to Prince Menzikoff's palace ; where a noble entertainment was prepared. After he roſe from the table, he ſhewed particular marks of eſteem to the Swediſh Rear-Admiral Oehrenſchield, and ſaid to all the noble Ruſſians ſtanding about him ; Here you ſee a brave and faithful ſervant of his Maſter, who has made himſelf worthy of the higheſt reward at his hands, and who ſhall always have my favour as long as he is with me, though he has killed me many a brave Ruſſian. I forgive it you, (ſaid he, turning to him with a ſmile) and you may depend upon my good will. Mr. Oehrenſchield having thanked the Czar, anſwered, However honourably I may have acted with regard to my Maſter, I did but my duty : I ſought death (he had received ſeven wounds) but did not meet it ; and it is no ſmall comfort to me, in my misfortune, to be a priſoner of your Majeſty, and to be uſed ſo favourably, and with ſo much diſtinction, by ſo great a Sea-Officer, and now deſervedly Vice-Admiral.

(20) Printed at Lond. 1723, in two volumes in 8vo.

[O] He, with his Conſort, paid a viſit to the King of Denmark at Copenhagen, where he ſpent three months.] He viſited there every ſchool of the Univerſity, and all the men of letters in the place. He was ſo regardleſs of ceremony, that it was to him indifferent, whether they waited on him, or he went himſelf to ſee them at their houſes. He went every day in a ſloop, attended with two Engineers, to coaſt the two Kingdoms of Denmark and Sweden ; he ſurveyed all the windings, ſounded every part of the Straits, and afterwards had the whole ſo exactly deſcribed in charts, that not ſo much as the ſmalleſt ſhelf, or bank of ſand, eſcaped his obſervation. And it is a ſure mark of the great reſpect which his allies bore him, that they did not in any manner oppoſe him in his great and aſſiduous labours to make himſelf maſter in every part of uſeful knowledge. He received a yet more glorious teſtimony of their eſteem. England was at that time in alliance with him, as well as Denmark ; and theſe two Powers having joined their fleets to his, gave him the ſupreme command of the whole (21).

(21) Fontinelle, ubi ſupra.

[P] Viſited the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris.] He was entertained there with the lateſt invented and moſt curious experiments and machines. He was no ſooner returned into his dominions, but he ordered Dr. Areſkin, a Scots Gentleman, his firſt Phyſician, to write to the Abbé Bignon, and acquaint him with his intentions of becoming a Member of that Academy. And after the Academy had returned him their thanks with all reſpect, and in the moſt grateful manner, for the honour which he did them, he wrote to them a letter with his own hand. Theſe particulars may be ſeen in the Hiſtory of that Academy, for the year 1720 (22). The Academy ſent him every year the volume of the Hiſtory, which, as an Academecian, he was intitled to ; and he always accepted of it with pleaſure, as from his brethren (23).

(22) p. 125.

(23) Fontenelle, ubi ſupra.

[Q] We ſhall mention ſome of the principal.] In order to carry the power of a nation to its utmoſt height, it was neceſſary, that the Sovereign ſhould ſtudy his country, both as a Geographer, and a Natural Philoſopher. He was to be perfectly acquainted with all its natural advantages, and to have the art of making uſe of them. He therefore applied himſelf vigorouſly to the theory of thoſe ſciences, that he might the better be able to put them in practice. He would not truſt theſe momentous affairs in the hands of Miniſters, who ſeldom labour ſo aſſiduouſly for the publick good. He would truſt no eyes but his own ; and looked upon voyages of three or four hundred leagues as nothing, when he was to inſtruct himſelf in any uſeful kind of knowledge. He made theſe voyages, attended only by three or four perſons, and with an intrepidity ſufficient alone to keep danger at a diſtance. And indeed, he was ſo thoroughly acquainted with the map of his vaſt Dominions, that he was able, without the leaſt miſtake, to form the greateſt deſigns, that could be founded on the general ſituation of his country, or the particular diſpoſition of any of its parts.

As

gury, he ſpoke of affairs with the utmoſt tranquillity and acuteneſs of judgment. Among other things, when the Senators and Biſhops mentioned the variety of obligations, which the Empire of Ruſſia lay under to him, for reforming abuſes and bad cuſtoms, and introducing uſeful arts and ſciences, he told them, that "he had forgot to reform one of the "moſt important points of all, the adminiſtration of juſtice: that among all the arts "and ſciences, which he had borrowed from the Chriſtian Powers, and in which they "infinitely excelled the Turks, he had conſidered, that the latter as far ſurpaſſed the "former in their adminiſtration of juſtice, ſince law-ſuits in Chriſtendom laſt for years "and even ages together, with an infinite expence, whereas in Turkey they are determined "in a few days, and with very little charge; and all this occaſioned by the tedious and "litigious pleadings of the Lawyers. To remedy this, he determined, that cauſes (as "among the Turks) ſhould be carried at laſt to the tribunal of the Magiſtrate or ordinary Judge; that proofs in writing and witneſſes ſhould be produced, and the characters and behaviour of the latter ſhould be particularly examined, and ſo an impartial "judgment be pronounced; all which would be finiſhed in a few hours. But if the party "condemned by thatCourt, ſhould think himſelf injured, he might appeal from this ſentence "to the Synod; and even after a ſecond judgment againſt him, to the Sovereign himſelf." Thoſe who were preſent approving this ſcheme, he commanded an order to be drawn up, which he ſigned and dated from his bed, and it was ſent immediately to all the Courts of his Empire. This order limits the determination of all cauſes to the term of eleven days; and in conſequence of it, all the ſuits then depending were decided before he cloſed his eyes in death (c). He died of the ſtrangury, cauſed by an impoſtume in the neck of his bladder, on the 28th of January 1725, aged fifty three years, and left the world with all the magnanimity of an hero, and the piety of a Chriſtian. As he had declared by proclamation publiſhed three years before his death, that he was at liberty to appoint whomſoever he pleaſed to ſucceed him, he nominated the Czarina, his widow, to be his ſucceſſor, who was thereupon immediately acknowledged Empreſs of Ruſſia by the ſeveral Eſtates thereof. We have a great many diſadvantageous things related of him

(c) Monſieur de la Motraye's Voyages and Travels, vol. 3. c. 3.

As all Meridians center under the Poles, the French and Chineſe, for inſtance, would be neighbours in the Northern Parts of the Earth, if their dominions extended very far that way. Thus the very Northern ſituation of the Empire of Ruſſia, and its great extent, make it join northwards to the Northern Parts of other Kingdoms, which lye at a vaſt diſtance from it towards the South. The Czar's Dominions border upon a great part of Europe and all Aſia; and he has beſides a conſiderable number of large rivers, which fall into different ſeas; as the Dwina into the White-ſea, which itſelf opens into the Ocean; the Don into the Black-ſea, an arm of the Mediterranean; and the Volga into the Caſpian. He obſerved, that theſe rivers, which hitherto had been of little or no advantage to his ſubjects, would join, as it were, his Dominions to the moſt diſtant countries, if he made a communication between them, either by means of ſeveral ſmall rivers that fall into them, or by digging new canals. He ſet himſelf about executing theſe vaſt deſigns, cauſed all the neceſſary levels to be taken, marked out of all the places, where the canals ſhould be dug, and appointed the number of the ſluices. The communication between the Volkowa, which runs by Peterſburg, and the Volga being finiſhed, it opens a paſſage by water, for eight hundred French leagues together, acroſs all Ruſſia, from Peterſburg to the Caſpian Sea or Perſia. The Czar ſent the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris the draught of this vaſt communication, of which he was himſelf the chief Engineer. His Dominions towards the Eaſt extend to the Frontiers of China, and almoſt to the Seas of Japan, being a vaſt tract of land for upwards of fifteen hundred French leagues. The Ruſſian Caravans, which traded to China, uſed to take up a whole year in their journey. The Czar ſaw, that this great journey might be ſhortened and made more eaſy, either by the communication of rivers, by other laborious works, or by treaties with ſeveral Tartarian Princes, who might give a free paſſage through their reſpective Dominions; and by theſe means he found the journey would be performed in four months. According to the ſcheme, which he had formed, every thing was to center at Peterſburg, which by its advantageous ſituation ſeemed very well fitted for that purpoſe. This city, which he had founded, and called after his own name, was to him what Alexandria was to Alexander the Great, its founder; and as that was ſo happily placed, as in thoſe days to divert the current of trade from Tyre, which till then was the firſt city in the world for commerce; ſo in theſe, Peterſburg would draw all nations to its Port, and become the center of the moſt extenſive traffick in the Univerſe. The Czar extended his views ſtill farther. He was deſirous of knowing how his Dominions lay in reſpect of America, whether that bordered upon Tartary, or a paſſage might be found through the North-ſea thither, which would alſo have opened his trade to that new world. Two ſhips ſailed from Archangel upon this diſcovery, but one of them was ſtopped in its courſe by the ice, the other was never heard of more, ſo that in all probability it was loſt. In the beginning of the year 1725, in which he died, he gave orders to an experienced Sea-captain, to build two more ſhips for a ſecond attempt. The Revolution, which happened in Perſia by the revolt of Mahmoud, drew both the Ruſſian and Turkiſh arms to that ſide; and the Czar upon this occaſion not only made himſelf maſter of the city of Derbent, lying Weſtward on the Caſpian Sea, but likewiſe of every thing elſe, which might aſſiſt the views, which he had of enlarging the Ruſſian trade. He ordered a map to be made of that ſea, which is very different from thoſe before publiſhed. Ruſſia abounds in mines, which by the hereditary ſloth and indolence and general want of ſpirit in that nation, were either undiſcovered or neglected. The Czar ſent into Germany for perſons ſkilled in the knowledge of metals, and ſo made the beſt advantage of theſe hidden treaſures. Gold duſt was brought him from the ſhores of the Caſpian ſea, and the moſt remote parts of Siberia; and it is ſaid, that a pound of the latter yielded fourteen ounces of pure gold. Iron is indeed more common, but much more uſeful than gold; and that became common in Ruſſia, and with it all the arts, which do manufacture or make uſe of it.

Other eſtabliſhments, for which the Ruſſians are obliged to him, are thus enumerated by Monſieur Fontenelle.

A body of men conſiſting of one hundred thouſand foot, under as regular diſcipline as any in Europe, and a great number of the officers are already.

A Navy conſiſting of forty ſhips of the Line, and two hundred Gallies.

Fortifications in the beſt method at all towns, which deſerved them. An excellent civil Government in all the great cities, which were before as dangerous in the night, as the moſt unfrequented deſerts.

him in a book juſt publiſhed, ſome of which we ſhall mention in the note [R]; but ſhall add here ſome particulars of his character from Monſieur de Fontenelle, who tells us, that in the Czar's opinion, all the pomp and ſtate, which would only have ſurrounded his perſon, were derogatory to his character; and he left to Prince Menzikoff to expreſs the greatneſs

An Academy for naval affairs and navigation, where all the Nobility are obliged to ſend ſome of their children.

Colleges at Moſcow, Peterſburg, and Kiof, for languages, polite literature, and mathematicks; and ſchools in the villages, where the children of the peaſants are taught to read and write.

A College of Phyſicians, and a noble diſpenſatory at Moſcow, which furniſhes medicines to the great cities, and to the armies; whereas before there was no Phyſician but the Czar's, and no Apothecary in all his dominions.

Public lectures in Anatomy, a word never ſo much as heard of before in Ruſſia; and what may be looked upon as an excellent perpetual lecture, the cabinet of the celebrated Mr. Ruyſch, purchaſed by the Czar, and containing an immenſe collection of the moſt curious, inſtructive, and uncommon preparations.

An Obſervatory erected, not only for the uſe of Aſtronomers to obſerve the Heavens; but deſigned alſo as a repoſitory for all ſorts of curioſities in nature.

A Phyſic-garden, which the Botaniſts, whom he invited thither, were to ſtock, not only with all the plants, which are to be found in all the known parts of Europe, but likewiſe thoſe of the more northern parts, which lye ſtill undiſcovered, as well as thoſe of Aſia, Perſia, and the moſt diſtant coaſts of China.

Printing-houſes, where he has changed their old barbarous, and almoſt unintelligible characters, thro' the great number of abbreviations; and whereby books will become more common, which before, as they were hard to be read, were more rare to be met with, than almoſt any foreign commodity.

Interpreters for all the languages of Europe, and likewiſe for the Latin, the Greek, the Turkiſh, the Calmuck, the Mogul, and the Chineſe.

A Royal Library, compoſed of three very large ones, which he purchaſed in England, Holſtein, and Germany.

When the Czar had thus laid an uſeful and ſolid foundation, he applied himſelf to the fundamental part. He changed the architecture, which was exceſſive ugly and diſagreeable; or, to ſpeak more properly, he firſt introduced that ſcience into his dominions. There appeared in a little time, a number of regular and convenient houſes, with ſome palaces and publick edifices, particularly an Admiralty-office, on which he beſtowed ſo much grandeur and magnificence, becauſe it was not an edifice deſigned for ſhew and oſtentation only. He ſent for a great number of pictures from Italy and France, by which he inſtructed a people in the art of painting, who before knew no more of it, than was to be ſeen in the wretched daubings, which they had of their Saints.

He ſent ſhips laden with merchandiſe to Genoa and Leghorn, which returned freighted with marble and ſtatues. Upon which Pope Clement XI. pleaſed with his taſte, preſented him with a fine antique, and he had it brought to Peterſburg by land, not caring to venture ſuch a curioſity by ſea. He made likewiſe a cabinet of medals, a curioſity of but a modern date in thoſe countries.

His views were ſo general and extenſive, that he was once reſolved to ſend the young Ruſſian Ladies to ſome of the principal cities of Germany, to improve themſelves in politeneſs and behaviour; the want of which eclipſed the advantages received from nature. He had obſerved in other nations, how much acquired accompliſhments are capable of improving natural beauty, and how agreeable, even without that, many perſons have by an engaging behaviour made themſelves. But he ſoon became ſenſible of the inconvenience of theſe journies, ſo that he was forced to lay aſide all thoughts of them, and wait till ſuch time as the men, improved in politeneſs and civility, might be able to poliſh the ſofter ſex.

Their Religion, which, continues Monſieur de Fontenelle, ſcarce merited the name of Chriſtian, was not forgot in this general change. The Ruſſians, like the reſt of the Greek church, obſerved ſeveral Lents; and they believed, that provided they kept thoſe very ſtrictly, they had ſupply'd the place of every other duty. The worſhip of the Saints was degenerated into a ſhameful ſuperſtition: every man had his own in his houſe, for his immediate protection, and would lend him to a friend, whoſe Saint had not done ſo well by him. Miracles depended wholly on the invention and avarice of the prieſts. The Teachers, who were very illiterate themſelves, could teach their people nothing; a depravation of manners, which will in ſome degree maintain itſelf in ſpite of inſtruction, was here favoured and heightened by ignorance. The Czar ventured to undertake the reformation of ſo many abuſes, which affected his very political intereſts. Their frequent and ſevere faſts were very prejudicial to his troops, and often made them incapable of fighting. His predeceſſors had withdrawn themſelves from the Patriarch of Conſtantinople, and had ſet up one of their own. He aboliſhed this dignity, though pretty much independent on him; and by that means had a greater authority over his church. He made ſeveral judicious and uſeful eccleſiaſtical canons and inſtitutions; and, what is often neglected, he took care to have them put in execution. They began firſt with preaching in the Ruſſian language in Peterſburg. The Czar ventured ſtill greater lengths; he took away part of the revenues of theſe churches and monaſteries, which were too wealthy, leaving only what was neceſſary for their ſubſiſtence, and added the overplus to his own demeſnes. He eſtabliſhed alſo a general Liberty of Conſcience throughout all his dominions. Thus far Monſieur de Fontenelle; and Monſieur de la Motraye (24) tells us, that in order to effect this reformation of the church, the Czar ſent for the Biſhops and Divines from Novogrod, Kiow, and other places, who had ſtudied in foreign countries, and in ſhort all, whom he thought to be beſt able to adviſe him in that affair. He laid before them the ignorance of the Clergy in general, the ill conduct of the Monks, &c. He joined the Senate to this Aſſembly, in which he preſided himſelf: this ſynod was held for the firſt time in the palace of Peterſburg, in the year 1721; the ſecond time at Moſcow, in 1722; and the third time in the new Monaſtery of St. Alexander Newſky, near Peterſburg. He ordered the eſtabliſhment and convocation of it to be publiſhed in the following manner: By the Grace, Mercy, and Love of God towards Mankind, and by the Command of the moſt wiſe, moſt ſerene, and moſt powerful Peter the Great, Emperor and Sovereign of all the Ruſſia's, &c. is ſettled, concluded and eſtabliſhed, in the holy orthodox church of Ruſſia, a ſpiritual Synod for the Regulation of ſpiritual Affairs, with the Advice and Conſent of the Ruſſian Clergy, and of the Senate, in the Metropolitan City of Peterſburg, &c. All the Members of this Synod obliged themſelves, by ſeveral moſt ſolemn oaths, ſwearing by Almighty God on the moſt holy Evangeliſts, to declare their moſt ſincere ſentiments, as dictated by their own hearts, according to the beſt of their knowledge and underſtanding in the Scripture, and to conform to the regulations, which ſhould there be made.

(24) Vol. 3. c. 6.

[R] We have a great many diſadvantageous things related of him in a book juſt publiſhed; ſome of which we ſhall mention in the note.] The book is that of Mr. Philip John Van Strahlenberg, quoted above in the firſt remark. He was a Swediſh Officer, and had been thirteen years captive in the Czar's Dominions. In his ſixth Chapter he ſums up what has been ſaid by the admirers of the Czar in vindication or commendation of the ſeveral ſteps of his conduct; and then what has been alledged in oppoſition thereto by thoſe, who have diſapproved of it, and inſiſt upon its being tyrannical, unjuſt, and imprudent. Here is an abſtract of what he puts into the mouths of thoſe, who extol the Czar, and thoſe who condemn him. It greatneſs of the Sovereign by the magnificence of the favourite. He had turned over to that Prince all external ſplendor, reſerving to himſelf only the moſt laborious functions; in which he was ſo aſſiduous as to go in perſon to all fires, which are very frequent in Ruſſia, and for the moſt part make dreadful havock, the greateſt part of the houſes being built of timber. He had eſtabliſhed ſeveral officers to aſſiſt upon theſe occaſions; and to ſet an example to the reſt he himſelf took one of thoſe poſts; and fearleſs of danger would climb to the tops of ſuch houſes as were on fire; expoſing his perſon, and performing

It is ſaid by the former, that he was a Prince extremely circumſpect in every thing he undertook. His great courage and intrepidity, whereby from his infancy he overcame all his enemies at home and abroad, was evident to the whole world. He formed an army according to the manner of the moſt polite and experienced nations; he fitted out fleets in all the four ſeas, which border upon Ruſſia; and left a force behind him, not only ſufficient for the defence of his country, but capable of ſuccouring his friends and allies. He cauſed many ſtrong fortreſſes to be raiſed after the beſt plans, and furniſhed them with good artillery and garriſons; and for the ſecurity of his fleets, made very convenient harbours. He introduced arts and ſciences into his Dominions; and freed religion from many ſuperſtitious abuſes. His inclination to juſtice was viſible by the laws and inſtitutions he made, in framing of which he was ſo diligent, that he ſeldom allowed himſelf above four hours ſleep. He made many extracts with his own hands from the beſt laws of Europe, read them often, or cauſed them to be read, and to be tranſlated into the Ruſſian tongue, the better to judge of the difference, and to proceed accordingly. He accuſtomed himſelf to walk every day through the ſtreets, in order that ſuch of his ſubjects as were oppreſſed might have an opportunity of preſenting their petitions, which he ever graciouſly received, and was no leſs ready in redreſſing their wrongs. For the encouragement of trade, which flouriſhed more in his reign than in former times, he built new and large cities. And for the more convenient tranſportation of merchandize he cauſed canals to be cut, and a direct road to be made between the cities of Moſcow and Peterſburg. By his great care in ſearching for mines, and encouraging ſeveral manufactures, of which Ruſſia had formerly little or no knowledge, he raiſed his revenues exceedingly, and was thereby enabled duly to pay his Miniſters, Houſhold, and Army. He was generous in rewarding all his faithful ſervants, many of whom he raiſed from mean extraction to grandeur and riches. On the other, he puniſhed his treacherous and diſloyal ſubjects without any reſpect of perſons. He had an averſion to ſuch as were negligent, and would not apply to and qualify themſelves for uſeful employments. Inſtances of which were his firſt Conſort, his own ſon, and ſiſters. His integrity and fidelity to his friends and allies appeared by his inviolable attachment to the King and Republick of Poland: he would never hearken to any projects detrimental to that Commonwealth. And when propoſals were laid before him in favour of the Duke of Holſtein, his ſon-in-law, with regard to the Crown of Sweden, he is reported to have anſwered, I love my children, and am obliged to aſſiſt them. But in this caſe I muſt have more reſpect to my former engagements, than to my preſent intereſts. As to his perſonal diſpoſition, he was beneficent, friendly, laborious, and without pride. He would accept of invitations to dine and ſup with his ſubjects, and be ſatisfied with their uſual table. He would ſpeak to high and low, and aſſiſt even the meaneſt to the utmoſt of his power. He had no regard for the pomp of a Court, and hated ſplendid apparel. He was ſo laborious, that he would frequently viſit his docks and yards, where ſhips were building; and with his own hands perform the work of a common ſhip-wright. He was an excellent turner; and ſo well ſkilled in naval, civil, and military architecture, and gunnery, that he ſurpaſſed many profeſſed maſters. His laſt regulation of the ſucceſſion was a noble inſtance of his concern for the welfare of his people; for he thereby aboliſhed the right of Primogeniture, to the end that the eldeſt Princes might not, by thinking themſelves inconteſtably ſecure of ſucceeding, nouriſh too early a pride, and neglecting to improve themſelves by ſtudy and application, endanger the ſafety of the whole Empire by their ill behaviour. Let us now turn the reverſe of this picture, and ſee what a figure is there repreſented. The enemies of the Czar's character alledge in general, "that whilſt his flatterers "are fondly pleaſing themſelves with the acquiſitions "and extenſion of the borders of Ruſſia, they turn "away their eyes from the far greater ruin of the "Empire within." And here they reckon as one cauſe of theſe evils, "the irregular courſe of life "and debaucheries, into which the Czar was "plunged into in his moſt early years, not only to the "great detriment of the Empire, but the ſhortening "of his own days." The ſteps, by which he was led into theſe wicked courſes, are here ſhewn, and the miſchievous conſequences of them are painted in ſtrong colours. "The eldeſt Senators, and the great "Officers of the Crown remonſtrated to him how "prejudicial they muſt needs be to his honour, and "his health, and the welfare of his Empire. But "this had no other effect than to irritate him againſt "his faithful adviſers, and drive him to greater exceſſes. That theſe might be the better concealed, "he reſided at Preabraſenſkie, at ſome diſtance from "his uſual Court; where he ſuffered none to approach him without an expreſs permiſſion, except "his favourites and ſoldiers. All this while he was "increaſing the number of his forces. He admitted "the loweſt of his people to his table and familiarity; which increaſed their inſolence to ſuch a degree, that they even inſulted the Nobility. He "promoted the moſt effectual methods of corrupting "the morals of his ſubjects, and particularly by encouraging a riotous celebration of what they call "the Slavlenie. This is a cuſtom in Ruſſia, where "the Prieſts at Chriſtmas time go from houſe to houſe "in their reſpective Pariſhes, ſinging hymns at the "birth of Chriſt, and congratulating the houſekeepers on the occaſion of the Feſtival, who are "wont to treat them in return, and make them preſents, according to their abilities. Some Noblemen and Citizens uſed to obſerve this ſacred ſeaſon "in ſomewhat a like manner, viſiting, feaſting, and "making preſents to one another. The Czar took "it into his head to do the ſame. At firſt he was "accompanied only by his own domeſticks, among "whom his tutor Satow repreſented the Prieſt as "Director; and they went into ſuch houſes only, "where they knew they ſhould be welcome. But "this matter was ſoon carried to a greater length; "for the Czar perſuaded ſome Senators and other "perſons of diſtinction to go with him; and thoſe "in their turn invited him to their houſes, and entertained him. How innocent ſoever theſe practices might be thought at firſt, they ſoon degenerated into great indecencies, and occaſioned ſome "reflections upon the Czar's behaviour. To ſtifle "theſe, he endeavoured to engage in his frolicks as "many as he could of the Grandees; he therefore "invited all his Courtiers, Miniſters of State, and "Officers of the army, to bear a part in them. This "company being too noble to be headed by a common Prieſt, (which was the character Satow repreſented) it was thought proper to give him a name "of more diſtinction, and to dignify the aſſembly "by ſome extraordinary title. Satow was thereupon "ſtyled the Patriarch of Bacchus; and under him "were appointed twelve Bacchanalian Archiepiſcopal "Aſſiſtants, who had their Prieſts and Deacons, "Clerks, &c. ſubject to them; and the whole fraternity bore the name of Bacchus's Eccleſiaſtical "State. The Czar's jeſters were made maſters of "the Ceremonies and Treaſurers; bottles were uſed "inſtead of cenſers; wine and brandy ſupplied the "place of holy water; and alms were diſtributed "with cudgels, &c. This train went from houſe to ing ſuch actions, which we ſhould admire in the moſt ſubaltern Officers. He was not free from a certain roughneſs and harſhneſs of temper natural to his whole nation, and which the abſolute power of their Monarch was not likely to ſoften. He had indeed cured himſelf of the exceſs of drinking, a vice common in Ruſſia. The Czarina knew how to ſoften his anger, and mitigate his ſeverity. He had this uncommon happineſs, that the dangerous paſſion of love, that paſſion, which has ſullied the reputation of ſo many great men, was ſubſervient to the making him yet greater. He publiſhed the unfortunate

"houſe,

" houſe, in ſledges, twelve or twenty in each: the " Maſters of the Ceremonies ranked them in order, " with great clubs in their hands; and if any one " committed a fault, eſpecially if he was ſuſpected " of being a falſe brother, he received the ſacerdotal " bleſſing with the club's end. But if Prieſts or " Deacons were guilty of any errors, their puniſh- " ment was to drink off a quart of malt-ſpirits. " Thus theſe proceſſions cauſed many ſober people to " contract an habit of drunkenneſs, and ſome, who " were treated in the above-mentioned manner, died " the ſame night, almoſt before they could reach their " own habitations. The Czar likewiſe put the inha- " bitants of Moſcow under ſuch apprehenſions, that no " body durſt ſpeak any thing againſt him or his com- " panions. It was made capital to caſt any reflections " upon the Czar. . . . . Prince Ramodamowſki, who " was Preſident of an Inquiſition, appointed to en- " quire into ſuch offences, with the title of Arch- " Emperor, was a man of a cruel diſpoſition and " ſtrong conſtitution; of the latter he gave proofs by " drinking quarts of brandy, as he did of the former " by hanging, beheading, and torturing ſeveral in- " nocent perſons, without examination. And when " he was aſked why he tortured ſuch or ſuch an one, " his anſwer was, that he muſt needs be guilty, or " he would not have been impriſoned. The Czar " coming once when he had juſt tortured a man in " this manner, and aſking him what was his crime, " he gave the ſame anſwer; and upon examination of " the caſe the Czar found the unhappy wretch guilty " of nothing, which deſerved any ſuch treatment, and " only accuſed through the malice of ſome neigh- " bours, who pretended that he had ſlandered the " Czar. Yet the edict, upon which theſe vile pro- " ceedings were founded, was not reverſed, but ra- " ther ſtrengthened and confirmed. This Slavlenie " was continued to the Czar's death. However, for " a very weighty reaſon, which ſhould rather have " been a motive for its intire abolition, the titles of " the officers relating to it were changed; Satow " had that of Arch-Pope, his twelve Biſhops that of " Cardinals. This ſo offended all the Roman Catholic " Princes, and in particular the Emperor of Ger- " many, and the Electors, by the application of the " title of Arch-Emperor, that if they had not been " reſtrained by the ſituation of their affairs they " might have expreſſed their reſentments in a way " prejudical to Ruſſia."

(25) For Dec. 1737, Art. 41. p. 413.

The Author of the Hiſtory of the Works of the Learned (25), obſerves, that if this indeed were a faithful repreſentation of Peter the Great's conduct, it would vaſtly degrade our idea of him. He appears here in the character of a buffoon, rather than a hero, and looks liker a tyrant than a father of his country. But it would be perhaps an injuſtice to the merit of that illuſtrious perſon, to regard it in any other light than that of calumny and detraction. It is the voice of envy and revenge, and proceeds, it may be, from thoſe only, who could not endure his glory, or who hated to be civilized; who were ſottiſh enough to imagine, that the diſgrace and ruin of a people muſt be the conſequence of deviating from the cuſtoms, or even the barbarity of their forefathers.

Thoſe who are ſo liberal of their reproaches upon the Prince, are no leſs free in ſcandalizing his Miniſters and ſervants. They ſay, " that the Nobi- " lity, becoming diſaffected and alienated from the " Czar on account of his irregularities, abſented them- " ſelves from the Court. This gave the favourites " an opportunity of obtaining the high poſts, and " raiſing the fortunes of their families and relations. " Theſe minions were all wild and extravagant " youths. They begged the greateſt and moſt im- " portant Offices for their friends and dependents, " from whom, however, they expected a retaliation; " and finding this method very profitable, they pro- " ceeded to ſell the Governments and Waiwodſhips " to the higheſt bidders; the effect of which was a " general rapine and oppreſſion. The frequent com- " plaints of the injured either reached not the ears of " the Czar, or he, being prepoſſeſſed by the ſpecious " pretences of thoſe who cauſed them, was deaf, or re- " jected them as groundleſs. This encouraged ſtill " greater encroachments, and emboldened thoſe har- " pies to be more rapacious." Beſides the perſonal ill conduct of the Czar, and the villany of his confidents and upſtart Miniſters, ſeveral ſteps of his adminiſtration are charged as diſhonourable and injurious to the Empire. Such were " his obliging all the No- " blemen under thirty, to be foot-ſoldiers, dragoons, " or ſailors. His raiſing, on the other hand, the ve- " ry dregs of the people, to the moſt honourable " and important Offices. His adopting the Turkiſh " method, of ſuffering his Grandees to exhauſt the " populace, and then making them refund their rob- " beries into the royal treaſury. His ſelling the Go- " vernments of the Provinces at exceſſive rates, there- " by forcing the buyers to pillage the inhabitants. " And accordingly, as it is here ſet forth, they no " ſooner took poſſeſſion of their poſts, than they in- " vented many new ſtratagems to impoveriſh the " country, and fill their own coffers. Among ſeve- " ral, the following was one: they ſent the Commiſ- " ſioners, Clerks, &c. to receive the contributions, " at ſuch time as they knew the peaſants had moſt " buſineſs in the field. Theſe poor wretches were " then obliged to ſell their cattle and corn for half " the value, in order to ſatisfy theſe Cormorants, " or make preſents to the Commiſſioners for a little " reſpite of payment. This frequently forced them " to ſell the poor remains of their cattle, and to fly " from their houſe and home." It would be tedious to recite all the articles alledged in defamation of the Czar, but to thoſe already mentioned his enemies add: " The obliging the Nobility to abſent themſelves " from their eſtates, whereby they were reduced to " ruin, their Stewards enabled to defraud them of " great part of their revenues, and proviſions render- " ed ſo ſcarce and dear, as to neceſſitate an increaſe " of taxes. The Czar's endeavouring by all means " to render himſelf abſolute, and to degrade the Se- " nate. His miſtruſting and diſcarding from his " confidence, perſons of diſtinction and ſenſe, and " placing his truſt in mean and ignorant creatures. " His altering the cuſtom of his predeceſſors, who " were uſed to admit the young Lords and Gentry to " their levee, where by converſing with wiſe and " prudent men, they learnt wiſdom and virtue; and " introducing into his Court, all the arts of modern " luxury. His obliging the youth to be ſent to " Moſcow, and from thence to travel into foreign " countries; where no due care was taken to reſtrain " them from impiety and lewdneſs. His forcing " the ſons of the beſt families to do the duties of ſol- " diers and common ſailors, to the corruption of " their morals and behaviour. The tranſporting of " the trade of the Empire from Archangel to Peterſ- " burg. The promoting of monopolies, to the great " detriment of commerce. The aboliſhing of the " old, and enacting of new laws, which cauſed ſuch " a confuſion among the Judges, that they were at a " loſs in a multitude of inſtances how to decree; " and ſubjected many to confiſcation, and even capi- " tal puniſhments, for violating the ſtatutes, which " they underſtood not the meaning of. The chang- " ing of the royal reſidence, from the centre of his " dominions, to one of the extremities of it; from " whence many and great inconveniences enſued, and " a prodigious expence accrued to the publick. His " undertaking unfortunate Hiſtory of Prince Alexei his ſon, together with the original papers relating to it [S] ; and his readineſs to expoſe to the whole world his conduct in this affair ought to be a proof, that he had nothing to reproach his conſcience with ; and ſome remarkable inſtances of his clemency towards perſons leſs dear to him, ſhould convince us, that his ſeverity towards his ſon was no more than neceſſary. He perfectly knew the honour due to merit, and that the reſpect he ſhewed it, was the only way to introduce it and make it flouriſh in his Dominions. He was not ſatisfied with giving teſtimonies of his beneficent temper, and ſettling penſions on perſons of merit, favours, which cannot be diſpenſed with, and are of abſolute neceſſity in the purſuit of the deſigns he had formed ; but he gave other marks of his eſteem, and thoſe of a ſtill more engaging nature, ſometimes after the very death of the perſons. He buried Dr. Areſkine, his chief Phyſician, with great pomp, and aſſiſted at the funeral with a lighted torch in his hand. He paid the ſame honour to two Engliſh Gentlemen, one of whom had been Rear-Admiral of his Fleet, and the other his Interpreter. He compoſed ſeveral pieces upon naval affairs ; and his name will increaſe the ſhort catalogue of thoſe Sovereigns, who have honoured the publick with their writings. He uſed to amuſe himſelf with turning, and preſented ſome pieces of his work to the Emperor of China. The diverſions, which he took with his Court, as ſome have deſcribed them, had a tincture of the antient Ruſſian ruſticity ; but he was contented with giving ſome relaxation to the mind, and could ſpare but few moments to the refinement of his pleaſures. There is related a very remarkable

" undertaking ſeveral pernicious enterprizes, which " are enumerated. And his adopting and inforcing " ſtrange cuſtoms and faſhions, which occaſioned di- " vers inſurrections and rebellions." Theſe, Mr. Strahlenberg ſays, are the different opinions and reaſonings, which he heard in Moſcow, from Ruſſian Vaſſals of credit and reputation, on both ſides, concerning the life and reign of the Czar ; and he declares, that he has exactly reported them, that impartial Hiſtorians may, for the future, ſeparate the good from the bad, and judge rightly of the atchievements of this great Monarch. After our Author's return from his captivity, he ſhewed theſe accounts to ſome Ruſſian Noblemen, and deſired their opinion of them ; upon which one of them communicated to him ſeveral remarks, eſpecially on thoſe paſſages, which are in derogation of the Czar's character ; ſome of which he confirms, others he mitigates and excuſes ; from ſome he vindicates the Czar, transferring the cenſure upon his Miniſters ; and with reſpect to others, he juſtifies his condnct.

[S] He publiſhed the unfortunate Hiſtory of Prince Alexei his ſon, together with the original papers relating to it.] The Reader may ſee them in the ſecond volume of the Preſent State of Ruſſia: tranſlated from the High Dutch, and printed at London 1722, in 8vo, in which they are publiſhed under the following title : A manifeſto of the criminal Proceſs of the Czarewitz Alexei Petrowitz, judged and publiſhed at St. Peterſburg, the 25th day of June, 1718, O. S. tranſlated from the Ruſſian original, and printed by Order of his Czariſh Majeſty at the Hague, by John van Duren, Bookſeller. MDCCXVIII. Now done into Engliſh from the above French tranſlation. In the firſt volume of the work cited above, we are told (27), that the Aſſembly of the Clergy having declared their opinion in writing, that the Czarewitz had deſerved death, and the Court of ſecular Judges eſtabliſhed by the Czar, for examining and judging this cauſe, having pronounced a ſentence, condemning the Czarewitz to death, a new ſeſſions was held on the 6th of July in the morning, and the Czarewitz brought out of the fortreſs into the court, under the guard of four under Officers, where he was obliged to repeat the confeſſion of his crimes, and to hear the ſentence of death, ſigned by the ſecular Judges, read to him ; after which he was ſent back into cuſtody. The next day, being Thurſday, the 7th of July, early in the morning, the news was brought to the Czar, that the violent paſſions of the mind, and the terrors of death, had thrown the Czarewitz into an apoplectick fit. About noon another meſſenger brought advice, that the Prince was in great danger of his life ; whereupon the Czar ſent for the principal men of his Court, and cauſed them to ſtay till he was informed by a third meſſenger, that the Prince being paſt hopes, could not out-live the evening, and that he was extremely deſirous to ſee his father. Then the Czar, attended by the company abovementioned, went to ſee his dying ſon, who, at the ſight of his father, burſt into tears, and, with his hands folded, ſpoke to him to this effect : " That he had grievouſly and " heinouſly offended the Majeſty of God Almighty, " and of the Czar ; that he hoped not to recover " of his indiſpoſition, and even if he ſhould, yet " he was unworthy of life : therefore he begged his " Majeſty, for God's ſake, only to take from him " the curſe he had laid upon him at Moſcow ; to " forgive him all his heavy crimes ; to impart to " him his paternal bleſſing, and cauſe prayers to be " put up for his ſoul." During theſe moving words, the Czar and the whole company almoſt melted away in tears. His Majeſty returned a pathetick anſwer, and repreſented to him in a few words, all the offences he had committed againſt him, and then gave him his forgiveneſs and bleſſings. After which they parted with abundance of tears and lamentations on both ſides. At five in the evening came a fourth meſſenger, being M. Oczakoff, Major of the guards, to acquaint the Czar, that the Czarewitz was extremely deſirous once more to ſee his father. The Czar at firſt was unwilling to comply with his ſon's requeſt ; but was at laſt perſuaded by the company, who repreſented to his Majeſty, how hard it would be to deny that comfort to a ſon, who, being on the point of death, might probably be tortured by the ſtings of a guilty conſcience. But when his Majeſty had juſt ſtept into his ſloop to go over to the fortreſs, a fifth meſſenger brought the news, that the Prince was already expired. Mr. Strahlenburg having told us (28), that the Czarewitz, together with his mother, and his father's half-ſiſter Mary, had conſpired againſt the Czar in 1717, obſerves, that " thoſe " perſons, who ſecretly favoured the Prince, judged " more moderately of this conſpiracy, and will not " allow the blame to be wholly on his ſide ; but " ſay, 1. That his father had been the cauſe of his " bad education ; Prince Menzikoff having been his " Tutor, whoſe extraction, education, and qualities, " being well known, it was eaſy to judge what me- " thods he could uſe for his education, who was " himſelf but of a mean genius. Beſides Menzikoff, " ſay they, did not viſit the Prince above twice or " thrice a year ; and whenever he reproved him for " any thing, it was in very harſh and unbecoming " language. As an inſtance of which they report, " that he once told the Prince to his face, Thou " muſt not expect the Crown ; for I am as near to it as " thou (29) ; and more of the like kinds of expreſ- " ſions ; which the Prince took ſo to heart, that " he loſt all taſte of applying himſelf to any thing, " which could be beneficial to him. The Prince " was obliged to reſide conſtantly at Preabrakenſkie, " where he had no converſation but that of common " people and Prieſts, who had been ſo indiſcreet as " to talk with him of the new cuſtoms introduced by " his Father, as the ruin of his country, and which " ſoon or late ought to be aboliſhed, His Father " likewiſe

(27) p. 228.

(28) Hiſtorico-Geographical Deſcription, &c. c. 3. p. 265. Eng. tranſlat.

(29) The Ruſſians in their language ſpeak familiarly in the ſecond perſon, as they do in the Latin.

markable particular concerning his dread of water, when he was young [T]. We ſhall cloſe this article with an Epigram on him [U], written by an ingenious Gentleman *.

* William Duncombe, Eſq; to whom we are obliged for the communication of it.

" likewiſe never ſpoke in a friendly manner to him ;
" but, when the Prince came to viſit him, uſed him
" more like a ſtranger than a ſon. All which contri" buted to his puſillanimity, inſomuch that he avoid" ed every opportunity of ſeeing his father. Beſides
" theſe circumſtances, he had not the beſt Counſellors
" about him ; but on the contrary, ſuch as Kikin,
" Archbiſhop of Roſcow, Bojar Glelow, Zarewitſch
" of Siberia, and others, who were of opinion, that " he would, ſoon or late, come to the Crown, not-
" withſtanding theſe ill appearances."

[T] A remarkable particular concerning his dread of water, when he was young.] Mr. Strahlenberg tells us (30), that when the Czar was about five years of age, his mother went with him in a coach in the ſpring-ſeaſon, and paſſing over a damm, where there was a waterfall or cataract, which made a great noiſe, and he lying in his mother's lap aſleep, he was ſo frightened by the ruſhing of the water, that it brought a fever upon him. And though he ſoon recovered this, yet he retained ſuch a dread of water, that he could never bear to ſee any ſtanding water, much leſs to hear any running water, without the greateſt uneaſineſs. This continuing till he was fourteen years of age, was a great grief to his mother, as well as his brother Iwan, who feared it would be a great prejudice to him, when, ſoon or late, he ſhould come to the Crown. But Prince Boris Gallizin, who was his chief Governor, happily thought of a method of curing it. He perſuaded his pupil, it being fine weather, to go with him into the country, to a hunting-match, which he had appointed there; but the young Czar did not know, that there was a brook near the place. After a little diverſion in hunting, Gallizin ſaid, it is very hot weather ; I wiſh there was a brook in the neighbourhood, I would go in, and bathe. The young Prince replied, What ? will you kill yourſelf ? Boris anſwered, I have frequently bathed with your late father ; and yet I am alive ſtill ; adding, that it was very wholeſom to bathe in hot weather. The young Czar was ſurprized, and ſaid, that he had heard, that people were frequently drowned. Boris anſwered, How can a man be drowned, when the water is not deeper than his knees ? If it pleaſe your Majeſty, I will ſend ſomebody to find out a brook, and you ſhall ſee, that it is poſſible to bathe without drowning. Accordingly he ſent a Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber, who being returned, ſaid, that not far from thence there was a brook. The Czar went thither, but approached with fear and trembling, and ſtopped his horſe at a good diſtance from the place. Boris ſent ſome men thither, and ordered them to croſs the water forwards and backwards, and then to return, to ſhew themſelves, that they were alive. After this the Czar ventured to ride nearer. Then Gallizin with his horſe croſſed the water himſelf, and ordered ſome of his people to alight from their horſes, and go barefooted through the water, which the Czar admired at, and at laſt had the courage to go through it himſelf with his horſe, to the great admiration of thoſe, who were preſent. After this cure, he returned to his palace well pleaſed, and told it to his mother, and his brother Iwan, who hardly could believe it ſo great was their joy. Some days after, Czar Iwan, went with his brother Peter, to a ſummer palace called Izmælowa, where there are a great many fiſh-ponds ; and after they had diverted themſelves in the garden, he ordered ſome of his ſervants to bathe in a pond, and they would look on. But Czar Peter forbid it. However, Czar Iwan perſuaded him at length to conſent. The young men being very merry in the water, it pleaſed Czar Peter ſo well, that he had a mind to try it himſelf ; to which Czar Iwan encouraged him ; and by that means he got rid at once of all the fear of water, with which he had been before poſſeſſed.

(30) Chap. 6. p. 273. Engliſh tranſlation.

[U] An Epigram on him.] It is as follows.

" T' adorn with arts a rough barbarian race,
" And poliſh them with ev'ry manly grace ;
" To chace the ſhades of ignorance profound,
" And ſpread the beams of knowledge all around ;
" To brighten and exalt the human ſoul,
" And ſtill conſult the welfare of the whole ;
" If theſe be acts more worthy of applauſe,
" Than with wild havock, in ambition's cauſe,
" To conquer Kingdoms, to lay waſte and burn,
" And peaceful States with reſtleſs rage o'erturn,
" Then Ruſſian's Czar with greater glory reign'd,
" Than was by Philip's ſon, or Cæſar gain'd.
" March 1724."

This Epigram was thus tranſlated into Latin by Mr. Lewis Duncombe, the Author's Nephew, a youth of very promiſing parts, who died of the ſmall pox at Merton College, Oxford, in the year 1730, Ætat. 19.

Si ſit nobilius ſævam & ſine pectore gentem
Artibus inſtruere, ingenuo emollireque Cultu ;
Altaſq; Erroris longè de mentibus umbras
Pellere, doctrinæq; hilarem undiq; ſpargere lucem ;
Omnimodis ſtudiis animamq; polire ſagacem,
Inque ſalutem hominum totis contendere nervis ;
Quam Clade infandâ vacuum migrare per orbem,
Urbes vaſtare innocuas, & corde tumenti
Culmina celſa Deûm atque domos involvere flammis ;
Imperium Petrus majori laude tenebat,
Cæſare quam parta eſt, vel forti prole Philippi. T.

PETIT (JOHN), Profeſſor of Divinity in the Univerſity of Paris towards the beginning of the 15th century, gained a great reputation by his eloquence, and by his learning : but he miſapplied his talents ſometimes to defend bad cauſes. He pleaded for the Univerſity of Paris before the King's Council in the year 1406 (a). It was in order to prove, that Cardinal de Chalant, Pope Benedictus's Legate, complained, without reaſon, of thoſe who withdrew from the obedience of that Pope ; and he moved that that withdrawing might be for the future kept and executed . . . . and that the Gallican Church might be no longer ſubject to the exactions unjuſtly introduced by the Court of Rome. The King's Council referred that affair to the Parliament. The cauſe was pleaded there in the Great Chamber the 7th of June of that ſame year (b). John Petit harangued there as much as he liſted ; his diſcourſe was long, and as ſtrong as could be wiſhed. The Parliament gave no ſentence then, but was obliged ſome time after, to paſs a decree which favoured the Univerſity's pretenſions (c). John Petit was of the famous Embaſſy which France ſent into Italy for ſuppreſſing the Schiſm ; and he harangued at Rome July the 7th, 1407 (d). Thus far all is well ; we ſee him exert his eloquence in lawful cauſes ; but we ſhall ſoon ſee the ill uſe he made of it. The Duke of Burgundy having cauſed the Duke of Orleans, the King's only brother, to be aſſaſſinated, was bold enough to own that attempt, though a moſt horrid crime in all its circumſtances [A]. He entered Paris as it were in (a) Hiſtoire de Charles VII. by a Monk of St. Denys, tranſlated into French by Monſieur le Laboureur, Liv. 26. chap. 2. p. 543.

(b) Ibid. p. 544.

(c) Ibid. chap. 3. p. 547.

(d) Ibid. Liv. 27. p. 606.

[A] A moſt horrid crime in all its circumſtances.] I have mentioned it in that Duke's article (1), but without hinting a particular, which prodigiouſly aggravates the heinouſneſs of that crime. The Monk of St Denys,

(1) The art. of BURGUNDY (John) rem. [B].

in triumph, and aſked audience, in order to prove that he had juſt reaſons to get the Duke of Orleans murthered (e). He choſe for his Council our John Petit, a baſe and mercenary ſoul, who would do any thing for money [B]; he maintained, March the 8th, 1408, in the great Hall of the Royal Palace of St. Paul, that the murther of that Duke was lawful (f). His plea was publiſhed (g). The Duke of Orleans's reputation was torn in pieces there with more fury, than his corps had been by the murtherers. The Duke's widow got that plea refuted by the Abbot of St. Denys, who pleaded for her, and for the deceaſed's reputation with a great deal of eloquence, before the King's Council, September the 11th, 1408 (h). The doctrine of the Duke of Burgundy's Orator was ſo abominable, and ſo proper to create all manner of diſorders in the State, that the Biſhop of (e) Hiſt. de Charles VI. by a Monk of St. Denys, tranſlated by la Laboureur, Liv. 27. chap. 27. p. 631.

(f) Ibidem.

(g) You will meet with the ſubſtance of it in the Monk of St. Denys, Liv. 27. ch. 27. and you will find it at length in Monſtrelet, Liv. 1. ch 38, 39.

(h) Hiſt. de Charles VI. traduite par le Laboureur, Liv. 28. chap. 10. p. 660, 661.

Denys, who wrote the Hiſtory of Charles VI. which Monſieur Le Laboureur has tranſlated into French, aſſerts, that as ſoon as the Princes of the Blood heard that the Duke of Burgandy had cauſed the Duke of Orleans to be aſſaſſinated, they abhorred ſo execrable a perfidiouſneſs, and wiſhed the Author of it already in the eternal torments of Hell, which ſo abominable a crime deſerved. They were, adds he, ſo much the more ſhocked at the Burgundian's baſeneſs and perfidiouſneſs, that it was not long ſince he was not only reconciled with the Duke of Orleans, but had alſo entered into a correſpondence of brotherly love with him. They had but lately confirmed it both by letters, and upon oath, and had even called God himſelf to witneſs, and taken the ſacrament together. There ſeemed to be a very good underſtanding between them in the conduct of the war, of which they had the management: they had vindicated each other's reputation in the bad ſucceſſes they met with, one would have thought their intereſt was the ſame: and as a greater token of union and friendſhip, the Duke of Burgundy knowing that his couſin the Duke of Orleans was out of order, had been to viſit him with all the marks, I do not ſay of civility, but of friendſhip; he even ſuffered himſelf to be prevailed to go and dine with him the next day, which was a Sunday. The other Princes of the Blood, knowing this, could not but conceive a very great indignation at ſuch an horrid proceeding, ſo that they would not hear his excuſes, and retired all in tears from the King's Council, and the next day, as the Duke of Burgundy was going to the Parliament houſe, they gave orders not to let him in (2). The Council for the widow preſſed all thoſe circumſtances home (3). Obſerve here how well human nature knows to reconcile together in the ſame mind all the meanneſs and baſeneſs of hypocriſy, with the moſt inſolent and haughty audaciouſneſs. There never was a Prince more proud nor more couragious than John Duke of Burgundy; he was ſirnamed the fearleſs (ſans peur), and yet what deceitfulneſs, and what diſſimulation do we not obſerve in his whole conduct? here follows an inſtance of it. He affected to be afflicted as much as any other, he went into mourning afterwards, like all the Princes, and was not aſhamed to be preſent with them at the funeral ſolemnity which was celebrated in the Church of the Celeſtines, where this Duke in his life-time had ordered his corps to be buried (4). He did not pull off the maſk, but when he ſaw the King's Council was going to reſolve to put Robert de Cani (5) in priſon, who was ſuſpected of that murther (6).

(2) Hiſt. de Charles VI. traduite en Francoiſe par Mr. le Laboureur, Liv. 27. chap. 28. p. 627.

(3) Ibid. Liv. 28. chap. 10. p. 666.

(4) Ibidem, Liv. 27. ch. 22. p. 625.

(5) Ibidem, ch. 23. p. 626.

(6) He hated the Duke of Orleans, becauſe this Duke has been a great while in love with his wife. Ibidem.

[B] A mercenary ſoul, who would do any thing for money.] There is no greater blemiſh in the reign of King Charles VI. than the triumphant impunity which the Duke of Orleans's aſſaſſin met with. It was much leſs the King's fault than his Kingdom's. For that unhappy Prince wanted moſt part of the time the uſe of his ſenſes, ſo that he could not be anſwerable for the diſorders of the State. It is the French nation that muſt be blamed; ſhe gave no aſſiſtance to the Prince, who required that ſuch an horrid attempt ſhould be revenged; ſhe divided after ſuch a manner, as rendered the murtherer's party more formidable than the other. The City of Paris, where the King's only brother was murthered, is chiefly to blame, for not endeavouring to puniſh that crime; it was in her power to ſee that the Burgundian might be uſed as he deſerved. It were wrong to cenſure the Univerſity of Paris, becauſe one of her Profeſſors of Divinity was wicked enough to ſet up for an Apologiſt of that murther; ſhe did not approve the bad principles of that furious declaimer; ſhe countenanced the Biſhop who condemned thoſe principles, as ſoon as ſhe could do it without danger, as will be ſeen in the following remark. Let us not cloſe this without obſerving, that John Petit was very ſure of the people's approbation, when he undertook to plead * (α) ſo abominable a cauſe, and he conſidered beſides, that he was to ſpeak for a Prince, whom the King himſelf dreaded. It is certain that Charles VI. ſent the Count of St. Paul to the Duke of Burgundy, to offer him a publick audience, with a full pardon for himſelf, requiring nothing of him, but that he would deliver up the Aſſaſſins, that they might be proſecuted according to law: but he did very much diſappoint the King's expectations, ſince his Majeſty was obliged to treat with him after an honourable manner about the reparation of a moſt villainous attempt; for which purpoſe he ſent the Duke of Berry and the King of Sicily to meet him at Amiens. The noble Duke of Bourbon was appointed to be of that Embaſſy, but he deſired generouſly to be excuſed; he would not even continue at court, but aſked leave to retire upon his own eſtate, and choſe rather to give up the ſhare he had in the adminiſtration, than to come to terms with the ſtate for the murther of his nephew; I have been told for certain, that he ſent the Duke of Burgundy word ſeveral times, that he could never ſee with pleaſure the Author of ſo baſe and infamous a perfidiouſneſs (7). Theſe two conſiderations, I mean the people's favour, and the Duke of Burgundy's credit, do not clear the Advocate. For the reſt, the reaſon why the people did not much care that the murtherer ſhould be puniſhed, was the hatred they had conceived againſt the Duke of Orleans, becauſe he was the Author of ſeveral taxes. It was becauſe of that hatred, that the people rejoiced at his death, and applauded the Duke of Burgundy: ſo true it is, that men have their private and domeſtick intereſt more at heart, than the fundamental laws of the State. Tantum nimirum ex publicis malis ſentimus, quantum ad privatas res pertinet; nec in iis quicquam acrius quam pecuniæ damnum ſtimulat (8). i. e. "We "feel the publick misfortunes only ſo far as they affect "our private intereſt; nor is there any thing that "vexes us more than the loſs of money." Montagne had well obſerved that defect. It is not for the common cauſe they are concerned, ſays he (9), nor do they mind what is againſt the intereſt of all, and of the State, but what is againſt their own private intereſt. This makes them particularly paſſionate for their own party, beyond what juſtice and reaſon require. Non tam omnia univerſi, quàm ea, quæ ad quemque pertinent, ſinguli carpebant. The impunity, which the Duke of Burgundy met with, was a mortal wound given to the juſtice, authority, and majeſty of the ſtate. But no matter for that; private perſons, as ſuch, did not feel it; they ſaw the pernicious conſequences of it only from a diſtance, every one was in hopes to avoid them; but the taxes laid by the Duke of Orleans fell heavy on every Citizen; hence it is, that none cared to revenge his death. We ſhall ſee by and by, that the mob at Paris was eaſily deluded again, when the Biſhop had condemned the Duke of Burgundy's apology.

(7) Ibidem, p. 627.

(8) Annibal ad Carthaginienſes, apud Livium, lib. 30. ſub. fin. p. m. 566.

(9) Montagne, Eſſais, Liv. 3. ch. 10. p. m. 410, 411.

* (α) John Petit was ſincere, and bold enough to urge, before the King's Council, two remarkable reaſons, by which he pretended to vindicate himſelf for daring to appear for the Duke of Burgundy in ſo odious a cauſe. The firſt is, that he was obliged to ſerve that Duke, to whom he had three years before taken an oath of allegiance: the ſecond, that this was the leaſt thing he could do out of gratitude for that Prince, who for a great while before gave him yearly a ſmall penſion, becauſe he had but an inconſiderable living. Monſtrelet has tranſmitted this particular to us; and honeſt Gentillet has inſerted it with John of Paris condemned it [C], as ſoon as that Duke's faction had loſt ground. This Prince's Attornies appealed to the Pope, and he himſelf wrote to the Council of Conſtance, recommending John Petit's cauſe to the Fathers (i): his Embaſſadors and his friends aſſerted that the condemned propoſitions were not to be met with in that Doctor's book: the Commiſſaries appointed by the Council annulled the ſentence of the Biſhop of Paris [D]. Gerſon

(i) See the rem. [D].

Petit's plea, into his Anti-Machiavel, l. 3. max. 8. CRIT. REM.

[C] John Petit's Doctrine was ſo abominable . . . . . that the Biſhop of Paris condemned it.] Before it was condemned, ſeveral learned and virtuous perſons took great offence at the propoſitions of this Profeſſor of Divinity, and dreaded the dangerous conſequences of them if they were not condemned. As for my part, ſays the Monk of St. Denys (10), I have ſeveral times declared that I wondered very much why the Biſhop of Paris, and the Inquiſitor of the Faith, neglected to cenſure a work which was ſo dangerous to men's morals, and ſo much againſt the ſervice of God: but I was always anſwered that the formidable authority of the Duke of Burgundy prevented them, and that they acted prudently to ſuffer that peſtiferous piece to lye in a manner buried in oblivion, rather than to run the danger of ſeeing it authorized by that Prince's credit. This appeared but too true in time; for no ſooner could they act with the ſecurity they ſo much deſired, but they commanded the Members of the Univerſity of Paris, upon pain of being puniſhed according to law, to bring forth without delay, all that they had wrote down in their Common-place books, and collections, concerning the ſaid John Petit's propoſition deſigned for the pretended juſtification of the Duke of Burgundy. They convened together, in the great hall of the Biſhops palace, the moſt celebrated Doctors and Bachelors of Divinity, and the Doctors of Civil and Canon Law, by whoſe advice and aſſiſtance they might examine what was erroneous in that piece: and having ſpent ſeveral days in that examination, with all the care and attention which the intereſt of religion required, laſtly on the ſixteenth of January they appointed out of that numerous aſſembly ſixteen Doctors choſen out of the Colleges of Paris, who made a collection of all the theſes and propoſitions alledged by that Doctor, which they judged fit to be condemned, in the following form. The Hiſtorian gives us afterwards nine propoſitions of John Petit, with the cenſure that was paſſed upon them; and then he continues thus (11). " Such was the opinion of the " Doctors and Maſters there aſſembled; they declar- " ed alſo that this whole piece of maſter John Petit " was unworthy of a man of wit, and did not even " deſerve to be preſerved. Wherefore, on the twen- " ty third of February (12), the ſaid Biſhop and the " Inquiſitor of the Faith, being aſſembled in the " great hall of the Epiſcopal Palace, in the preſence " of ſeveral Prelates, and eminent Doctors, and of " a great crowd of people, judged it proper to cen- " ſure it as being erroneous both in point of doctrine " and of morals, and to ſentence it, as being ſcan- " dalous in ſeveral reſpects, to be burnt in the Court " before our Lady's Church. This was executed ac- " cordingly two days after in their preſence, on a " ſcaffold raiſed for that purpoſe, before a vaſt mul- " titude of people, after maſter Benedictus Gencien, a " famous and celebrated Doctor, had proved aloud and " moſt learnedly the odiouſneſs of theſe opinions." You will meet now with an inſtance of the people's inconſtant humour. This was a moſt grievous affront to the Duke of Burgundy, who learnt by an experience which was neceſſary for example's ſake, how diſhonourable and ſhameful it is for great men to degenerate from the glory of their anceſtors: but his greateſt vexation was to hear, that that ſilly vindication had rendered him odious to the wiſeſt and moſt modeſt perſons, who ridiculed and deſpiſed him; that he was now a laughing ſtock to the common people, and to the very mob, that he had made himſelf a common talk, and was the ſubject of a thouſand ſatyrical ſongs, in which he was publickly ſtyled a traitor and murderer (13).

(10) Hiſtoire de Charles VI. Liv. 33. ch. 28. p. 931, 932.

(11) Ibidem, p. 933.

(12) It was in 1414, beginning the year with the month of Jan.

(13) Hiſtoire de Charles VI. Liv. 33. chap. 28. p. 933.

Obſerve that Gerſon, Chancellor of the Univerſity, laboured very much to procure the cenſure (14). He did even preach often againſt John Petit's propoſitions, and refuted, in the name of the Univerſity, and before the King, every part of that Profeſſor's diſcourſe and of his book (15). Obſerve alſo that the ſubſtance of the nine propoſitions, which were cenſured, comes to this: " That it is lawful, and even commendable " and meritorious for any perſon by his own private " authority to kill a tyrant, and that for this purpoſe " he may make uſe of any means, even of treaſon " and flatteries, to make him fall into the ſnares " which are laid for him, notwithſtanding any " alliance he may have entered into with him, and " the oaths he has taken (16)."

(14) Cancellarius contra Joannis Parvi aſſertiones concionatur ſæpius, has accurato & diligenti ſtudio expendit, & detectos in iis contra fidem errores configit. Tam curante potiſſimum Gerſone errorum cenſura à Theologiæ facultate & Pariſienſi Epiſcopo confecta eſt. Jo. Launoius, Hiſtoria Gymnaſii Navarræ, p. 482.

(15) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du grand Schiſme, Liv. 5. p. m. 236.

(16) Ibidem.

[D] . . . . . His friends aſſerted that the condemned propoſitions were not to be met with in that Doctor's books: the Commiſſaries appointed by the Council annulled the ſentence of the Biſhop of Paris.] There was no other courſe to take; for unleſs they had been loſt to all ſenſe of ſhame, they could not deny the cenſure of the nine propoſitions to be well grounded. They were therefore under a neceſſity to do what the Janſeniſts have done a long time afterwards: they were, I ſay, obliged to have recourſe to the diſtinction of matter of fact and matter of law, de facto, et de jure, and to aſſert that the nine propoſitions were not to be met with in John Petit's book. And this was what they actually did. Read what follows: I trace the account ſomewhat high, that the reader may be the better acquainted with the whole affair.

" (17) As that ſentence (18) was extremely diſho- " nourable to the Duke of Burgundy, whoſe juſtifi- " cation was burnt with that book, to the eternal diſ- " grace of his name, his Attornies appealed to the " Holy See *. The Duke to court the Pope's fa- " vour undertook to protect him. . . . . † But know- " ing that the Pope had been arreſted at Freiburg " before he could enter into the Dutchy of Bur- " gundy, he wrote to the Council, in anſwer to the " notice he received from thence of the Pope's eva- " ſion, that as he had promiſed him his protection " only in caſe he would keep his word , he was " now reſolved to forſake him ſince the Council was " not pleaſed with his conduct, and to adhere in " every thing to the holy Council. Having thus " artfully endeavoured to render the Fathers favour- " able to him, he added that he had notice that his " enemies laboured to defame him, with a pretence " to perſuade the Council to condemn certain here- " tical propoſitions, which were aſcribed to the late " Dr. John Petit, who had pleaded his cauſe like an " honeſt man: that as his reputation was concerned " therein, he earneſtly deſired the Fathers, that before " they determined any thing in ſo material a point, and " before they condemned that Dr.'s book, they would " be pleaſed to have it examined, in the preſence of " his Embaſſadors, that they might know whether " theſe propoſitions were really his, or whether they " were not maliciouſly forged by others, who endea- " voured to get them condemned under the name of " that celebrated Profeſſor, and even under his own †. " The Council appointed Commiſſaries for that pur- " poſe, who were the Cardinals of Albano, of Aquileia, " of Venice, and of Ailly. The Duke of Burgundy's " Embaſſadors, who by their intrigues had made a " powerful party, and who had at their head Martin " Porree, Biſhop of Arras, and Doctor of Divinity, " excepted at firſt againſt Cardinal Peter d'Ailly, be- " cauſe he had been Gerſon's maſter, whom they " took to be their chief antagoniſt, and they aſſerted " boldly that the propoſitions, which the Biſhop of " Paris condemned, as being ſet down by Doctor " John Petit in his book entitled a Vindication of the " Duke of Burgnndy, were not to be met with there " in the ſame terms in which they were produced; " that it was John Gerſon, who being jealous of the " reputation which Doctor Petit had gained in the " Univerſity, forged them after his own fancy, that " he might put an heretical conſtruction upon them, " which they themſelves condemned; but they were " ready to prove thoſe propoſitions were very ortho- " dox, as ſet down in that Doctor's book *. On the " other hand Cardinal d'Ailly, who had been objected " againſt, joined with the Doctors John Gerſon and " Jordan Morin, and they proteſted all three that " there was nothing more falſe † than what the Em- " baſ-

(17) Ibid. p. 23.

(18) That is to ſay, the Biſhop of Paris's ſentence.

* J. Juvenal.

† Cod. Victor. apud Spond.

 Act. Victorin. apud Spond.

†† T. 5. Hiſt. Univ. p. 299. ex Monſtrel. J. Juvenal. Cod. Victor.

* J. Juvenal.

† Cod. Victor.

Gerſon appealed from their ſentence to the Council, but he did not obtain all the ſatiſfaction he might reaſonably expect [E]. That aſſembly ſhewed that a Prince, who commands armies, is a very powerful protector of an Heretick. The Council's deciſion was expreſſed in general terms, and did not in the leaſt condemn either John Petit's book, or the Duke of Burgundy's attempt. The King of France did not act with the ſame caution: he cauſed that libel to be condemned with the utmoſt ſeverity, and baniſhed from Paris ſome Doctors who oppoſed the honeſt deſign, which the others had of making the Univerſity concern herſelf in the Biſhop's cauſe [F]. But two years after, that Prelate was obliged to ſee his ſentence reverſed, in order to pleaſe the Duke of Burgundy [G]. John " baſſadors of Burgundy dared to aſſert: that if a " man had but eyes, could read and underſtand " French, he could not but know that the condemned propoſitions, and eſpecially that to which " all the reſt were reduced, were not only aſſerted by " John Petit, but contained alſo the whole ſubſtance " and a true abridgment of his libel, in which he " laboured nothing elſe but to prove them by his " pretended arguments, and by his falſe reaſonings. " Laſtly, after many debates upon that point, in " which the queſtion was only about a moſt plain " matter of fact, which the Burgundians continued " obſtinately to deny, the three Cardinals appointed " as Commiſſaries, who had declared for them, took " a very bad expedient: for as on the one hand they " could not approve ſuch wicked propoſitions, and " on the other hand were unwilling to condemn " the Duke of Burgundy's Advocate , they reſolv- " ed to declare that the Biſhop of Paris was not a " proper judge in that cauſe, which belonged to the " Holy See, and thereupon they reverſed his ſen- " tence." Their decree was proclaimed by ſound of trumpet in the Court before the Porch of the Cathedral Church at Paris (19). You will find in a work of Gerſon by what intrigues the Burgundian Faction brought all this about. Inſtituit inter Volucrem & Monimum, id eſt, inter ſe & fratrem ſuum dialogum, ubi καθ' ἕκαστα & ſingillatim exponit, quibus molitionibus Burgundiones uſi ſunt ut Pariſienſis cenſura caſſa & irrita declararetur (20).

 J. Juvenal.

(19) Dati ſunt à Concilio & ſelecti judices, qui repugnante Gerſone, & aliis qui ab ejus ſtabant partibus, Pariſienſem cenſuram abrogarunt, politicis potius quam Theologicis rationibus ducti. Cenſuræ abrogatis & lecta & publicata eſt buccis concrepantibus in propylæo Æ lis beatæ Mariæ Pariſ. Hæc Juvenalis Urſinus ut vidit, ita & retulit in Hiſtoria Caroli VI. Joan. Launoius, in Hiſtoria Gymnaſii Navarræ, p. 489.

(20) Idem, ibid.

[E] Gerſon appealed from this ſentence to the Council, but he did not obtain all the ſatisfaction he could reaſonably expect.] He wiſhed no doubt that the Council would confirm the Biſhop of Paris's ſentence, by rendering expreſsly the book which contained the Duke of Burgundy's apology; but this was not done. " Either they had not at Conſtance John Petit's libel, " but only an extract containing his propoſitions; or " if they had it, they would not examine it, that " they might not oblige any man, as the Emperor * " adviſed, whoſe opinion was that they ought to " confine themſelves to the Doctrine in general, and " condemn only the fundamental propoſition, which " contained the ſubſtance of all the reſt, which they " did accordingly in theſe words. It has been repreſented to this holy Council, that ſome erroneous and moſt " ſcandalous propoſitions have been taught, tending to the " ruin of every State and Kingdom, among which the " following has been preſented to the Fathers †. Every " tyrant may be, and ought lawfully and meritoriouſly to " be killed by whoever it be of his vaſſals or ſubjects, " making uſe for that purpoſe of ſnares, flatteries, and " feigned careſſes, notwithſtanding any oath, and what- " ever alliance one had entered into with him, and " without waiting for the ſentence or command of any " Judge whatſoever. The holy Council, to extirpate " that error, declares and determines, after mature deli- " berations, that that doctrine is againſt Faith and good " morals, it explodes and condemns it, as heretical, ſcan- " dalous, and giving room to frauds, deceits, falſities, " treaſons, and perjuries. Farther, it declares and de- " cides, that they who obſtinately maintain that moſt per- " nicious doctrine, are hereticks, and ought, as ſuch, to " be puniſhed according to the rules ſet down in the holy " Canons. Such was the Council's decree: the Fathers, for certain reaſons, and chiefly that they " might not diſoblige the Duke of Burgundy, were " determined not to blend the matter of fact, with " the matter of law in this cauſe (21)."

* Cod. Victor.

† Act. Concil. Conſt. Seſſ. 15.

(21) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du grand Schiſme, Liv. 5. p. 240.

That conduct of the Council vexed John Gerſon ſo much the more, as he had been charged with acting herein not from the love of truth, but on account of the quarrels in which he had been engaged with John Petit (22). It was alſo objected to him, that he had at firſt reduced that man's doctrine to one ſingle propoſition, of which he made nine afterwards, when he came to know that the examiners were ſenſible that he had miſrepreſented his adverſary's opinion (23). He drew the indignation of the houſe of Burgundy upon himſelf to ſuch a degree, that he run great dangers after the Council was diſſolved. He was not ſuffered to return to Paris, to take again upon him his functions of Chancellor of the Univerſity. He was forced to retire through by-ways; he went and hid himſelf for ſome time in the Mountains of Bavaria, after which he croſſed Switzerland, and went to Lyons, where he continued till his death (24).

(22) Spondanus, ad ann. 1415. num. 51. p. 752.

(23) Sentiens nihilominus Gerſonius Theologis illos agnoviſſe fraudem in truncatione propoſitionum Parvi illas alias novem concluſiones propoſuerit. Idem, ibid.

(24) Launoius, in Hiſtoria Gymnaſii Navarræ, p. 490.

[F] The King of France . . . . cauſed that libel to be condemned with the utmoſt ſeverity, and baniſhed from Paris ſome Doctors who oppoſed the honeſt deſign of . . . . the Biſhop.] The account you will now read begins with the laſt of theſe two particulars. " Our Doc- " tors were at Conſtance, † fearing what happened, " namely, that the Cardinals, who were appointed " Commiſſaries, would favour the Burgundians, wrote " to their brethren at Paris, to do their endeavours, " that the Univerſity might concern herſelf in the " Biſhop's cauſe, to get his ſentence againſt John Petit's " doctrine confirmed; but it happened that ſeveral " members of that great body, having ſuffered them- " ſelves to be bribed by the party of that Doctor, " and of the Duke of Burgundy, caballed ſo effectu- " ally againſt him, that they prevented their obtain- " ing what they deſired. The honeſt Doctors, eſpe- " cially thoſe of the illuſtrious Sorbonne, and of Na- " varre, being always ſtrongly addicted to the good " cauſe, which Gerſon maintained with a great deal " of zeal and ſtrength, having laid their complaints " before the King, his Majeſty, with a deſign to rid " the Univerſity of thoſe turbulent ſpirits, who diſ- " turbed the Church and the State, ſent orders to " above forty of the moſt mutinous, to retire from " Paris that ſame day upon pain of death. . . . After " this, to prevent the revival of ſo abominable a " doctrine by preſerving the book in which it was " taught, his Majeſty ſent to the Parliament his de- " claration againſt the errors contained in that libel of " maſter John Petit *, entitled, A Vindication of the " Duke of Burgundy, with orders to cut in pieces in a " full Court all the copies that could be found of it; " forbidding alſo every one to keep any by him, " upon pain of forfeiting both his liberty and his " eſtate; commanding that this declaration be re- " giſtered with the Biſhop of Paris's ſentence, join- " ing together both the matter of fact and the mat- " ter of law in the condemnation of the moſt perni- " cious errors contained in Maſter John Petit's libel, " entitled, A Vindication of the Duke of Burgundy, " which begins with theſe words; Par devers la treſ- " haute Majeſté Roiale, and which has been publickly " † expoſed to ſale at Paris and in other places. All " this was regiſtered in the Parliament the fourth of " June 1416, and the 16th of September following " the King iſſued out a moſt ſevere decree, at the " Univerſity's requeſt, againſt thoſe who ſhould dare " again to aſſert the doctrine of that abominable li- " bel, declaring them ſubject to all the puniſhments " due to thoſe who are guilty of Treaſon (25)."

† J. Juvenal, p. 328, of the edit. printed at the Louvre.

* Hiſt. Univ. Liv. 5. p. 300. Quam M. Joannes Parvi nuncupatus juſtificationem Ducis Burgundiæ fecit appellari, ejus quaternos & particulas apud quemcumque inveniri poterunt, &c. Prædicta Propoſitio M. J. Parvi in ſeſe, & in ſuis aſſertionibus principaliter intentis & in ea contentis eſt abolenda atque damnanda tanquam in fide erronea, &c. & eam ſic abolemus & damnamus, &c. Quam juſtificationem D. Ducis Burgundiæ appellavit complures in ſe errores peſtiferos continentem, & quæ in tantum in dictis villa & Dioceſi Pariſienſi publicata extitit, quod venditioni publice expoſita & à pluribus empta fuerit. p. 301.

† Publicæ venditioni expoſita quæ ſic incipit. Par devers, &c. p. 302.

[G] . . . . . That Prelate was obliged to ſee his ſentence reverſed, in order to pleaſe the Duke of Burgundy.] One may obſerve in John Petit's affairs, what happens generally: a toleration, a condemnation, an abſolution, &c. according as the Prince who protected him was more or leſs powerful. His credit being very low at Paris in the year 1414, ſevere proceedings were carried on againſt his Apologiſt. His power being very great in the ſame city in the year 1418, the whole cenſure was declared void. Let us

(25) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du grand Schiſme, Liv. 5. p. 242, 243.

John Petit died in the year 1411, at Hedin, a city belonging to that Duke (k). He had taken ſanctuary thither, fearing the Duke of Orleans's ſons, who deſigned to have him convicted of hereſy. He was not a Cordelier, as ſome have aſſerted, but a ſecular Prieſt (l).

(k) Monſtrelet, lib. 1. cap. 39. apud Spondanum, ad ann. 1408. num. 1. p. 704.

(l) Spondanus, ad ann. 1408. num. 1. p. 703.

quote an Author who lived in that Century. About this time, ſays he (26), there was a general proceſſion at Paris, at which were preſent all the Members of the Univerſity, and chiefly the Vicars of the Biſhop of Paris, who lay then very ſick at St. Omer. Theſe Vicars did there in a full Church, and in the preſence of the whole proceſſion repeal the ſentence of condemnation, which the ſaid Biſhop had formerly given againſt John Petit's propoſition, againſt the Duke of Burgundy's reputation, giving him thus ſatisfaction, with regard to his honour and loyalty, acknowledging him true Champion of the Crown of France, and ſhewing the power which the Biſhop had given them for that purpoſe, ſo that the Duke of Burgundy was ſatisfied.

(26) John à Fevre, Seigneur de St. Remi, Hiſtoire de Charles VI. ch. 88. p. 124.

☞ PETRARCH (FRANCIS), a very learned Writer in the 14th Century, was born July 20, 1304, at Arezzo, and was ſon of Petrarco di Parenzo, a notary, and Eletta de' Canigiani, both of good families at Florence (a), from which city his father had been obliged to retire in 1300, by the faction of the Neri [A]. While young Petrarch lived at Piſa with his father, he received ſome tincture of learning from the famous Barlaam of Calabria, Monk of St. Baſil, and afterwards Biſhop of Geraci; and when his father was ſettled at Avignon, he was ſent by him to Carpentras, where he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of grammar, rhetoric, and philoſophy, for four years. He afterwards ſpent four years at Montpellier, where he ſtudied law under John Andreas, and Cino of Piſtoia. It is probable, that the latter, who excelled in Italian Poetry, inſpired him with an inclination for that art, and taught him the firſt principles of it. His father then ſent him to Bologna, in order that he might complete his ſtudies in the law under John Calderino and Bartholomew d'Oſſa. His application to the law was the effect of mere complaiſance to his father; but his genius led him entirely to poetry, eloquence, hiſtory, and moral philoſophy. And though his father, when he viſited him at Bologna, threw into the fire all the Latin Poets and Orators, except Virgil and Cicero, which were the only writers he granted to his ſon's importunate requeſts; yet it was not poſſible for Petrarch to alter his inclination, and reliſh the ſtudy of the law. His mother dying in 1324, and his father the year following, he returned to Avignon, in order to ſettle his domeſtick affairs; and then purchaſed about fifteen miles from that city, to the Eaſt, a country-houſe in a very ſolitary but agreeable ſituation, named Vaucluſe, where he ſpent a good part of the year. His falling in love in the year 1327 with the beautiful Laura, whom he has immortalized in his Poems [B], made this place ſtill more dear to him. His reſidence at Vaucluſe was interrupted by ſeveral journeys, which he took. For in 1327 Lewis of Bavaria's entrance into Italy having given him hopes, that the exiles of Florence would be recalled home, he went to Milan for that purpoſe; but was obliged to return to Avignon without ſucceſs. His inclination to travel induced him afterwards to go to Paris, and thence to Flanders and Germany. James Colonna, Biſhop of Lombez, with whom he had contracted a friendſhip at the Pope's Court at Avignon, going about that time to Rome, and inviting Petrarch thither, the latter took that opportunity of ſeeing that city. Upon his return to Avignon, at the perſuaſion of that Prelate and of Cardinal John Colonna his brother, he entered into the ſervice of Pope John XXII. who employed him in ſeveral affairs of importance both at Rome and in France. He was in hopes of obtaining by this means ſome conſiderable poſts; but being diſappointed, he retired to Vaucluſe, where he ſhewed his reſentment in three ſonnets extant among his works, and in ſome of his Latin Letters. It was there that he wrote moſt of his Latin works, and among the reſt his Poem upon Africa, which was eſteemed a prodigy in thoſe times of ignorance, and raiſed him ſo great a reputation in Italy and France, that he was invited the ſame day by the Senate of Rome and the Chancellors of the Univerſity of Paris to come and receive the poetical Crown. By the advice of his friends, and for many reaſons he preferred Rome to Paris; and embarked for the former city in 1341, and arrived at Naples, where King Robert, who was an eminent patron of learned men, would have diſſuaded him from going to Rome to receive the poetical Crown, and have given it himſelf. But Petrarch having thanked his Majeſty for his offer, purſued his journey

(a) See Lodovico Antonio Muratori's Life of Petrarch, prefixed to Le Rime di Franceſco Petrarca, riſcontrate co' i Teſti a penna della Libreria Eſtenſe, e co' i fragmenti dell' originale d'eſſo Poeta, &c. Edit. Modena 1711, in 4to, and the additions to this Life in the Venice Journal, Tome 8. p. 286.

[A] From which city his Father had been obliged to retire in 1300 by the faction of the Neri.] He went with his family to Arezzo, where they continued for ſome time; and it was during their reſidence at Arezzo, that Petrarch was born, who however has been always conſidered as a Florentine. He was but ſeven months old, when his mother obtained leave of the Republick of Florence to live at Anciſa, a village depending on that city, where her huſband had an eſtate; and ſhe removed thither with her ſon; which occaſioned ſome to imagine that he was born there. His father having in vain attempted to procure leave to return to his own country, ſent for his wife and ſon, who was then ſeven years old, and carried them with him to Piſa, in order that he might have the better opportunity to proſecute his own intereſts; but finding himſelf at laſt utterly diſappointed, he thought proper to retire two years after to Avignon, where the Pope reſided at that time.

[B] Falling in love in the year 1327 with the beautiful Laura, whom he has immortalized in his Poems.] James Philip Tomaſini in his Petrarcha redivivus, and other Writers aſſert, that ſhe was daughter of Henry de Chiabau, Lord of Cabrieres. But Joſeph Maria Suares and others affirm, that ſhe was of the family of Sade. What is certain is, that ſhe was born at Avignon June the 4th 1314, and ſpent the greateſt part of her life at Vaucluſe. Petrarch aſſures us, that his paſſion for her was entirely honourable. But ſome pretend to prove the contrary by his verſes themſelves, journey to Rome, and received there from the Senate and People the poetical Crown on the 8th of April, being Eaſter-day, 1341 [C]. From Rome he went to Parma, where he received great honours from the Lords of Correggio. But his love of ſolitude and ſtudy, the fruits of which are a great many excellent works written by him [D], induced him to retire to a very agreeable place named Selva Piana in the territory of Reggio, where he ſpent part of the time, during which he reſided in that country, dividing himſelf between the city and his rural retirement. About that time his friends wrote to him themſelves. However, his affection for her continued as long as ſhe lived, and even a great while after her death. She died April the 6th 1348, in the 34th year of her age, and was interred in the Church of the Cordeliers at Avignon. Petrarch has immortalized his grief for her loſs by a great number of verſes, which are full of her praiſes, and would make us imagine her to be a perfectly accompliſhed Lady, if we did not know, that it was a poet and a lover who ſpeaks.

[C] Received there from the Senate and People the poetical Crown on the 8th of April, being Eaſter-Day, 1341.] The circumſtances of this ſolemnity are ſo remarkable, that they deſerve to be related. Upon the day, on which it was to be performed, the Vice-Legate, who was of the family of Colonna and Biſhop of Terracina, cauſed a maſs to be celebrated with muſick at the altar of St. Peter; after which Petrarch was conducted to the palace of Colonna near Santa Maria in via lata, where they dined. After dinner, the under-maſter of the Ceremonies brought ſeveral works of Petrarch, and made a ſpeech to the aſſembly, in which he demanded, that he ſhould be crowned Poet, which was unanimouſly agreed to. Immediately after the Poet was dreſſed in the habits neceſſary for the ceremony. Firſt, he had the tragick Cothurnus of purple leather put upon his right leg, and on his left the comick buſkin of a violet colour, tied with blue ſtrings. Upon his doublet, which was of grey taffeta, he had a long robe of violet-coloured velvet, plaited at the collar, with ſleeves, doubled with green taffeta, and adorned with gold lace. And he was girt with a chain of diamonds. Upon this robe he had another of white ſattin open at the ſides. His head was then covered with a mitre of gold-cloth, and made in ſuch a manner as to receive the crowns upon it, and adorned with pendants behind, like thoſe of Biſhops. At his neck hung a violin with a chain conſiſting of figures and dragons. Upon his hands he had a pair of gloves, the right of Otter-ſkin, and the left of Ermin. When he was thus equipped, there came a girl with her hair looſe, bare-footed, with a bear's ſkin over her ſhoulders, and a lighted candle in her left hand, in order to hold up his robe, which was very long. In this manner he came down into the Court, where he found a chariot adorned with devices covered with laurel, ivy, and myrtle, and ſpread with cloth of gold, in which were repreſented Mount Parnaſſus, Apollo, and the Muſes. At the top was a ſeat, where our Poet ſat, having round him ſeveral books, and all the ſymbols of the liberal arts, and bearing on his knees a large violin of ivory. Of the four feet, which ſupported his ſeat, the firſt was a lion, the ſecond was an elephant, the third a griffin, and the fourth a panther. Divers perſons repreſenting the antient deities, walked round the chariot, which bore with Petrarch only the three Graces, and Bacchus, who had at his ſide Patience. The chariot was drawn by four horſes, and preceded by a woman dreſſed in a coarſe cloth, who drove before her with a wand a man well dreſſed, who ſat at his eaſe in a litter drawn by two horſes. A perſon repreſenting Envy, and carrying in her hand a croſs-bow bent, walked behind, and was followed by ſatyrs, fawns, and nymphs dancing. When the muſick ceaſed, young people leaped and danced about on all ſides, and ſung ſongs in honour of Petrarch and the city of Rome. In this order they arrived at the Capitol, where every body being aſcended, Petrarch made a ſpeech in Latin deſiring the poetical Crown; which was granted him; and three crowns placed upon his mitre, the firſt of laurel, the ſecond of ivy, and the third of myrtle. The Senator, who crowned him, preſented him with a robe valued at five hundred Ducats of gold, and the people of Rome gave him five hundred Ducats more, and every thing which had been made uſe of at his coronation. Mounting his chariot again he went in the ſame order, in which he came to the Church of St. Peter, throwing money among the people, which had been beſtowed on him by the Colonna's, who gave him for that purpoſe four hundred Florins. When he arrived at St. Peter's, he performed his devotions before the great altar, and offered his three Crowns there. He then returned to the palace of Colonna, where he was entertained at a magnificent ſupper, which was followed by a ball.

This relation is extracted from a letter written by Senuccio del Bene, a Florentine Poet, contemporary with Petrarch, or by an Author of a later date, who probably was Jerom Marcatelli, Canon of Padua, who publiſhed it firſt in 1549, as the Writers of the Journal of Venice affirm. The Author of that letter, a French tranſlation of which was printed at Paris 1565, in 4to. aſſures us that he was preſent at this ceremony; and the detail of it, which he gives, makes this probable enough. However, he is miſtaken with regard to the day of the ceremony, which he erroneouſly fixes on the Aſcenſion-Day, May 22; beſides, that this date is inconſiſtent with itſelf, ſince Aſcenſion-Day that year was the 17th of May, and not the 22d. Add to this, that the Writer of the letter endeavours to aſſign the reaſons of what paſſed in that ceremony, in which every thing alluded to the character and genius of a Poet.

[D] A great many excellent works written by him.] His works were printed at Baſil 1581, in four volumes in folio, under this title; Franciſci Petrarchæ Opera quæ extant, omnia. This edition contains his Latin and Italian works. The Latin had been printed together before at Baſil 1496, in folio, and Venice 1501, in folio. But this edition is more complete, and contains the following treatiſes. In the firſt Volume, 1. De Remediis utriuſque Fortunæ Libri duo. Lyons 1577, in 8vo. Geneva 1613, in 24°. Rotterdam 1649, in 8vo. Tranſlated into Italian, and publiſhed under the title of, Opera di Franc. Petrarca de' Remedi dell' una el' altra Fortuna, tradotta per Remigio Florentino. Venice 1549, in 8vo. A French tranſlation was printed at Paris 1534 in folio, under this title: Meſſire François Petrarque des Rémedes de l'une & l'autre Fortune tranſlaté du Latin par Nicole Oreſme. Grenaille and Sieur de Châteauniers made a new French Verſion, in which he altered the form of Dialogue, and by that means retrenched a great many tedious repetitions. It was publiſhed under this title; Le ſage reſolu contre la Fortune & la mort; ou Petrarque mis en François. Roan 1662, in 12mo. in two tomes. There is another French tranſlation ſtill later under this title: Entretiens de Petrarque ſur la bonne & mauvaiſe Fortune, ou l'Art de vivre heureux. Paris 1673, in two tomes in 12mo. 2. De Vitâ ſolitariâ Libri duo. 3. De Otio Religioſorum Libri duo. 4. De verâ ſapientiâ Dialogi duo. 5. De Contemptu Mundi, ſive Secretorum Dialogi tres. This work was printed ſeparately under this title: De ſecreto Curarum conflictu. Regii Lepidi, 1501, in 4to. 6. Pſalmi Pœnitentiales ſeptem. Theſe are ſeven Pſalms compoſed by Petrarch. 7. De Republicâ optimè adminiſtrandâ Liber. This and the following books were printed ſeparately at Berne in 1602, in 12mo. 8. De Officio & virtutibus imperatoriis Liber. 9. Rerum memorabilium Libri quatuor. Theſe are different parts of the Roman and Greek Hiſtory reunited under ſeveral titles. They were printed ſeparately at Berne in 1604, in 12mo. There is an old French tranſlation, entitled, Les paroles joyeuſes & dits memorables des nobles & ſages hommes anciens, redigez par François Petrarque, & traduits en François. Lyons 1531, in him from Florence, that they were in hopes of procuring his return thither, and recovering his eſtate. Upon this he went to Arezzo, that he might be at hand to negotiate this affair; all the inhabitants of that city going out to meet him, and ſhewing him the moſt diſtinguiſhed honours. But he did not ſucceed in his deſigns; and finding the affair protracted to too great a length, returned to Parma, and ſoon after to Vaucluſe. He did not continue long in Provence; for Pope Clement VI. ſent him ſome time after to Naples to congratulate Queen Joan, upon her ſucceeding King Robert, who died in 1343. He went again into Italy in 1348 to viſit at Verona the Lords de la Scala, and at Padua James de Carrera, who was then Lord of that city, and with the Lords de la Scala had ſtrongly invited Petrarch by their letters. He was at Verona, when he heard of the death of his dear Laura, which filled him with great ſorrow. He returned to Avignon in 1349, and left it again in 1350, to go to Rome on occaſion of the Jubilee, and then retired to his ſolitude of Vaucluſe, where he continued till 1352, when being weary of this retirement, and excited by his love to Italy, he abſolutely abandoned Provence, and went to Milan, where he entered into the ſervice of the Viſconti, who ſhewed him all poſſible marks of eſteem, and employed him for ten years in affairs of conſequence and ſeveral embaſſies. The reſt of his life was continually taken up in travelling: he reſided ſometimes at Parma, ſometimes at Padua, other times at Ferrara or Venice. He was in the laſt city in 1364, when John Boccace came thither to inform him, in the name of the Republick of Florence, that his eſtate was reſtored to him, and liberty granted him of returning thither. This news was very agreeable to him; but he was not then in a condition to make uſe of the favour ſhewn him; for he was ſo broken in his health, that he could not think of going to ſettle in a place ſo far diſtant from that where he then was; and was ſo ſubject to fainting-fits, that once at Ferrara he was thought to be dead for thirty hours. He choſe therefore to retire to Padua, to finiſh his days there under the patronage of Francis de Carrera, Lord of that city, who gave him a very agreeable country-houſe at Arqua ten miles from that city. He took another journey to Venice in 1373 with a ſon of Francis de Carrera, to deſire in his name pardon of the Republick for ſome inſults, which he had offered it. They arrived there September 27, and were the next day introduced in the Council-hall, where Petrarch began his diſcourſe, but had ſcarce ſaid a few words, when he was ſo confounded, that he ſtopped ſhort. The audience was therefore deferred till the day following, when he ſpoke with ſo much eloquence

8vo. 10. Vitarum illuſtrium Virorum Epitome. Theſe are elogiums upon fourteen antient Romans in ſo many chapters. They were printed at the end of the four books Rerum Memorabilium, with a ſupplement of Lorbardus de Siricho, in which he treats of one and twenty other illuſtrious Romans and Greeks, at Baſil, in 1563, in folio. 11. De pacificandâ Italiâ Exhortatio. 12. Ad veteres Romanæ Reipublicæ Defenſores Oratio. 13. De Libertate capeſſendâ hortatoria. 14. De Obedientiâ & Fide uxoriâ. This is a Latin verſion of the laſt novel of Boccace, containing the ſtory of the patience of Griſelidis. 15. De Avaritiâ vitandâ Oratio. 16. Itinerarium Syriacum. Michael Poccianti has erroneouſly repreſented this work in his catalogue of the Florentine Writers, as different from another of the ſame kind, which he ſuppoſes to be only in manuſcript. Anthony Poſſevinus has made the ſame miſtake in his Bibliotheca. This treatiſe is a voyage to the Holy Land, or rather a deſcription, which Petrarch gives to one of his friends, of the places which he ſhould ſee in a journey, which he deſigned to take to Paleſtine. Reuſner has inſerted it in his collection of voyages, though it is in proſe, and all the reſt, which he has introduced into his collection, are in verſe. In the ſecond volume, are the following tracts, 17. Epiſtolarum de Rebus Familiaribus Libri octo. 18. Epiſtolarum ad quoſdam ex veteribus illuſtriores Liber unus. 19. Epiſtolarum ſine titulo Liber unus. 20. Epiſtolarum de rebus ſenilibus, libri 16. 21. Epiſtolarum variarum Liber unus. All theſe letters were printed together at Geneva in 1601, in 8vo. 22. De ſui ipſius & aliorum ignorantiâ Liber. Geneva 1609, in 12mo. 23. Apologiæ contra Gallum. 24. Quatuor libri invectivarum contra quendam Medicum. There are added at the end ſeveral works, which have been falſly aſcribed to Petrarch. In the third volume are theſe treatiſes: 25. Epiſtolæ de ſumendâ atque receptâ Laureâ quinque. Theſe letters are followed by the privilege which was granted him, on occaſion of his being crowned Poet. 26. Bucolicorum Eclogæ 10. 27. Africa, hoc eſt, de Bello Punico Libri ix. This poem is not very extraordinary, though highly admired by ſome Writers of his time; for there are enormous faults in it, not only againſt Quantity, but likewiſe againſt the eſſential Rules of Poetry. 28. Epiſtolarum Libri tres. Theſe Epiſtles are in verſe. 29. Teſtamentum Petrarchæ. The fourth volume contains his Latin works, of which there are many editions. We ſhall mention the principal. Opere di Franceſco Petrarch, cioè le Rime. Venice 1473, in folio. This is the firſt edition, and is extremely ſcarce. Con li comenti di M. Franceſco Filelfo, Antonio da Tempo, Girolamo Aleſſandrino ſopra i ſonetti è le Canzoni, e di M. Bernardo Licinio ſopra i Trionfi. Bologna 1475, in folio. Con l'eſpoſizioni di Aleſſandro Vellutello. Venice 1538, in 4to. Con l'Eſpoſizione di Aldo Manuzio. Venice 1533, in 8vo. Con l'Eſpoſizione di Bernardino Daniello. Venice 1541, in 4to. Con nuove e brevi dicharazioni. Venice 1548, in 8vo. Theſe explications are by Anthony Bruccioli. Con l'Eſpoſizione di M. Gio. Andrea Geſualdo. Venice 1553, in 4to. Col Comento di Silvano de Venafro. Rome 1626, in 4to. Corrette da Girolamo Ruſcelli. Venice 1554, in 8vo. Corrette da Ludovico Dolce, con alcuni Avertimenti di Giulio Cammillo. Venice 1557, in 12mo, and 1559, in 8vo. Con nuove Eſpoſizioni. Lyons 1574, in 16°. Theſe explications are by Bembo. The Academy della Cruſca quotes only this edition in their Dictionary. Brevemente ſpoſte da Ludovico Caſtelvetro. Baſil 1582, in 4to. La Rime di Franceſco Petrarca, riſcontrate co' i Teſti a penna della Libreria Eſtenſe, è co' i Fragmenti dell' Originale d'eſſo Poeta. S'aggiungono le Conſiderazioni rivedute è ampliate d' Aleſſandro Saſſoni, le Annotazioni di Girolamo Muzio, è le Oſſervazioni di Lodovico Antonio Muratori. Modena 1711, in 4to. Petrarch's Italian poem, conſiſts of the following pieces: 30 Sonnetti & Canzoni. Theſe are poems, which he wrote upon his beautiful Laura. They bear the general name of Rime, and are divided in two parts, the firſt of which contains thoſe, which he wrote during her life; and the ſecond thoſe, which he compoſed after her death. 31. Fragmenti. Theſe are to be met with only in a very ſcarce edition of part of Petrarch's poems, publiſhed by Frederic Ubaldini, at Rome 1642, in fol. 32. Trionfi d' Amore, della Caſtita, della Morte, della Fama, del Tempo, della Divinita.

Our

eloquence and force, that the Senate granted what he desired. He did not long survive this event; for upon his return to Arqua he died there July 18, 1374, aged seventy years, and was interred there [E]. He had embraced the Ecclesiastical State, and wore the habit, and gave himself the title of Clerk; he was Canon of Cavaillon and of Lombez, Archdeacon of the Church of Parma, and at last Canon of the Cathedral Church of Padua; but never received the Order of Priesthood. Besides these preferments, Robert King of Naples and Queen Joan gave him the title of Domestick Chaplain, as appears from the letters, which they granted him, the former in 1341, and the latter in 1343. He had a very good constitution; and his temperate manner of life contributed to preserve it a long time without sickness. He neither wished for nor despised riches, and loved glory, though without shewing too great a zeal for it. He had an excellent genius, and was a perfect master of the Italian Poetry; but his Latin Poems are much inferior. A great many Authors have written his life [F]. Jerom Squarciafico, in his account of him prefixed to Petrarch's Italian Poems, tells us, that he would never consent, that

Our Author's Canzoni are the best performances, in the judgment of Muratori, and are much superior to his Sonetti, among which, however, there are some incomparable. With regard to his Trionfi, the best Judges own, that they are inferior to his other poems, though there be in them invention, beautiful descriptions, admirable thoughts, and excellent verses. There have been several French translations of Petrarch's Italian poems, particularly the following. Les Triomphes de Messire François Petrarque, traduit de Rime Toscane en Prose Françoise. Avec l'Expostion au long de toutes les Histoires y contenues. Paris 1520, in folio, and since in 8vo and 16°. The Translator's name is unknown, except he was George de la Forge, of Bourbon, of whom we meet with a manuscript Translation in page 11, of the catalogue of manuscripts of Madam the Princess, printed in 1724. Les six Triomphes de Petrarque traduits en Rime Françoise, par Jean Amayner, Baron d'Opede. Lyons in 16°, without date. Toutes les oeuvres vulgaires de François Petrarque, contenant quatre Livres de Madame Laure d'Avignon sa Maitresse, en Sonnets & Chants; les Triumphes d'Amour, de Châteté, de Mort, de Renommée, du Temps, & de la Divinité, traduites du Tuscan en vers Françoise par Vasquin Philieul, de Carpentras, Docteur is Droits, & Chanoine de Notre-Dame des Doms. Avignon 1548, in 8vo. Septante Sonnets traduits de Petrarque par Etienne du Tronchet, Foresion. Paris 1575, and 1581, in 16°. With some other pieces by the Translator. Le Petrarque traduit en Rime Françoise avec les Commentaires par Philippe de Maldeghem. Brussels 1600, in 8vo. Les Oeuvres amoureuses de Petrarque, traduites en François avec l'Italien à côté. Par le Sieur Placide Catamusi, Docteur & Professeur en Droit & Advocat en Parliament. Paris 1669, in 12mo. We find here only the translation of the Sonetti and Trionfi of Petrarch; that of the Canzoni is not added. Du Verdier, in his Biblotheque Françoise, has committed a gross mistake, with relation to a Commentary upon Petrarch's Trionfi, by Bernardo Illicinio or Licinio. He writes thus, p. 117. "Bernard Illicinius has translated into French the Exposition and Commentary upon the Italian Text of Petrarch's triumphs, not printed, and seen by me in manuscript in the library of Count d'Urfé." Du Verdier's mistake manifestly arose from his having seen in the manuscript only the name of Illicinius; whence he imagined that this was the name of the French translation. Father Labbe, through another mistake, has asserted in his Nova Bibliotheca Manuscriptorum, that Illicinius had not translated, but written this Commentary in French; for his words are these: The Triumphs of Petrarch in Italian, with the French Commentaries of Bernard Illicinius. 33. Chronica delle vite de Pontefici & Imperatori Romani, in fino à suoi tempi alla quale sono state aggiunte quelle da tempi del Petrarca fino a Pio III. Florence 1478, in folio. Venice 1507, in 4to, and 1534, in 8vo. Geneva 1615, in 4to. Nicholas Franco published at Venice in 1543, in 8vo, a work under the title of Petrarchista, in which he relates, that being at Avignon, at the house of one Robert, he saw several original pieces of Petrarch, which had not been published, and among others some elegies, of which he gives a specimen in page 26. But whoever is the least conversant in the writings of Petrarch, will easily perceive, that Franco intended to impose on the ignorant, since the piece which he cites, is only a Cento from Petrarch's verses already printed. There has been a prodigious number of Commentaries on Petrarch's poems: most of his Sonnets have served as an exercise for the critical talent of the learned men of Italy; which shews the esteem, in which our Author is held. The Reader may see the titles of some of them in Haym's Notizia de' Libri rari, p. 212 & seqq.

[E] Upon his return to Arqua he died there July 18, 1374, aged seventy years, and was interred there.] He ordered by his will made at Padua in 1370, that he should be interred at Arqua. His funeral was honoured by the presence of the Lord of Padua, and the Bishop and Clergy of that city; and his funeral Oration was pronounced by his friend Bonaventure Badoaro of Peraga, of the Order of the Eremites, who was afterwards Cardinal. The following Epitaph, which was written by Petrarch himself, was placed over his grave.

Frigida Franciſci lapis hic tegit ossa Petrarcæ:
Suscipe, Virgo parens, animam; sate Virgine parce:
Fessaque jam terris cœli requiescat in arce.
Anno Domini 1374, 18 Julii.

Below were added these words: Viro insigni F. P. Laureato Franciscolus de Brosano Mediolanensis, Gener, individuâ conversatione, amore, propinquitate, & successione, memoria. This Franciscolus de Brosano had married a natural daughter, which Petrarch had by a Lady of a good family, who lived in the village of Linterno, afterwards called corruptly l'Inferno, near Milan; Petrarch left Franciscolus his universal Legatee.

[F] A great many Authors have written his life.] Above five and twenty have given an account of his life at large; but they are inconsistent with each other both in dates and facts. That which Muratori prefixed to Petrarch's Italian Poems in his edition printed in 1711, is the most exact, and has been followed in this article, to which we have joined the additions made to it in the Journal of Venice, Tome VIII. p. 186. However, we shall give a list of those, who laboured in this design, before that learned Author. Paul Vergerio published a life of Petrarch in Latin, and James Philip Tomisini has inserted it in page 175 of his Petrarcha redivivus, at Padua 1650, in 4to. Xicco or Siccone Polentone of Padua wrote another in Latin, which Tomasini likewise published under the name of an anonymous Writer from a manuscript of James Gaffarel in his Petrarcha redivivus, p. 185. Giannezzo (in Latin Jannoctius) Manetti left one in Latin, published by Tomasini in the same book, p. 195. Leonardo Aretino wrote his account in Italian, printed in Tomasini's book, p. 207. Ludovico Beccatelli, Archbishop of Ragusa, wrote one in Italian, subjoined to the preceding in Tomasini's Petrarcha redivivus, p. 213. Rodolphus Agricola wrote his account in Latin, according to Trithemius; but it seems never to have been printed. Philip Villani left one in Italian, which has continued in manuscript. Girolamo Squarciafico prefixed one in Italian to his Commentary upon the Italian Poems of Petrarch, first printed at Milan in 1494, in folio, and several times since. Alexander Vellutello prefixed one to his Commentary upon our Poet, printed at Venice in 1538, in 4to. and reprinted several that his ſiſter ſhould become the Miſtreſs of Pope Benedict XII. who was deſperately in love with her, and promiſed him a Cardinal's hat as a reward; but that another brother ſold this ſiſter to that Pope upon very mean terms.

veral times. Andrea Geſualdo added a much larger account of Petrarch's life than any of the preceding, to his Commentaries on that Poet, printed at Venice 1553, in 4to. Antonio da Tempo of Padua prefixed one written in Italian, as well as the preceding, to his Commentary publiſhed at Bologna in 1475, in folio. Bernardino Daniello of Lucca wrote one in the ſame language, which he added to his Commentary printed at Venice in 1541, in 4to. Papirius Maſſo publiſhed in Latin the lives of Dante, Petrarch, and Boccace, at Paris 1587, in 8vo. and they are inſerted in the collection of his Elogia. Paulus Jovius has given our Author a place in his Elogia, among which his is the fifth. Jacobi Philippi Tomaſini Petrarcha redivivus, integram Poetæ vitam Iconibus ære cælatis exhibens. Acceſſit nobiliſſimæ Fœminæ Lauræ brevis Hiſtoria. Editio altera correcta & aucta. Padua 1650, in 4to. Tomaſini has added to this a letter of Fortunio Liceti, whom he had conſulted concerning the orthography of Petrarch's name; in which letter Liceti declares for Petrarcha written with an h. Michael Poccianti treats at large of our Author in his Catalogus Scriptorum Florentinorum. Giulio Negri has given him a long article, though a very confuſed and erroneous one, in his Hiſtoria de Fiorentini Scrittori. Placide Catanuſi has prefixed a pretty long account of Petrarch to his French tranſlation of our Author's Poems, and inſiſted principally upon the ceremony of his being crowned Poet; but there are many miſtakes in that account. T.

☞ PETTY (WILLIAM), ſon of Anthony Petty, a Clothier, was born at Romſey, a little haven-town in Hampſhire, May 26, 1623; and while a boy, took great delight in ſpending his time among Artificers there, as Smiths, Carpenters, Joiners, &c. whoſe trades, in ſome reſpects, he underſtood ſo well at twelve years of age, that he could work at them. At that time he went to the Grammar-ſchool there (a); at fifteen years of age was maſter of the Latin, Greek, and French tongues, the whole body of Arithmetic, and thoſe parts of practical Geometry and Aſtronomy uſeful to Navigation, and Dialing, with the knowledge of ſeveral mechanical trades (b). Soon after this, he went to Caen in Normandy, and with a little ſtock of Merchandize, which he then improved, maintained himſelf there, and afterwards removed to Paris, and ſtudied Anatomy, and read Veſalius with Mr. Hobbes, who had a great affection for him, and aſſiſted him in his ſtudies (c). Upon his return to England, he was preferred in the King's Navy; and at the age of twenty years, had gotten about ſixty pounds, with as much Mathematics as any one of his age was known to have had; and with this money, in 1643, when the war between the King and Parliament grew hot, he went into the Netherlands and France for three years, and having vigorouſly proſecuted his ſtudies, eſpecially in Phyſic, at Utrecht, Leyden, Amſterdam and Paris, he returned home to Romſey, bringing with him about ten pounds more than he had carried out of England (d). On the 16th of March, 1647, he obtained a patent from the Parliament, to teach the art of double writing [A]; which patent was to continue in force for ſeventeen years. In 1648, he publiſhed at London in 4to, Advice to Mr. Samuel Hartlib, for the Advancement of ſome particular Parts of Learning [B]. At this time he adhered to the predo-

(a) Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 807. 2d edit.

(b) This he tells us himſelf, in laſt Will, dated May 2, 1685.

(c) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(d) See his Will.

[A] His art of double writing.] In his Advice to Mr. Samuel Hartlib, for the advancement of ſome particular parts of learning, printed at London 1648, in 4to, he writes thus: There is invented an inſtrument of ſmall bulke and price, eaſily made, and very durable, whereby any man, even at the firſt ſight and handling, may write two reſembling copies of the ſame thing at once, as ſerviceably and as faſt (allowing two lines upon each page for ſetting the inſtruments) as by the ordinary way. Of what nature, or in what character, or what matter ſoever, as paper, parchment, a book, &c. the ſaid writing ought to be upon, made. The uſe hereof will be very great to Lawyers and Scriveners, for making of indentures, and all kinde of counter-parts; to Merchants, Intelligencers, Regiſters, Secretaries, Clarkes, &c. for copying of letters, accompts, invoices, entering of warrants, and other records; to Scholars for tranſcribing of rare manuſcripts, and preſerving originals from falſification, and other injuries of time. It leſſeneth the labour of examination, ſerveth to diſcover forgeries and ſurreptitious copies, and to the tranſacting of all buſineſſes of writing, as with eaſe and ſpeed, ſo with privacy alſo.

[B] Advice to Mr. Samuel Hartlib, for the Advancement of ſome particular Parts of Learning.] In the dedication to Mr. Hartlib, dated at London the 8th of January 1647-8, he writes thus: "I have had "many flying thoughts concerning the advancement "of reall learning in general, but particularly of the "education of Youth, Mathematics, Phyſic, and con"cerning the Hiſtory of Art and Nature, with ſome "more ſerious ones concerning your owne moſt ex"cellent Advices for an Office of Publick Addreſſe. "And indeed they were but flying thoughts, for ſee"ing what vaſt ſummes were requiſite to carry on "thoſe deſigns, and how unwilling or unable men "generally are to contribute towards them, I thought "it but labour loſt to fix my mind much upon them. "But it having pleaſed God, unexpectedly, to make "me the Inventor of the art of double writing, daily "and hourly uſefull to all ſorts of perſons in all "places of the world, and that to perpetuity, I con"ceived, that if there were underſtanding enough in "men to be ſenſible of their own good, and thank"fulneſſe or honeſty to reward the Contrivers of it. "ſuch meanes might be raiſed out of this art, as "might at leaſt ſet the aforementioned deſigns on "float, and make them ready to ſet ſaile towards "the haven of perfection upon every opportunity of "ſtronger gales. And thereupon I reaſſumed my me"ditations, which I here give you, deſiring you and "your ingenious friends to remeditate upon them, "and correct them; but withall to think of the "beſt courſe how to improve my invention to ſuch ad"vantage, as may, if poſſible, make us capable of en"joying more then bare ideas of that happineſſe, "which the atchievements of our deſigns promiſeth. "I ſhall deſire you to ſhew them unto no more then "needs you muſt, ſince they can pleaſe only thoſe "few, that are reall friends to the deſigne of reali"ties; not thoſe, who are tickled only with rhetori"call prefaces, tranſitions, and epilogues, and charm"ed with fine alluſions and metaphors, (all which I "do not condemn) wherewith, as I had no abili"ties to adorn my diſcourſe, ſo I wanted all other "requiſites thereunto, having written it (as yourſelf "muſt beare me witneſſe) at your own importunity, "in the midſt of my cares and indeavours to perfect "mine invention, and which is worſe in the midſt "of my hard, and perhaps, unprofitable labour, to "prevent the ingratitude and backwardneſſe of men "to predominant party of the Kingdom, and went to Oxford, when the Parliamentary Viſitors were exerciſing their juriſdiction in that Univerſity, and ſettled there for ſome time, proſecuting the ſtudy of Phyſic, and teaching Anatomy and Chemiſtry to the young Scholars there. He became likewiſe Deputy-Profeſſor of Anatomy to Dr. Thomas Clayton, who had an unſurmountable averſion to the ſight of a dead body. March 7, 1649-50, he was created Doctor of Phyſic, by virtue of a diſpenſation from the Delegates of the Univerſity; and was ſoon after made Fellow of Braſen-noſe College, in the room of Nathaniel Hoyle, B. D. In December 1650, he was one of the chief perſons

" to reward him, who ſhall earneſtly labour to ex-
" preſſe himſelfe,

" Yours and your deſignes moſt affectionate Servant,

" W. P.

(1) p. 1. In the tract itſelf, he obſerves (1), that his deſign is to point at ſome pieces of knowledge, the improvement whereof would make much to the generall good and comfort of all mankind, and withall to deliver our own opinion, by what meanes they may be raiſed ſome one degree neerer to perfection. But before we can meddle, ſays he, with this great work, we muſt firſt think of getting Labourers, by appointing ſome generall randevouz, where all men either able or willing to take up armes againſt the many difficulties thereof, may find entertainment. That is to ſay, we muſt recommend the inſtitution of an Office of common Addreſſe, according to the projection of Maſter Hartlib, (that painfull and great inſtrument of this deſigne,) whereby the wants and deſires of all, may be made known to all; where men may know what is already done in the buſineſſe of learning; what is at preſent in doing, and what is intended to be done; to the end, that by ſuch a generall communication of deſignes and mutual aſſiſtance, the wits and endeavours of the world may no longer be as ſo many ſcattered coals or firebrands, which for want of union are ſoone quenched; whereas being but layed together, they would have yeelded a comfortable light and heat. For methinkes the preſent condition of men is like a field, where a battle hath beene lately fought, where we may ſee many leggs, and armes, and eyes lying here and there, which, for want of a union, and a ſoul to quicken and enliven them, are good for nothing but to feed ravens, and infect the air. So we ſee many wittes and ingenuities lying ſcattered up and downe the world, whereof ſome are now labouring to doe what is already done, and puſling themſelves to reinvent what is already invented. Others we ſee quite ſtuck faſt in difficulties for want of a few directions, which ſome other man (might he be met withall) both could and would moſt eaſily give him. Againe, one man wants a ſmall ſumme of mony to carry on ſome deſigne, that requires it; and there is perhaps another, who hath twice as much ready to beſtow on the ſame deſigne; but theſe two having no means ever to heare the one of the other, the good work, intended and deſired by both parties, doth utterly periſh, and come to nothing. But this we paſſe over ſleightly, though very fundamental to our buſineſſe, becauſe the Maſter-builder thereof himſelf hath done it ſo ſolidly. " Having by this means procured " work-men, and what elſe is neceſſary to the worke, " that which we would have them to labour in, is; " How to finde out ſuch arts as are yet undiſcovered; " how to learne what is already known, by more " compendious and facile ways, and to apply it to " more, and thoſe more noble uſes; how to work in " men an higher eſteeme of learning, ſo as to give " occaſion, encouragement, and opportunity to more " men to apply themſelves to its advancement.

" The next thing then to be done will be,

I. " To ſee what is well and ſufficiently done al-
" ready, exploding whatſoever is nice, contentious,
" and merely phantaſtical; all which muſt in ſome
" meaſure be ſuppreſſed and brought into diſgrace
" and contempt with all men.

II. " This ſurvey may be made by peruſing
" all books, and taking notice of all mechanical in" ventions.

III. " In this peruſal all the real or experimental " learning may be ſifted and collected out of the ſaid
" books.

IV. " There muſt be appointed able readers of
" all ſuch books, with certain and well limited di" rections what to collect out of them.

V. " Every book muſt be ſo read by two ſeverall
" perſons apart, to prevent miſtakes and failings
" from the ſaid directions.

VI. " The directions for reading muſt be ſuch, as
" the Readers obſerving them, may exactly agree
" in their collections.

VII. " Out of all theſe bookes, one booke or great
" worke may be made, though conſiſting of many " volumes.

VIII. " The moſt artificiall indices, tables, or o" ther helps for the ready finding, remembring, and
" well underſtanding all things contained in theſe
" bookes, muſt be contrived and put in practice.

" Having thus taken the height or pitch, where" unto all arts and ſciences whatſoever are already " come, and obſerved where they now ſtick; the " ableſt men in every reſpective faculty muſt be ſet
" apart, to drive them on further with ſufficient
" maintenance and encouragement for the ſame.
" Whereunto it is requiſite, that two or three, one
" under another, be employed about each faculty,
" to the end that ſome of them dying, or any other-
" wiſe failing, there may never want men acquainted " with the whole deſigne, and able to carry it on,
" with the help of others to be admitted under them.
" And that at leaſt, yearly accounts be taken of " thoſe men's endeavours, and rewards be proportion-
" ed to them accordingly." Our Author then propoſes,

1. That there be inſtituted Ergaſtula Literaria, literary work-houſes, where children may be taught as well to do ſomething toward their living, as to read and write.

That the buſineſs of education be not, as now, committed to the worſt and unworthieſt of men; but that it be ſeriouſly ſtudied and practiſed by the beſt and ableſt perſons.

That all children above ſeven years old may be preſented to this kind of education, none being to be excluded, by reaſon of the poverty and unability of their parents; for hereby it hath come to paſs, that many are now holding the plow, which might have been fit to ſteer the State. Wherefore let ſuch poor children be imployed on works, whereby they may earn their living, equal to their ſtrength and underſtanding, and ſuch as they may perform, as well as elder and abler perſons, viz. attending engines, &c. And if they cannot get their whole living, and their parents can contribute nothing at all to make it up, let them ſtay ſomewhat the longer in the work-houſe.

That ſince few children have need of reading, before they know, or can be acquainted with the things they read of; or of writing, before their thoughts are worth the recording, or they are able to put them into any form, (which we call inditing;) much leſs of learning languages, when there are books enough for their preſent uſe in their own mother tongue; our opinion is, that thoſe things being withall ſomewhat above their capacity, as being to be attained by judgment, which is the weakeſt in children, and be deferred a while, and others more needful for them, ſuch as are in the order of nature before theſe aforementioned, and are attainable by the help of memory, which is either moſt ſtrong, or unpreoccupied in children, be ſtudied before them. We wiſh therefore, that the Educands be taught to obſerve and remember all ſenſible objects and actions, whether they be natural or artificial, which the Educators muſt, upon all occaſions, expound unto them.

That

That they uſe ſuch exerciſes, whether in work, or for recreation, as tend to the health, agility, and ſtrength of their bodies.

That they be taught to read by much more compendious means than are in common uſe; which is a thing certainly very eaſy and feaſible.

That they be not only taught to write according to our common way, but alſo to write ſwiftly, and in real characters; as likewiſe the dexterous uſe of the inſtruments for writing many copies of the ſame thing at once.

That the artificial memory be thought upon; and if the precepts thereof be not too far above children's capacities, we conceive it not improper for them to learn that alſo.

That in no caſe the art of drawing and deſigning be omitted, to what courſe of life ſoever theſe children are to be applied; ſince the uſe thereof for expreſſing the conceptions of the mind, ſeems to be little inferiour to that of writing, and in many caſes performs what by words is impoſſible.

That the elements of arithmetic and geometry be all ſtudied, being not only of great and frequent uſe in all human affairs; but alſo ſure guides and helps to reaſon, and eſpecial remedies for a volatile and unſteady mind.

That effectual courſes be taken to try the abilities of the bodies and minds of children, the ſtrength of their memory, inclination of their affections either to vice or virtue, and to which of them in particular; and withall to alter what is bad in them, and increaſe and improve what is good, applying all, whether good or bad, to the leaſt inconveniency, and moſt advantage.

That ſuch as ſhall have need to learn foreign languages, (the uſe whereof would be much leſſened, were the real and common characters brought into practice) may be taught them by incomparably more eaſy ways than are now uſual.

That no ignoble, unneceſſary, or condemned part of learning be taught in thoſe houſes of education; ſo that if any man ſhall vainly fall upon them, he himſelf only may be blamed.

That ſuch as have any natural ability and fitneſs to muſic, be encouraged and inſtructed therein.

That all children, though of the higheſt rank, be taught ſome gentile manufacture in their minority, ſuch as theſe, turning of curious figures, making mathematical inſtruments, dials, and how to uſe them in aſtronomical obſervations; making watches, and other trochilic motions; limning and painting on glaſs or in oyl-colours; graving, etching, carving, emboſſing, and molding in ſundry matters; the Lapidary's art in knowing, cutting, and ſetting jewels; grinding of glaſſes dioptrical and catoptrical; botanics and gardening; making muſical inſtruments; Navarchy, and making models for buildings and rigging of ſhips; architecture and making models for houſes; the Confectioner's, Perfumer's, or Dier's arts; Chemiſtry, refining metals, and counterfeiting jewels; Anatomy, making ſkeletons, and excarnating bowels; making Mariner's compaſſes, globes, and other magnetic devices.

And all for theſe reaſons:

1. They will be leſs liable to be cozened by Artificers.

2. They will become more induſtrious in general.

3. They will certainly bring to paſs moſt excellent works, being as Gentlemen ambitious to excell ordinary workmen.

4. They being able to make experiments themſelves, may do it with leſs charge, and more care, than others will do it for them.

5. The Reſpublica Artium will be much advanced, when ſuch as are rich and able, are alſo willing to make luciferous experiments.

6. It may engage them to be Mecenas's and Patrons of arts.

7. It will keep them from worſe occaſions of ſpending their time and eſtates.

8. As it will be a great ornament in proſperity, ſo it will be a great refuge and ſtay in adverſity, and common calamity.

" We have already, ſays our Author, recommend" ed the ſtudy of the elements of arithmetic and " geometry to all men in general. But they being
" the beſt grounded parts of ſpeculative knowledge,
" and of ſo vaſt uſe in all practical arts, we cannot " but commend deeper enquiries into them. And
" although the way of advancing them in particu" lar, may be drawn from what we have already " delivered concerning the advancement of learning
" in generall; yet for the more explicite under-
" ſtanding of our meaning herein, we referre to Maſter
" Pell's moſt excellent idea thereof, written to Maſ-
" ter Hartlib (2).

(2) See the art. of PELL (John), remark [B].

" In the next place, for the advancement of all
" mechanicall arts and manufactures, we wiſh that " there were erected a Gymnaſium Mechanicum, or
" a college of Trades-men, (or for more expedition,
" untill ſuch place could be built, that the moſt con" venient houſes for ſuch a purpoſe, may be either
" bought or hired,) wherein we would, that one at
" leaſt of every trade (but the prime, moſt ingenious
" workman, the moſt deſirous to improve his art)
" might be allowed therein a handſome dwell-
" ing rent-free, which with the credit of being ad" mitted into this ſociety, and the quick ſale,
" which certainly they would have of their commo" dities, when all men would repair thither, as to a " market of rare and exquiſite pieces of workman-
" ſhip, would be a ſufficient motive to attract the " very ableſt Mechanicks, and ſuch as we have deſ-
" cribed to deſire a Fellowſhip in this College.

" From this inſtitution we may clearly hope, when
" the excellent in all arts are not only neighbours,
" but intimate friends and brethren, united in a
" common deſire and zeal to promote them, that
" all trades will miraculouſly proſper, and new in" ventions would be more frequent then new faſhions
" of clothes and houſhold ſtuffe. Here would be the " beſt and moſt effectual opportunities and means for " writing a hiſtory of trades in perfection and exact-
" neſſe, and what experiments and ſtuffe would all
" thoſe ſhops and operations afford to active and " philoſophical heads, out of which to extract that " interpretation of nature, whereof there is ſo little,
" and that ſo bad, as yet extant in the world?

" Within the walls of this Gymnaſium or College,
" ſhould be a Noſocomium Academicum, according to
" the moſt exact and perfect idea thereof; a com-
" pleat Theatrum Botanicum; ſtalls and cages for all
" ſtrange beaſts and birds, with ponds and conſer-
" vatories for all exotic fiſhes. Here all animals,
" capable thereof, ſhould be made fit for ſome kind
" of labour and employment, that they may as well
" be of uſe living as dead. Here ſhould be a repo-
" ſitary of all kind of rarities, natural and artificial,
" pieces of antiquity, modells of all great and noble
" engines, with deſignes and platforms of gardens
" and buildings; the moſt artificiall fountains and
" water-works; a library of ſelect books; an aſtro-
" nomicall obſervatory for celeſtiall bodies and me-
" teors; large pieces of ground for ſeverall experi" ments of agriculture; galleries of the rareſt paint-
" ings and ſtatues; with the faireſt globes and geo-
" graphicall maps of the beſt deſcriptions. And ſo
" far as is poſſible, we would have this place to be
" the epitome or abſtract of the whole world; ſo
" that a man converſant within theſe walls, would " certainly prove a greater ſcholar, than the walking
" libraries ſo called, although he could neither write
" nor read. But if a child, before he learned to " read or write, were made acquainted with all " things and actions (as he might in this college,)
" how eaſily would he underſtand all good books afte-
" wards, and ſmell out the ſopperies of bad ones?"

Our Author next gives us a plan of the Noſocomium Academicum; and afterwards recommends the compiling of a work, whoſe title might juſtly be, Vellus aureum, ſive Facultatum Lucriferarum Deſcriptio magna; wherein all the practiſed ways of getting a ſubſiſtence, and whereby men raiſe their fortunes, may be at large declared. And among theſe we wiſh, that the Hiſtory of Arts or Manufactures might firſt be undertaken as the moſt pleaſant and profitable of all the reſt, wherein ſhould be deſcribed the whole proceſs of manual operations and applications of one natural thing (which we call the elements of artificials) to another, with the neceſſary inſtruments and machines, whereby every piece of work is elaborated and made to be what it is; unto which work bare words being not ſufficient, all inſtruments and tools muſt be pictured, and colours added, when the deſons concerned in the [C] recovery of one Anne Greene, who had been hanged at Oxford Caſtle on the 14th of that month, for the ſuppoſed murther of her baſtard child. In the beginning of January, 1650-1, he was unanimouſly elected Profeſſor of Anatomy at Oxford, upon the reſignation of Dr. Clayton; and ſoon after was made one of the College of Phyſicians at London, and Profeſſor of Muſic at Greſham College, which laſt he obtained by the intereſt of his dear friend Captain John Graunt [D] (e). Being now maſter of 500 l. 100 l. of which were allowed him to go to Ireland, he landed at Waterford in that Kingdom, on the 10th of September, the ſame year, and became ſcriptions cannot be made intelligible without them. This Hiſtory, ſays he, muſt not be made out of a Farrago of imperfect relations made to the compiler, either by too rude or couſening workmen; but all things thereunto appertaining muſt be by himſelfe obſerved and atteſted by the moſt judicious and candid of each reſpective profeſſion, as well to make the work the more authentick (it being to be the baſis of many future inferences and philoſophations) as the more clearly and diſtinctly to enforme the Compiler himſelf, by whoſe judgment as the alembick, and induſtry of fire, it is hoped, that the quinteſſence and magiſteries of all preſent inventions may be extracted, and new ones produced in abundance. Although it be intended to teach the making of all artificials; yet it is not to be underſtood, that when there hath been taught how to make a ſtoole or a naile of one faſhion, that the art of making a chaire or a naile of another faſhion ſhould be long inſiſted on. But the compiler ſhould ſtrive to reduce the making of all artificials in each trade to a certaine number and claſſes of operations, tools, and materials; neither need he to ſet the figures, or mention the names of all artificials that ever were made, but only of ſuch as are moſt knowne and of common uſe amongſt men. He needeth not to deſcribe every punctilio in making all the aforementioned particulars, and yet leave no more defects than may be ſupplied by every common underſtanding. For we queſtion whether, if he ſhould engage himſelfe in ſuch an endleſſe labour, a man by the bare light and inſtruction of the book could attaine to a dextrous practice of trade, whereunto hath been required ſeven yeares Autopſia; but are confident, that the help of this book will leſſen the former tædium by more than half. He ſhould not ſo abridge the work as not to diſtinguiſh between inſtruments of the ſame name; as between a loome to weave kerſies, and another wherein to weave ſilk ribbands or ſtockings. He ſhould all along give the mechanicall reaſon of every inſtrument, material, and operation, when the ſame is ſenſible and cleere. He ſhould all along note his own defects in ſetting down theſe hiſtories, in caſe he had not at the time of the writing thereof ſufficient information, and withal the deficiencies of the trades themſelves. Now whereas there be divers wayes and methods of working moſt manufactures, he ſhould in each thing ſtick cloſe to the way of ſome one maſter; but note all the diverſities he knoweth, and give his opinion of the uſe and goodneſs of each.

(e) Wood, ubi ſupra.

" Moreover the œconomy ſive Ars augendæ rei familiaris in all profeſſions ought to be enquired into, " viz. what ſeaſons of the yeare are moſt proper to " each work; which the beſt places and times to " buy materials, and to put off the Commodities " when finiſhed; how moſt thriftily to hire, enter- " taine, and overſee ſervants and workmen; how " to diſpoſe of every excrement and refuſe of mate- " rials, or of broken, worne, or otherwiſe unſer- " viceable tooles and utenſils; with all cauteles, im- " poſtures, and other ſleights good or bad, whereby " men uſe to over-reach one another.

" There ought to be added to this work many and " various indices, beſides the alphabetical ones; as " namely one of all the artificials mentioned in the " whole worke. Another of all the natural mate- " rials or elements of artificials uſed, from whence " they come, where to be had, and what are the or- " dinary and middle prices of them. Another of all " the qualities or ſchemes of matter, as of all li- " quifiable things, viſcid, friable, heavy, tranſpa- " rent, abſterſive, or otherwiſe qualified according to " all the claſſes of 1, 2, and 3 qualities, to the end " that materials for all inventions and experiments " may be at hand and in ſight. Another of all ope- " rations mentioned in the whole work, as ſawing, " hewing, filing, boring, melting, diſſolving, turn- " ing, beating, grinding, boyling, calcining, knit- " ting, ſpinning, ſewing, twiſting, &c. to the end " that they all may alſo be at hand for the purpoſes " aforeſaid. Another of all tooles and machines, " as files, ſawes, chiſſels, ſheeres, ſives, loomes, " ſhuttles, wheeles, wedges, knives, ſkrews, &c. for " the ſame purpoſe alſo.

" The Compiler ought to publiſh all his con- " jectures, how odd inventions may be perfected, " and new ones produced; giving directions how " to try the truth of them. So that by all thoſe, " unto whoſe hands theſe books ſhall come perchance, " all the ſaid ſuppoſitions may be tried, and the ſuc- " ceſſe reported to the Compiler himſelfe.

" The Compiler's firſt ſcope in inventions ſhall " bee, how to apply all materials that grow in abun- " dance in this kingdome, and whereof but inconſi- " derable uſe and profits are as yet made, to more " advantage to the Commonwealth; and alſo how " all impotents, whether onely blind, or onely lame, " and all children of above ſeven years old, might " earne their bread, and not be ſo long burthen- " ſome to their parents and others.

" There ſhould be made a Preface to the work to " teach men how to make the moſt of experiments, " and to record the ſucceſſes of them whatſoever, " whether according to hopes or no, all being e- " qually luciferous, although not equally lucriferous.

" There ought to be much artifice uſed, that all " the aforementioned indices may handſomely re- " ferre one to another; that all things contained in " the whole book may be moſt eaſily found, and " moſt readily attend the ſeekers of new inven- " tions.

" The way to accompliſh this worke muſt be to " enquire what to this purpoſe is already done, or in " hand, in all places, and alſo by whom; ſo that " communication of Counſels and proceedings may " (if poſſible) be had with thoſe undertakers.

" All bookes of this ſubject already extant in " print muſt be collected and bought, not to tranſ- " cribe them, but to examine them per Autopſiam, and " re-experiment the experiments contained in them; " and withall to give hints of new enquiries.

" The Compiler muſt be content to devote his " whole life to this employment; one, who (as we " ſaid before) hath the fire of induſtry, and the " alembick of a curious and rational head, to extract " the quinteſſence of whatſoever he ſeeth.

" He ſhould be as young as ſufficient abilities will " admit, to the end that he may with the concur- " rence of God's ordinary providence either finiſh or " very farre advance the worke, while he liveth; " and alſo that living long in that employment, he " may heap up the larger ſtock of experiments; " which how much the greater it is in one man, " affordeth ſo much the more hopes of new in- " ventions."

[C] Concerned in the recovery of Anne Greene, who had been hanged, &c.] The reader may ſee a particular account of this extraordinary accident in a pamphlet printed at Oxford 1651, with this title. News from the dead: or a true and exact Narration of the miraculous deliverance of Anne Greene, who being executed at Oxford December 14, 1650, afterwards revived; and by the care of certain Phyſicians there ſhe is now perfectly recovered. Together with the manner of her ſuffering, and the particular means uſed for her recovery. Written by a ſcholar in Oxford for the ſatisfaction of a friend, who deſired to be informed concerning the truth of the buſineſs. Whereunto are annexed certain Poems caſually written on that ſubject.

[D] His dear friend Captain John Graunt.] We ſhall take this opportunity to add here a remark to the article, which we have already given of that ingenious Writer. Biſhop Burnet (3) ſpeaking of the Fire of London, writes thus: The moſt extraordinary became Phyſician to the army, with the allowance of 20 ſhillings a day, in which place he continued till June 1659, gaining by his practice about 400 l. per ann. above the ſaid ſalary. About September 1654, perceiving, that the admeaſurements of the lands in Ireland forfeited on account of the Rebellion in 1641, and intended to regulate the ſatiſfaction of the ſoldiers, who had ſuppreſſed the ſame, was moſt inſufficiently and abſurdly managed, he obtained a contract dated December 11 the ſame year for making the ſaid admeaſurements; which he performed in ſuch a manner, that he gained about 9000 l. thereby, which with the 500 l. abovementioned, with his ſalary of 20 s. per diem, and the benefit of his practice, together with 600 l. more for directing an after-ſurvey of the adventurer's lands, and 800 l. more for two years ſalary as Clerk of the Council, raiſed him an eſtate of about 13000 l. in ready and real money. Part of this money he beſtowed in ſoldier's debentures, part in purchaſing the Earl of Arundel's houſe in Lothbury London, and part he kept in caſh to anſwer emergencies. He purchaſed lands in Ireland, great part of which were loſt by the Court of Innocents in 1663 (f). In January 1658 he was elected one of the Burgeſſes for Weſtlow in Cornwall, to ſerve in Richard Cromwell's Parliament, which began at Weſtminſter on the 27th of that month. But that Parliament being ſoon diſſolved, he went again into Ireland, where he had a great conteſt with Sir Hierom Sankey [E]. Returning after the Reſtoration, he was introduced to King Charles II. who was highly pleaſed with his ingenious diſcourſe, and on the 11th of April 1661 knighted him, and afterwards, as it was reported, deſigned to create him Earl of Kilmore in Ireland. Upon the eſtabliſhment of the Royal Society, he was appointed one of its firſt Members, and afterwards one of the Council belonging to it (g). In 1662 he publiſhed a Treatiſe of Taxes and Contributions [F]. In the beginning of 1663 he was greatly applauded in Ireland for the ſucceſs of his new invention of a double-bottom'd ſhip [G]. Beſides the tracts above-mentioned, he wrote ſeveral other works.

(3) Hiſtory of his own Time, vol. I.

(f) See his Will.

(g) Wood, ubi ſupra.

paſſage, though it is but a preſumption, was told me by Dr. Lloyd (4) and the Counteſs of Clarendon. The latter had a great eſtate in the New River, that is brought from Ware to London, which is brought together at Iſlington, where there is a great room full of pipes, that convey it through all the ſtreets of London. The conſtant order of that water was, to ſet the pipes a running on Saturday-night, that ſo the ciſterns might be all full by Sunday-morning; there being a more than ordinary conſumption of water that day. There was one Graunt, a Papiſt, under whoſe name Sir William Petty publiſhed his Obſervations on the Bills of Mortality. He had ſome time before applied himſelf to Lloyd, who had great credit with the Counteſs of Clarendon; and ſaid, he could raiſe that eſtate conſiderably, if ſhe would make him a Truſtee for her. His ſchemes were probable; and he was made one of the Board, that governed that matter; and by that he had a right to come as oft as he pleaſed, to view their works at Iſlington. He went thither the Saturday before the fire broke out; and calling for the key of the place, where the heads of the pipes were, he turned all the cocks that were then open, and ſtopt the water, and then went away, and carried the keys with him. So when the fire broke out next morning, they opened the pipes in the ſtreets to find water, but there was none. And ſome hours were loſt in ſending to Iſlington, where the door was to be broke open, and the cocks turned. And it was long before the water got to London. Graunt indeed denied, that he had turned the cocks; but the officer of the works affirmed, that he had, according to order, ſet them all a running; and that no perſon had got the keys from him beſides Graunt, who confeſſed that he had carried away the keys, but pretended he did it without deſign. Mr. William Maitland, F. R. S. in order to inform himſelf concerning the truth of this account, applied himſelf, as he tells us (5), to the Governor and Company of the New River, who ordered their minute-book to be communicated to him, from which it appears, that at a General Court of the ſaid Company held at Mr. Clifton's in Covent-Garden, on the 25th of September 1666, John Graunt, Eſq; was firſt admitted a Member of the ſaid New River Company (in the room of Alexander Broom deceaſed) in truſt for one of the ſhares belonging to Sir William Backhouſe, Knight, who dying in the year 1669, Dame Flower Backhouſe (probably his relict (6), became poſſeſſed of nine of his ſhares; and on the 12th of November the ſame year ſhe appointed Mr. Graunt one of her Truſtees in the ſaid Company. "Whereby it is manifeſt, ſays Mr. "Maitland, that the above recited relation, which "the Biſhop had of Dr. Lloyd and the Counteſs of "Clarendon, has not the leaſt foundation. For by "what has been ſaid it is evident, that Mr. Graunt "was not admitted into the government of the New "River Company till twenty three days after the "breaking out of the Fire of London; and then "put in truſt by the above named Sir William Backhouſe; whoſe relict, daughter, relation, or name-ſake, the abovementioned Dame Flower Backhouſe, "was ſome time after married to Henry Lord Cornbury, eldeſt ſon to the Earl of Clarendon; and who "by right of his ſaid Lady was firſt admitted a "Member of the ſaid Company on the 10th of No-"vember in the year 1670, and afterwards as Earl "of Clarendon, on the 9th of November 1676, be-"ing the firſt of that family, that ever was con-"cerned in the New River Company."

(4) Dr. William Lloyd, Biſhop of Worceſter.

(5) Hiſtory of London, b. 1. c. 3+. p. 291.

(6) She was his widow, as appears from Wood's Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 290. 2d edit.

[E] Where he had a great conteſt with Sir Hierom Sankey.] This Sir Hierom Sankey or Zanchy preferred ſix articles againſt our Author relating to his conduct in Ireland: 1. That he the ſaid Dr. Petty had received great bribes. 2. That he had made a trade of buying debentures in vaſt numbers againſt the Statute. 3. That he had gotten vaſt ſums of money and ſcopes of land by fraud. 4. That he had uſed many foul practices as Surveyor and Commiſſioner for ſetting out lands. 5. That he and his Fellow-Commiſſioners had placed ſome debentures in better places than they could claim, denying right to others. 6. That he and his Fellow-Commiſſioners had totally diſpoſed of the army's ſecurity; the debt ſtill remaining chargeable on the State. The Reader may ſee further concerning this affair in A Brief of Proceedings between Sir Hierome Sanky and Dr. Petty, with the State of the Controverſy between them. London 1659, in folio; and Reflections upon ſome Perſons and Things in Ireland, by Letters to and from Dr. Petty; with Sir Hierome Sankey's Speech in Parliament. London 1660, in 8vo.

[F] In 1662 he publiſhed a Treatiſe of Taxes and Contributions.] It was printed under this title, A Treatiſe of Taxes and Contributions; ſhewing the Nature and Meaſures of Crown-Lands, Aſſeſſments, Cuſtoms, Poll-monies, Lotteries, Benevolence, &c. London 1662 and 1667, in 4to.

[G] His new invention of a double-bottomed ſhip.] In July 1663, when firſt this ſhip adventured from Dublin to Holyhead, ſhe ſtaid there many days before her return; "and it was pleaſant, ſays Mr. Wood "(7), to conſider how her adverſaries inſulted, and "having firſt eſtabliſhed the concluſion, that ſhe was "caſt away, did afterwards diſcourſe the ſeveral ne-"ceſſities why it ſhould be ſo. Some ſaid, it was "impoſſible her maſt could be ſufficiently planted "againſt a ſtrong gale; others ſaid ſhe was gone "to land at O. Braſil. But her return in triumph "with works [H]. He died at his houſe in Piccadilly-ſtreet, almoſt oppoſite to St. James's Church, within the liberty of Weſtminſter, of a gangrene in the foot, occaſioned by the ſwelling of the gout, on the 16th of December 1687; and his body was interred at Romſey, his native town, near thoſe of his father and mother. By his wife Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Hardreſs Waller, Knight, and Relict of Sir Maurice Fenton, he had iſſue two ſons, viz. Charles, created Baron of Shelborne in Ireland ſoon after his father's death, and Henry, and a daughter named Anne. He had alſo a natural daughter extremely like him in perſon, who was an actreſs in the Duke's Theatre in 1680 and afterwards. He wrote a life of himſelf, which, after his death, came into the hands of his brother-in-law Waller (b). In his laſt will he obſerves, that his real eſtate might be 6500 l. per ann. his perſonal eſtate about 45000 l. his bad and deſperate debts 3000 l. and the demonſtrable improvements of his Iriſh eſtate 4000 l. per ann. in all 15000 l. per ann. And with regard to his religion he expreſſes himſelf thus: "As for religion, I die "in the profeſſion of that faith and in the practice of ſuch worſhip as I find eſtabliſhed "by the law of my country, not being able to believe what I myſelf pleaſe, nor wor- "ſhip God better than by doing as I would be done unto, and obſerving the laws of "my country, and expreſſing my love and honour to Almighty God by ſuch ſigns and "tokens

(7) Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 808.

(b) Wood, ibid. col. 807—811.

"with theſe viſible advantages above other veſſels "did check the deriſion of ſome, and becalmed the "violence of others; the firſt point being clearly "gained, that ſhe could bear the ſeas. She then "turned in againſt wind into that narrow Harbour "(Holyhead) amongſt the rocks and ſhips, with "ſuch dexterity, as many antient ſeamen did then "confeſs they had never ſeen the like. About "ſame time Thomas Earl of Oſſory and other perſons "of honour were embarked in her, and drove to "and again within the Bar near Dublin. It then "blew very hard, inſomuch that a ſmall Holland "veſſel, famous for a good ſailor, which ſet ſail "with her, was in appearance after looked upon to "be overſet, whilſt ſhe inclined not above half a "foot to one ſide more than another, ſo that "it was truly then called the pad of the ſea. It ap- "peared very much to excel all other forms of ſhips "in ſailing, in carriage, in ſecurity, and many o- "ther ſuch benefits; but at length in its return home "from a certain voyage, it was deſtroyed by a com- "mon fate, and by ſuch a dreadful tempeſt, as over- "whelmed a great fleet the ſame night. So that "the antient fabrick of ſhips had no reaſon to tri- "umph over that new model, when of ſeventy ſail "that were in the ſtorm, there was not one eſcaped "to bring the news. In a word, though this in- "vention ſucceeded not, while it was only ſupported "by private purſes, it will (as one (8) obſerves) un- "doubtedly produce great effects, if ever it ſhall be re- "trived upon the publick ſtock of the nation." Sir William Petty gave a model of this ſhip made with his own hand to the Royal Society, and it is now in their Muſæum.

(8) Tho. Sprat, in The Hiſtory of the Royal Society, Lond. 1667, in 4to. part. 2. p. 240.

[H] Several other works.] They are as follow. I. A Diſcourſe made before the Royal Society, 26 Nov. 1674. concerning the uſe of duplicate proportion in ſundry important particulars. London 1674, in 12mo. See the Philoſophical Tranſactions, num. 109. p. 209. There is a ſevere cenſure of this diſcourſe, written by Dr. Tho. Barlow, Biſhop of Lincoln, printed in his Genuine Remains, p. 151. & ſeqq. Edit. London 1693, in 8vo. II. A new Hypotheſis of ſpringing, or elaſtic motion: printed at the end of the preceding diſcourſe. III. An Apparatus to the Hiſtory of the common practices of Dying. See Sprat's Hiſtory of the Royal Society, Part II. p. 284, &c. Edit. London 1667. IV. A Treatiſe about the building of Ships. It was preſented by the Author in manuſcript to the Royal Society about 1665, contained in about a quire of paper of his own writing. But William Lord Brouncker, Preſident of that Society, took it away, and kept it in his poſſeſſion till 1682, and afterwards, perhaps to the time of his death, ſaying that it was too great an Arcanum of State to be commonly peruſed. The Author had no copy of it by him, but there was one in the hands of Dr. Robert Wood, who lived in Ireland (9). V. Colloquium Davidis cum Animâ ſuâ (accinente paraphraſin in 134 Pſalmum) de magnalibus Dei. London 1679, in two ſheets in fol. This piece, which is in Hexameter Verſe, was compoſed by the Author March 25, 1678, under the name of Caſſid. Aureus Minutius. VI. Political Arithmetic; or a Diſcourſe concerning the Extent of Land, People, Buildings, Huſbandry, Manufacture, Commerce, Fiſhery, Artizans, Seamen, Soldiers, Publick Revenues, Intereſt, Taxes, Superlucration, Regiſtries, Banks, valuation of Men, increaſing of Seamen, of Militias, Harbours, Situation, Shipping, Power at Sea, &c. as the ſame relates to every country in general, but more particularly to the territories of his Majeſty of Great Britain, and his neighbours of Holland, Zealand, and France. This was preſented in manuſcript to King Charles II. but was not printed till the year 1690, in 8vo. The Lord Sherborne, our Author's ſon, in his Dedication of this book, obſerves, that it was "by him ſtyled "Political Arithmetic, inaſmuch as things of Govern- "ment, and of no leſs concern and extent than the "glory of the Prince and the happineſs and great- "neſs of the people, are by the ordinary rules of "arithmetic brought into a ſort of demonſtration. "He was allowed by all to be the inventor of this "method of inſtruction, where the perplexed and "intricate ways of the world are explained by a ve- "ry mean piece of ſcience; and had not the Doc- "trines of this Eſſay offended France, they had long "ſince ſeen the light, and had found followers, "as well as improvements before this time, to the "advantage, perhaps, of mankind." In the firſt Chapter, our Author endeavours to ſhew, that a ſmall country, and a few people, may by their ſituation, trade, and policy, be equivalent in wealth and ſtrength, to a far greater people and territory; and particularly, how conveniences for ſhipping and water-carriage do moſt eminently and fundamentally conduce thereto. In the ſecond Chapter, he ſhews, that ſome kind of taxes, and publick levies, may rather increaſe than diminiſh the Common-wealth. In the third Chapter, that France cannot, by reaſon of natural and perpetual impediments, be more powerful at ſea, than the Engliſh or Hollanders. In the fourth, that the people and territories of the King of England are naturally near as conſiderable for wealth and ſtrength, as thoſe of France. In the fifth, that the impediments of England's greatneſs, are but contingent and removeable. In the ſixth, that the power and wealth of England had increaſed for above forty years before. In the ſeventh, that one tenth part of the whole expence of the King of England's ſubject is ſufficient to maintain one hundred thouſand foot, thirty thouſand horſe, and forty thouſand men at ſea; and to defray all other charges of the Government, both ordinary and extraordinary, if the ſame were regularly taxed and raiſed. In the eighth, that there are ſpare hands enough among the King of England's ſubjects, to earn two millions per ann. more than they now do; and that there are employments ready, proper, and ſufficient for that purpoſe. In the ninth, that there is money ſufficient to drive the trade of the nation. In the tenth, that the King of England's ſubjects have ſtock ſufficient and convenient to drive the trade of the whole commercial world. VII. Another Eſſay of Political Arithmetic, concerning the Growth of the City of London, with the Meaſures, Periods, Cauſes, and Conſequences thereof, Ann. 1682. London 1683 and 1686, in 8vo. The principal points of this diſcourſe are, 1. That London doubles in forty years, and all England

(9) Wood, ubi ſupra, col. 809.

" tokens as are underſtood to be ſuch by the people, with whom I live, God knowing " my heart even without any. And thus begging his divine Majeſty to make me what " he would have me to be both as to faith and good works, I willingly reſign my ſoul " into his hands, relying only upon his infinite mercy and the mercies of our Saviour, " for my happineſs after this life, where I expect to know and ſee God more clearly than " by the ſtudy of the Scriptures and of his works I have hitherto been able to do. " Grant me, O Lord, an eaſy paſſage in thyſelf, that as I have lived in thy fear, I " may be known to die in thy favour. Amen."

land in three hundred and ſixty years. 2. That there were, anno 1682, about ſix hundred and ſeventy thouſand ſouls in London; and about ſeven millions four hundred thouſand in all England and Wales, about twenty eight millions of acres of profitable land. 3. That the periods of doubling the people, are found to be in all degrees, from between ten to twelve hundred years. 4. That the growth of London muſt ſtop of itſelf before the year 1800. 5. A table, helping to underſtand the ſcriptures, concerning the number of people mentioned in them. 6. That the world will be fully peopled within the next two thouſand years. 7. Twelve ways whereby to try any propoſal pretended for the public good. 8. How the City of London may be made, morally ſpeaking, invincible. 8. An help to uniformity in religion. 10. That it is poſſible to increaſe mankind by generation, four times more than preſent. 11. The plagues of London are the chief impediment and objection againſt the growth of the city. 12. That an exact account of the people is neceſſary in this matter. VIII. Obſervations upon the Dublin Bills of Mortality, 1681, and the State of that City. London 1683, in 8vo. IX. Maps of Ireland, being his actual ſurvey of that whole Kingdom, publiſhed in folio, in 1685. X. Eſſay concerning the Multiplication of Mankind. London 1686, in 8vo. With this was printed the ſecond edition of Another Eſſay in Political Arithmetic. XI. Further Obſervations upon the Dublin Bills; or Accounts of the Houſes, Hearths, Baptiſms, and Burials in that City. London 1686, in 8vo. XII. Two Eſſays in Political Arithmetic, concerning the People, Houſing, Hoſpitals, &c. of London and Paris: with Obſervations upon the Cities of London and Rome. London 1687, in 8vo. In the firſt Eſſay, he endeavours to prove, that London hath more people and houſing than the Cities of Paris and Rouen put together; and is alſo more conſiderable in ſeveral other reſpects. In the ſecond, he attempts to ſhew, that in the hoſpital called L'Hoſtel Dieu, at Paris, there die three thouſand per annum, by reaſon of ill accommodation. XIII. Five Eſſays in Political Arithmetic: viz. 1. Objections from the City of Rey in Perſia, and from Monſieur Auzout, againſt two former Eſſays, anſwered, and that London hath as many people as Paris, Rome, and Rouen put together. 2. A Compariſon between London and Paris, in fourteen Particulars. 3. Proofs that London, within its 134 Pariſhes, named in the Bills of Mortality, there live about nine hundred ninety ſix thouſand people. 4. An Eſtimate of the People in London, Paris, Amſterdam, Venice, Rome, Dublin, Briſtol and Rouen, with ſeveral Obſervations upon the ſame. 5. Concerning Holland, and the reſt of the ſeven United Provinces. XIV. A Treatiſe of Taxes and Contributions, particularly fitted for the State of Ireland. London 1691, in 4to, printed in a book, intitled, A Collection of three State Tracts, &c. XV. A Treatiſe of Naval Philoſophy, &c. London 1691, in 8vo. XVI. The Political Anatomy of Ireland, &c. London 1692, in 8vo. XVII. Verbum Sapienti: or, An Account of the Wealth and Extence of England, &c. London 1691, in 8vo. This is animadverted on in a pamphlet, intitled, A Letter from a Gentleman in the Country, to his Friend in the City, &c. London 1692, in 4to. XVIII. In the Philoſophical Tranſactions, he has the following pieces: viz. 1. Experiments to be made relating to Land-Carriage. N°. 161. p. 666. 2. Some Queries whereby to examine Mineral Waters. N°. 166. p. 802. 3. A Miſcellaneous Catalogue of mean, vulgar, cheap, and ſimple Experiments. N°. 167. p. 849. 4. An Extract of two Eſſays in Political Arithmetic, concerning the comparative Magnitude of London and Paris. No. 183. p. 152. 5. A further Aſſertion of the Propoſitions concerning the Magnitude, &c. of London, contained in two Paſſages, &c. together with a Vindication of the ſaid Eſſays, from the Objections of ſome learned Perſons of the French Nation. No. 185. p. 237. 6. What a complete Treatiſe of Navigation ſhould contain, drawn up in the year 1685. N°. 198. T.

PEYRAREDE (JOHN DE), a Gentleman of Gaſcony (a) and a Proteſtant [A], wrote good Latin verſes, and underſtood the art of criticiſm very well. He made himſelf known at Paris towards the beginning of Lewis the XIV.'s reign. He publiſhed obſervations on Terence, and Hemiſtichs to fill up the imperfect lines in Virgil's Æneis, to which he added ſome verſes. He dedicated this work to the Queen of Sweden (b). His emendations and critical conjectures on Florus deſerved the approbation of La Mothe le Vayer, who followed them pretty often, and has quoted him with commendations [B]. He is ſometimes mentioned in Balzac's letters. I ſhall tranſcribe a paſſage from them which is very much to his honour [C]. We find in a letter, which he wrote from Paris

(a) He called himſelf Nobilis Aquitanus, in his works, as the Abbé de Marolles obſerves in his Denombrement des Auteurs qui l'ont obligé, i. e. " A Cata- " logue of the " Authors who " obliged him."

(b) See l'Abbé de Marolles, ib.

[A] A Proteſtant.] He was one even ſo far as to be ſcrupulouſly zealous, if we may form conjectures from a letter of Monſieur Balzac to Monſieur Conrart. But who told you, ſays he to him (1), that I have an antipathy againſt the Huguenots? It cannot be neither Monſieur Conrart, nor Salmaſius, nor Monſieur Daillé, whom I have ſo much commended, and ſo much celebrated; whom I love and eſteem moſt particularly, of which I have made ſo publick a profeſſion. It muſt be, no doubt, that the honeſt Monſieur de Peyrarede would make no difference between an inoffenſive raillery, and what is ſaid ſeriouſly, and that amidſt the freedom of converſation he put a criminal conſtruction on ſome words which came from an innocent intention. Without entering deeper upon this ſubject, I proteſt to you, dear Sir, that I have no greater averſion for the Huguenots, than you have for the Catholicks.

(1) Balzac, Lettre premiere à Conrart, Liv. 1. p. m. 25, 26.

[B] La Mothe le Vayer . . . . has quoted him with commendations.] " I have followed the interpretation " of the learned Monſieur Peyrarede," ſays he in his notes on the 19th chapter of the 2d book of Florus (2). In another place he makes uſe of an epithet which is more honourable ſtill. Theſe words, ſays he (3), are very dark, I have explained them according to the expoſition of the illuſtrious Monſieur Peyrarede. The Abbé de Marolles quotes him often in his remarks on Statius.

(2) See Mothe le Vayer, Remarques ſur Florus, p. 910. See alſo p. 842.

(3) Ibid. p. 933.

[C] I ſhall quote a paſſage which is very much to his honour.] " Laſt Friday's Mail brought me ſome " news from our Monſieur de Peyrarede. Do you " know that his name is already very famous at " Paris, and that the Celtæ have the Aquitanians in " admiration? Or, if you would have me ſay it after " another manner, and ſpeak it poetically of a Poet, " the God of the River Seine wonders to hear the " Muſes of the Dordonne ſing ſo well. For my " part, I am contented with their laſt work, and if " the ſouls of the bleſſed could be raiſed by the " charms of beautiful lines, I do not queſtion but the " Duke of Brezé would come down from Heaven " the moment one ſhould rehearſe to him the fol- " lowing lines:

" Tu

ris April 20, 1641, to Iſaac Voſſius (c), that he began to percieve the infirmities of old age, and that during thirty years he had been overwhelmed with misfortunes, or buſy with improving his eſtate. It appears from that letter that he had a ſon.

(c) It is the 324th of thoſe which were written to John Gerard Voſſius.

" Tu nube ſerena
" Stellato fulgens apice, et radiante corona,
" Ad tua Sacra veni, quæ multo Regia luctu
" Concelebrat, Sacrique Chori, Sanctuſque Senatus, &c.
" Aſpice ut ipſa gemens, ingenti affixa feretro,
" Horridaque et laceris luget Victoria pennis,
" Quæ quondam tua caſtra, tuas comitata triremes,
" Deſeruit tua ſigna ſemel: nunc cædis acerbæ
" Invidiam lenire velit ; fatiſque malignis
" Imputat, infandæ excuſat crimina cladis, &c.

i. e. " Did you ever read any thing more noble and " more moving than this poor Goddeſs's victory, " afflicted for the death of that brave Duke? What " a moving ſcene is it to behold her with her gar- " ments torn, and her wings broke, doing penance " for the fault ſhe imagined ſhe had committed ; to " ſee her tied, and as it were nailed to that large " coffin, which ſhe waſhes with her tears! ſhe is " inconſolable for the misfortune which happened " at Orbitello, ſhe wiſhes ſhe could lay the blame of " it on ill fate ; ſhe &c. (4)." This is what Monſieur Balzac wrote December the 4th 1646.

(4) Balzac, Lettres Choiſies, part. 2. liv. 3. Lett. 37. p. m. 378.

PEYRE (JAMES D' AUZOLES (a) LA), a Gentleman of Auvergne (b), and one of the moſt ridiculous Writers of the 17th Century, tells us in the beginning of one of his books, that he was the ſon of Peter d'Auzoles and of Mary Fabri of Auvergne, He did not deſerve to be refuted by learned men, and yet he had that honour [A]. He is ſoundly ridiculed in a work of Monſieur Baillet (c), where he mentions a book, which la Peyre entitled Anti-Babau (d). He died of an apoplectick fit at Paris the 19th of May 1642 (e). I have mentioned ſomething of him in the article Balzac (f), and I ſhall give hereunder an inſtance of the ſhallowneſs of his wit [B].

(a) It is not true that his name was d'Auzoles la Reine, as is aſſerted in Moreri.

(b) Nobilis Avernas. Ludov. Jacob. Biblioth. Pontific. p. 343.

(c) In his Anti's, art. 155.

(d) It is an anſwer to a letter of Father Bolduc.

(e) Ludov. Jacob, Biblioth. Pontific. p. 343. But Peter de St. Romuald, Journal Chronol. tom. 1. p. 619, aſſerts, that he died of a malignant fever, June the 30th.

(f) Quotat. (43).

[A] He did not deſerve to be refuted by learned men, and yet he has had that honour.] His little book, de la vie perdurable de Melchiſedech (of Melchizedech's long Life,) printed in the year 1622, was refuted by the Jeſuit Salian : his Jobe, printed the next year, was refuted by the Capuchin Bolduc, and by the Jeſuit Petavius (1). He ought to have thanked that Jeſuit, and not to have been ſo imprudent as to attack him in a work of Chronology, which he intitled Diſciple des tems, (the Diſciple of the Times.) It is he who is meant, though his name be not mentioned, in the Preface to the 2d part of Petavius's Rationarium temporis, where it is obſerved, that of ſo many works of Chronology, which had been publiſhed till that time, there were none more wretched than that which is intitled Sainte Chronologie (the Holy Chronology). La Peyre was the Author of it, and alſo of a ſmall folio, printed in the year 1629, with this title. La Sainte Geographie, c'eſt à dire, exacte Deſcription de la Terre, & veritable Demonſtration du Paradis terreſtre. i. e. " The holy Geography, that is to ſay, an accurate " deſcription of the earth, and a true demonſtration " of the terreſtrial Paradiſe." I wonder Voſſius did not put this Author in his long liſt of Chronologers.

(1) See Monſieur Baillet's Anti's. artic. 155.

[B] I ſhall give an inſtance of the ſhallowneſs of his wit.] The Abbé de Marolles affords it me. Monſieur le Febvre Chantereau, ſays he (2), aſſerts, that the common method of computing the years of our Lord is the beſt, and preferable to any other, againſt the opinion of Scaliger, Petavius, and others, who reckon a few years more, or ſuppoſe a few leſs: and as I obſerved, that he commended, in this reſpect, the late Monſieur de la Peyre, James D'Auzoles, with whom I have alſo been very much acquainted, I wondered a little at it, becauſe this good man, though he ſtudied with a great deal of application, yet had not a wonderful genius : which I could eaſily find out, by the opinion he entertained, that one might make the year to conſiſt of but three hundred and ſixty-four days, inſtead of three hundred and ſixty-five and ſomething more, that it might always begin with a Sunday, and end always with a Saturday. To ſpeak the truth, he muſt not have underſtood his ſcience wonderfully well ; for if his opinion herein were followed, the month of January would ſoon fall on the time when Auguſt ſhould be ; becauſe the year would always be a day and ſome hours too ſhort ; which being loſt of courſe in the months, they muſt unavoidably change their proper ſeaſon. But he could never underſtand this, and fell into a ſtrange paſſion ; whence I inferred, that Monſieur de la Peyre was not ſo wonderfully ſkilled, as he imagined, in the ſcience which he profeſſed. He practiſed ſometimes in his controverſies, what is uſually done in ſummons, among thoſe who are at law together ; I mean, that he ſet down very accurately the place of his abode. He dated his Anti-Babau from Paris, at Mr. Conturier's, an honeſt man, and a man of honour, at whoſe houſe he lodged, the 5th of Auguſt, 1631 (3). Does not this ſhew moſt plainly, that he had but a very ſhallow wit?

(2) Marolles, Mémoires, p. 271, 272.

(1) Baillet, in his Anti's, art. 155.

PEYRERE (ISAAC LA), a native of Bourdeaux, has made himſelf famous by his treatiſe of the Præadamites, which was printed in Holland in the year 1655 [A], and which a crowd of Authors refuted immediately [B]. He was then a Proteſtant, and had a poſt in the Prince of Condé's family. Though he did not put his name to that work, yet

[A] His Treatiſe of the Præadamites, which was printed in Holland in the year 1655 (1).] Heidanus was charged with having been concerned in the printing of that book, but he cleared himſelf, and the accuſer never dared to reply : I learn this particular from Petrus ab Andlo. Ignorantiam Mareſii ſequitur ejus effrons et immane mendacium, quavis pœna digniſſimum. Eum ſcilicet qui familiam ducit inter hodiernos Carteſianos, obſtetricatum fuiſſe Editioni Libri de Præadamitis inſcripti. Sed cum vir ille doctiſſimus deteſtandam hanc calumniam publicè à ſe ſit amolitus in parte ſecunda ſuarum Conſiderationum de Sabbatho et Die Dominica, pag. 3. Nec ille, qui, ut inquit Marcſius, olim per indirectum id exprobraverat, cujus Gonorrhœam et profluvia hic lambere ac reſorbere voluit noſter, quicquam reſpondere potuerit, hoc maledicentiſſimæ linguæ ſpiculum inter ſcuta rejiceremus, niſi dudum in auctoris caput recidiſſet cum immortali ejus ignominia (2). You will meet with the ſcheme of the book concerning the Præadamites, in the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary.

(1) Obſerve that I have ſeen in the catalogue of a library, which was ſold at Leyden October the 1ſt, 1696, that book of the Præadamites, as tho' it had been printed, and theſe words are added, editio optima, beſt edition, 1653, 8vo.

(2) Petrus ab Andlo, Anim. ad Vindicias Diſſertat. p. 10.

[B] . . . . . and which a crowd of Authors refuted immediately.] The Author of the Supplement to Moreri names but four perſons (3), who wrote againſt the Syſtem of the Præadamites. Here follows a more complete catalogue of them. John Conrad Dannhawerus, Profeſſor of Divinity at Straſburg, publiſhed there, Præadamita mutis, ſive fabula primorum hominum ante Adamum conditorum exploſa. John Micrælius, Profeſſor of Philoſophy, and Principal of the College at Stetin, wrote a work againſt la Peyrere (4). John Henry Urſinus publiſhed at Francfort Novus Prometheus Præadamitarum plaſtes ad Caucaſum relegatus et religatus. Samuel des Marets, Profeſſor of Divinity at Groningen, publiſhed there, Refutatio Fabulæ Præadamiticæ abſoluta ſeptem prioribus quæſtionibus cum Præfatione Apologetica pro αὐθεντία ſacræ Scripturæ. John Helpert, Profeſſor at Helmſtat, cauſed to be printed

(3) Monſieur Morin (it is Morin the Aſtrologer) Anthony Hulſe, Author of the Nonens Præadamiticum, J. Pythius, and J. Helpert.

(4) It was printed at Stetin.

yet he was known to be the Author of it, which was the reaſon why he was impriſoned in the Spaniſh Low-countries [C]. He knew of no better method to get out of trouble, than by imputing his Doctrines to the Principles of the Proteſtants, and by promiſing to go to Maſs. He went to Rome, where he was kindly received by Alexander VII. (a). He publiſhed, according to cuſtom, the reaſons which determined him to change his religion. Some Roman Catholicks laughed at them [D]. He lived retired the latter part of his life (b). He had been in Denmark, among the attendants of Monſieur de la Thuillerie the French Embaſſador, and wrote there two relations which have been publiſhed [E]. He is mentioned in the Menagiana [F], as you will ſee hereunder. A fragment from a letter, which I ſhall tranſcribe, will acquaint the Reader with ſome particulars, which are very curious [G].

(a) See the rem. [C].

(b) See the rem. [F].

PEZELIUS

printed at Amſterdam, Diſquiſitio de Præadamitis. Anthony Hulſius's Non ens Præadamiticum, was printed by John Elzevier at Leyden. Philip le Prieur publiſhed at Paris, Animadverſiones in Librum Præadamitarum, and took the name of Euſebius Romanus. All the books I have been mentioning, were printed in the year 1656, as Thomas Bangius obſerves (5), who adds, that La Peyrere ſhewed him his manuſcript at Copenhagen, in the year 1645. Neutiquam tamen, continues he, perſuadere nobis unquam potuimus, eò temeritatis dilapſurum virum alias humanum & ingenioſum, ut hoc commentum publicis typis excudendum daret, niſi res ipſa noſtris oculis expoſita fuiſſet, i. e. "I could never "have thought, that this man, otherwiſe honeſt and "ingenious, would have come to that degree of raſh- "neſs, as to print that romance, had I not ſeen it "with my own eyes." Crenius obſerves (6), that Calovius and Schotanus have ſtrongly argued againſt the Præadamitical Hypotheſis, the former in the 3d volume of his Common places, the latter in his Bibliotheque of the Sacred Hiſtory. He obſerves alſo (7), that in John Urſinus's edition of the Prometheus Præadamitarum, we meet with Doctiſſimorum quorundam Gallorum in Librum de Præadamitis Notæ cenſoriæ, and (8) that Philip le Prieur gave another edition of his work at Paris, in the year 1658, in which he commends his antagoniſt for embracing the Roman Catholick Religion. Bangius does not mention a treatiſe printed at Leyden in 1658, with this title, Reſponſio exetaſtica ad Tractatum incerto autore nuper editum cui titulus Præadamitæ. Autore J. Pythio Miniſtro Jeſu Chriſti in Swartewael.

(5) Thomas Bangius, in Cœlo Orientis, Exercit. 2. Quæſt. 8. p. 134. apud Thomam Crenium, Faſce 2. Exercit. Philologico-Hiſtoricarum, p. 13.

(6) Thomas Crenius, ibid.

(7) Idem, ibid. p. 8.

(8) Idem, ibid. p. 10.

[C] He was impriſoned in the Spaniſh Low-countries.] "In the year 1655, the Biſhop of Namure publiſhed "a Cenſure of the book of the Præadamites, written "by the Sieur la Peyrere, but yet without naming "him, becauſe he had not declared himſelf the Au- "thor of it, though it was but too well known. But "he met with a much worſe uſage on the ſame ac- "count when he was at Bruſſels, in February 1656 "(9). Thirty men armed entered outrageouſly into "his chamber, and carried him off, and having "made him wander for ſome time up and down the "ſtreets of Bruſſels, they threw him at laſt into the "tower of Turemberg, and all this by the Arch- "Duke Leopold's conſent. He was told this was "done by the authority of the Arch-biſhop of Mech- "lin's Grand-Vicar. At laſt, having continued "ſome time in that tower, he was ſet at liberty by the "credit of his Maſter the Prince of Condé, by whoſe "advice he went immediately to Rome to proſtrate "himſelf at the Pope's feet, and ſubmit both his "book and himſelf intirely to his Holineſs's will, "becoming thus a true and ſound Catholick with all "the good ſucceſs he could wiſh. This is what he "has related himſelf in his petition to the moſt "holy Father Alexander VII. (10)." See the remark [G].

(9) Moreri is then miſtaken, when he aſſerts, that la Peyrere recanted in a book printed at Rome in 1655. His Printers have put 1555.

(10) Pieire de Saint Romuald, Journal Chronologique & Hiſtorique, 25 Decembre, p. m. 675.

[D] Some Roman Catholicks laughed at them.] Read the following paſſage, extracted from a letter which Guy Patin wrote April the 9th 1658. "The Author "of the book concerning the Præadamites, named "Iſaac de la Pereire (11), a Gaſcoon, is come back "hither from Rome. He has publiſhed a little "book in 4to, in which he explains the reaſons "why he changed his religion (this in the ſtyle of "the ſchools is called to abjure one's hereſy). He "has diſowned his book of the Præadamites. I "have ſeen that book, but it does not ſell well. It "is ſaid the Pope has given him a ſmall Abbey, "and that Mazarin has promiſed him ſome new fa- "vour from Heaven, or from purgatory. He is "here waiting for that bleſſing with all the impati- "ence and eagerneſs you may imagine in a Gaſcoon, "who is afraid to ſtarve, and who changed his reli- "gion with no other view but to make his fortune, "and to live well at the expence of all thoſe whom "it may concern. He ſets up here for a great "performer of miracles, or a diſtributer of indul- "gences .... (12). A Gaſcoon, who is learned, is "a courtier, and a converted Huguenot, is very pro- "per for that ſport, and capable to act ſuch a part."

(11) It ſhould be La Peyrere.

(12) Patin, Lettre 117. p. 454, 455, of the 1ſt volume.

[E] He wrote two relations which have been publiſhed.] He wrote them for his friend La Mothe le Vayer: the one is an account of Greenland, the other of Iceland: they are both pretty curious. I have quoted ſomething from the latter in the article Jonas (Arngrimus). He dedicated it to the Prince of Condé, and hints in his dedication that he had a mind to write that Hero's life. I imagine that he is the Author of the Account of the Battle of Lens.

[F] He is mentioned in the Menagiana.] "Iſaac de "la Peyrere (13) of Bordeaux is the Author of a "book entitled the Præadamites, in which he pre- "tends to prove that Adam was not the firſt of man- "kind. This good man was a boarder at the Fa- "thers of the Oratory in their houſe of our Lady of "the Vertues. He continued to be ſtill infatuated "with his Præadamites, and it is probable he carried "that fancy to the grave. He would have been very "well pleaſed, had he known that there was a Rabbi "who mentioned Adam's tutor. But that Rabbi "was a Rabbi, and that is ſaying enough. When "the book of the Præadamites was publiſhed, it was "ſentenced to be burnt by the common hangman. "I deſired the Author, who was a friend of mine, "to ſend it me before it were brought to light: he "took the joke and ſent it me with this line from "Ovid, in which he only changed the word urbem, "(the city) into ignem, (the fire)."

(13) He ſhould have ſaid Iſaac la Peyrere. Moreri ought to have called him ſo, and not la Pereré.

"Parve, nec invideo, ſine me, liber, ibis in ignem (14).

i. e. "Little book, you ſhall go into the fire without "me, nor do I envy your fate."

(14) Suite du Menagiana, p. 38, of the Dutch edition.

See the Melanges de Vigneul-Marville, page 144. of the firſt Volume (15).

(15) He is called there de la Peyrere.

[G] A fragment from a letter .... will acquaint the Reader with ſome particulars, which are very curious.] As I do not give much credit to Peter de St. Romuald, I deſired to know from a Gentleman of great merit, and who was at that time in the Prince of Condé's family, whether or not that honeſt Monk had given a true account of the matter. Here follows the anſwer that was ſent to me. "I think I can give "you a very accurate account of what you aſk me, "becauſe Monſieur de la Peirere was a great friend of "mine. He was arreſted at Bruſſels at the time your "Author mentions: but the ſecret hiſtory of this "is, that the late Prince * was concerned in that affair "by the means of a Jeſuit who loved Monſieur de "la Peirere, bating his religion, which he would "have him change. For which purpoſe they took a "pretence from his book of the Præadamites to ar- "reſt him, and they made him dread the conſe- "quences of that book, if he would not forſake his "religion. The good man, who was by no means "obſtinate with regard to what is called religion, "ſoon changed his own, and his maſter gave "him

* Of Condé.

PEZELIUS (CHRISTOPHER), a Proteſtant Divine, was born the 5th of March 1539 at Plawen in the Veightland in Germany (a). He taught five years in the College of his native place, and was afterwards Profeſſor of Divinity and Miniſter at Wittenberg (b); but as he was one of thoſe Doctors who refuted Lutheraniſm ſecretly, and deſigned to introduce Calviniſm, he was deprived of his employments, and impriſoned in 1574, with ſeveral other of his Collegues: nor were they ſet at liberty but on condition that they ſhould retire from Saxony, and write nothing in the world againſt the Elector, nor againſt his Univerſities, nor againſt his Churches (c) [A]. He retired to Egra, and having ſtayed there a little while, he was invited to Sigen to be Principal of the ſchool there, by Count John of Naſſau, brother of William of Naſſau Prince of Orange. Some time after he was choſen Miniſter at Herborn (d), from which place he dates the Dedication of one of his books (e) in the Month of September 1580. He was Profeſſor of Divinity at Bremen in the year 1588, and was alſo ſuperintendent of the Churches there, in which poſt he continued till his death, which happened February the 25th 1604 (f). He publiſhed a great many books [B]. He was at Heidelberg in 1599, and was at the meeting of the faculty of Divinity, before whom Conrad Vorſtius gave an account of his faith (g). It is very ſtrange that neither Melchior Adam, nor Paul Freher, gave an account of his life.

(a) Chriſtop. Pezelius, Epiſt. Dedicat. part. 7. Argumentor. Melanchth.

(b) Idem, ibid.

(c) Idem, Epiſt. Dedicat. 2 part. Argumentor. Melanchth.

(d) Idem, Ibid.

(e) Secundæ Partis Argumentor. Melanchth.

(f) Witte, in Diario Biograph.

(g) See the Life of David Pareus, p. m. 56, 58. See alſo the rem. [C] of the art. VORSTIUS (Conrad).

" him wherewithal to go to Rome to fetch his abſo-
" lution, of which he did not make much account.
" He returned to his maſter, who had always a great
" friendſhip for him, and maintained him, ſince his " return into France, at the houſe of the Fathers of " the Oratory at Paris. I have often ſeen him there,
" and found him not much perſuaded of Popery, but
" extremely infatuated with his notion of the Præada-
" mites, of which he wrote and ſpoke to his friends
" till his death. The Attorney General of that Or" der, who is a friend of mine, entertained me once
" at dinner with him, and made him confeſs, that " he was always a writing books, which, he whiſper-
" ed to me, would be burnt the moment the good " man had given up the ghoſt. La Peirere was the " beſt man in the world, of the mildeſt temper,
" and who with a very eaſy mind believed but lit" tle."

[A] Pezelius . . . . and his Collegues . . . . . were not ſet at liberty, but on condition that they ſhould . . . . . write nothing in the world againſt the Elector, nor againſt his Univerſities, nor againſt his Churches.] They kept nevertheleſs to themſelves the liberty of declaring their ſentiments. Sic Deus Opt. Max. eventus poſtea rexit, ut à triſti ſervitute atque obligatione prius nobis impoſita una cum Collegis liberatus, duris quidem conditionibus (ut patria tota excederemus, nec adverſus illuſtris. Electorem Saxoniæ, ejuſque Scholas et Eccleſias ſtylum ſtringeremus, confeſſione tamen veritatis, et conſcientiæ noſtra ratione integra et liberanobis, ut verbi diminiſtris relicta) in exilium ire juberemur (1). I do not know how Pezelius reconciled his promiſe with the writings he publiſhed againſt the Lutheran Doctrine concerning the Lord's Supper: I know only that he was engaged in a very hot paper war with the moſt zealous Doctors of the other party; as for inſtance, with Nicholas Selneccerus, Daniel Hoffman, Gyles Hunnius, and Philip Marbachius. The very title of a work he publiſhed at Bremen in 1591, ſhews that he wrote paſſionately. That title is as follows: Defenſio contra vaniſſimas Calumnias, quas N. Selneccerus evomuit in Reſponſione Chriſtophori Pezelii Confutationis quatuordecim cauſarum Selnecciarum de condemnationibus Calviniſtarum (2). i. e. " A vindication againſt the " moſt falſe ſlanders, which N. Selneccerus belched " out in his anſwer to Pezelius's refutation of Selnec- " cerus's fourteen reaſons for which he pretends the " Calviniſts ought to be condemned." The title of another book, which he publiſhed in 1593, contains among other things, theſe words. Quam (Pezelii Explicationem) Hermannus Hamelmannus libello, cui titulum fecit, de depravatione, fraudulentia, impoſtura, et falſitate D. Chriſtophori Pezelii, et omnium Sacramentorum, temerario ac ſtolido conatu oppugnare auſus fuit (3). i. e. " Which explication of Pezelius Her- " man Hamelmannus by a raſh and fooliſh attempt " dared to refute in a book, which he entitled, of " the miſrepreſentation, fraud, impoſture, and falſity of " Chriſtopher Pezelius, and of all the Sacramentarians." Hoſpitian mentions ſome other works of Pezelius publiſhed during this Sacramentarian Controverſy, and he gives an extract of the following (4), which was publiſhed at Bremen in 1589, Tractatus Chriſtophori Pezelii propoſitus in Gymnaſio Bremenſi, in explicatione Examinis Philippi Melanchthonis de Cœna Domini, &c.

(1) Chriſtoph. Pezelius, Epiſt. Dedicat. 2 part. Argument. Melanchth. folio 65.

(2) See Hoſpinian's Hiſtoria Sacram. Tom. 2. p. 670.

(3) Ibid. p. 80.

(4) Ibid. p. 662.

[B] He publiſhed a great many books.] For beſides thoſe which I have juſt now mentioned, he publiſhed at Wittenburg in 1565 an Oration de generatione hominis, and in 1571 Apologia veræ doctrinæ de definitione Evangelii oppoſita Thraſonicis præſtigiis Joan. Wigardi (5). His Commentary on Geneſis was printed at Newſtad in the year 1599, in 8vo. and his expoſition of the firſt Chapters of St. John's Goſpel in the year 1586, in 8vo. It would be too long to mention all the others. I ſhall only obſerve that his Melificium Hiſtoricum is a large Commentary on John Sleidanus's Treatiſe de quatuor Monarchiis; that it extends to the reign of Heraclius; that it was printed at Marpurg in two parts in 4to, in the year 1610; and that the next year Lampadius added a third part to it, which carries the hiſtory down to his time. I ſhall alſo obſerve that Pezelius publiſhed extracts from Melanchthon's works, in which he put the objections and anſwers relating to theological ſubjects in a very good order, and intermixed the whole with Scholia. That work contains ſeven or eight volumes in 8vo, which have been publiſhed at different times. The firſt volume was printed in the year 1578.

(5) Epit. Bibl. Geſneri, p. 146.

PHÆDRUS, a Latin Author, who wrote five books in Iambic verſe, was a Thracian (a). He was made free by Auguſtus [A], and lived till after the death of Sejanus (b). He had been oppreſſed by that favourite of Tiberius (c). He repreſents himſelf as a man who never cared to hoard up riches [B]. All the Criticks are not of opinion that (a) Phædr. in Præfat. lib. 3.

(b) See Scheffe-rus in Vita Phædri.

(c) See the ſame Author, ibid.

[A] He was made free by Auguſtus.] He is called Auguſti Libertus, Auguſtus's freed-man, in the title of his Fables. Lipſius, Andrew Scot, Dempſterus, Borrichius, and ſeveral other Criticks underſtand by that expreſſion, that Tiberius made him free (1). But Florent Chrétien, Voſſius, Scheffer, &c. chooſe to underſtand it of Auguſtus. I follow this laſt opinion, though I muſt confeſs that the proofs of it do not come up to a full demonſtration. This however is certain, namely, that Phædrus relates as an eye-witneſs, ſome things which happened under Auguſtus. See the 11th fable of the 3d book; but not the 8th of the 5th book, where Bathyllus is mentioned, for Voſſius (2) is in the wrong to aſſert, that Phædrus ſpeaks of that, as having ſeen it himſelf.

(1) See Scheffe-rus's notes in Phædrum, init.

(2) Voſſius, de Poet. Latinis, p. 38.

[B] He repreſents himſelf as a man, who never cared to hoard up riches.] See his preface to his 3d book, where he mentions this as one of the reaſons which ſhould facilitate his promotion to the rank of a Poet.

Quamvis

that he is the perſon mentioned in an Epigram of Martial [C]. It is to be obſerved, that Caſaubon, who had ſo much learning, did not know there was a Phædrus among the antients, till Peter Pithou publiſhed Phædrus's Fables [D]. Since that firſt edition, which was publiſhed in the year 1596, there have been ſeveral others with the notes of the moſt eminent Criticks. See a catalogue of thoſe editions in John Scheffer's Preface on that Author, and add to them the edition (d) of the year 1698, which Burman procured, and which contains, beſides the notes of Gudius which had never been publiſhed, the entire Commentaries of Conrad Ritterſhuſius, of Nicholas Rigault, of Nicholas Heinſius, of John Scheffer, and of John Lewis Praſch, with extracts from ſome other Commentators. The edition which was publiſhed ſince that (e), by the care and with the notes of Hoogſtraten is the moſt beautiful of all that have been yet printed, with regard to the letter, and the cuts. It was made for the uſe of the young Prince of Naſſau Governor of the

(d) Of Amſterdam, for Henry Wetſtein.

(e) At Amſterdam, for Francis Halmo, 1701, 4to.

Quamvis in ipſa natus ſim pene ſchola,
Curamque habendi penitus corde eraſerim,
Et laude invita in hanc vitam incubuerim,
Faſtidioſe tamen in cælum recipior.

(3) He ſays there, Hujus reſpectu Fabulæ deterritus, periculoſum ſemper vitavi lucrum.

See alſo the 5th fable of the 5th book (3).

[C] All the Critics are not of opinion, that he is the perſon mentioned in an Epigram of Martial.] Here follows that Poet's words.

Dic, Muſa, quid agat Canius meus Rufus?
Utrumne Chartis tradit ille victuris
Legenda temporum acta Claudianorum?
An quæ Neroni falſus adſtruit ſcriptor?
An æmulatur improbi jocos Phædri (4)?

(4) Mart. Epigr. 20. lib. 3.

i. e. " Tell me, Muſe, what does my friend Canius " Rufus apply himſelf to? Does he write for poſte- " rity the Hiſtory of what paſt under the Claudii? " Or does he give an account of what a lying Au- " thor imputes to Nero? Does he endeavour to imi- " tate the jokes of that wicked Phædrus?"

Scriverius's note on the laſt of theſe five lines, is the moſt outrageous in the world againſt thoſe who are of opinion, that Martial ſpeaks of our Phædrus: Poſſunt ne magis decoquere de judicio, ac magis ludere de otio ſuo viri docti, qui exiſtimant Fabulatorem Phædrum à Clariſſimo Pithæo editum, & cujus Arienus quidam, ſive Arianus, in præfatione Fabularum ſuarum Æſopiarum ad Theodoſium meminit, hunc eundem eſſe, de quo loquitur Martialis? Volunt nos credere ſcilicet, Libertum illum Auguſti Cæſaris fuiſſe, ſtylo atque tempore parem Laberio vel Publio Mimo, & quidem, quantum conjiciunt, ſub Tiberio vixiſſe, atque adeo poſt Sejanum damnatum: Nugæ. Certe niſi vehementer fallor, ævo illo dignus cenſeri minime poteſt ſcriptor iſte, cuicui tandem ille alapas & libertatem debeat (5). i. e. " Is it poſſible that learn- " ed men ſhould miſuſe their judgment, and miſ- " ſpend their leiſure ſo far, as to imagine that Phæ- " drus, the Author of the Fables, which have been " publiſhed by the celebrated Pithou, and whom A- " rienus or Arianus mentions in his preface to The- " odoſius, prefixed to his Æſopian Fables, is the " perſon whom Martial mentions here? They would, " forſooth, perſuade us, that he was Auguſtus's freed- " man, and contemporary with Laberius, and with " Publius the Mimographer, and equal to them with " regard to his ſtyle, and that he lived, as they ima- " gine, under Tiberius, and even after Sejanus " was ſentenced to death. Theſe are mere trifles: " and indeed, if I am not miſtaken, that Writer, to " whomſoever he owed his liberty, can by no means " be thought worthy of that age." Scriverius boaſts that he can prove his opinion by ſeveral arguments, and obſerves, among other things, that Perot, Archbiſhop of Siponto, is the Author of one of the Fables which have been publiſhed under the name of Phædrus (6). It is certain that one of the Fables, which Perot aſſerts he extracted from Arienus, and put into Iambick verſe, does hardly differ from the other. Alluſit ad Fabulam, ſays he in his Commentary on the 77th Epigram of the 1ſt book of Martial (7), quam nos ex Arieno in Fabellas noſtras adoleſcentes Iambico carmine tranſtulimus:

Olim quas vellent eſſe in tutela ſua
Divi legerunt Arbores, &c (8).

(5) Scriverius, in Martial. Epigr. 20. lib. 3. p. m. 88.

(6) It is the 18th of the 3d book in my edit. which is that of Hamburg 1673.

(7) And not the 20th of the 3d book, as Menage aſſerts in his Meſcolanze, p. 220.

(8) You will meet with the reſt in Menage, ibidem.

But the Criticks did not fail to judge, that he aſcribed it unjuſtly to himſelf. However it be, one may well wonder that a book, which abounds with ſo much wit and good ſenſe, as Phædrus's does, was ſo little known during ſeveral ages. Suppoſe Martial ſpeaks of him, we have in this caſe but two Authors who mentioned him (9). I have obſerved elſewhere (10), that Seneca had not the leaſt knowledge of him, and this was for a great while the caſe of Caſaubon, as I ſhall obſerve hereunder. This ought to leſſen a little our wonder, with regard to the obſcurity, in which Curtius's name and reputation lay buried for ſo many years. Let us add, that Velleius Paterculus met with the ſame fate. See above, the article of PATERCULUS, remark [D], quotation (23).

(9) Avienus mentions him, as Scriverius obſerves in the paſſage quoted above.

(10) In the art. ÆSOP, rem. [M]. See hereunder the words of the Jeſuit Vavaſſeur.

[D] Caſaubon . . . did not know there was a Phædrus . . . . till Peter Pithou publiſhed Phædrus's fables.] Here follows what he wrote to Peter Pithou: Ex Epiſtola tua primum de Phædro Auguſti Liberto cognovi; nam plane mihi ante id nomen incognitum, prorſuſque de eo qua ſcriptore qua ſcripto vel legi nihil, vel ſi eſt aliter non memini. i. e. " It is by your letter, that I firſt " came to be acquainted with Phædrus, Auguſtus's " freed-man; that name was quite unknown to me; " I never read any thing neither of the man, nor of " his works; or if I did, I do not remember it at " all." This letter of Caſaubon was wrote in the year 1596, at which time Peter Pithou publiſhed the Fables of Phædrus at Troies. He ſent a copy of them to Father Sirmond, who was then at Rome. This Jeſuit ſhewed it to the learned men in that city, who judged at firſt that it was a ſuppoſititious work; but having examined it more carefully, they altered their opinion, and thought they could obſerve in it the characteriſtical marks of the age of Auguſtus. You may read theſe particulars in Latin. Memini equidem Jacobum Sirmandum narrare mihi ſolitum, cum Petrus Pithæus hos Phædri Æſopiarum quinque Libros Lutetiæ (11) edidiſſet primum, & ad ſe Romam pro veteri amicitia muneri miſiſſet, percuſſos illico Romanos novitate voluminis, atque ut gens eſt emunctæ naris, natura nunquam verba cui potuit dare, ſuſpicari cæpiſſe nam quidnam partus iſte recens ac ſuppoſititius eſſet, qui tanto intervallo appareret, tamque dilituiſſet diu: veruntamen libro perlecto toto, neminem dubitaſſe, quin ætatem redoleret Auguſti, ac ſummam illam facilitatem ſtyli & ſcripturæ, & beatam copiam repræſentaret; tuncque vixiſſet auctor, cum laus bene loquendi temporum potius, quam hominum fuit; ibique etiam apud Cæſarem ſerviſſet, ubi ſedem ac domicilium eruditio collocaſſe videretur; qua in domo filiæ & nepotes, intimi & familiares, ſervi & liberti literas egregie didiciſſent (12). Theſe are the words of a Jeſuit, who immediately after makes ſome reflections on this paſſage from Seneca, Æſopios logos intentatum Romanis ingeniis opus, (the Romans have not attempted to imitate Æſop's Fables). He maintains that Seneca does not ground his aſſertion on Phædrus's being a Thracian, and not a Roman; he refutes effectually thoſe who pretend to account thus for the matter; and he thinks either that Seneca's memory failed him, or that Tiberius's ſucceſſors took care to have the copies of Phædrus's work deſtroyed immediately, becauſe they ſaw their tyranny expoſed therein; and that for this reaſon Seneca was unacquainted with that book. I cannot well approve this laſt obſervation; for if the work had been ſuppreſſed for that reaſon, Seneca would have more eaſily remembered it. But let us hear our Jeſuit (13). Miror vehementer, cur affirmarit Seneca, Æſopios loges eſſe intentatum Romanis ingeniis opus: quum Phædrum hunc haberet, quem opponere poſſet toti Græciæ. Nam quod

(11) He publiſhed them at Troies in Champagne, and not at Paris.

(12) Franciſcus Vavaſſor. de ludicra dictione, p. 206, 207.

(13) Idem, ibid. p. 207.

the Provinces of Friesland and Groningen. The French translation, which Moreri commends, was made by the Gentlemen of Port-Royal. How good soever it may be, yet Monsieur le Fevre of Saumur found many blunders in it [E].

quod clarissima Lumina superioris sæculi duo, Petrus Pithœus et Justus Lipsius prodiderunt, vere id à Seneca dictum, quia Phædrus non genere aut ortu Romanus, sed Thrax, sicut ipse testatum reliquit, esset, minus ea probabilis videtur expositio Senecæ. Quasi vero Romanis ingeniis opus intentatum, sit quicquam aliud, quam Latinis literis nondum illustratum nec elaboratum opus: aut Comœdia fuerit carmen intactum Romanis, quamvis id solus natione Afer Terentius tractasset: aut si percenseret Seneca, qui philosophiam Scriptores Latine explicassent, de eo se numero eximeret ipse; propterea quod natione foret Hispanus, patria Cordubensis. At non exemit Quintilianus, qui quo loco de Philosophis egit Latinis, his illum potissimum annumeravit; cum inter Oratores, Poetas, et alios diversi generis scriptores potuisset referre. Citius dixerim Senecam vel parum hic attendisse, quid scriberet; vel istud, ut alia, oblitum prorsus memoriæ vitio peccasse . . . . (14). Illud verisimilius, iniquissimis Tiberii, Caligulæ, Claudii, Neronis temporibus, cum scripta edictis abolerentur et Senatus consultis, si cui Poetæ aut Historico verbum excidisset opportunum delationi et calumniæ, cum ne liberæ quidem relictæ cogitationes; et opinio tacita de Principe, sicunde vel ex vultu argui posset, Majestatis rea fieret, libellum fabularem, cujus in Apologis plerisque mera illius sæculi Tyrannis noteretur, suppressum fuisse continuo, ac evanisse tandem, et ignoratum à Seneca, et reliquæ posteritatis oculis subductum. i. e. " I " wonder very much why Seneca asserted, that " Æsop's Fables was a work unattempted by the Romans, since he had Phædrus, whom he might " have opposed to all Greece. For what these two " most eminent men of the last Century, Peter Pithou, and Justus Lipsius have asserted, seems by no " means probable to me; namely, that Seneca spoke " the truth, because Phædrus was not a Roman by " birth nor by extraction, but a Thracian. As " though a work unattempted by the Romans were " any thing else but a work not illustrated nor explained in the Latin tongue: or as though comedy " would be a kind of poem never touched upon by " the Romans, in case Terence, who was an African, " were the only Author who wrote Comedies in " Latin: or as though Seneca, treating of the Authors who explained Philosophy in Latin, should " except himself from their number, because he was " originally from Spain, and born at Corduba. But " Quintilian did not leave him out of that number; " for in the place where he treats of the Latin Philo- " sophers, he reckons him chiefly among them; " though he might have placed him among the " Orators, or the Poets, or among Writers of some " other kinds. I would therefore rather say, that " Seneca did not consider accurately what he was " writing here, or that his memory failed, as it did " on some other occasions. . . . . But, what is more " probable still, it must be observed that in those " dangerous times of Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, " and Nero, when books were suppressed by edicts, " and by decrees from the Senate, if a Poet or an " Historian dropped but one word which might give " an handle for calumny, or information; when " men's very thoughts were not free, when any opinion entertained of the Prince, though concealed " in the breast became capital, if it could be but " guessed at by a man's looks, or by his countenance, " it must be observed, I say, that as Phædrus's Fables contained many hints against the tyranny of " those times, they must have been very soon suppressed, and vanished away at last, so that Seneca " was unacquainted with them, and the following " ages never saw them." Let us not forget to observe, that Gabriel Faerne did not act very honestly, if we may believe Thuanus (15), He had the manuscript of Phædrus by him, but was sure not to boast of it, nor to publish it. His reason was, that he would have discredited the Fables, which he had wrote in Latin verse, from Æsop's original, if he had acquainted the world, that there was such a work of Phædrus, Augustus's freedman, still extant. Let us not forget Monsieur Perrault's observation on that passage of Thuanus. We meet with it in a Preface which he prefixed to his French translation in verse of this Faerne's Fables, published at Paris in 1699. Here follow his own words. " The beau- " tiful style in which Faerne wrote his Fables, got " him the name of the second Phædrus, though he " had never seen his works, which did not come to " our knowledge but above thirty years after Faerne's " death. For it was Monsieur Pithou, who having " met with it among the dust of an antient library, " published it in the beginning of this Century. " Thuanus, who in his History mentions our Author " very honourably, pretends that Phædrus was not " unknown to him; he does even blame him for " suppressing that antient Writer, in order to conceal " his own plagiarism; but what he asserts there is " not grounded in the least, and could not come into " his head, but by the strong prepossession, in which " all the exorbitant admirers of antiquity indulge " themselves; namely, that a modern Author can " write nothing that is excellent, unless he has some " eminent Author for his pattern. Of the hundred " Fables which Faerne turned into Latin verse, there " are but five which Phædrus also handled: and if " these five there is but one or two, which are ex- " pressed nearly after the same manner; which hap- " pened only because it is impossible that two men " who write upon the same subject, should not hap- " pen sometimes to have the same thoughts, and to " use the same expressions." The latter part of this passage is as full a vindication of Faerne as could be wished.

(14) Franciscus Vavassor, de Ludicra Dictione, p. 208.

(15) Thuanus, lib. 28. sub fin. p. m. 578. ad ann. 1561. Du Ryer has erroneously translated these words of Thuanus. Si Phædri, cujus sive imitatione sive æmulatione luserat, nomen non dissimulasset: which Du Ryer renders thus, " If he had not " concealed the " name of Phæ- " drus, with " whom he made " sport," instead of, whom he strove to imitate or to surpass in the composition of Fables.

[E] Monsieur le Fevre of Saumur found many blunders in it.] He published very good notes on Phædrus in the year 1657, and he was already very famous for his learning; and yet the learned Schefferus had not heard any thing of him in the year 1660. He came then to know both the name of the Author, and how valuable a work his Phædrus was, by a letter he received from Gronovius (16). Mihi sane, says he (17), adeo ad diem illum Faber fuit ignoratus, ut illius nihil ante, ac ne notas quidem in Scriptorem nostrum, nisi serò, ut prædixi, viderim vel legerim. I observe this that the reader may see, the most learned men are sometimes unknown to each other, though they flourish in the same age, and be contemporaries.

(16) Scheffer. Præfat. in 2 edit.

(17) Idem, ibid.

PHÆDRUS (THOMAS), Professor of Eloquence at Rome towards the end of the 15th Century, and in the beginning of the 16th passed for the Cicero of his time [A]. He was Canon of Lateran, and keeper of the Library in the Vatican (a). He owed the beginning of his fortune to the acting of Seneca's Hippolytus, in which he performed the part of Phædra (b); whence he also kept the name of Phædrus. The cause of his death

(a) Parrhasius, de Quæsitis per Epistolam, p. 34.

(b) See the rem. [A].

[A] He passed for the Cicero of his time] Let us quote Erasmus, who will acquaint us with some pretty curious particulars concerning this Phædrus. Romæ . . cognovi et amavi Petrum (1) Phædrum, lingua verius quam calamo celebrem: mira erat in dicendo tum copia tum auctoritas. Magna felicitatis pars est Romæ innotuisse; ille primum innotuit ex Senecæ Tragœdia, cui Titulus Hippolytus, in qua representarit personam Phædræ, in area, quæ est ante palatium Cardinalis Raphaelis Georgiani. Sic ex ipso Cardinale didici, unde et Phædro cognomen additum. Is obiit minor annis, ni fallor, quinquaginta, dictus sæculi sui Cicero (2). i. e. " At Rome . . . . . I was acquainted and inti- " mate with Peter Phædrus, a man more famous in- " deed by his tongue, than by his pen. He spoke " with wonderful eloquence and gravity. It is a " great happiness for a man to make himself known " at Rome. Our Phædrus got some reputation there " by

(1) Parrhasius & Pierius Valerianus call him Thomas.

(2) Erasmus, Epistola, 5. lib. 23. p. 1210.

death was attended with remarkable circumſtances [B]. Riding once through the city on a mule, he met a cart drawn by wild oxen; his mule took a fright, and threw him down. He was ſo happy that the cart paſſed over him without doing him any hurt, becauſe he happened to fall within the ſpace between the two wheels: but his fright, and his fall ſpoiled the whole maſs of his blood to ſuch a degree, that he contracted a diſtemper of which he was never cured. If he had lived longer, he would probably have publiſhed ſome books [C], which would perhaps have confirmed what has been obſerved of him, that his tongue was better than his pen (c). Parrhaſius, his Collegue, who was infinitely obliged to him, was extremely ſorry for his death. I do not know whether it was Phædrus or another, who preached the ſermon, which Eraſmus has ſo juſtly cenſured [D]. Voſſius imagined that this Roman Profeſſor was the Author of the Antiquities of Hetruria [E], which have been publiſhed under the fictitious name of Proſper.

(c) See the rem. [A].

(d) See the rem. [B], of the art. PARRHASIUS.

PHAON

" by Seneca's tragedy, intitled, Hippolytus, in which " he acted the part of Phædra, whence he got the " ſirname of Phædrus: that Tragedy was acted in " the Court-yard before the Palace of Cardinal Ra- " phael Georgianus: this I have from the Cardinal " himſelf. Phædrus died being not yet fifty, if I " am not miſtaken, being ſtyled the Cicero of his " time." Here follows the character which Pierius Valerianus gives of our Phædrus's eloquence. Neque diu felix fuit Thomas Phædrus, affluentiſſimum eloquentiæ flumen, quo non alius eo tempore orando clarior, neque vehementior fuit, Romanæ ipſe quoque Cathedræ decus, & ornamentum (3). i. e. " Nor was Thomas Phædrus a " long time happy, that moſt fluent ſtream of elo- " quence, than whom no man at that time ſpoke " with more clearneſs and ſtrength. He was alſo the " glory and ornament of the Roman See." Add to this, what I quote from Parrhaſius in the remark [C], and Peter Bembus's teſtimony: he was a ſkillful judge in matters of eloquence, and very much commends our Thomas Phædrus in that reſpect: It is in the 3d letter of the 4th book, dated from Venice, January the 13th, 1505. Let us extract a particular from thence. A perſon had wrote to him, that Phædrus grew luſty. So much the better, ſaid he, we may then uſe him after the manner of the ancient heroes, and ſtyle him good and great, or luſty. Illum certe poſſumus heroum more ὠύτε μεγάτε dicere.

(3) Pierius Valerianus, de Literat. Infelicit. lib. 1. p. 25.

[B] The cauſe of his death was attended with remarkable circumſtances.] You will ſee them elegantly expreſſed in the following paſſage from Pierius Valerianus. Quam vero miſerabiliter, quamque inopino mortis genere ſubreptus interiit, dum ſcilicet mula media urbe vehitur junctis factus obviam bubalis, qui viſendæ magnitudinis carrucam trahebant: Conſternata ſiquidem mula, bubaliſque identidem perterrefactis, ſimul ab ea calcitroſa excuſſus eſt tam magnæ corporaturæ vir, quantum hominem noſtis, ſimul à plauſtro ſuperatus, quamvis in rotarum medium intervallum incidens eliſionem evitarit, corrupto tamen præ timore & gravi caſu intra viſcera ſanguine, multa inde longæ & occultæ valetudinis incommoda perpeſſus, in ejuſmodi ærumna vita functus eſt (4).

(4) Idem, ibid. N. B. The ſenſe of this paſſage is given in the text of this article.

[C] He would probably have publiſhed ſome books.] The Reader will not be diſpleaſed to know the titles of them, which Parrhaſius has tranſmitted down to us. I ſhall therefore tranſcribe the following paſſage, which contains a noble elogium of our Phædrus; but we muſt remember that the perſon who ſpeaks is an Orator, who had received many favours from him. Quis eſt in hoc orbis terrarum domicilio (cujus antiquum ſcenæ decus inſtauravit) quis in hac excultiſſima Academia (quæ Phædro Rhetore cœlum vertice contingebat) quis adeo barbarus à Muſis abeſt, & Gratiis, qui ad extincti Phædri nomen ubertim non fleat. O deteſtandam fati importunitatem? Silet, heu, T. Phædre, vox illa tua jucunde ſonora; illa argutæ linguæ ſuadela, quæ mentes hominum in omnis affectus impellebat, quæ Romanam faucundiam à Gothis uſque temporibus amiſſam reſtituit. Ubi nunc eſt ille geſtus cum ſententiis congruens? Ubi illa incorrupti Latini ſermonis integritas? Quis ultimam manum tot inchoatis operibus imponet? Quæ (non ſecus ac Apellis illa decantatiſſima Venus) interrupta pendent: luculentiſſimæ ſcilicet Orationes, Apologia Ciceronis in obtrectatores, quam mihi paucis ante diebus, quam cœpiſſet æſtuare, domi ſuæ per ſummam voluptatem legit: Annalium breviarium, quo res omnes à Populo Romano geſtas complexus eſt: in Horatii Poeticam vigilantiſſima commentaria: in Plauti Comœdias ſcrupuloſiſſimæ quæſtiones (5). i. e. " Who is there in this City (whoſe an- " cient glory Phædrus reſtored) who in this moſt po- " lite Univerſity (who when Phædrus was Profeſſor " of Eloquence, lifted her head up to the ſky) who " ſo barbarous, and ſo unacquainted with the Muſes " and with the Graces, but will ſhed a whole flood " of tears on the death of Phædrus? Oh! the abo- " minable cruelty of Fate! Thy ſweet voice, oh " Phædrus, is alas! no longer heard: that power- " ful and perſuading tongue, which could raiſe all " kinds of paſſions in men, and reſtored the antient " eloquence, loſt ever ſince the invaſion of the Goths, " that tongue ſpeaks no more. Where is now that " action of yours always anſwerable to the ſenſe of " your diſcourſes? What is become of that pure and " uncorrupted Latin ſtyle? Who ſhall complete ſo " many of your works juſt begun, which (like that " celebrated Venus of Apelles) lie unfiniſhed? His " eloquent Orations; his apology for Cicero againſt " his Revilers, which Phædrus read to me with the " utmoſt pleaſure a few days before he fell ſick; " that Compendium of Annals, in which he gives a " ſummary account of the whole Roman Hiſtory; " thoſe elaborate Commentaries on Horace's Art of " Poetry; thoſe moſt curious queſtions on Plautus's Co- " medies." If this Oration were dated, we ſhould know the time when Phædrus died. Obſerve that Volaterranus, having hinted the ſeries of the antient wars, expreſſes himſelf thus. BELLORUM IGITUR HUJUSMODI excurſum T. Phædri noſtri ex magna parte diligentia collectum, non abs te fuerit ſimul ordine repetiiſſe (6). i. e. " It will be of ſome uſe to give a me- " thodical account of thoſe wars, the ſeries and con- " nexion of which have been ſet down chiefly by " the care of our friend T. Phædrus."

(5) Janus Parrhaſius, in Orat. ante Prælectionem Epiſt. Ciceron. ad Atticum, p. 145, 146.

(6) Volaterranus, Comment. Urban. lib. 38. p. m. 1459.

[D] The ſermon, which Eraſmus has ſo juſtly cenſured.] That ſermon was delivered before Pope Julius II. on a Holy Friday. Eraſmus heard it, and received no edification from it. The Preacher laboured only to appear Ciceronian. Eraſmus does not name him (7), but we may think that he means one of the Profeſſors of Eloquence, of whom he had ſaid what follows. Florebant id temporis præter cæteros dicendi laude Petrus Phædrus & Camillus hac ætate minor, ſed eloquentiæ viribus major, niſi quod ille jam hujus laudis arcem occupaverat (9). i. e. " At that time were fa- " mous for their eloquence, among others, Peter " Phædrus, and Camillus, only the latter was ſome- " thing younger, but his eloquence was greater (and " his reputation would have been greater alſo, had it " not been that) the former had got the ſtart of " him."

(7) Nomen Oratoris non edam, ne videar hominis probi & eruditi famam arrodere voluiſſe. Eraſm. in Ciceroniano, p. 39. i. e. " I " ſhall not name " the Preacher, " leſt it ſhould " be thought " that I deſign- " ed to traduce " a pious and " learned man."

[E] Voſſius imagined that Phædrus was the Author of the Antiquities of Hetruria.] Here follow his words. Fuere qui fœtum crederent Gulielmi Poſtelli. Sed verus auctor eſt Thomas Fædrus, qui vixit anno 1490 (10). i. e. " Some thought it was a work of William Poſtel. " But the true Author of it is Thomas Fædrus, who " lived the year 1490." Voſſius has been very much wronged in Placcius's treatiſe De Scriptis Anonymis; for after the words which I have tranſcribed, and thoſe that are before them, we find immediately this; Cujus Thomæ ulteriorem nullam nec apud ipſum, nec apud Geſnerum, alioſve illius generis auctores invenio mentionem. Verum enim vero non opus eſt ut de eo multum hic ſolliciti ſimus, cum non illum, ſed ipſum CURTIUM INGHIRAMIUM, qui fragmenta illa primus, ac ſi Scornelli prope Vulterram ea ſub terra inveniſſet, Florentiæ publicavit, parentem hujuſce ſuppoſititii figmenti fuiſſe prolixe docuerit

(9) Idem, ibid. p. 38.

(10) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Latinis, lib. 1. cap. 9. in fin. p. 41.

Leo

Leo Allatius, in ſuis ad dictas Antiquitates annotationibus, Pariſiis 1640, & biennio poſt Romæ iterum excuſis (11). i. e. "I do not find this Thomas mentioned any more, either by him, or by Geſner, or by any other Writer of the ſame kind. But we ought not to trouble ourſelves much about this, ſince it is not he, but Curtius Inghiramius, who publiſhed thoſe fragments firſt at Florence, as though he had found them under ground near Volterra, and who is the true Author of this ſuppoſititious work, as Leo Allatius fully ſhews, in his notes upon thoſe Antiquities, printed at Paris in 1640, and reprinted two years after at Rome." That whole Latin paſſage is printed in Italicks after the ſame manner as the words tranſcribed from Voſſius, nor is there the leaſt mark to ſhew there is a diſtinction to be made between the former part of the paſſage and the latter: ſo that there is no Reader but may juſtly imagine, that Voſſius ſaid all this; one may therefore think he knew nothing of all that Parrhaſius, Eraſmus, and Pierius Valerianus relate of Phædrus. The worſt is, that one might imagine, Voſſius was inconſiderate enough to aſſert in the ſame page, that Thomas Phædrus is the true Author of a book which Curtius Inghiramius compoſed. Let us obſerve by the by, that Voſſius's miſ-ſpelling has miſled Konig (12) who made two Authors out of one; he gives us Thomas Fœdrus for an Author, different from Thomas Phædrus, and refers us to Hallervord.

(11) Placcius, de Scriptis Anonymis, in Appendice, p. 30.

(12) See his Bibliotheca vetus & nova, p. 310, and 628.

PHAON of Mitylene, in the iſland of Leſbos, was a very handſom man, who was extremely beloved by the fair ſex. Poor Sappho was caught, as well as many others, and found him ſo little complaiſant, that ſhe was diſconſolate, as we ſhall obſerve in her article. The Poets, after their uſual manner of having recourſe to miracles at every turn, have feigned, that Phaon's great beauty, which made ſuch deep impreſſions on the Ladies hearts, was a preſent which the Goddeſs Venus made him, to reward him for the ſervices he had done her. He took her once in his boat, without inquiring who ſhe was, and carried her with all ſpeed to the place ſhe deſired (a) [A]. He aſked nothing for his trouble (b), but he was nevertheleſs well paid. Venus made him a preſent of a veſſel of alabaſter full of a certain ointment, with which he had no ſooner rubbed himſelf, but he became the moſt handſom of all men (c). He ſet the hearts of all the women at Mitylene on fire. Youth returned upon him, and ſo forth (d). He made an ill uſe of it, which coſt him his life, for he was killed in the very fact, I mean being ſurpriſed committing adultery (e). Some have aſſerted, that the property of a certain herb was the cauſe of Sappho's love for him [B].

(a) Ælian. Hiſt. div. lib. 12. cap. 17.

(b) Palæphatus, de Fabul.

(c) Ælian. Hiſt. div. lib. 20. cap. 17.

(d) Palæphatus, de Fabul. Lucanus, Dialog. Mortuor. Tom. 1. p. 234.

(e) Ælian. Hiſt. div. lib. 12. cap. 17.

[A] He carried Venus . . . . to the place ſhe deſired.] There is a paſſage in Lucian, by which we learn, not whither he carried her, but where ſhe imbarked. Μῶν καὶ σύ τινα ὥσπερ ὁ Φάων τὴν Ἀφροδίτην ἐκ Χίου διαπορθμεύσας εἶτά σοι εὐξαμένῳ ἔδωκε νέον εἶναι καὶ καλὸν ἐξ ὑπαρχῆς καὶ ἀξιέραστον. Have you alſo, aſks Simylus of Polyſtratus, carried Venus over from Chios, like Phaon of old, that at your requeſt ſhe made you grow young again, and become handſom and lovely (1)? One might infer from theſe words, that Phaon aſked as a reward, the favour of being reſtored to youth and beauty. But Palæphatus gives us not the leaſt hint of this, he obſerves, that Phaon had been a Mariner all his life-time, and never uſed any one uncivilly, nor made the poor pay for their paſſage, for which reaſon he was admired in the iſle of Leſbos; that Venus, being diſguiſed like an old woman, entered into his boat, that he croſſed her over with ſpeed, and aſked her nothing for his trouble; but that from an old man as he was, ſhe made him become an handſom youth. Servius touches (2) upon this ſtory, and adds to it the following particular, extracted from two comic Poets (3), that Phaon built a temple to Venus on the mountain of Leucas, from which a woman, who was deeply in love with him, had thrown herſelf into the ſea. Let us obſerve, that Lucian imagined that Phaon was of the iſle of Chios (4), wherein he was probably miſtaken.

(1) Lucian. Dialog. Mortuor. Tom. 1. p. 234.

(2) Servius, in Æn. 3. ver. 273. Correct in the edition of Leyden 1680. Venerem mutatam in navis formam, thus, in anus formam.

(3) Menander and Turpilius.

(4) Lucian. in Navigio, Tom. 2. p. 696.

[B] Some have aſſerted, that the property of a certain herb was the cauſe of Sappho's love for him.] It is ſtrange men ſhould not be willing to grant, that Sappho could fall paſſionately in love by the bare ſtrength of her natural temper. You ſee that Pliny accounts for it by ſo fabulous a principle as Venus's ointment. He is very much in the right to obſerve, that that herb has ſomething monſtrous in it (5). Portentoſum eſt quod de ea traditur, radicem ejus alterutrius ſexus ſimilitudinem referre, raram inventu: ſed ſi viris contigerit mas, amabiles fieri. Ob hoc & Phaonem Leſbium dilectum à Sappho. Multæ circa hoc non Magorum ſolum vanitates, ſed etiam Pythagoricorum (6). i. e. "They relate a wonderful particular of that herb, namely, that its roots repreſents the diſtinguiſhing parts of either ſex; but it is a difficult matter to find it. If that which repreſents the male-ſex happens to be uſed by a man, he becomes lovely. This was the cauſe of Sappho's love for Phaon the Leſbian. Not only the Magi, but even the Pythagoreans have aſſerted many idle ſtories concerning that plant." The plant meant here is white Eryngium, called by the Latins centum capita, which Pinet tranſlates Chardon à cent têtes, the thiſtle with an hundred heads.

(5) Plin. lib. 22. cap. 8.

(6) Father Hardouin refers us here to a book falſely intitled, Kiranium Kirani, p. 37.

PHASELIS, a ſea-port town in Lycia, on the borders of Pamphylia (a). It was one of the cities which got the greateſt riches by the piracies of the Cilicians, for which reaſon it was deſtroyed by Publius Servilius (b), after the victories he gained over thoſe Pirates. It was in a wretched condition when Pompey landed there after the battle of Pharſalia [A]. It has been aſſerted, that it was built by Mopſus (c). This city has been (a) Strabo, lib. 14. p. 458. See alſo T. Livius, lib. 37. cap. 23. (b) Nec mari ſubmoviſſe contentus validiſſimas urbes eorum & diuturna præda abundantes, Phaſelin & Olympon evertit, Iſaurumque ipſam arcem Ciliciæ. Florus, lib. 3. cap. 6. (c) Pomponius Mela, lib. 1. cap. 14.

[A] It was in a pitiful condition when Pompey landed there, after the battle of Pharſalia.] If we may believe Lucan, there were more people in Pompey's ſhip, than in that city.

Te primum parva Phaſeli
Magnus adit. Nam te metui vetat incola rarus,
Exhauſtæque domus populis, majorque carinæ
Quam tua turba fuit (1).

(1) Lucan. lib. 8.

——"Poor Phaſelis, firſt receives the wand'ring train
"There, free from fears, with eaſe he may command
"Her citizens, ſcarce equal to his band." Rowe.

And yet Strabo, who lived after Pompey, ſpeaks of Phaſelis, as of a conſiderable city with three harbours for ſhips. He meant, probably, the condition that been very much talked of with regard to a certain miraculous favour, which Alexander was ſaid to have received there from the Gods [B]. I ſhall make a remark upon this as

(2) Obſerve that it is by no means probable that that city was reſtored to its antient ſplendor after the battle of Pharſalia, till Strabo's time.

(3) Strabo, lib. 14. p. 458.

that city had been in before his time (2); but he ought not to have expreſſed himſelf in the preſent tenſe. Εἶτα Φάσηλις, τρεῖς ἔχουσα λιμένας, πόλις ἀξιόλογος. Ac deinde Phaſelis, tres habens portus, urbs memorabilis (3).

[B] A miraculous favour which Alexander was ſaid to have received there from the Gods.] Let us begin with quoting Joſephus, who having given an account of the paſſage through the Red Sea, makes the following obſervation. No man ought to wonder at this, as though it were incredible, that the ſea ſhould have opened a way to the firſt men, who were not cunning enough then to find out ſome crafty device, and who were in danger of their lives, this being done either by God's good will, or by a natural cauſe. For it is not long ſince the ſea of Pamphylia opened itſelf to make way for the Macedonians, who were led by Alexander the Great, and who had no other way to paſs by; becauſe God had determined to make uſe of Alexander and his army, to deſtroy the Kingdom of Perſia; which is witneſſed by all thoſe who wrote that King's atchievements. But let every one think of this what he pleaſes (4). It is not true, that all Alexander's Hiſtorians took the manner, in which he paſſed the Streight of Pamphylia near Phaſelis, to be miraculous. We ſhall now quote a celebrated Author, who hints very clearly, that there was nothing of a miracle on that occaſion. Alexander marched his army along the ſea-coaſt of Pamphylia with ſuch expedition, that many Hiſtorians have deſcribed and extolled it with that height of admiration, as if it were no leſs than a miracle, and an extraordinary effect of divine favour, that the waves which are wont to come rowling in from the main, and hardly ever leave ſo much as the beach under the ſteep broken cliffs at any time uncovered, ſhould on a ſudden retire, to afford him paſſage. Menander in one of his Comedies, ſeems to allude to this wonderful event, when he ſays, " If I want " an inſtance of it, Alexander comes preſently to " my mind; I aſk him, Can you paſs over the ſea? " He replies, As eaſily as over the dry land." Yet Alexander himſelf, in his epiſtles, does not ſpeak of this as any thing miraculous; he obſerves only, that he went from Phaſelis, and marched through the Streights which they call the Ladders (5). We ought to be obliged to Plutarch for mentioning that Conqueror's letters, for they decide the whole matter; they convince of impoſture or of error thoſe who have deſcribed that paſſage as ſomething ſupernatural, and as a very great miracle. If there had been ſome prodigy in this, and ſome extraordinary favour from Heaven, Alexander would not have failed to mention it in the letters he wrote concerning that march of his army. No political reaſon could oblige him to conceal ſo wonderful an event; and there were ſeveral conſiderable motives, which would have induced him to mention it. Nothing could be of a more deciſive conſequence for him, than to convince the whole world that the Gods had viſibly declared in his favour, that they ſubmitted the moſt untractable elements to him, and that even nature renounced her antient cuſtoms, in order to haſten the King of Perſia's ruin. He himſelf therefore ſhould have wrote an account of that great miracle to his mother, to Antipater, to all the nations of Greece, and have ſent it to all the places where he deſired to be known. He ought to have taken care to ſee his letters duly attended with all that could make them authentick, and yet he gave an account of it in the moſt ſimple manner imaginable. Let it not be objected, that he would owe nothing but to his own courage; this is not true; for we have proved in his article (6), that his furious ambition of paſſing for a God was very much owing to his policy. It appears plainly from the whole tenor of his conduct, that he wiſhed for nothing more paſſionately, than to ſee all the nations fully perſuaded of the great influence of his good fortune, and of the unchangeable happineſs of his deſtiny. A man will go infinitely farther with ſuch a reputation, than with that of a moſt brave and able Captain: for upon the whole, all the world knows, that General's courage and prudence are limited, but men imagine that nothing can ſtop a Conqueror, in whoſe favour Fortune has openly declared, and who can command Heaven and Earth, the Sea and the Winds. Queis militat æther, Et conjurati veniunt ad claſſica venti (7). So that the chief intereſt and greateſt concern of Conquerors is, to be looked upon as perſons whom God deſigns to bring great revolutions about, and whom he favours with his miracles. If this makes us abate ſomething of their glory with regard to their courage, or to their genius and ability, they are recompenſed with uſury in other reſpects. The extent of their conqueſts, the number of their victories, the rapidity with which great deeds are performed, when Fortune directs them, and takes every thing almoſt wholly upon herſelf, without caring for the concourſe of prudence, all this, I ſay, is an object of admiration, infinitely more dazzling, than thoſe limited and moderate conqueſts, which are owing only to the moſt conſummate prudence, and to the moſt undaunted intrepidity. Are there any human virtues, that can inſpire us with the ſame reſpect, the ſame veneration, the ſame eſteem, which we naturally conceive for thoſe whom we look upon as choice veſſels, deſigned by God for the foundation of Empires, his favourites, and his minions? A man is much more admired upon that ſcore, than if he diſtinguiſhed himſelf only by his prudence and by his courage. Obſerve, laſtly, that there are ſome things entirely independent on a Conqueror's valour and wiſdom. Theſe qualities are not capable to open a paſſage for an army through the ſea or through a river; and therefore, when a General confeſſes that the ſea and the rivers opened miraculouſly a paſſage for his army, men do not rob him of the glory due to him, to beſtow it on fortune; for all the world is fully perſuaded, that the ability and courage of a great Warrior are not capable to produce ſuch effects; all the world would look upon him as a mad-man, or would laugh at him, if he ſhould dare to boaſt that he found means to make a great army croſs an arm of the ſea without ſhips, and without pontons. It is therefore impoſſible to find out good reaſons, which could determine Alexander to conceal the miracle in queſtion: whence we muſt infer, that if he did not mention it in the letters he wrote concerning his march, it was becauſe there happened nothing extraordinary then.

(4) Joſeph. Antiquit. lib. 2. towards the end. I make uſe of Genebrard's (French) Tranſlation, becauſe I ſhall be obliged to quote him by and by upon another account.

(5) Plutarch, in his Life of Alexander, cap. 6. p. m. 154, 155. I make uſe of Amyot's Tranſlation; you will meet with this paſſage in page 673 and 674, of the Greek and Latin edition of Plutarch.

(6) See the art. MACEDONIA rem. [H], and the art. OLYMPIAS, rem. [F].

(7) Theſe are Claudian's words, in 3 Conſulat. Honorii Aug. ver. 95. This relates to a prodigy, which made Theodoſius gain the victory over Eugenius in 394. See Monſieur Flechier, Vie de Theodoſe, Liv. 4. p. 479. edit. in 12mo. and Barthius in Claudianum, p. 509, &c. The whole paſſage in Claudianus is as follows. O nimium dilecte Deo, cui fundit ab antris Æolus armatas hiemes, cui militat æther. Et conjurati veniunt ad claſſica venti. i. e. " Oh " Prince too " much beloved " of God! in " whoſe favour " Æolus pours " down rain " from Heaven, " for whom the " ſkies fight, " and at whoſe " call the winds " come to his " aſſiſtance.

I can ſupport my argument by a very good obſervation. The moſt ambitious Princes, the warriors the moſt covetous of praiſe, are never ſo inventive as their flatterers, nor ſo cunning as their panegyriſts (8), with regard to thoſe things which are proper to add a luſtre to a Conqueror's glory. Since then Alexander's flatterers, ſince the Orators and the Poets, who have commended him, have aſſerted that the Sea of Pamphylia retired its waves to make a paſſage for his army, and that there happened a great miracle on that occaſion, we ought to believe that they were perſuaded, that by this means they would labour more effectually to render his glory immortal, and that they would make it thus more wonderful. He did not bethink himſelf of that device, and with regard to that kind of artifices, he was not equal to the wits, the flatterers, and the orators, in point of invention; ſo that he wrote plainly and ſincerely how he croſſed the ſea. If he had made uſe of craft, if he had concealed the prodigy, leſt he ſhould leſſen his glory by confeſſing that the Gods had aſſiſted him, his flatterers would have well known what his taſte was in this reſpect, they would have ſuited their commendations to it, and had never mentioned the miracle. If we had all the poems and pamphlets, which were publiſhed upon that ſubject during this Prince's life, we ſhould meet with many idle ſtories in them: but as it is the fate of thoſe pieces to periſh as ſoon and even ſooner than their Authors, poſterity has not been peſtered with them. So that nothing has been tranſmitted down to us, but the plain account to which the graveſt Hiſtorians reduced the whole matter; and it is not difficult to get a true notion of that affair by conſulting an able geographer. Strabo tells us that Mount Climax is ſo near the Sea of Pamphylia, that it is ſeparated from it only by a narrow

(8) Apply to this theſe words of Pliny the younger, Paneg. Trajan. cap. 55. Ingenioſior eſt ad excogitandum ſimulatio veritate, ſervitus libertate, metus amore. i. e. " Diſſimulation " is more cunning to find out " flatteries than " truth, ſlavery " more than liberty, fear " more than " love."

WHETHER ALEXANDER could have any reaſons to conceal a miracle performed in his favour.

as I have promiſed (d).

(d) Article MACEDONIA in the text, letter (d).

row paſſage, which may be croſſed on foot when that Sea is ſtill, but which is all covered with water when that Sea is high. Alexander truſting to his good fortune commanded his army to paſs through that place, without waiting till the return of the ſpring had carried off the waters. His ſoldiers paſſed accordingly being to their waiſt in the water: this is the whole miracle. Περὶ Φασηλίδα δ' ἐϛὶ τὰ κατὰ θάλατταν ϛεινὰ, δι' ὧν Ἀλέξανδρος παρήγαγε τὴν ϛρατείαν: ἔϛι δ' ὄρος Κλίμαξ καλούμενον ἐπίκειϛαι δὲ τῷ Παμφυλίῳ πελάγει, ϛενὴν ἀπολείπων πάροδον ἐπὶ τῷ αἰγιαλῷ, ταῖς μὲν νηνεμίαις γυμνουμένην, ὡς τε εἶναι βάϛιμον τοῖς ὀδεύουϛι πλημμυρονὶς δὲ τῷ πελάγει, ὑπὸ τῶν κυμάτων καλυπτομένην ἐπιπολύ· ἡ μὲν οὖν διὰ τοῦ ὄρους ὑπέρβαϛις, περίοδον ἔχει ϗ προσάντης ἐϛὶ, τῷ δ' αἰγιαλῷ χρῶνται κατὰ τὰς εὐδίας. Ὁ δὲ Ἀλέξανδρος εἰς χειμέριον ἐμπεσὼν καιρὸν, ϗ τὸ πλέον ἐπιτρέπων τῇ τύχῃ, πρὶν ἀνεῖναι τὸ κύμα ὁρμῆϛαι, ϗ ὅλην τὴν ἡμέραν ἐν ὕδαϛι γενέϛθαι τὴν πορείαν συνίδὼν, μέχρι ὀμφαλοῦ βαπτιζομένων. Apud Phaſelidem ſunt ad mare anguſtiæ, per quas exercitum traduxit Alexander. Eſt enim ibi mons Climax, Pamphylio incumbens mari, & propter littus arctum relinquens tranſitum: qui tranquillo mari nudatur, & à viatoribus perambulari poteſt: mari exundante, fluctibus admodum obtegitur. Alexander autem hybernam incidit in tempeſtatem, cumque fortunæ maximam eventus partem crederet, antequam defluerent undæ profectus eſt: itaque contigit, ut totum diem milites per aquam iter facerent uſque ad umbilicum in eam demerſi (9). Others aſſert that the South wind, which blowed ſeveral days ſucceſſively, and which had made the Sea overflow the whole paſſage even to the foot of the Mountain, ceaſed to blow the moment Alexander arrived, and that there aroſe a North wind, which drove the waters from the ſhore. Freinſhemius (10) quotes the Author who mentioned this; I ſhall tranſcribe his text and his quotations. * Parte exercitus ad Pergenſium urbem per montes præmiſſa; cæteros ipſe per littus ducebat, qua Climax mons Pamphylio mari imminens anguſtam euntibus ſemitam relinquit, quoties mare tranquillum eſt; at quum æſtus incubuit, fluctibus operitur. Idque hyeme frequens & prope perpetuum eſt. At Alexander nihil æque ac moram metuens, exercitum per æqua, per iniqua, eodem ardore atque impetu rapiebat. Continui per eos dies Auſtri flaverant, qui mare in littus propellentes, omnia itineris veſtigia altis paludibus opplent: adſiduæ etiam magnæque pluviæ, ut ventis iſtis ſpirantibus ſolet, ruebant. Sed adventante Alexandro ſubito exortus Aquilo cælum purgavit imbribus, undas rejecit in mare, & Macedonibus tranſitum aperuit, Sic quoque unius  diei itinere per incerta vada emergendum fuit; aqua ad umbilicum ferme pertingente. Tantam in periculis Alexandri fiduciam, ut ab ipſius ingenio profectam non dubito; ita frequentibus prodigiis & ominibus auctam confirmatamque fuiſſe crediderim: poſtquam decreto numinis, clariſſimis maximiſque rebus ſe deſtinari conjecit. i. e. "Having ſent part of his army to Perga, he "led the reſt along the coaſt, where Mount Climax "hanging over the Sea of Pamphylia leaves a narrow "path to walk over when the Sea is calm, but which "in a ſtorm is covered with water, which happens "often, and almoſt continually in the winter. But "Alexander fearing nothing more than a delay, "continued with the ſame eagerneſs to lead his army "along, whether the roads were good or bad. The "wind having been South for many days had driven "the ſea over that path, ſo that it was all drowned: "add to this the heavy rains which uſed to fall con"tinually when the wind is South. But on Alexan"der's arrival there aroſe on a ſudden a North wind, "which drove the waters into the ſea, cleared the "ſky, and opened a paſſage for the Macedonians. "But notwithſtanding this the army was to march "a whole day through an uncertain road, the ſol"diers being to their waiſt in the water. So great "was Alexander's courage in the midſt of dangers; "I do not queſtion but it was owing to his own tem"per, yet I am apt to think it was alſo encreaſed "and ſtrengthened by the many prodigies and preſa"ges he met with, which made him imagine he was "deſigned by Heaven for great and glorious actions." Joſephus ſhews but little judgment, when he compares the paſſage through the Red Sea with the paſſage over the Sea of Pamphylia. He imagined that Alexander's miracle would incline the Greeks to believe that of Moſes; but he had reaſons to fear leſt the paſſage through the Red Sea ſhould be accounted for by natural cauſes, as that through the Sea of Pamphylia is aſcribed to the North wind. If Genebrard had made uſe of a leſs reproachful terms, his obſervation on the following words of Joſephus could not be blamed. The Egyptians were diſappointed in their expectation, not knowing that ſuch an opening and ſuch a road was not deſigned for all, but only for the Hebrews, who were making their eſcape to ſave their lives, and not for their enemies, who purſued them with a deſign to ruin and deſtroy them (11). Here follows Genebrard's note. "Hence you may know how execrable Joachin Va"dian's impiety is, who dares to write in his Com"mentaries on Pomponius Mela, that Moſes waited "the opportunity when the Red Sea was to return "into the Ocean, and leave its bottom dry, as it "happens twice a day at Mount St. Michael in Nor"mandy. For beſides that God would ſhew his "power herein, the Red Sea does never leave its "bottom dry by ebbing and flowing, or by riſing "and falling, but is always full of water, as appears "plainly from Geography, and the Sea Chart's (12)." Joſephus ought to have avoided making his parallel with ſo much the more caution, that he had room to fear leſt the Greek Philoſophers ſhould make an advantage of what is obſerved in the ſacred hiſtory, namely, that the Lord cauſed the Sea to go back by a ſtrong Eaſt wind all that night (13). Here then, might they ſay, are two miracles, which are much alike, and both the effect of the wind. There aroſe in Alexander's favour a North wind, which drove the waters of the Sea back into its channel; another wind did the ſame in Moſes's favour. Several Writers, to make the conqueſts of the Macedonian army appear more wonderful, have taken for a miracle a North wind, which by chance proved very favourable to them. The Hiſtorian of the Hebrews has done the ſame (14): to prevent therefore theſe objections Joſephus ſhould have forbore the parallel he makes ſo unſeaſonably. The Author of a Commentary in uſum Delphini cenſures him ſeverely for it. Ut imperite, ne dicam impie, feciſſe Joſephus videatur, qui narrato Iſraelitarum tranſitu per rubrum mare, qui credibile probaret eſſe miraculum, ſimile quiddam Alexandro contigiſſe agnoſcit, & ab omnibus affirmari tradit qui res ejus geſtas literis mandarunt (15).

Obſerve that it is an eaſy matter to point out a very material difference between what paſſed near Phaſelis, and what happened in Ægypt. The wind which drove back the Red Sea was preceded by an human action, which ſhewed that God himſelf acted herein in a ſpecial manner. Moſes ſtretched out his hand over the Sea (16). But farther, there is a particular here, which cannot be aſcribed to the wind: The waters were divided, and the children of Iſrael went into the midſt of the Sea upon the dry ground, and the waters were a wall unto them on their right hand and on their left. If it be ſuppoſed, that the wind made that opening or diviſion, it muſt be confeſſed that it was not natural, that is to ſay, that it blew only on a very little portion of the ſea, and that letting the waters on the right and on the left alone, it made a way in the middle, and drove back only the waters which happened to be in that middle, ſupporting thoſe that were on both ſides. If it be aſked why it was neceſſary the wind ſhould blow all night, ſince God has no occaſion for the ſecond cauſes to dry up in a moment an arm of the Sea, I anſwer that it is not the buſineſs of the creatures to preſcribe to their Creator how he ought to act. And beſides, they who aſſert that the miracles of the antient law were produced occaſionally as they were deſired by a creature, are perhaps not miſtaken. See what are Father Malebranche's and Monſieur Arnaud's opinions upon this (17). If the Angel, to whoſe care the people of Iſrael was committed, was the occaſional cauſe of all Moſes's miracles, we would have no reaſon to wonder, that the action of bodies, the violence of the winds, &c. were made uſe of on thoſe occaſions. Several difficulties may be ſolved by that principle. An Heathen would ſay perhaps, according to the ſtyle of thoſe who ſpoke ſo much of the Genii of the Emperors, that Alexander's genius cauſed the South

(9) Strabo, lib. 14. p. 458.

(10) Supplem. in Q. Curtium, lib. 2. cap. 11. num. 18. See alſo his Index to Q. Curtius, under the word Pamphylia.

* Strabo, lib. 14. Curt. 5. 3. 22. 6. 3. 16. Artemon in Senecæ ſuaſor. 1. Arrian. 1, 8. 8. Euſtath. in Dionyſ. ver. 855, & 865. Appian. lib. 2. de Bell. Civil. Joſeph. Antiquit. lib. 2. extremo. Plutarch. cap. 27 & 28.

 Strabo, lib. 14.

(11) Joſephus, book 2. towards the end, according to Genebrard's Tranſlation.

(12) Genebrard, in the margin of his Tranſlation of Joſephus, book 2. of the Antiquities of the Jews, folio 53, of the Paris edit. 1604, in 8vo.

(13) Exodus, chap. 14. ver. 21.

(14) You muſt ſuppoſe all this is ſaid by the Greek Philoſophers we have juſt now mentioned.

(15) Mich. le Tellier, Notis in Q. Curtium, lib. 5. capite ipſi undeſimo, 193.

(16) Exodus, chap. 14. ver. 21. See Monſieur le Clerc's Diſſertation, mentioned in the Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Savans, for Octob. 1695. p. 59, 60.

(17) Monſieur Arnaud publiſhed in the year 1685, A Diſſertation on the manner after which God performed Miracles under the antient Law, by the means of the Angels. He refutes Father Malebranche in that Diſſertation.

PHASIS, a River which runs through Colchis, and diſcharges itſelf in the Euxine Sea, had that name ſince a young man had thrown himſelf into it. It was called Arcturus before that time. That young man was the ſon of Apollo and Ocyroe (a): he killed his mother whom he ſurprized in the very fact [A], I mean in the arms of a lover. The furies appeared to him, and tormented him to ſuch a degree, that he threw himſelf into the Arcturus. There grew in that River a plant named Leucophyllus, which had a wonderful property; for it prevented women from committing adultery. But it was to be gathered with ſome precautions (b) [B]. Nothing has rendered the Phaſis more famous than the expedition of the Argonauts: for all the Poets who have celebrated it could not but remember this great River, ſince the Argonauts were obliged to ſail towards its head, in order to get the golden Fleece. With regard to this and ſeveral other particulars I refer you to Lloyd's Dictionary: but as to the preſent ſtate of the Phaſis you will meet

(a) Who was the daughter of Oceanus.

(b) Extracted from Plutarch, in his Treatiſe de Fluviis, p. m. 16, 17.

South wind to ceaſe, and a North wind to blow, the day when that Conqueror deſigned to paſs along the ſea-ſhore near Phaſelis. But in order to perſuade us of this, it were neceſſary to prove, that in caſe Alexander had continued in Macedonia, the North wind would not have ſucceeded to the South wind, the day he made his army march along that ſhore. But it is impoſſible to prove and to know this. One might indeed comprehend, that thoſe Genii of the Emperors could, by their knowledge in natural philoſophy, applicando activa paſſivis, have made a wind ceaſe, and have raiſed another; but one cannot know whether they do it actually in ſuch a place, or at ſuch a time.

[A] He killed his mother, whom he ſurprized in the very fact.] They who have read Pontus de Tyard may wonder that I ſhould ſpeak of young Phaſis, without beſtowing upon him the ſame elogies, which that Author beſtows upon him. Phaſis, ſays he (1), being grown a man, and a chaſte obſerver of the rules of continency, ſurprized his mother committing adultery. Being vexed and exaſperated at his mother's ſin, and not capable to reſtrain his anger, he killed her. If you have a mind to ſee how he expreſſes this poetically read what follows.

(1) Pontus de Tyard, in the Twelve Tables of Rivers and Fountains, folio m. 11.

Leur fils Phaſis ja grand, mais de chaſte nature,
D'un adultere bras voit ſa mere embraſſée,
Dont d'un glaive vangeur l'ayant morte laiſſée,
Il choiſit en Arcture & morte & ſepulture (2).

(2) Ibid. folio 12.

But to account for my conduct, it is ſufficient for me to obſerve, that the Author from whom Pontus de Tyard borrowed this ſtory, does not ſay that Phaſis was chaſte: I judged therefore that it was not fit to add any thing to the original. The method, which numberleſs tranſcribers follow, is very wrong: they blend together the facts they mention with their own conjectures, or with the conſequences they infer from them: for they inſert them into the body of their narration, as though the Authors from whom they borrow thoſe facts, had alſo related thoſe conjectures and conſequences. It were proper to diſtinguiſh what one adds from what one tranſcribes, eſpecially when thoſe additions do not neceſſarily follow from the reſt. Pontus de Tyard has not followed that rule, he imagined that Phaſis muſt have been a ſevere obſerver of continency, ſince Ocyroe's adultery induced him to kill her. He has aſſerted theſe two particulars as though Plutarch had related them both; he has blended his own inference with that antient Author's account. But it is a conſequence, which at moſt is but probable. For a man without being very chaſte himſelf, might conceive ſo much horror by ſeeing his mother in a lover's arms, as to kill her. All they who puniſh diſſoluteneſs in their own families, are not modeſt for all that. There may be men, who debauch as many women as they can, and yet would uſe very cruelly a ſiſter, a mother-in-law, or even a mother, if they ſuffered themſelves to be debauched, and eſpecially if they were ſurprized in the very act of adultery (3). I would not have expatiated ſo much on Pontus de Tyard's fault, if I did not ſee that even at this time very eminent Authors are guilty of it.

(3) Ἐπ' αὐτοφώρῳ, in flagranti crimine. Plut. de Fluviis p. m. 12. See Mauſſac's notes, p. 234, on that expreſſion of Plutarch.

I do not urge Valerius Flaccus's authority in order to prove that Phaſis was not continent. For when that Poet relates that Phaſis being paſſionately in love with a beautiful nymph, whom he purſued moſt deſperately, he means the God of the River Phaſis.

Barbarus in patriis ſectatur montibus Aean
Phaſis, amore furens: pavidas jacit illa pharetras
Virgineo turbata metu; diſcurſibus & jam
Deficit: ac volucri victam deus alligat unda (4).

(4) Valer. Flaccus, Argonaut. lib 5. ver. 425. p. m. 304.

[B] There grew . . . . . a plant . . . . . which had a wonderful property. . . . . It was to be gathered with ſome precautions.] It was to be found at break of day in the beginning of the ſpring, when the myſteries of Hecate were celebrating: the God Pan's preſence was very much required there (5). See the margin (6). Jealous huſbands having gathered it, ſpread it about their beds, in order to keep them pure and undefiled: ἣν οἱ ζηλότυποι τῶν ἀνδρῶν ἁπτόμενοι, ῥίπτουσι περὶ τὸν παρθένιον θάλαμον, καὶ ἀνοσίους τηροῦσι τοὺς γάμους. Quam poſtquam hominum zelotypi collegerunt, circa thalamum virginalem jaciunt, ut puras conſervent nuptias (7). We meet with the ſame words in a book of Ariſtotle (8), but they have been added to it; and Monſieur Mauſſac does not queſtion (9) but they were extracted from the ſame work, from which I have juſt now tranſcribed them. Let us obſerve, that if a drunken man (10) came near the place where that plant grew, he loſt his ſenſes immediately, and confeſſed all the crimes he had committed, or deſigned to commit: he was ſeized, wrapt up in a piece of leather, and caſt into a round hole, which was called the little mouth of the impious, and which was like a well. That man's corps was ſeen thirty days after in the lake Mœotis, full of worms, and was immediately devoured by vultures, which had not been obſerved there before (11).

(5) Πρὸς πάνισμον ἔνθεον, ad Divinum Panis Dei afflatum. Plutarchus, de Fluviis, p. 17.

(6) This calls to my mind a vulgar tradition, which prevails in ſome provinces of France; which is, that the ſeed of Fern cannot be gathered but on St. John's Eve, at midnight exactly; and that to gather it ſucceſsfully, one muſt be aſſiſted by ſome Sorcereſs; that it has admirable properties, &c.

(7) Plutarchus, de Fluviis, p. 16.

(8) Περὶ θαυμασίων ἀκουσμ. De mirabili auſcultatione, ſub fin.

(9) Mauſſac, in Plutarchum de Fluviis, p. 235.

(10) Ἐάν τις τῶν ἀσεβεστέρων διὰ μέθην, ſi quis impurus ob ebrietatem. Plutarchus de Fluviis, p. 16.

I cannot tell whether the ſtory of this plant was not altered by thoſe, who abridged the Authors who mentioned it firſt, and by thoſe who quoted ſome part of thoſe abridgments. Theſe are two conſiderable cauſes of falſifications, becauſe ſome writers draw up a quite new account by quoting ſomething from the abbreviators, and ſomething from thoſe who applied to their particular deſigns what ſuited their purpoſe, omitting all the other circumſtances, and even improving thoſe which could be of any uſe to them. However it be, there is ſome probability that the firſt foundation of this ſtory was, that when the myſteries of Hecate were celebrating, the men, being obliged to contain themſelves, uſed to put into their wives beds an herb, the property of which was to cool nature. We have ſeen (12), that ſomething like this was practiſed among the Athenians, during the ſolemnity of the Theſmophoria. But it muſt be confeſſed, that the herb of the Phaſis would have been much more conſiderable than the Agnus caſtus of the Athenians, ſince its property not being confined to the duration of a feſtival, would have removed for ever the uneaſineſs of all jealous huſbands. Here follow ſome other lines of Pontus de Tyard.

(11) Extracted from Plutarch. ib. exCteſippo, lib. 2. Rerum Scythicarum.

(12) In the rem. [B], of the art. THESMOPHORIA.

Depuis du nom Phaſis eſt appellé ce fleuve,
Où le chaſte arbriſſeau Leucophile ſe treuve,
Remede à jalouſie en un froid cœur tombée.
Car quiconque au Printemps en ſon lit cachera
Cette plante trempée en Phaſis: treuvera
Que jamais ſa Venus ne ſera dérobée (13).

(13) Pontus de Tyard, Douze Fables de Fleuves, ou Fontaines, folio 12.

i. e. "Phaſis was ſince that time the name of this "River, in which grows the chaſte ſhrub called "Leucophyllus, a remedy againſt jealouſy in a cold "heart:

as I have promiſed (d).

(d) Article MACEDONIA in the text, letter (d).

row paſſage, which may be croſſed on foot when that Sea is ſtill, but which is all covered with water when that Sea is high. Alexander truſting to his good fortune commanded his army to paſs through that place, without waiting till the return of the ſpring had carried off the waters. His ſoldiers paſſed accordingly being to their waiſt in the water: this is the whole miracle. Περὶ Φασηλίδα δ' ἐστὶ τὰ κατὰ θάλατταν στενὰ, δι' ὧν Ἀλέξανδρος παρήγαγε τὴν στρατείαν: ἔστι δ' ὄρος Κλίμαξ καλούμενον ἐπίκεισθαι δὲ τῷ Παμφυλίῳ πελάγει, στενὴν ἀπολιπὸν πάροδον ἐπὶ τῷ αἰγιαλῷ, ταῖς μὲν νηνεμίαις γυμνευομένην, ὡς τε εἶναι βάσιμον τοῖς ὀθνείοις πλημμυροῦσαν δὲ τῷ πελάγει, ὑπὸ τῶν κυμάτων καλύπτομένην ἐπιπολύ· ἡ μὲν οὖν διὰ τὸ ὄρους ὑπέρβασις, περίοδον ἔχει καὶ προσάντης ἐστὶ, τῷ δ' αἰγιαλῷ χρῶνται κατὰ τὰς εὐδίας. Ὁ δὲ Ἀλέξανδρος εἰς χειμέριον ἐμπεσὼν καιρὸν, καὶ τὸ πλέον ἐπιτρέπων τῇ τύχῃ, πρὶν ἀνεῖναι τὸ πύμα ὄμβροις, καὶ ὅλην τὴν ἡμέραν ἐν ὕδασι γενέσθαι τὴν πορείαν συνέβη, μέχρι ὀμφαλῶ βαπτιζομένων. Apud Phaſelidem ſunt ad mare anguſtiæ, per quas exercitum traduxit Alexander. Eſt enim ibi mons Climax, Pamphylio incumbens mari, & propter littus arctum relinquens tranſitum: qui tranquillo mari nudatur, & à viatoribus perambulari poteſt: mari exundante, fluctibus admodum obtegitur. Alexander autem hybernam incidit in tempeſtatem, cumque fortunæ maximam eventus partem crederet, antequam defluerent undæ profectus eſt: itaque contigit, ut totum diem milites per aquam iter facerent uſque ad umbilicum in eam demerſi (9). Others aſſert that the South wind, which blowed ſeveral days ſucceſſively, and which had made the Sea overflow the whole paſſage even to the foot of the Mountain, ceaſed to blow the moment Alexander arrived, and that there aroſe a North wind, which drove the waters from the ſhore. Freinſhemius (10) quotes the Author who mentioned this; I ſhall tranſcribe his text and his quotations. * Parte exercitus ad Pergenſium urbem per montes præmiſſa; cæteros ipſe per littus ducebat, qua Climax mons Pamphylio mari imminens anguſtam euntibus ſemitam relinquit, quoties mare tranquillum eſt; at quum æſtus incubuit, fluctibus operitur. Idque hyeme frequens & prope perpetuum eſt. At Alexander nihil æque ac moram metuens, exercitum per æqua, per iniqua, eodem ardore atque impetu rapiebat. Continui per eos dies Auſtri flaverant, qui mare in littus propellentes, omnia itineris veſtigia altis paludibus opplent: adſiduæ etiam magnæque pluviæ, ut ventis iſtis ſpirantibus ſolet, ruebant. Sed adventante Alexandro ſubito exortus Aquilo cælum purgavit imbribus, undas rejecit in mare, & Macedonibus tranſitum aperuit, Sic quoque unius  diei itinere per incerta vada emergendum fuit; aqua ad umbilicum ferme pertingente. Tantam in periculis Alexandri fiduciam, ut ab ipſius ingenio profectam non dubito; ita frequentibus prodigiis & ominibus auctam confirmatamque fuiſſe crediderim: poſtquam decreto numinis, clariſſimis maximiſque rebus ſe deſtinari conjecit. i. e. "Having ſent part of his army to Perga, he "led the reſt along the coaſt, where Mount Climax "hanging over the Sea of Pamphylia leaves a narrow "path to walk over when the Sea is calm, but which "in a ſtorm is covered with water, which happens "often, and almoſt continually in the winter. But "Alexander fearing nothing more than a delay, "continued with the ſame eagerneſs to lead his army "along, whether the roads were good or bad. The "wind having been South for many days had driven "the ſea over that path, ſo that it was all drowned: "add to this the heavy rains which uſed to fall con"tinually when the wind is South. But on Alexan"der's arrival there aroſe on a ſudden a North wind, "which drove the waters into the ſea, cleared the "ſky, and opened a paſſage for the Macedonians. "But notwithſtanding this the army was to march "a whole day through an uncertain road, the ſol"diers being to their waiſt in the water. So great "was Alexander's courage in the midſt of dangers; "I do not queſtion but it was owing to his own tem"per, yet I am apt to think it was alſo encreaſed "and ſtrengthened by the many prodigies and preſa"ges he met with, which made him imagine he was "deſigned by Heaven for great and glorious actions." Joſephus ſhews but little judgment, when he compares the paſſage through the Red Sea with the paſſage over the Sea of Pamphylia. He imagined that Alexander's miracle would incline the Greeks to believe that of Moſes; but he had reaſons to fear leſt the paſſage through the Red Sea ſhould be accounted for by natural cauſes, as that through the Sea of Pamphylia is aſcribed to the North wind. If Genebrard had made uſe of a leſs reproachful terms, his obſervation on the following words of Joſephus could not be blamed. The Egyptians were diſappointed in their expectation, not knowing that ſuch an opening and ſuch a road was not deſigned for all, but only for the Hebrews, who were making their eſcape to ſave their lives, and not for their enemies, who purſued them with a deſign to ruin and deſtroy them (11). Here follows Genebrard's note. "Hence you may know how execrable Joachin Va"dian's impiety is, who dares to write in his Com"mentaries on Pomponius Mela, that Moſes waited "the opportunity when the Red Sea was to return "into the Ocean, and leave its bottom dry, as it "happens twice a day at Mount St. Michael in Nor"mandy. For beſides that God would ſhew his "power herein, the Red Sea does never leave its "bottom dry by ebbing and flowing, or by riſing "and falling, but is always full of water, as appears "plainly from Geography, and the Sea Chart's (12)." Joſephus ought to have avoided making his parallel with ſo much the more caution, that he had room to fear leſt the Greek Philoſophers ſhould make an advantage of what is obſerved in the ſacred hiſtory, namely, that the Lord cauſed the Sea to go back by a ſtrong Eaſt wind all that night (13). Here then, might they ſay, are two miracles, which are much alike, and both the effect of the wind. There aroſe in Alexander's favour a North wind, which drove the waters of the Sea back into its channel; another wind did the ſame in Moſes's favour. Several Writers, to make the conqueſts of the Macedonian army appear more wonderful, have taken for a miracle a North wind, which by chance proved very favourable to them. The Hiſtorian of the Hebrews has done the ſame (14): to prevent therefore theſe objections Joſephus ſhould have forbore the parallel he makes ſo unſeaſonably. The Author of a Commentary in uſum Delphini cenſures him ſeverely for it. Ut imperite, ne dicam impie, feciſſe Joſephus videatur, qui narrato Iſraelitarum tranſitu per rubrum mare, qui credibile probaret eſſe miraculum, ſimile quiddam Alexandro contigiſſe agnoſcit, & ab omnibus affirmari tradit qui res ejus geſtas literis mandarunt (15).

Obſerve that it is an eaſy matter to point out a very material difference between what paſſed near Phaſelis, and what happened in Ægypt. The wind which drove back the Red Sea was preceded by an human action, which ſhewed that God himſelf acted herein in a ſpecial manner. Moſes ſtretched out his hand over the Sea (16). But farther, there is a particular here, which cannot be aſcribed to the wind: The waters were divided, and the children of Iſrael went into the midſt of the Sea upon the dry ground, and the waters were a wall unto them on their right hand and on their left. If it be ſuppoſed, that the wind made that opening or diviſion, it muſt be confeſſed that it was not natural, that is to ſay, that it blew only on a very little portion of the ſea, and that letting the waters on the right and on the left alone, it made a way in the middle, and drove back only the waters which happened to be in that middle, ſupporting thoſe that were on both ſides. If it be aſked why it was neceſſary the wind ſhould blow all night, ſince God has no occaſion for the ſecond cauſes to dry up in a moment an arm of the Sea, I anſwer that it is not the buſineſs of the creatures to preſcribe to their Creator how he ought to act. And beſides, they who aſſert that the miracles of the antient law were produced occaſionally as they were deſired by a creature, are perhaps not miſtaken. See what are Father Malebranche's and Monſieur Arnaud's opinions upon this (17). If the Angel, to whoſe care the people of Iſrael was committed, was the occaſional cauſe of all Moſes's miracles, we would have no reaſon to wonder, that the action of bodies, the violence of the winds, &c. were made uſe of on thoſe occaſions. Several difficulties may be ſolved by that principle. An Heathen would ſay perhaps, according to the ſtyle of thoſe who ſpoke ſo much of the Genii of the Emperors, that Alexander's genius cauſed the South

(9) Strabo, lib. 14. p. 458.

(10) Supplem. in Q. Curtium, lib. 2. cap. 11. num. 18. See alſo his Index to Q. Curtius, under the word Pampbylia.

* Strabo, lib. 14. Curt. 5. 3. 22. 6. 3. 16. Artemon in Senecæ ſuaſor. 1. Arrian. 1, 8. 8. Euſtath. in Dionyſ. ver. 855, & 865. Appian. lib. 2. de Bell. Civil. Joſeph. Antiquit. lib. 2. extremo. Plutarch. cap. 27 & 28.

 Strabo, lib. 14.

(11) Joſephus, book 2. towards the end, according to Genebrard's Tranſlation.

(12) Genebrard, in the margin of his Tranſlation of Joſephus, book 2. of the Antiquities of the Jews, folio 53, of the Paris edit. 1604, in 8vo.

(13) Exodus, chap. 14. ver. 21.

(14) You muſt ſuppoſe all this is ſaid by the Greek Philoſophers we have juſt now mentioned.

(15) Mich. le Tellier, Notis in Q. Curtium, lib. 5. Capite ipſi undeſimo, 193.

(16) Exodus, chap. 14. ver. 21. See Monſieur le Clerc's Diſſertation, mentioned in the Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Savans, for Octob. 1695. p. 59, 60.

(17) Monſieur Arnaud publiſhed in the year 1685, A Diſſertation on the manner after which God performed Miracles under the antient Law, by the means of the Angels. He refutes Father Malebranche in that Diſſertation.

PHASIS, a River which runs through Colchis, and diſcharges itſelf in the Euxine Sea, had that name ſince a young man had thrown himſelf into it. It was called Arcturus before that time. That young man was the ſon of Apollo and Ocyroe (a): he killed his mother whom he ſurprized in the very fact [A], I mean in the arms of a lover. The furies appeared to him, and tormented him to ſuch a degree, that he threw himſelf into the Arcturus. There grew in that River a plant named Leucophyllus, which had a wonderful property; for it prevented women from committing adultery. But it was to be gathered with ſome precautions (b) [B]. Nothing has rendered the Phaſis more famous than the expedition of the Argonauts: for all the Poets who have celebrated it could not but remember this great River, ſince the Argonauts were obliged to ſail towards its head, in order to get the golden Fleece. With regard to this and ſeveral other particulars I refer you to Lloyd's Dictionary: but as to the preſent ſtate of the Phaſis you will meet

(a) Who was the daughter of Oceanus.

(b) Extracted from Plutarch, in his Treatiſe de Fluviis, p. m. 16, 17.

South wind to ceaſe, and a North wind to blow, the day when that Conqueror deſigned to paſs along the ſea-ſhore near Phaſelis. But in order to perſuade us of this, it were neceſſary to prove, that in caſe Alexander had continued in Macedonia, the North wind would not have ſucceeded to the South wind, the day he made his army march along that ſhore. But it is impoſſible to prove and to know this. One might indeed comprehend, that thoſe Genii of the Emperors could, by their knowledge in natural philoſophy, applicando activa paſſivis, have made a wind ceaſe, and have raiſed another; but one cannot know whether they do it actually in ſuch a place, or at ſuch a time.

[A] He killed his mother, whom he ſurprized in the very fact.] They who have read Pontus de Tyard may wonder that I ſhould ſpeak of young Phaſis, without beſtowing upon him the ſame elogies, which that Author beſtows upon him. Phaſis, ſays he (1), being grown a man, and a chaſte obſerver of the rules of continency, ſurprized his mother committing adultery. Being vexed and exaſperated at his mother's ſin, and not capable to reſtrain his anger, he killed her. If you have a mind to ſee how he expreſſes this poetically read what follows.

(1) Pontus de Tyard, in the Twelve Tables of Rivers and Fountains, folio m. 11.

Leur fils Phaſis ja grand, mais de chaſte nature,
D'un adultere bras voit ſa mere embraſſée,
Dont d'un glaive vangeur l'ayant morte laiſſée,
Il choiſit en Arcture & morte & ſepulture (2).

(2) Ibid. folio 12.

But to account for my conduct, it is ſufficient for me to obſerve, that the Author from whom Pontus de Tyard borrowed this ſtory, does not ſay that Phaſis was chaſte: I judged therefore that it was not fit to add any thing to the original. The method, which numberleſs tranſcribers follow, is very wrong: they blend together the facts they mention with their own conjectures, or with the conſequences they infer from them: for they inſert them into the body of their narration, as though the Authors from whom they borrow thoſe facts, had alſo related thoſe conjectures and conſequences. It were proper to diſtinguiſh what one adds from what one tranſcribes, eſpecially when thoſe additions do not neceſſarily follow from the reſt. Pontus de Tyard has not followed that rule, he imagined that Phaſis muſt have been a ſevere obſerver of continency, ſince Ocyroe's adultery induced him to kill her. He has aſſerted theſe two particulars as though Plutarch had related them both; he has blended his own inference with that antient Author's account. But it is a conſequence, which at moſt is but probable. For a man without being very chaſte himſelf, might conceive ſo much horror by ſeeing his mother in a lover's arms, as to kill her. All they who puniſh diſſoluteneſs in their own families, are not modeſt for all that. There may be men, who debauch as many women as they can, and yet would uſe very cruelly a ſiſter, a mother-in-law, or even a mother, if they ſuffered themſelves to be debauched, and eſpecially if they were ſurprized in the very act of adultery (3). I would not have expatiated ſo much on Pontus de Tyard's fault, if I did not ſee that even at this time very eminent Authors are guilty of it.

(3) Ἐπαγτοφώρῳ, in flagranti crimine. Plut. de Fluviis p. m. 12. See Mauſſac's notes, p. 234, on that expreſſion of Plutarch.

I do not urge Valerius Flaccus's authority in order to prove that Phaſis was not continent. For when that Poet relates that Phaſis being paſſionately in love with a beautiful nymph, whom he purſued moſt deſperately, he means the God of the River Phaſis.

Barbarus in patriis ſectatur montibus Aean
Phaſis, amore furens: pavidas jacit illa pharetras
Virgineo turbata metu; diſcurſibus & jam
Deficit: ac volucri victam deus alligat unda (4).

(4) Valer. Flaccus, Argonaut. lib 5. ver. 425. p. m. 304.

[B] There grew . . . . . a plant . . . . . which had a wonderful property. . . . . It was to be gathered with ſome precautions.] It was to be found at break of day in the beginning of the ſpring, when the myſteries of Hecate were celebrating: the God Pan's preſence was very much required there (5). See the margin (6). Jealous huſbands having gathered it, ſpread it about their beds, in order to keep them pure and undefiled: ἣν οἱ ζηλότυποι τῶν ἀνδρῶν διεπόμενοι, ῥίπτουσι περὶ τὸν παρθένιον θάλαμον, καὶ ἀνοδίνιον τηροῦσιν τὸν γάμον. Quam poſtquam hominum zelotypi collegerunt, circa thalamum virginalem jaciunt, ut puras conſervent nuptias (7). We meet with the ſame words in a book of Ariſtotle (8), but they have been added to it; and Monſieur Mauſſac does not queſtion (9) but they were extracted from the ſame work, from which I have juſt now tranſcribed them. Let us obſerve, that if a drunken man (10) came near the place where that plant grew, he loſt his ſenſes immediately, and confeſſed all the crimes he had committed, or deſigned to commit: he was ſeized, wrapt up in a piece of leather, and caſt into a round hole, which was called the little mouth of the impious, and which was like a well. That man's corps was ſeen thirty days after in the lake Mœotis, full of worms, and was immediately devoured by vultures, which had not been obſerved there before (11).

(5) Πρὸς παύισμαν ἔνθιον, ad Divinum Panis Dei afflatum. Plutarchus, de Fluviis, p. 17.

(6) This calls to my mind a vulgar tradition, which prevails in ſome provinces of France; which is, that the ſeed of Fern cannot be gathered but on St. John's Eve, at midnight exactly; and that to gather it ſucceſsfully, one muſt be aſſiſted by ſome Sorcereſs; that it has admirable properties, &c.

(7) Plutarchus, de Fluviis, p. 16.

I cannot tell whether the ſtory of this plant was not altered by thoſe, who abridged the Authors who mentioned it firſt, and by thoſe who quoted ſome part of thoſe abridgments. Theſe are two conſiderable cauſes of falſifications, becauſe ſome writers draw up a quite new account by quoting ſomething from the abbreviators, and ſomething from thoſe who applied to their particular deſigns what ſuited their purpoſe, omitting all the other circumſtances, and even improving thoſe which could be of any uſe to them. However it be, there is ſome probability that the firſt foundation of this ſtory was, that when the myſteries of Hecate were celebrating, the men, being obliged to contain themſelves, uſed to put into their wives beds an herb, the property of which was to cool nature. We have ſeen (12), that ſomething like this was practiſed among the Athenians, during the ſolemnity of the Theſmophoria. But it muſt be confeſſed, that the herb of the Phaſis would have been much more conſiderable than the Agnus caſtus of the Athenians, ſince its property not being confined to the duration of a feſtival, would have removed for ever the uneaſineſs of all jealous huſbands. Here follow ſome other lines of Pontus de Tyard.

(8) Περὶ θαυμασίων ἀκουσμ. De mirabili auſcultatione, ſub fin.

(9) Mauſſac, in Plutarchum de Fluviis, p. 235.

(10) Ἐάν τις τῶν ἀσεβεστέρων διὰ μέθην, ſi quis impurus ob ebrietatem. Plutarchus de Fluviis, p. 16.

(11) Extracted from Plutarch. ib. ex Cteſippo, lib. 2. Rerum Scythicarum.

(12) In the rem. [B], of the art. THESMOPHORIA.

Depuis du nom Phaſis eſt appellé ce fleuve,
Où le chaſte arbriſſeau Leucophile ſe treuve,
Remede à jalouſie en un froid cœur tombée.
Car quiconque au Printemps en ſon lit cachera
Cette plante trempée en Phaſis: treuvera
Que jamais ſa Venus ne ſera dérobée (13).

(13) Pontus de Tyard, Douze Fables de Fleuves, ou Fontaines, folio 12.

i. e. "Phaſis was ſince that time the name of this "River, in which grows the chaſte ſhrub called "Leucophyllus, a remedy againſt jealouſy in a cold "heart:

meet with a better account of it in Moreri.

" heart. For whoever takes that plant in the ſpring, " dips it in the Phaſis, and hides it in his bed, " will find that his Venus will never be ſtole away " from him."

PHERON, King of Egypt, the ſon and ſucceſſor of Seſoſtris, did not undertake any war, and was puniſhed with blindneſs, for being ſo audacious as to ſhoot a dart on the waters of the Nile. They were ſwelled ſo much that they were above eighteen cubits high over the fields, and the wind made the River riſe in great waves. The King ſeeing this, commitred the attempt I have been mentioning, and was ſtruck blind on the ſpot. He continued ten years in that condition, and then he was told by an Oracle that the time of his misfortune was going to expire, and that he would recover his ſight, in caſe his eyes were waſhed with the water of a woman, who never lay with any man but her own huſband. He tried firſt his own ſpouſe's water, but got no benefit by it; afterwards he uſed that of other women, and at laſt he was cured. He cauſed all the women, whoſe water he had uſed to no purpoſe, to be conducted into a certain city, and had them all burnt together with the city; afterwards he married the woman to whom he was indebted for the recovery of his eye-ſight; and he conſecrated in the Temples ſeveral monuments of his gratitude towards the Gods, and particularly two Obeliſks in the Temple of the Sun [A], which were an hundred cubits high, and eight cubits broad. A man of Memphis, whom the Greeks called Proteus reigned after him (a). This article being to be met with in Moreri's Dictionary, I deſigned at firſt to omit it. But I altered my reſolution, when I ſaw what libertles men take in falſifying that ſtory. As I was determined to cenſure that licentiouſneſs, it was neceſſary that I ſhould lay before the readers a faithful account of this old ſtory, that it might be compared with the falſe copy which modern Writers have preſumed to give of it [B].

(a) Extracted from Herodotus, lib. 2. cap. 111, 112. p. m. 129, 130. See alſo Diod. Sicilus, lib. 1. cap. 59.

PHILELPHUS

[A] And particularly two Obeliſks in the Temple of the Sun.] Sir John Marſham (1) thinks they are both at Rome. and that the one is that which Sixtus V. cauſed to be erected before St. Peter's Church. He thinks alſo Caligula had one of theſe two obeliſks carried to Rome, and grounds his opinion on ſome paſſages in Pliny, which do not ſignify this. Here follows what Pliny obſerves, according to Father Hardouin's edition; in which the erroneous reading, which Sir John followed, is corrected. Tertius (obeliſcus) Romæ in Vaticano Caii & Neronis principum Circo, ex omnibus unus omnino factus eſt imitatione ejus; quem fecerat Seſoſtridis filius Nuncoreus. Ejuſdem remanet & alius centum cubitorum, quem poſt cæcitatem viſu reddito, ex oraculo ſoli ſacravit (2). i. e. " The third " (Obeliſk) is at Rome in the Vatican Circus or Ring " of the Emperors Claudius and Nero; it was made " up of all the reſt in imitation of that, which Nuncoreus Seſoſtris's ſon erected. There is alſo another of the ſame Nuncoreus, an hundred cubits " high, which he conſecrated to the ſun according " to the Oracle, having recovered his eye-ſight, after he had been ſometime blind." You ſhall ſee now how Sir John Marſham quotes this paſſage. Plinio appellatur Nuncoreus Seſoſtridis filius ille, qui Obeliſcum centum cubitorum poſt cæcitatem (vidi reddito ex oraculo) Soli ſacravit. Ejuſdem remanet & alius Romæ (in Vaticano Caii & Neronis principum Circo) ex omnibus unus omnino fractus eſt in mobilitione (3). i. e. " Pliny calls Nuncoreus that ſon of " Seſoſtris, who after he had been blind conſecrated " to the Sun an Obeliſk an hundred feet high (when " he had recovered his ſight, according to the Oracle.) " There remains alſo another of his at Rome in the " Vatican Circus of the Emperors Claudius and Nero, which alone was entirely broken in pieces, " in the taking of it down." Obſerve that Pliny (4) does not aſſert, that the obeliſk which was carried to Rome under Caligula, was one of the two obeliſks which the ſon of Seſoſtris erected.

(1) Marſh. Chron. Can. Seculo 15. p. m. 413, 414.

(2) Plinius, lib. 36. cap. 11. p. m. 199.

(3) Marſh. Chron. Can. p. 414.

(4) Plinius, lib. 36. cap. 9. p. 296, 297.

[B] I lay before the Reader a faithful account of that old ſtory, that it might be compared with the falſe copy which modern writers have preſumed to give of it.] I do not pretend to level this at Monſieur Chevreau: for he has not falſified Herodotus's narration (5). It is true he adds a particular to it, which is that the woman who reſtored Pheron's eye-ſight was a gardiner's wife; this Hiſtorian whom he quotes does not aſſert this; but that addition is not material; and after all it is true that an antient Hiſtorian (6), whom he does not quote, calls that woman a gardiner's wife. The reflection, which is added to Chevreau's account, is not to be cenſured. An Author, who relates what he has read, may, if he pleaſes, add moral reflections to it; he muſt only take care that his Readers be not puzzled to know whether they be his, or belong to the Author he quotes. Monſieur Chevreau does not leave us in ſuſpenſe; we perceive without the leaſt trouble, that it was he and not Herodotus, who ſays, " If there were a Pheron at this time, and if the " remedy which cured him were in uſe, and the ſame " penalty revived, there are many women, who " would have occaſion to fear leſt they ſhould ſtarve " with cold (7)." This is a Commentary ſuitable to the text: for it is not to be queſtioned, but this Hiſtory of Pheron is a mere ſtory, or a ſatyrical invention againſt the women. My readers do not want to be be told, 1. That there never was an oracle, which told a King, who had been ten years blind, that he would ſoon recover his ſight. 2. That it is not true that a chaſte woman's water ever cured blindneſs. Men are therefore ſufficiently perſuaded among Chriſtians, that what Herodotus related in that paſſage is a mere fable, and one of the ſtories, which in thoſe dark and ignorant ages were invented almoſt with the ſame view as the apologues, and the fictions of Æſop were; I mean, with a deſign to inſpire people with a fear of the Gods, and to cenſure bad morals. Railleries were ſometimes made uſe of, and wicked jokes againſt the women. This point was not omitted in the ſtory of Pheron. But our modern Writers, finding it too ſimple, and dreſſed up too negligently, have taken pains to adorn it. It is related in the Saint-Evremoniana after this manner. " A King " named Pheron being grown blind, begged of the " Oracle a remedy to cure him; the urine of a woman true to her huſband was preſcribed to him. " But his own wife and all the women in the Kingdom wanting that virtue, he was obliged to ſend " Embaſſadors into the neighbouring Kingdoms, to " enquire for one; after numberleſs enquiries he met " with one by chance, who cured him: and having " firſt cauſed his wife to be burnt, he married the " woman who reſtored his ſight to him: but indeed " ſhe did not prove ſo chaſte afterwards; and the " King having aſked her the reaſon why ſhe had " been true to her firſt huſband, ſhe anſwered ingenuouſly, that no man had ever aſked her the queſtion " (8)." When a Boccaccio or a Douville inſert into their ſtory the moſt diverting particulars they can think of, one ought not to take offence at it; the ground-work is entirely their own, they may adorn it as they pleaſe. But when a man relates a ſtory contained in the beſt books which antiquity has tranſmitted down to us, he is no longer at liberty to ſet it off with new ornaments, by a ſupplement of particulars

(5) See the 2d part of the Chevræana, p. 395, of the Dutch edition.

(6) Diod. Siculus, lib. 1. cap. 59.

(7) Chevræana, 2 part. p. 396.

(8) S. Evremoniana, p. 132, 133, of the Dutch edition.

(9) See the Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, Feb. 1701. p. 145.

ticulars lately invented. And yet this is what has been done in the Saint-Evremoniana. It is a book of which we are told for certain, that Monsieur de Saint Evremont is not the Author, and which he disowns from the beginning to the end (9). There are nevertheless many good things in that work, and which seem to be expressed after his own manner: but whoever be the Author of it, Monsieur de Vigneul Marville would not scruple to give him the following advice. The more a writer abounds with such particulars, as are to be met with in Brantome, the more he raises himself above the common sort of Writers, and proves useful to the publick: they who relate them ought only to take care, that they be true and well grounded. For an Author should not be suffered to forge chimeras in order to adorn his History (10).

(10) Vign. Marville, Melanges d'Histoire & de Litterature, Tom. 2. p. 159, of the Dutch edit.

Let us observe by the by, that this is not the first time, that authors and booksellers have falsly ascribed works to Monsieur de St. Evremont. That artifice begins to grow stale, and one cannot reflect upon this without comparing that illustrious Author to the man, to whom seven women were to go and say, We will eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel, only let us be called by thy name, to take away our reproach (11).

(11) Isaiah, c. 4. ver. 1.

PHILELPHUS . . . . . .

. . . . . .

The work he entitled Florentinarum de exilio Commentationum, pro exulibus Florentinis à Cosmo Medicæo atque ejus factione ejectis, conscriptarum Libri tres, and dedicated by him to Vitalian Borrhomeo, is not in the catalogue of his works inserted in his life. In all probability it was never printed. The Author mentions it in a letter to Anthony Metallus, and in another letter to John Olzina (a). I read this in a work of Don Nicholas Antonio (b), to whom Martin Vasques Sirvela (c) had lent that manuscript.

(a) See the 16th book of Philelphus's Epistles.

(b) Nicol. Antonius, de Exilio, lib. 1. cap. 1. p. 4.

(c) He had a noble Library in Seville.

PHILETAS, a Grammarian, Critick, and Poet, was a native of the island of Cos, and lived in the time of Alexander the Great, and of Ptolemy I. King of Egypt, who appointed him Preceptor to his son Ptolemy Philadelphus (a). He published several Poems, of which there are extant only some fragments in Athenæus; and in certain other antient Authors who had quoted him [A]. He wrote elegies with so much beauty, that many allowed him the second place in that species of versification. It is not certain that Propertius, a good judge of these matters, gave him only the second place [B]. Now as this elegy was employed chiefly in mournful subjects, and the misfortunes of lovers; it cannot be denied but that Philetas had a peculiar talent, for exhibiting, by his air, and every part of his exterior, the character of the Poem in which he excelled; and to prevent the want of opportunities which make the Muses grow languid. He was so very short, and so thin, that he was obliged to put lead into his shoes, to prevent his being carried away by the wind [C]. This was the way to avoid the reproaches, which are so frequently made to Lent-preachers, when, with a hale and ruddy complexion, they groan on account of the corrupted state of mankind, and bewail the contempt in which the laws of mortification are held. This would become them better, were they as lean as our Philetas. Besides, we may easily suppose, that he very frequently was reduced to the necessity of deploring the cruelty of his Battis; for an air like that of our Philetas, a body so very much emaciated, that the least puff of wind could cast him to the ground, was (a) Suidas. See also Strabo, book 14. p. 452.

(b) Me tamen Coæ Battis amasse dies. Ovid. Trist. lib. 1. El. 6. ver. 2.

[A] Some antient Authors . . . . . had quoted him.] Parthenius borrows his second amorous adventure from him (1). Stephanus Byzantinus cites him under the Greek words ἴχνη and φλιῶς. He is quoted three or four times in the Etymologicum magnum. Stobæus mentions something of his Paignia, in the discourses containing the subjects of consolation, παιγνιχά. I suppose that the Philetas cited by them is he of Cos: for I do not know that Philetas of Ephesus, whom we hear of only by Suidas, was ever an Author. I will not pretend to say, as many do, that Claudian hinted at Philetas in the following verse:

(1) Under the article Philetas in Moreri, Parthenius should not have been cited in Erat. but in Erot. i. e. in Eroticis.

Fors juvat audentes, Coi sententia vatis.

" Fortune assists the bold, said Coos' bard:

(2) See Barthius in Claud. Epist. ad Probin. p. 967.

it not being certain, whether we ought to read Coi rather than Cei, Chii, or Prisei (2).

[B] Many allowed him the second place . . . . . It is not certain that Propertius . . . . . gave him only the second place.] I leave those, who have considered a little the three following passages of Propertius, to determine this matter.

(3) Propert. lib. 2. Eleg. 34.

Tu satius memorem musis imitere Philetam,
Et non inflati somnia Callimachi (3).

(4) Idem. lib. 3. Eleg. 8.

Inter Callimachi sat erit placuisse libellos,
Et cecinisse modis Coe poeta tuis (4).

(5) Idem. lib. 3. Eleg. 1. There is another passage Eleg. 6. lib. 4. where he hints at those two Poets, and Philetas the first. Stat. Silv. 2. lib. 1. names Philetas before Callimachus.

Callimachi manes & Coi sacra Philetæ
In vestrum quæso me sinite ire nemus.

" The Muse belov'd, Philetas, imitate;
" And not Callimachus's turgid dreams.
" 'Twill be enough, if like Callimachus
" You please, and like the bard of Coos sing.

" Permit, the Manes of Callimachus,
" And fam'd Philetas, in your groves to go."

I do not desire, that those passages should be understood as they are explained by Joseph Scaliger; for I am of opinion that he is mistaken, in imagining that Propertius dissuades from the imitation of the turgid Callimachus: and when he reads, instead of Coe Poeta tuis, he reads pare Poeta tuis, to conclude from thence, that Propertius judged Philetas's verses to be sweeter than those of any other Poet. I do not desire all this; I am certain that, without having recourse to such helps, the reader will find that, all things duly considered, Propertius does not rank Philetas below Callimachus. I do not know why Ælian ranks Philetas among the heroic Poets (6), nor why Lorenzo Crasso (7) makes Callimachus say, that Philetas holds the second place in elegiac writing: Quintillian ought to be cited: Elegiæ princeps habetur Callimachus, says he, Chap. I. Lib. X. of his institutions, secundas confessione plurimorum Philetas occupavit. i. e. " Callimachus is looked upon as the " first elegiae writer; and Philetas, as most persons " confess, has obtained the second rank." See also Proclus in the extracts of his Chrestomathia, which Photius has preserved (8).

(6) Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. 10. cap. 6.

(7) Istor. de Poet. Grec. 231.

(8) Photius, cap. 239.

[C] He was obliged to put lead into his shoes, to prevent his being carried away by the wind.] He used to put leaden balls to his feet, according to Athenæus (9), or leaden soles to his shoes, according to the Authors copied by Ælian, though he does not give credit to their story (10). The reason of his unbelief is, that a man, who was not able to bear up against the wind, would not have been able to wear such heavy shoes.

(9) Athen. lib. 12. cap. 13. p. 552.

(10) Ælian. Var. Hist. lib. 9. cap. 14. See also lib. 10. cap. 6.

[D] His

was no very inviting charm in the article of love. This circumſtance, perhaps, had rendered him ſo very ſkilful in writing of elegies. In all probability he was ſeldom ſucceſsful in his amorous purſuits, but met with continual repulſes. Be this as it will, the hectic and emaciating diſorder, which at laſt brought him to his end, was not aſcribed to his good or ill fortune in his amours; but it was aſcribed, in his epitaph, to his over great application to ſtudy, and to his watchings [D]; a circumſtance that would be much more honourable to his memory, had he employed himſelf in important ſubjects: but the poor creature waſted his ſtrength, and deſtroyed his health, by ſearching after the captious and intricate ſophiſms of the Logicians (c); and particularly after that called the Liar, which was a mere puerile ſubtilty [E]. It is thought that he gave the title of Telephus to one of his Poems, from his father's name. It is mentioned under this title by the Scholiaſt on Apollonius (d); but according to Voſſius, page 401 of his Greek Hiſtorians, that Scholiaſt ſpoke of a Poem entitled Templum.

(c) Athen. lib. 9. Suidas.

(d) In lib. 4. apud Andræam Schottum in Procli Chreſtomathiam.

[D] His death was aſcribed, in his epitaph, to his own great application to ſtudy, and to his watchings.] We are obliged to Athenæus for preſerving this particular incident (11). You run the hazard, ſays he, directing himſelf to an inquiſitive man, who never eat any meat, without enquiring how long it had had the name by which it was called, to wear out your life in thoſe kinds of reſearches, as Philetas did his, in examining a ſophiſm; for this ſtudy emaciated his body to ſuch a degree, that it brought him to his end. His inſcription engraved on his tomb, declares this, &c. Muretus, in his notes on elegy 1. book 3. of Propertius, carries this teſtimony of Athenæus a little farther than he ſhould have done; he making that Author ſay, that Philetas loſt his life by too intenſe an application to his ſtudies, and by his vexation at his not having been able to diſcover the ſolution of a ſophiſm. Athenæus does not mention this vexation. Had Muretus only conjectured this, nothing could have been objected to him; but a Writer ought to lay it down as a law to himſelf, never to aſcribe to an Author, words which were never ſaid by him. How troubleſome muſt it be for our Readers, when we confound our paraphraſes, gloſſes and conjectures, with the text of the antient Authors cited by us (12)?

(11) Κινδυνεύεις ἴσως ποτὲ διὰ ταῦτας τὰς φροντίδας ὥσπερ ὁ Κῶος φιλητᾶς ζητῶν τὸν καλούμενον ψευδολόγον τῶν λόγων, ὁμοίως ἐκεῖνος διαλυθῆναι· ἰσχνὸς γὰρ πάνυ τὸ σῶμα διὰ τὰς ζητήσεις γενόμενος ἀπέθανεν. ὡς τὸ πρὸ τῆ μνημείῳ αὐτῆ ἐπίγραμμα δηλοῖ Φίλητ' ἐγὼ φιλητᾶς εἰμὶ λόγων ὁ ψευδόμενος μ' Ὦλεσε, καὶ νυκτῶν φροντίδες ἐσπέριοι. Eſt itaque periculum ne ob has curas aliquando ut Philetas Cous perveſtigans rationum mentientem dictam exolutus pereas: nam corpore ob id ſtudium valde attenuato is obiit, quod inſculptum ejus monumento declarat hoc Epigramma Hoſpes, Philetas ſum mendax & captioſa ratio Me perdidit, veſpertinæque ac nocturnæ ſtudiorum curæ. Athen. lib. 9. p. 401.

[E] The Liar . . . . . was a mere puerile ſubtilty.] The ſophiſm, to which the Greeks give the name of ψευδόμενον, is called mentiens by Tully, in his ſecond book de Divinatione. This is one of the moſt famous ſophiſms that Eubulides, Euclid's ſucceſſor, exhibited (13). It conſiſted of certain terms, which ſeem to deſtroy one another; or, according to Africanus the Civilian (14), it is a way of reaſoning, qua quicquid verum eſſe conſtitueris, falſum eſſe reperietur, i. e. "whereby, whatever a perſon lays down "for a truth, is found to be falſe.". Here follows an example of this (15): If you ſay that you tell a lie, and, in ſaying this, you tell the truth, you tell a lie: now you ſay that you lie, and in this you ſay the truth; conſequently you lie, in telling the truth. This is a ſyllogiſm, whereby one proves that a man did not ſpeak truth, for the very reaſon that he does ſpeak it. The ſame ſophiſm may be made, by ſuppoſing that a man who foreſwears himſelf, ſwears that he is foreſworn; for, at one and the ſame time, he ſwears the truth, and conſequently he is not foreſworn; and ſwears a falſhood, and conſequently he is foreſworn. The ſame contradictory conſequences were drawn from Epimenides, a Cretan by birth, who had ſaid that all the Cretans are liars. The Stoicks were very fond of theſe falſe ſubtilties of the ſect of Megara. The modern Logicians ſometimes employ the propoſitions they call ſeipſas falſificantes; ſuch as the following, ſemper mentior, i. e. I always lie. Any perſon, who is maſter of a little good ſenſe, may eaſily diſcover the fallacy of this kind of ſophiſms; and yet (16) Ariſtotle too declares very ſeriouſly, that the ſophiſm called the Liar is a very puzzling one. I am far leſs pleaſed to hear him ſay this, than to ſee Seneca laughing at the multitude of books, which had been compoſed on that ſophiſm (17); quid me detines in eo quem tu ipſe pſeudomenon appellas, de quo tantum librorum compoſitum eſt (18), ecce tota mihi vita mentitur, hanc coargue, hanc ad verum, ſi acutus es, dirige, i. e. "Why do you entertain me ſo long "with what you call the Liar, upon which ſo many "books have been writ? Lo, all my life is made "up of lies; diſprove this, and, if you have any "ſubtilty, direct this to truth." Read the remark [D], of the article EUCLID.

(15) See Cicero, Academ. 4.

(16) Ethic. Nicom. lib. 7. cap. 3. rem. [D] art. EUCLID

(17) Seneca, Epiſt. 45.

(18) Chryſippus had writ eleven books upon it. Diog. Laert. in ejus Vita.

(12) Compare this with remark [B] of the art. PHERON. (13) Diog. Laert. lib. 2. (14) L. qui quadring. 88 ad leg. Falc.

☞ PHILIPS (KATHERINE), a very ingenious Lady in the 17th Century, was daughter of Mr. John Fowler, of Bucklerſbury, in London, Merchant, by Katherine his wife, daughter of Daniel Oxenbridge, Dr. of Phyſic. She was born in the Pariſh of St. Mary Wool-Church, in London, and baptized there on the 11th of January, 1631, and educated under Mrs. Salmon, at a ſchool in Hackney, where ſhe very early diſtinguiſhed herſelf for her ſkill in Poetry. She married James Philips, of the Priory of Cardigan, Eſq; and went with the Viſcounteſs of Dungannon into Ireland, and tranſlated from the French into Engliſh Corneille's Tragedy of Pompey [A], which

[A] Tranſlated from the French into Engliſh Corneille's Tragedy of Pompey.] She tranſlated it at the requeſt of the Earl of Orrery, and dedicated it to the Counteſs of Cork. It was acted with great applauſe at the Duke's Theatre. How great an opinion Lord Orrery had of her performance, appears from the following verſes, being part of a copy addreſſed to her:

"You Engliſh Corneille's Pompey with ſuch flame,
"That you both raiſe our wonder and our fame.
"If he could read it, he like us would call
"The Copy greater than th' Original.
"You cannot mend what is already done,
"Unleſs you'll finiſh what you have begun.
"Who your tranſlation ſees, cannot but ſay,
"That 'tis Orinda's Work, and but his Play.
"The French to learn our language now will ſeek,
"To hear their greateſt wit more nobly ſpeak.
"Rome too will grant, were our tongue to her known,
"Cæſar ſpeaks better in't, than in his own.
"And all thoſe wreaths once circled Pompey's brow,
"Exalt his fame leſs than your verſes now."

The Prologue to it, when it was acted at the Theatre in Dublin, was written by the Earl of Roſcommon, and the Epilogue by Sir Edward Deering, Bart. This Tragedy of Corneille was tranſlated by Mr. Waller, the Earl of Dorſet, &c. Mrs. Philips ſpeaks of this tranſlation in a letter to Sir Charles Cotterel, dated September the 17th 1663, in the following terms (1): I have ſeen the ſecond and fourth acts of Pompey, that was tranſlated by the wits, and have read and conſidered them very impartially. The expreſſions are ſome of them great and noble, and the verſes ſmooth; yet there is room in ſeveral places for an ordinary Critic to ſhew his ſkill. But I cannot but be ſurprized at which was ſeveral times acted at the new Theatre there with great applauſe, in 1663 and 1664, in which laſt year it was publiſhed. Her poems were firſt printed the ſame year, though without her conſent [B]. She died of the Small-pox in Fleetſtreet, in June 1664, and was interred on the 22d of that month, in the Church of St. Bennet Sherehog in London at the great liberty they have taken in adding, omitting, and altering the original, as they pleaſe themſelves. This I take to be a liberty not pardonable in Tranſlators, and unbecoming the modeſty of that attempt. For ſince the different ways of writing ought to be obſerved with their ſeveral properties, this way of garbling Authors is fitter for a paraphraſe than a tranſlation. But having aſſumed ſo great a licence, I wonder their Verſes are any where either flat or rough, which you will obſerve them not ſeldom to be. Beſides, their Rhymes are frequently very bad; but what chiefly diſguſts me, is, that the ſenſe moſt commonly languiſhes through three or four lines, and then ends in the middle of the fifth. For I am of opinion, that the ſenſe ought always to be confined to the couplet; otherwiſe the lines muſt needs be ſpiritleſs and dull. I wiſh you could procure me the third and fifth Acts, for I long to ſee them, eſpecially the third, which I take to be the moſt noble and beſt written in the French.

(1) Letters from Orinda to Poliarchus, p. 178, 179. edit. Lond. 1705.

[B] Her Poems were firſt printed the ſame year [1664], though without her conſent.] They were printed in 8vo. Upon the publication of this edition, her friend Sir Charles Cotterel, knowing how averſe ſhe was to appear in print, and being ſure that it was without her conſent, went immediately, both to the Gentleman who had licenſed it upon the Bookſeller's averment that he had her leave, and to the Bookſeller himſelf, for whom it was printed; and took the beſt courſe he could with both to get it ſuppreſſed, as it preſently was (though afterwards many of the books were privately ſold) and gave her an account by the next poſt, of what he had done. Upon this ſhe wrote a letter to Sir Charles, dated January the 29th, 1663-4, in which ſhe writes thus (2): I am ſo obliged to you for the friendly concern you take in the unfortunate attempt of the unworthy publiſhing of my fooliſh rhymes, that I know not which way to expreſs, much leſs to deſerve the leaſt part of ſo noble an obligation. Philaſter gave me a hint of this misfortune laſt poſt, and I immediately took an opportunity of expreſſing to him the great, but juſt affliction it was to me; and begged him to join with you in doing what I ſee your friendſhip had urged you both to do without that requeſt; for which I now thank you, it being all that could be done to give me eaſe; but the ſmart of that wound ſtill remains and hurts my mind. You may be aſſured, I had obeyed you by writing after my old ill rate, on the occaſion you mention, had you not in your next letter ſeemed to have changed your opinion, adviſing me rather to haſten to London, and vindicate myſelf, by publiſhing a true copy. Beſides, I conſidered it would have been too airy a way of reſenting ſuch an injury; and I could not be ſo ſoon reconciled to verſe, which has been ſo inſtrumental to afflict me, as to fall to it again already. However, if you ſtill think it proper, I will reſign my judgment and humour to yours, and try what I can do that way. Mean while, I have ſent you incloſed my true thoughts on that occaſion in proſe, and have mixed nothing elſe with it, to the end that you may, if you pleaſe, ſhew it to any body, that ſuſpects my ignorance and innocence of that falſe edition of my verſes; and I believe it will make a greater impreſſion on them, than if it were written in rhyme. Incloſed in this letter ſhe ſent the following. " 'Tis well " you chid me ſo much for endeavouring to expreſs " a part of the ſenſe I have of your obligations; " for while you go on in conferring them paſt all " poſſibility of acknowledgment, it is very convenient for me to be forbidden to attempt it. Your " laſt generoſity in vindicating me for the unworthy " uſage I have received from the preſs at London, " as much tranſcends all your former favours, as the " injury done me by that Printer and Publiſher, " ſurpaſſes all the troubles, that to my remembrance " I ever had. All I can ſay to you for it is only " this, that you aſſert the cauſe of an innocent, tho' " a very unhappy perſon; and that it is impoſſible " for malice itſelf to have printed thoſe rhymes, " which you tell me are got abroad ſo impudently, " with ſo much wrong and abuſe to them, as the " very publication of them at all, though never ſo " correct, had been to me, who never writ a line " in my life, with intention to have it printed; " and am truly of my Lord Falkland's mind, when " he ſays,

" ——He danger fear'd than cenſure leſs,
" Nor could he dread a breach like to the preſs.

" You know me, Sir, to have been all along ſufficiently diſtruſtful of whatever my own want of company and a better employment, or the commands " of others have ſeduced me to write, and that I " have rather endeavoured never to have thoſe trifles ſeen at all, than that they ſhould be expoſed " to all the world in this impudent manner, in which " they now moſt unhappily are. But is there no " retreat can ſhield me from the malice of this " world? I thought that rocks and mountains might " have hidden me; that it was free for all to beguile " their ſolitude with what harmleſs thoughts they " pleaſed; and that our rivers, though they are babling, would not have betrayed the follies of impertinent thoughts, that were produced on their " banks. But I am the only unfortunate perſon, " who cannot ſo much as think in private; who " muſt have all my imaginations and idle notions " rifled and expoſed to play the Mountebanks, and " dance upon the ropes to entertain the Rabble; to " undergo all the raillery of the Wits; and all the " ſeverity of the Wiſe; to be the ſport of ſome that " can, and deriſion of others, that cannot read a " verſe. This is the moſt cruel accident, that could " ever have befallen me, and has already made a " proportionate impreſſion on me; for it has coſt me " a ſharp fit of ſickneſs ſince I heard it, and I believe would have been more fatal, but that I conſidered what a champion I have in you, whoſe " credit in the world will gain me a belief with all " the better ſort of perſons, that I am ſo innocent " of that wretched artifice of a ſecret conſent, of " which I fear I am ſuſpected, that whoever would " have brought me thoſe copies corrected and amended, and a thouſand pounds to have bought my " permiſſion to print them, ſhould not have obtained it. You know too, beſides, that though " there are many things in this villainous impreſſion, " which the ignorance of what occaſioned them, and " the falſeneſs of the copies may repreſent very ridiculous and extravagant; yet I could give ſome " account of them, even to the ſevereſt Cato; and " ſure they muſt be more abuſed, than I can believe " it poſſible for them to be, (for I have not yet " ſeen the book, nor can imagine what it is,) before they can be diſguiſed in ſuch a manner, as " not to deſerve the character of thoſe lines of Sir " Edward Dering, in his Epilogue to Pompey,

" ——No nobler thought can tax
" Thoſe rhymes of blemiſh to the bluſhing ſex:
" As chaſte the lines, as harmleſs is the ſenſe,
" As the firſt ſmiles of infant innocence.

" So that I hope there will be no need of juſtifying " them to virtue and honour. And I am ſo little " concerned for the reputation of writing ſenſe, that " provided the world will believe me wholly innocent of the leaſt knowledge, much more of any " connivance at this publication, I will willingly " compound, never to trouble them with the true copies; which nevertheleſs, you adviſe me to do; " though if you ſtill judge it abſolutely neceſſary to " the reparation of the misfortune, and to the general ſatisfaction, and if, as you tell me, all the reſt " of my friends will preſs me to it, I ſhall reſolve " upon it with the ſame reluctancy, that I would " cut off a limb to ſave my life. However, I hope " you will ſatisfy all your acquaintance of my averſion to it; and did they know me as well as you do, " that

(2) Ibid. p. 219, 220.

London [C], under a grave-ſtone, where her father, grandfather, and grandmother lye interred (a). Mr. Cowley wrote an Ode on her death. Dr. Jeremiah Taylor addreſſed to her his Meaſures and Offices of Friendſhip; the ſecond edition of which was printed at London 1657, in 12mo. She aſſumed the name of Orinda. The Author of the Preface to her Poems printed at London 1678 in folio, tells us, that ſhe "wrote her familiar "letters with great facility, in a very fair hand, and perfect orthography; and if they "were collected with thoſe excellent diſcourſes ſhe writ on ſeveral ſubjects, they would "make a volume much larger than this of her Poems (b)." In 1705 a ſmall volume of her letters to Sir Charles Cotterel were printed at London under the title of Letters from Orinda to Poliarchus; the Editor of which tells us, that they were the effect of an happy intimacy between herſelf and the late famous Poliarchus, and are an admirable pattern for the pleaſing correſpondence of a virtuous friendſhip. They will ſufficiently inſtruct us how an entercourſe of writing between perſons of different ſexes ought to be managed with delight and innocence; and to teach the world not to load ſuch a commerce with cenſure and detraction, when it is removed at ſuch a diſtance from even the appearance of guilt.

(a) Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 402, 403. 2d edition.

(b) Which contains about 320 pages in folio.

"that apology were very unneceſſary; for I am ſo "far from expecting applauſe on account of any "thing I write, that I can ſcarce expect a pardon. "And ſometimes I think, that to make verſes, is ſo "much above my reach, and a diverſion ſo unfit for "the ſex to which I belong, that I am about to re-"ſolve againſt it for ever; and could I have reco-"vered thoſe fugitive papers, that have eſcaped my "hand, I had long ſince, I believe, made a ſacrifice "of them all to the flames. The truth is, I have "always had an incorrigible inclination to the vani-"ty of rhyming, but intended the effects of that hu-"mour only for my own amuſement in a retired "life; and therefore did not ſo much reſiſt it, as a "wiſer woman would have done. But ſome of my "deareſt and beſt friends having found my Ballads "(for they deſerve no better a name) they made me "ſo much believe they did not diſlike them, that I "was betrayed to permit ſome copies to be taken "for their diverſion, but this with ſo little concern "for them, that I have loſt moſt of their originals; "which I ſuppoſe to be the cauſe of my preſent miſ-"fortune. For ſome infernal ſpirits or other have "catched thoſe rags of paper; and what the care-"leſs blotted writing kept them from underſtanding, "they have ſupplied by conjecture, till they have at "length put them in the ſhape wherein you ſaw "them; or elſe I know not which way it is poſſible "for them to have been collected, and ſo abomina-"bly printed, as I hear they are. I believe too, there "are ſome among them, that are not mine; and "thus I am not only injured in my own particular, "but on the account likewiſe of thoſe worthy per-"ſons, who had then the ill luck to be of my con-"verſation, whoſe names are, without their leave, "expoſed in this impreſſion, ſo that there are but few "things in the power of fortune, that could have "afflicted me more than this treacherous accident. "To conclude, I know you ſo much my friend, that "I need not aſk your pardon for making this tedious "complaint; but I own it is a great injuſtice to re-"venge myſelf thus on you, for the wrongs which have "been done me by others; and therefore, will only "tell you, that the ſole advantage I gain by this "cruel news is, that it has convinced me by dear "experience, that no adverſary can ſhake the con-"ſtancy of your friendſhip, and that in the worſt hu-"mour that ever I was in, I ſtill am, &c.

Januar. 29.
1663-4. "Orinda."

In 1667, there was printed at London, in folio, Poems by the moſt deſervedly admired, Mrs. Katherine Philips, the matcheleſs Orinda. To which is added, Monſieur Corneille's, Pompey and Horace, Tragedies. With ſeveral other tranſlations from the French, with her picture before it, engraven by Faithorne. There was likewiſe another edition at London 1678, in folio.

She tranſlated but the four firſt Acts of Corneille's Horace, the fifth being done by Sir John Denham.

[C] Interred . . . in the Church of St. Bennet Sherehog, in London.] Her ſon Hector, who died an infant, was interred there; and ſhe wrote the following epitaph on him, printed among her works.

What on earth deſerves our truſt?
Youth and beauty both are duſt.
Long we gathering are with pain,
What one moment calls again.
Seven years childleſs marriage paſt,
A ſon, a ſon is born at laſt;
So exactly limb'd and fair,
Full of good ſpirits, mien, and air,
As a long life promiſed;
Yet in leſs than ſix weeks dead.
Too promiſing, too great a mind
In ſo ſmall room to be confin'd.
Therefore as fit in Heav'n to dwell,
He quickly broke the priſon-ſhell.
So the ſubtle Alchemiſt
Can't with Hermes' ſeal reſiſt
The pow'rful ſpirit's ſubtler flight,
But 'twill bid him long good night.
And ſo the ſun, if it ariſe
Half ſo glorious as his eyes,
Like this infant, takes a ſhrowd,
Buried in a morning cloud.

T.

☞ PHILIPS JOHN, an eminent Engliſh Poet, was ſon of Dr. Stephen Philips, Arch-deacon of Salop, and born at Bampton in Oxfordſhire, December 30, 1676. After he was well grounded in Grammar learning, he was ſent to Wincheſter ſchool, where he made himſelf maſter of the Latin and Greek languages, and was ſoon diſtinguiſhed for an happy imitation of the excellencies, which he diſcovered in the beſt claſſical Authors (a). With this foundation of good learning he was removed to Chriſt-Church in Oxford, where he performed all his Univerſity-exerciſes with applauſe, and in a ſhort time grew to be ſuperior to moſt of his Contemporaries, and following the natural bent of his genius, beſides other valuable Authors, became acquainted with Milton [A], whom

(a) Mr. George Sewell's Life and Character of Mr. John Philips, p. 4. 3d edit. Lond. 1720.

[A] Beſides other valuable Authors became acquainted with Milton.] Mr. Sewell tells us (1), that there was not an alluſion in Paradiſe Loſt, drawn from the thoughts and expreſſions of Homer or Virgil, which our Author could not immediately refer to; and by that he perceived what a peculiar life and grace their ſentiments added to Engliſh poetry; how much their images raiſed its ſpirit, and what weight and beauty their words, when tranſlated, gave to its language. Nor was he leſs curious in obſerving the force and elegance of his mother-tongue; but, by the example of his darling Milton, ſearched backwards into the works of our old Engliſh Poets, to furniſh him with proper, ſounding, and ſignificant expreſſions, and prove the due extent and compaſs of the language. For this purpoſe he carefully read over Chaucer and Spencer; whom he ſtudied with application, and traced him in all his ſucceſsful tranſlations from the antients. Nor was he ſo in love with poetry, as to neglect any other parts of good literature, but was very well verſed in the whole compaſs of Natural Philoſophy [B]. While he continued at the Univerſity, he was honoured with the acquaintance of the beſt and politeſt men in it; and had a particular intimacy with Edmund Smith, Author of the Tragedy of Phædra and Hippolytus (b). The firſt Poem, which diſtinguiſhed him, was his Splendid Shilling [C]. The reaſon of his coming to London was the perſuaſion of ſome great perſons, who engaged him to write upon the battle of Blenheim (c); his Poem upon which [D] introduced him to the Earl of Oxford and Henry St. John, Eſq; afterwards Lord Viſcount Bolingbroke, and other noble patrons. He laid the foundation, and wrote the firſt book of his Cyder [E] at Oxford, and the ſecond for the moſt part at London (d). All that we have left more of this Poet is a Latin Ode to Henry St. John, Eſq; which is eſteemed a maſter-piece; the ſtyle being pure and elegant, the ſubject of a mixt nature, reſembling the ſublime ſpirit and gay facetious humour

(1) Life and Character of Mr. John Philips, p. 5.

(b) Sewell's Life and Character of Mr. John Philips, p. 4——9. 3d edit. Lond. 1720.

(c) Ibid. p. 11.

(d) Ibid. p. 18.

Spencer; and afterwards in his writings did not ſcruple to revive any words or phraſes, which he thought deſerved it, with that modeſty and liberty, which Horace allows of, either in the coining of new, or reſtoring of antient expreſſions.

[B] Nor was he ſo in love with poetry, as to neglect any other parts of good literature, but was very well verſed in the whole compaſs of Natural Philoſophy.] He ſeemed, in his ſtudies, as well as his writings, to have made Virgil his pattern, and often to have broken out with him into the following rapturous wiſh:

Me vero primum dulces ante omnia Muſæ,
Quarum ſacra fero ingenti perculſus amore,
Accipiant; cœlique vias & ſidera monſtrent;
Defectus ſolis varios, Lunæque labores;
Unde tremor terris, quæ vi maria alta tumeſcant
Objicibus ruptis, rurſuſque in ſe ipſa reſidant:
Quid tantum oceano properent ſe tingere ſoles
Hyberni; vel quæ tardis mora noctibus obſtet (2).

(2) Virgil, Georgic, lib. 2.

" Give me the ways of wandring ſtars to know,
" The depths of Heav'n above, and Earth below;
" Teach me the various labours of the Moon,
" And whence proceed th' eclipſes of the Sun.
" Why flowing tides prevail upon the main,
" And in what dark receſs they ſhrink again.
" What ſhakes the ſolid earth, what cauſe delays
" The ſummer-nights, and ſhortens winter-days."
DRYDEN.

Mr. Philips was no leſs paſſionate an admirer of nature; and it is probable, that he drew his own character in that deſcription, which he gives of a philoſophical and retired life, at the latter end of the firſt book of his Cyder:

——— He to his labour hies,
Gladſome, intent on ſomewhat that may eaſe
Unhealthy mortals, and with curious ſearch
Examines all the properties of herbs,
Foſſils, and minerals, that th' embowell'd earth
Diſplays, if by his induſtry he can Benefit human race.

And we have good reaſon to believe, that much might have been attained to, and many new diſcoveries made by ſo diligent an enquirer, and ſo faithful a recorder of phyſical operations. However, though death prevented the hopes of the world in that reſpect, yet the admirable paſſages of that kind, which we find in his Poem on Cyder, may convince us of the niceneſs of his obſervations in natural cauſes. Beſide this, he was particularly ſkilled in all manner of antiquities, eſpecially thoſe of his own country; and part of this too he has, with much art and beauty, intermixed with his poetry (3).

(3) Sewell, p. 6, 7, 8.

[C] His ſplendid Shilling.] In the Tatler (4) it is ſtyled the fineſt burleſque Poem in the Britiſh language. " Nor was it only, ſays Mr. Sewell (5), the fineſt of " that kind in our tongue, but handled in a manner " quite different from what had been made uſe of " by an Author of our own or other nations; the " ſentiments and ſtyle being in this both new; " whereas in thoſe, the jeſt lies more in alluſions to " the thoughts and fables of the Antients, than in the " pomp of the expreſſion. The ſame humour is continued through the whole, and not unnaturally " diverſified, as moſt poems of that nature have been " before. Out of that variety of circumſtances, which " his fruitful invention muſt ſuggeſt to him on ſuch " a ſubject, he has not choſen any but what are " diverting to every Reader, and ſome, that none " but his inimitable dreſs could have made diverting " to any. When we read it, we are betrayed into a " pleaſure, that we could not expect; though at the " ſame time, the ſublimity of the ſtyle, and the gra- " vity of the phraſe, ſeem to chaſtiſe that laughter, " which they provoke." Mr. Edmund Smith, in his poem upon our Author's death, ſpeaks thus concerning this poem.

(4) No. 250.

(5) p. 14, 15.

In her beſt light the comic Muſe appears,
When ſhe with borrow'd pride the buſkin wears.

[D] His poem upon Blenheim.] In this he ſhews, as Mr. Sewell remarks (6), that he could uſe the ſame ſublime and nervous ſtyle as properly on a ſerious and heroic ſubject, as he had before done on one of a more light and ludicrous nature. The Exordium of this piece is a juſt alluſion to the beginning of the Æneid, (if that be Virgil's,) and that of Spencer's Fairy Queen.

(6) p. 16.

From low and abject themes the grov'ling muſe
Now mounts aërial, to ſing of arms
Triumphant, and emblaze the martial acts
Of Britain's hero.

The ſpirit is kept on the ſame to the end; the whole being full of noble ſentiments and majeſtic numbers, and not admitting any rival on the ſame occaſion, except Mr. Addiſon's Campaign.

[E] His Cyder.] He was determined to the choice of this ſubject, by the violent paſſion he had to do ſome honour to his native country. The poem is founded upon the model of Virgil's Georgics, " and " comes neareſt, ſays Mr. Sewell (7), of any other, " to that admirable poem, which the Critics prefer " to the divine Æneid. Yet though it is eaſy to " diſcern who was his guide in that difficult way, " we may obſerve, that he comes after rather like " a purſuer than a follower, not tracing him ſtep af- " ter ſtep, but chooſing thoſe paths, in which he " might eaſieſt overtake him. All his imitations are " far from being ſervile, though ſometimes very " cloſe; at other times he brings in a new variety, " and entertains us with ſcenes more unexpected and " pleaſing perhaps, than his maſter's themſelves were " to thoſe, who firſt ſaw that work. The conduct " and management are ſuperior to all other Copy- " ers of that original; and even the admired Rapin " is much below him, both in deſign and ſucceſs; " for the Frenchman either fills his Gardens with the " idle fables of antiquity, or new tranſformations " of his own; and has, in contradiction to his own " rules of Criticiſm, injudiciouſly blended the ſe- " rious and ſublime ſtyle of Virgil, with the elegant " turns of Ovid in his Metamorphoſis. Nor has the " great genius of Mr. Cowley ſucceeded better in his " books of Plants, who, beſides the ſame faults with " the former, is continually varying his numbers " from one ſort of verſe to another, and alluding to " remote hints of Medicinal Writers, which, though " allowed humour of Horace (e). He intended to have written a Poem upon the Reſurrection and the Day of Judgment [F]. He was beloved by all who knew him; ſomewhat reſerved and ſilent among ſtrangers, but free, familiar, and eaſy with his friends. He was averſe to diſputes, and thought no time ſo ill ſpent, and no wit ſo ill uſed, as that which was employed in ſuch debates (f). His whole life was diſtinguiſhed by a natural goodneſs, and well grounded and unaffected piety, an univerſal charity, and a ſteady adherence to his principles. No one obſerved the natural and civil duties of life with a ſtricter regard, whether thoſe of a ſon, a friend, or a member of Society; and he had the happineſs to fill every one of thoſe parts without even the ſuſpicion either of undutifulneſs, inſincerity, or diſreſpect. Thus he continued to the laſt, not owing his virtues to the happineſs of his conſtitution, but the frame of his mind; inſomuch that during a long ſickneſs, which is apt to ruffle the ſmootheſt temper, he never betrayed any diſcontent or uneaſineſs, the integrity of his life ſtill preſerving the chearfulneſs of his ſpirits. And if his friends had meaſured their hopes of his life only by his unconcernedneſs in his ſickneſs, they could not but conclude, that either his date would be much longer, or that he was at all times prepared for death. He had long been troubled with a lingering conſumption attended with an aſthma; and the ſummer before he died, by the advice of his phyſicians, removed to the Bath; where, although he had the aſſiſtance of the ableſt of the faculty, by whom he was generally beloved, he only got ſome preſent eaſe, and went from thence, but with ſmall hopes of a recovery; and upon the return of his diſtimpers, died at Hereford the 15th of February following, in the year 1708. He was interred in the Cathedral of Hereford, with an inſcription upon his grave-ſtone [G]; and had a monument erected to his memory in Weſtminſter-Abbey by Sir Simon Harcourt, afterwards Lord Chancellor; the epitaph on which was written by Dr. Freind [H].

(7) p. 18.

(e) Ibid. p. 25.

(f) Ibid. p. 8.

PHILISTUS,

" allowed to be uſeful, are yet ſo numerous, that " they flatten the dignity of the verſe, and ſink it " from a Poem to a Treatiſe of Phyſic. It is not " out of envy to the merit of theſe great men, (and " who will ever be ſuch in ſpite of envy) that we " take notice of theſe miſtakes; but only to ſhew " the judgment of him, who followed them, in a- " voiding to commit the ſame. Whatever ſcenes he " preſents us with, appear delicate and charming; " the philoſophical touches ſurprize, the moral in- " ſtruct, and the gay deſcriptions tranſport the Rea- " der. Sometimes he opens the bowels of the " earth; at others, he paints its ſurface; ſometimes " he dwells upon its lower products and fruits; at " others, mounts to its higher and more ſtately plan- " tations, and then beautifies it with the innocent " pleaſures of its inhabitants. Here we are taught " the nature and variety of ſoils, there the difference " of vegetables; the ſports of a rural, the retire- " ment of a contemplative life, the working genius " of the huſbandman, the induſtry of the mechanic, " contribute as much to diverſify, as the due praiſes " of exalted patriots, heroes, and ſtateſmen, to raiſe " and ennoble the poetry. The change of ſeaſons " and their diſtinctions, introduced by the riſing " and ſetting of the ſtars, the effects of heat, cold, " ſhowers and tempeſts, are in their ſeveral places " very ornamental, and their deſcriptions inferior " only to thoſe of Virgil."

[F] He intended to have written a Poem upon the Reſurrection and the Day of Judgment.] Mr. Sewell remarks (8), that in this Poem, it is probable he would not only have exceeded all other, but even his own performances. That ſubject indeed was only proper to be treated of in that ſolemn ſtyle, which he makes uſe of, and by one, whoſe juſt notions of religion, and true ſpirit of poetry, could have carried his Reader without a wild enthuſiaſm,

(8) Sewell, p. 26.

——extra flammantia Mœnia Mundi.
LUCRET.

Milton has given a few fine touches upon the ſame; but ſtill there remains an inexhauſtible ſtore of materials to be drawn from the Prophets, the Pſalmiſt, and the other inſpired Writers, which in his poetical dreſs might, without the falſe boaſting of old Poets, have endured to the day that it deſcribed. The meaneſt ſoul and the loweſt imagination cannot think of that time and the deſcription we meet with of it in holy writ, without the greateſt emotion, and the deepeſt impreſſion. What then might we not expect from the believing heart of a good man, and the regulated flights and raptures of an excellent Chriſtian Poet? Our Author's friend Mr. Smith, who had probably ſeen the firſt rudiments of his deſign, ſpeaks thus of it in his Poem upon his death:

O! had relenting Heav'n prolong'd his days,
The towring bard had ſung in nobler lays,
How the laſt trumpet wakes the lazy dead;
How Saints aloft the croſs triumphant ſpread;
How op'ning Heav'ns their happy regions ſhow,
And yawning gulphs with flaming vengeance glow,
And Saints rejoice above, and Sinners howl below.
Well might he ſing the day he could not fear,
And paint the glories he was ſure to wear.

[G] An inſcription upon the grave-ſtone.] The inſcription is as follows:

JOHANNES PHILIPS.
Obiit 15 die Febr. Anno { Dom. 1708. / Ætat. ſuæ 32.
Cujus
Oſſa ſi requiras, hanc Urnam inſpice;
Si ingenium neſcias, ipſius Opera conſule;
Si Tumulum deſideras, Templum adi Weſtmonaſterienſe.
Qualis quantuſque Vir fuerit,
Dicat elegans illa & præclara,
Quæ Cenotaphium ibi decorat,
Inſcriptio.
Quam interim erga Cognatos pius & officioſus,
Teſtetur hoc Saxum,
A Mariâ Philips Matre ipſius pientiſſimâ
Dilecti Filii Memoriæ non ſine lacrymis dicatum.

[H] The Epitaph on which was written by Dr. Freind.] It is as follows.

Herefordiæ conduntur Oſſa,
Hoc in Delubro ſtatuitur Imago,
Britanniam omnem pervagatur Fama
JOHANNIS PHILIPS:
Qui viris bonis doctiſque juxta charus,
Immortale ſuum Ingenium,
Eruditione multuplici excultum,
Miro animi Candore,
Eximiâ morum ſimplicitate,
Honeſtavit.
Litterarum amœniorum ſitim,
Quam Wintoniæ Puer ſentire cœperat,
Inter Ædis Chriſti Alumnos jugiter explevit,
In illo Muſarum domicilio
Præclaris æmulorum ſtudiis excitatus,
Optimis ſcribendi Magiſtris ſemper intentus,
Carmina ſermone patrio compoſuit
A Græcis Latiniſque Fontibus feliciter deducta,
Atticis Romaniſque auribus omnino digna;
Verſuum quippe harmoniam
Rhythmo didicerat
Antiquo illo, libero, multiformi,

PHILISTUS, a Greek Hiſtorian, born in Syracuſe, had a conſiderable ſhare in the friendſhip of Dionyſius the tyrant, and aſſiſted him conſiderably in eſtabliſhing his power (a). Dionyſius appointed him Governor of the Citadel of Syracuſe; and it is even thought that he enjoyed the tyrant's mother, her ſon knowing it. He loſt Dionyſius's favour, after marrying, without the conſent of that Prince, the daughter of Leptines his brother (b); and being ſent into exile, choſe to reſide in the city of Adria: but was recalled after the tyrant's death. Thoſe, who perſuaded the younger Dionyſius to recall him, were enemies to Dion (c), and were afraid leſt Plato ſhould change the tyrant's mind; and were of opinion that no perſon was better qualified than Philiſtus, to traverſe the deſigns of that Philoſopher. They were not miſtaken: for the inſtant that Philiſtus was recalled, he oppoſed Plato, and prompted the tyrant to drive out Dion (d). The latter was ſoon able to make war upon Dionyſius whom he at laſt beſieged in the fortreſs of Syracuſe, and triumphed over the fleet which Philiſtus had brought to ſuccour the beſieged (e), the firſt year of the 107th Olympiad (f). According to ſome Authors Philiſtus having loſt the battle laid violent hands on himſelf: but others relate, that he was taken by his enemies and put to a cruel death [A]. He was a man of merit, if we conſider him only with regard to the qualities of his mind, his knowledge, and his abilities as a writer and even a ſoldier (g): but his moral qualities cannot be juſtly applauded, ſince he employed his talents in concealing, under ſpecious gloſſes, the injuſtice of tyranny (h). There would have been ſome generoſity in his conduct, had it not been blended with ſelf-love [B]. He wrote ſeveral books [C], but his Hiſtory of Sicily was looked (a) Plutarch. in Dione, p. 962.

(b) i. e. Dionyſius's brother.

(c) He was brother to the ſecond wife of the elder Dionyſius.

(d) Extracted from Plutarch in Dione, p. 962, 963.

(e) Idem, ibid. p. 970, 973.

(f) Diod. Sic. lib. 16. cap. 16.

(g) See the cloſe of the rem. [A].

(h) Plutarch. in Dione, p. 974. See the rem. [B].

Ad res ipſas apto prorſus & attemperato,
Non numeris in eundem ferè orbem redeuntibus,
Non clauſularum ſimiliter cadentium ſono,
Metiri:
Uni in hoc laudis genere Miltono ſecundus,
Primoque pæne par.
Res ſeu tenues, ſeu grandes, ſeu mediocres
Ornandas ſuſceperat,
Nuſquam non quod decuit,
Et videt, & aſſecutus eſt,
Egregius, quoqcunque ſtylum verteret,
Fandi author, & Modorum artifex.
Fas ſit huic,
Auſo licet à tuâ Metrorum lege diſcedere,
O Poeſis Anglicanæ Pater atque conditor, Chaucere,
Alterum tibi latus claudere,
Vatum certè Cineres tuos undique ſtipantium
Non dedecebit Chorum.

Simon Harcourt Miles
Viri bene de ſe deque Literis meriti,
Quoad viveret, Fautor,
Poſt-obitum piè memor,
Hoc illi ſaxum poni voluit.

J. Philips, Stephani S. T. P. Archdiaconi
Salop. Filius, natus eſt Bamptoniæ
In Agro Oxon. Dec. 30. 1676.
Obiit Herefordiæ Febr. 15. 1708. T.

[A] According to ſome Authors, Philiſtus . . . . . laid violent hands on himſelf: but others relate, that . . . his enemies . . . . put him to a cruel death.] It will be beſt to tranſcribe Plutarch's account of this affair (1). Having conquered Philiſtus, they treated him in a very barbarous and cruel manner. It is true indeed Ephorus ſays, that he diſpatched himſelf, upon ſeeing that his galley was taken: but Timonides, who always accompanied Dion, from the beginning of the war, writing to Speuſippus the Philoſopher, ſays, that he was taken priſoner alive, by his galley's running a ground; and that the Syracuſans firſt took off his coat of mail, ſtript him ſtark naked; and after treating him in the moſt contumelious manner, cut off his head, then gave the body to ſome boys, bidding them drag it through the diſtrict of the city called Acradina, and afterwards throw it into the quarries. And Timæus, inſulting him ſtill more, ſays, that the little boys hung up the dead body by the lame leg, and dragged him through the whole city, where he was inſulted by all the inhabitants of Syracuſe, who were greatly pleaſed to ſee him dragged by the leg, who had ſaid, that it would not become Dionyſius to be beholden to the ſwiftneſs of his horſe for his flight from the throne (2), but be dragged out by the leg rather than quit it voluntarily. And yet Philiſtus relates this, not as ſpoken by him to Dionyſius, but by another perſon (3). Diodorus Siculus is one of thoſe who relate that Philiſtus killed himſelf, to prevent his falling alive into the hands of his enemies; and to ſave himſelf from the tortures and ignominy which they would have made him ſuffer (4). This was a bloody engagement, and Philiſtus, by his valour, made victory incline at firſt to his ſide: but at laſt he was hemmed in by a great number of the enemy's ſhips, who exerted their utmoſt endeavours in order to take him priſoner (5). We are told by the ſame Hiſtorian, that his body met with the moſt contumelious uſage, and was left unburied (6). He obſerves, I. That Philiſtus did ſingular ſervice to both the Dionyſius's; and behaved with greater fidelity towards them than any of their adherents. II. That the tyrant, not finding any perſon worthy of filling the employment which was become vacant by the death of Philiſtus, the moſt valiant of his friends, was diſheartened; and offered Dion half his Kingdom, and afterwards his Crown. III. That Philiſtus had greatly ſignalized his bravery in an expedition by land; and that the younger Dionyſius had beſtowed upon him the command of all his naval forces, as ſoon as he heard that the Syracuſans had raiſed Heraclides, Dion's great friend, to the like employment (7).

(1) Plutarch. in Dione, p. 973, according to Amyot's tranſlation.

(2) Compare this with citat. (31), of the art. PERIANDER.

(3) Diod. Siculus, lib. 14. cap. 8. p. 571, ſuppoſes that Philiſtus ſaid that.

(4) Diod. Siculus, lib. 14. cap. 16. p. m. 743.

(5) Idem, ibid.

(6) Idem, ibid.

(7) Idem, lib. 16. cap. 16. p. 747.

[B] There would have been ſome generoſity in his conduct, had it not been blended with ſelf-love.] Dionyſius the tyrant had honoured him with his affection, and munificence, and afterwards ſent him into baniſhment. We generally find that an Hiſtorian is biaſſed by the preſent reſentment of an injury, rather than by the remembrance of paſt favours; I mean, that if he compoſes his work during the exile, to which his patron and benefactor has ſentenced him, he ſpeaks more to his prejudice than advantage. But Philiſtus acted very differently from this. He wrote a Hiſtory during his diſgrace, and did not, by any paſſage in it, diſcover that his affection for him was leſſened in any manner; but paid the higheſt regard to him, excuſed, and applauded him. One would have concluded that he had writ his work in Syracuſe, cheriſhed by the auſpices of that Prince, and poſſeſſed of the noble employments he had enjoyed under him. If the good offices, which Monarchs receive from an Hiſtorian, in prejudice of truth, can be at any time praiſe-worthy; this doubtleſs would be, when he beſtows them on thoſe very perſons who had ſent him into exile. It is an indication of a great ſoul, to treaſure up more carefully the remembrance of a benefit, than the memory of an injury; but ſince Philiſtus flattered Dionyſius, in hopes of being recalled to Syracuſe, this perſonal intereſt, this mixture of ſelf-love, tarniſhes the beauty of his action; and therefore we ought not to ſay, with Pauſanias, that this circumſtance excuſes him (8).

(8) Εἰ δὲ καὶ Φίλιστος αἰτίαν δικαίαν ἔλαβεν, ἐλπιζων την ἐν Συρακοσσαις καθοδον ἀπεκρύψατο τῶν Διονυσίου τὰ ἀνοσιώτατα. Nam ſi Philiſtus venia dignus habetur qui cum Syracuſas ſe reſtitutum iri ſperaret, multa Dionyſii flagitia diſſimulavit. Pauſanias, lib. 1. p. 13.

[C] He wrote ſeveral books.] Suidas (9) aſcribes to him a treatiſe on Oratory: Ægyptica, in twelve books; Res Siculæ, in eleven books; ſome ſpeeches, one of which relates to the city of Naucratis; the hiſtory of Dionyſius the Tyrant; three books on the Theology of the Egyptians; a Treatiſe on Libya and looked upon as his maſter-piece [D]. He imitated Thucydides's laconic ſtyle, and avoided and Syria. He firſt obſerves, that Philiſtus was of Naucratis or Syracuſe, which makes me ſuſpect that he makes two Authors one. There are, in his catalogue, many works which don't well ſuit our Philiſtus; and which I would attribute to a Philiſtus born in Naucratis. Raguſa the Jeſuit (10), citing Conſtantine Laſcaris, ſuppoſes two Philiſtus's; the one of Syracuſe or Naucratis, and the other of Syracuſe. The former, ſays he, was related to Dionyſius the Tyrant, and died in a war againſt the Carthaginians: he wrote ſeveral things relating to Sicily. The latter was ſent into baniſhment by the elder Dionyſius, and wrote a conſiderable part of his Hiſtory during his exile. Plura ſcripſit de rebus Ægyptiacis lib. 12. de Sicanicis lib. 11. item de Baccho: de Theologia Ægyptiorum lib. 6. de Syria & Libya. This only confounds things the more; for this Author, after ſuppoſing that there were two Philiſtus's, divides what he ought to have aſcribed ſingly to one or other of them: he changes the circumſtances (11); and aſcribes thoſe books to the Syracuſan, which ſhould rather have been aſcribed to him whoſe native country is doubtful.

(9) Suidas, in Φιλιστος.

(10) Hieronymus Raguſa, in Elogiis Siculorum, p. 232, 233.

(11) Philiſtus, who died in war, did not fight againſt the Carthaginians, but againſt the troops of Dion of Syracuſe.

[D] . . . his Hiſtory of Sicily was looked upon as his maſter-piece.] It was divided into two parts; the firſt comprehended, in 7 books, the tranſactions during above 800 years, and concluded with the taking of Agrigentum, that is, the third year of the 93d Olympiad; for at that time the Carthaginians poſſeſſed themſelves of this city (12). The ſecond part, conſiſting of four books, began with the reign of the elder Dionyſius, that is, where the firſt ended; for this Dionyſius poſſeſſed himſelf of Syracuſe, the year after the taking of Agrigentum (13). Theſe are the eleven books Rerum Sicularum, which Suidas ſuppoſes were writ by Philiſtus; but he alſo aſcribes to him the particular Hiſtory of Dionyſius the Tyrant, in ſix books. Voſſius is of opinion, that Cicero, in the paſſage cited hereunder, has regard only to the diviſion mentioned above, viz. that of the Hiſtory of Sicily, in two parts; one in ſeven books, the other in four. Siculus ille (Philiſtus) capitalis, creber, acutus, brevis: pene puſillus Thucydides: ſed utros ejus habueris libros (duo enim ſunt corpora) an utroſque, neſcio. Me magis de Dionyſio delectat: ipſe eſt enim veterator magnus & perfamiliaris Philiſto Dionyſius (14). i. e. "Philiſtus the "Sicilian is ſubtle, copious, acute, laconic, and al- "moſt a little Thucydides; but I don't know which "of his two books you would have (there being two) "or both of them. That which treats of Dionyſius "pleaſes me moſt; for Dionyſius was a ſubtle old "fox, and extremely intimate with Philiſtus." This opinion of Voſſius is perhaps very rational; but perhaps alſo Tully placed, on the one hand, the two parts of the general Hiſtory of Sicily; and, on the other, the particular Hiſtory of Dionyſius the Tyrant, mentioned by Suidas. Dionyſius Harlicanaſſeus ſeems to favour ſomething more thoſe who aſſert, that the Hiſtory of the Tyrant, is the ſame book with the ſecond part of the Hiſtory of Sicily, than thoſe who ſhould affirm the contrary (15). However this be, Cicero was not diſpleaſed with our Philiſtus, as an Hiſtorian; and conſequently thoſe who deſpiſed him, may be looked upon as perſons of an over delicate, or of a depraved taſte. Dionyſii mater ejus qui Syracuſanorum tyrannus fuit ut ſcriptum apud Philiſtum eſt, & doctum hominem & diligentem & æqualem temporum illorum, quum prægnans hunc ipſum Dionyſium alvo contineret, ſomniavit ſe peperiſſe Satyriſcum (16). i. e. "The "mother of Dionyſius, who was the tyrant of Sy- "racuſe, (as is related by Philiſtus, a very learned "and careful Author, and who lived in thoſe times) "being with child of Dionyſius, dreamed that ſhe "was delivered of a ſatyr or hairy monſter." Thoſe who ſhall duly conſider the applauſes which Tully has beſtowed on Thucydides, will lay great ſtreſs on his declaring immediately, that Philiſtus imitated Thucydides very happily. Hunc conſecutus eſt Syracuſius Philiſtus, qui quum Dionyſii tyranni familiariſſimus eſſet ocium ſuum conſumpſit in hiſtoria ſcribenda MAXIMEQUE Thucydidem eſt, ſicut mihi videtur, IMITATUS (17). i. e. "He was followed by Philiſtus the Syracuſan, who "being extremely intimate with Dionyſius the ty- "rant, employed his leiſure hours in writing hiſtory; "and, in my opinion, imitated Thucydides very ex- "actly." Quintilian affirms, that Philiſtus is much clearer than Thucydides (18). This is a great elogium: for obſcurity is a great defect, and may outweigh the great advantages which Thucydides is thought to have over Philiſtus. If it were poſſible for us to compare the writings of this latter with Thucydides, we perhaps ſhould find, that Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus has ranked the Philiſtus a little too low under the other (19). However, Philiſtus being called the little Thucydides by Cicero, will always be a great honour to the firſt mentioned. Thoſe, who called a certain actor in Paris, little Moliere, imagined they paid him no ſmall compliment.

(12) Diod. Sicul. lib. 13. cap. 103. p. m. 554.

(13) Idem, ibid.

(14) Cicero ad Quintum fratrem, Epiſt. 12. lib. 2.

(15) See Dionyſ. Halicarn. Epiſt. Pompeium, p. m. 261.

(16) Cicero, lib. 1. de Divinat. cap. 20.

(17) Idem, lib. 2. de Oratore, folio 73 [D].

(18) Philiſtus quoque meretur qui turbæ quamvis bonorum poſt bos authorum eximatur, imitator Thucydidis, & ut multo infirmior ita aliquatenus lucidior. Quint. lib. 10. cap. 1. p. m. 469.

(19) Dion. Hal. Epiſt. ad Pompeium, p. 261, and 262. See alſo p. 190.

I muſt take notice of two errors which have been committed with regard to the pene puſillus Thucydides of Cicero: one of them was animadverted upon by Voſſius, and the other by a Jeſuit. A learned Commentator imagined, that the reaſon why Cicero gives Philiſtus the abovementioned title, was, becauſe he wrote very little in compariſon of Thucydides: but this is a miſtake. Id referri eo minime debet quod præ Thucydide pauca admodum ſcripſerit, quæ * Paulli Manutii ſententia eſt, (nam longe aliud apparet ex iis quæ ex Suida & Diodoro adduximus) ſed quia non paullo quidem infirmior ſit Thucydide, ut Fabius † quoque cenſet, attamen imitetur eum non infeliciter (20). i. e. "We "muſt not conclude this, becauſe he wrote very little "in compariſon of Thucydides, as Paulus Manutius "thinks, (for the reverſe appears from what I quoted "from Suidas and Diodorus Siculus:) but becauſe "he has not ſo much ſtrength as Thucydides, as Fa- "bius likewiſe thinks, and yet is a happy imitator "of him." An Author who has collected the errors of great men, imagined that Cicero had ſpoke very contemptuouſly of Thucydides, and called him the little Thucydides. This blunder is refuted as follows: Iſto fere pacto hallucinatum fuiſſe virum doctum, qui de erroribus magnorum virorum ſcripſit, illico ſenſi, ut hic iſtius liber in manus meas incidit. Is pagina nonageſima extrema ait, Thucydidem hiſtoricum videri ne enarratorem quidem interdum, ideo pene puſillum Ciceroni dictum. Non animadvertit ſcriptor, tum profecto aliud agens, neque quemquam ab ullo vocari ſolere pene parvum, aut pene magnum, ſed omnino parvum, aut magnum; neque ibi apud Tullium, ubi pene puſillus Thucydides dicitur, uſurpari hoc de Thucydide (21). i. e. "By this I in- "ſtantly perceived, that a miſtake had been com- "mitted by the learned Author, who wrote concern- "ing the errors of great men, as ſoon as his work fell "into my hands. The Author in queſtion declares, "in his ninetieth page, that Thucydides the Hiſto- "rian ſeems ſometimes not to deſerve to be called "even a writer of narratives, and for that reaſon is "called pene puſillus by Cicero. This Author, whoſe "mind was abſent at that time, did not conſider, "that no perſon is ever called pene parvus, or pene "magnus, but abſolutely parvus or magnus; and "that the expreſſion (in Cicero) pene puſillus Thu- "cydides, is not meant of Thucydides." Father Vavaſſor ſhews afterwards, that Cicero ſpoke of our Philiſtus.

* Notis ad eum Ciceronis locum.

† Lib. 10. cap. 1.

(20) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Græc. lib. 1. cap. 6. p. 27.

(21) Franciſcus Vavaſſor, de ludicra Dictione, p. 166, 167.

I have one more obſervation to make. Cicero declares that the hiſtory of Dionyſius's hiſtory pleaſed him much more than Philiſtus's other work, becauſe Dionyſius was of a knaviſh diſpoſition, and was very familiar with that Hiſtorian's. Voſſius, fearing that it would give occaſion to ſpeak ill of Cicero, takes great care to illuſtrate that matter. Cicero, ſays he, does not praiſe Philiſtus's moral character: the only circumſtance he ſearches for, in that Hiſtory, is the benefit which may be reaped from the knowledge of the knaviſh artifices of that tyrant. Non animum Philiſti laudavit Tullius, ſed utilitatem libri prædicavit: atque id imprimis quidem propter prudentiam quam ex vafri adeo tyranni vita capere eſſet: ſed & propter dictionem quam Thucydideæ æmulam fuiſſe etiam ex ſecundo de oratore cognoſcimus, ac propterea idem in Bruto, &c. (22). Theſe latter words are quite uſeleſs, not to ſay worſe: for the queſtion was not to apologize for Cicero, becauſe he took a pleaſure in reading Philiſtus; but becauſe he took more delight in reading avoided digreſſions to an exceſs [E]. He was handled with great ſeverity by Timæus the Hiſtorian. Plutarch cenſures him for it, though, on the other hand, he blames Ephorus for applauding Philiſtus [F].

(22) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græcis, lib. 1. cap. 6. p. 27.

PHILYRA,

ing the Hiſtory of Dionyſius the tyrant. It will be to no purpoſe, to juſtify this taſte, to ſay that Philiſtus was a fine writer. We do not know that he diſtinguiſhed himſelf more by his ſtyle in the hiſtory of Dionyſius, than in the other. We ſhould therefore ſay, that Voſſius choſe rather to make a tranſition, than to reaſon in a juſt manner. Thoſe who know how vaſtly difficult it is to write with connexion, I mean ſo as to introduce tranſitions in a proper manner, and at the ſame time to obſerve exactly all the rules of logic, will not wonder ſo much that there were ſuch numerous faults, like thoſe I have been ſpeaking of in Authors.

By the way, Voſſius's apology for Cicero is extremely juſt. Every man of a curious and inquiſitive turn of mind, eſpecially if he looks into the affairs of the commonwealth, will join in opinion with that illuſtrious Roman, and not be the leſs honeſt man upon that account. He will rather chooſe to read the particular hiſtory of an artful politician, a mighty villian, a bold and ſubtle uſurper, than general hiſtories, and eſpecially when the authors of them have lived familiarly with the tyrant. There you will object to me, that ſuch writers will diſguiſe matters, and ſet the crimes of their heroes in a favourable light: and this Philiſtus did. I anſwer, that a judicious reader will ſee through thoſe artifices, and make a proper advantage of them. I do not doubt but that many perſons, for the ſake of recovering this ſingle book of Philiſtus, would give up four or five of the antient authors, who have been tranſmitted to us. Philiſtus would inform us of a great many tranſactions, to which we are utter ſtrangers. We ſcarce know any thing of Dionyſius the tyrant, beſides his cruel actions and his diffidence: now theſe form but a very ſmall part of his picture. A man, who makes himſelf maſter of a powerful Republick, and maintains his uſurpation during many years, in ſpite of numberleſs obſtacles, is generally poſſeſſed of many valuable qualities. How theſe were blended in Dionyſius we know not, nor are we acquainted with the particulars of his conduct, or of many defects, which the Syracuſans might have. It would be of advantage to ſee the light in which Philiſtus ſet thoſe things. The maxim, intereſt reipublicæ cognoſci malos; i. e. It is for the advantage of the commonwealth that wicked men ſhould be known, ought to be extended ſo far. He who hears but one ſide, hears nothing, or cannot form a right judgment; or, ſhould he judge rightly, this would be only by mere chance.

[E] .... he avoided digreſſions to an exceſs.] It is a fault in a Writer to take a pleaſure in rambling from his ſubject, and Theopompus the Hiſtorian has been juſtly cenſured for it (23). But it does not follow, that it is an excellency in an Author, to take a pleaſure in never leaving his chief ſubject; on the contrary, it is over-doing, it is ſpoiling a good thing.

(23) See remarks [E] and [F] of the art. THEOPOMPUS.

(24) Horat. Epiſt. 6. lib. 1. ver. 15.

Inſani ſapiens nomen ferat, æquus iniqui,
Ultra quam ſatis eſt virtutem ſi petat ipſam (24).
" The juſt will be unjuſt, wiſe void of wit,
" That ſeek e'en virtue more than what is fit."
CREECH.

There is a medium between theſe two extremes, as Theon has judiciouſly obſerved. Οὐ γὰρ ἁπλῶς χρὴ (παρήκασιν) πᾶσαν παραιτεῖσθαι, καθάπερ ὁ Φίλιστος, ἀναπαύσει γὰρ τὴν διάνοιαν τῶν ἀκροατῶν. ἀλλὰ τὴν τηλικαύτην τὸ μήκος, ἥτις ἀπαλλοτριοῖ τὴν διάνοιαν τῶν ἀκροωμένων, ὥστε δεῖσθαι πάλιν ὑπομνήσεως τῶν προειρημένων, ὡς Θεόπομπος ἐν ταῖς Φιλιππικαῖς (25). i. e. " Nor ought we, " like Philiſtus, to entirely avoid digreſſions; be- " cauſe this may be a relief to the minds of the au- " ditors: but ſuch only as are ſo very prolix, that " they call off their minds, ſo as to make it neceſ- " ſary to repeat what was ſaid before: digreſſions " like thoſe which Theopompus employs in his Phi- " lippicks." It is plain that Theon blames Philiſtus for not uſing digreſſions; but he ſays they are neceſſary ſometimes, and ſerve as ſo many reſting places. His obſervation is juſt: a little variety is neceſſary in all works of wit; and it is obſerved, that the moſt regular Writers do not afford the greateſt pleaſure. I could point out certain Hiſtories which often make readers yawn, and even fall aſleep, though the Authors had exactly obſerved, in their compoſitions, all the rules of art; though their ſtyle was grave, cloſe, correct, and ſententious: their naration unencumbered with incidents and trifling particulars; and without deſcending to particulars or employing digreſſions; ever directed by the right line becauſe it is the ſhorteſt (26). Other Writers, ſometimes quitting a grave character, with regard to the ſtyle or ſubject: and making no ſcruple to go out of their way, for the ſake of an epiſode, write ſuch a hiſtory as engages the reader's attention perpetually; ſo that he gets to the end of the work before he has had time to be tired. I ſhall not examine, whether this be a proof of one of thoſe things, viz. either that the rules are falſe, or elſe the reader's mind. I only inſiſt upon the fact, and am guided by the remark of a man of very good taſte. What a prodigious difference, ſays he (27), there is between a beautiful work, and a perfect or regular work; I do not know whether we have yet had any of the latter kind. It is perhaps leſs difficult for a great genius to hit upon the great and ſublime, than to avoid faults of every kind. The Cid had but one voice, at its firſt appearance, that of admiration; it triumphed over authority and politics, which attempted, but in vain, to ruin its reputation; it reunited in its favour thoſe who are always divided in opinion and ſentiment, the great and the common people; they all learnt it by heart, and repeated it, before the actors, when exhibited on the ſtage. In a word, the Cid is one of the fineſt poems that can be made; and one of the beſt criticiſms ever made on any ſubject, is that of the Cid. This is one of the fineſt examples that can be given of the inſufficiency of rules. The Author of the Cid ſcarce followed one of them: the French Academy accuſed him for infringing them, and nevertheleſs it charmed, and ſtill continues to charm the publick. It loſt its cauſe before the ſupreme judges, and won it in all other places; it appealed to the people, like that Horatius who killed his ſiſter, and prevailed with them to annul the ſentence of the eſtabliſhed Judges. Montagne's Eſſays are another example of a happy irregularity. Were that book to be thrown into a very methodical form, it would take away its greateſt beauties.

(25) Theop. in Progymnaſm. cap. 4. p. m. 44.

(26) A puncto ad punctum linea recta eſt omnium breviſſima.

(27) La Bruyere, Characteres dece Siecle, in the Chapter on Works on Wit, p. m. 76, 77.

By the way, I am not ſo much concerned, as may be imagined, to vindicate digreſſions: for the hiſtorical part of this work is infinitely more conformable to Philiſtus's manner than to that of Theopompus; and, with reſpect to my Commentary, I am not obliged to apologize for its containing ſeveral digreſſions. It is a ſpecies of writing, which requires, or admits them naturally: it is a compilation, and what we call miſcellanies. Variety is eſſential to this ſpecies of writing; and ought principally to be indulged in thoſe writers, who are perſuaded that by this method only they can keep the reader from being tired (28). I am to obſerve, that a digreſſion cannot be ſaid to be too long, only becauſe it takes up ſeveral pages, but when each individual part of it takes up too much room; for how conciſe ſoever a writer may be on every one in particular, the joining of many together will render him prolix. Solet enim eſſe quædam partium brevitas quæ longam tamen efficit ſummam (29). I employ this reflection of Quintilian in a ſenſe different from that in which he uſes it.

(28) Liber fuit & opuſculis varius & metris: ita ſolemus qui ingenio parum fidimus ſatietatis periculum fugere. Plin. Epiſt. 21. lib. 8.

(29) Quintilian. lib. 4. cap. 2. p. m. 183.

[F] Plutarch cenſures Timæus, tho', on the other hand, he blames Ephorus for applauding Philiſtus.] " But " Timæus makes this a handle, and a juſt one, to " reprove the affection, diligence and fidelity, which " Philiſtus had always ſhewn for the ſupport and de- " fence of the tyranny; and inveighs againſt him in " the moſt abuſive manner on that account. As to " thoſe whom he had really injured, if they were " ſo inhuman as to ſhew their reſentment againſt his " dead body, they perhaps were in ſome meaſure ex- " cuſable; but thoſe who wrote his actions after his " death;

PHILYRA, the daughter of Oceanus, was ſo much charmed with the paſſion which Saturn declared he had for her, that ſhe indulged him the laſt favour. Rhea, Saturn's wife, knew nothing of it for ſome time; but at laſt, entertaining ſome ſuſpicions on that head, ſhe watched the two lovers ſo narrowly, that ſhe caught them in the amorous congreſs. Saturn, to conceal himſelf, aſſumed the form of a horſe [A]; but Philyra was in ſuch confuſion that ſhe left the country [B], and went and wandered on the Mountains of the Pelaſgi, where ſhe was delivered of Chiron the Centaur (a). Her grief for bringing forth a child, part man and part horſe, obliged her to beſeech the Gods to change her into ſome other being [C]; and her prayers being heard, ſhe was metamorphoſed into a tree (b).

(a) Extracted from Apollon. Argon. lib. 2. ver. 1235 & ſeq.

(b) A lime-tree. See the rem. [C].

" death; who were never once injured by him in his " life-time, ought to ſoften their rage when they are " ſpeaking of him: methinks, they ſhould not, for " their own reputation ſake, reproach him in in- " ſulting, opprobrious language, for thoſe calamities " which may as eaſily befall the beſt man in the " world. On the other hand, Ephorus does not " ſhew much prudence in praiſing Philiſtus; for tho' " he is very ingenious in finding out excuſes to diſ- " guiſe baſe and wicked actions, and very artful in " inventing ſpecious reaſons, dreſſed in beautiful " words; he yet, though he ſhould exert his utmoſt " endeavours, would not be able to acquit him from " the imputation, of being the moſt zealous aſſertor " of arbitrary Government that ever lived; and of " ever loving, coveted and deſired the pleaſures, the " power, the riches, and alliances of tyrants: but " he, in my opinion, who does not applaud Philiſ- " tus's defects, nor reproaches him for his calamities, " obſerves the juſt medium which becomes an Hiſ- " torian (30)." What Plutarch ſays with reſpect to theſe alliances of tyrants, is confirmed by the following words of Cornelius Nepos: Philiſtum hiſtoricum Syracuſas reduxit, hominem amicum non magis tyranno quam tyrannidi (31). i. e. " He recalled to Syracuſe, " Philiſtus the hiſtorian, no leſs a friend to the ty- " rant, than to tyranny." And by the following paſſage from Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus: Philiſtus Thucydidem ſequitur moribus exceptis: hic enim liber eſt, & animi magnitudinis ac gravitatis plenus: ille tyrannorum & aliorum cupiditati plus nimio ſubſervit (32). i. e. " Philiſtus made Thucydides his pattern, except in " his moral conduct: for the latter was a great per- " ſonage, and animated by a noble ſoul, but the " former behaved towards tyrants and others in too " obſequious a manner."

(30) Plut. in Dione, p. 974.

(31) Corn. Nepos, in Vita Dionyſii, cap. 3.

(32) Dion. Hal. Epiſt. ad Pompeium, p. 190.

[A] Saturn . . . . . aſſumed the form of a horſe.] Virgil adds, that he ran away with the utmoſt ſpeed, and that all Pelion (1) ecchoed with his neighing.

(1) A Mountain of Theſſaly.

Talis & ipſe jubam cervice effundit equina
Conjugis adventu pernix Saturnus, & altum
Peliona hinnitu fugiens implevit acuto (2).

(2) Virgil. Georgic. lib. 3. ver. 92.

" In ſuch a ſhape grim Saturn did reſtrain
" His heavenly limbs, and flow'd with ſuch a mane,
" When, half ſurpriz'd, and fearing to be ſeen,
" The Leacher gallop'd from his jealous queen,
" Ran up the ridges of the rock amain,
" And with ſhrill neighings fill'd the neighbouring plain DRYDEN.

This is probable enough. A huſband, caught, in the amorous congreſs by his wife, is expoſed to ſuch a flood of injurious expreſſions, ſuch a ſtorm of reproaches, that the moſt prudent thing he can do is to fly from her. Some affirm (3), that Saturn aſſumed a horſe's form to enjoy Philyra; and conſequently his wife's preſence did not compel him to the neceſſity of doing this. Perhaps he employed this artifice by way of precaution, as he was afraid of Rhea's vigilance, and endeavoured to deceive her before hand.

(3) Pherecydes, apud Scholiaſt. Apollonii in lib. 2. ver. 1237.

(4) Hyginus, cap. 138.

(5) Philargyrius, in Virgil. Georgic. lib. 3. ver. 93.

(6) Apollon. lib. 2. ver. 1236.

[B] Philyra was in ſuch confuſion that ſhe left the country.] Authors are not agreed with reſpect to the ſcene of this action. Some fix it in Thrace (4), others in Theſſaly (5), and others again in an iſland of the Euxine Sea. Apollonius (6) is of the laſt opinion; and ſince he makes Philyra fly as far as Theſſaly, he conſequently muſt ſuppoſe her ſhame and confuſion to be extreme.

Ἡ δ' αἰδοῖ χαλκόν τε καὶ ἤθεα κεῖνα λιποῦσα
Ὠκιαλὶς Φιλύρη, εἰς ὄρεα μακρὰ πελασγῶν Ἦλθ'.

(7) Idem, ibid. ver. 1242.

" Philyra, Ocean's daughter, quite aſham'd
" Of her looſe conduct, left that fatal place,
" And to the high, Pelaſgian mountains fled.

Some affirm that Saturn metamorphoſed her into a mare, to ſave her from the confuſion with which the crime ſhe had filled muſt neceſſarily fill her (8). It is to be obſerved that Saturn was at that time in proſperity. He poſſeſſed his Kingdom (9): his ſon Jupiter was but an infant; but it is affirmed, that after his being dethroned, and was fled into Italy, he again immerſed himſelf into his former debauchery.

(8) Adventante uxore ſe in equum, illa in equam convertit, atque ita uterque effugerunt. Philargyrius, in Virgil. Georgic. lib. 3. ver. 93.

Advena quos profugus gignens, & equina libido
Intulit Italiæ: Tuſcis namque ille puellis
Primus adhinnivit ſimulato numine mœchus.
Mox patre deterior ſilveſtri habitator Olympi
Juppiter, inceſta ſpurcavit labe Lacænas (10).

(9) Apollon. lib. 2. ver. 1237.

(10) Prudent. in Symmach. lib. 1. ver. 56.

" Whom baniſh'd Saturn, in a horſe's ſhape,
" Brought to fair Italy. He firſt debauch'd
" The lovely Tuſcan Maids, in that diſguiſe.
" Great Jove, his ſon, acted ſtill worſe than he,
" And with the Spartan Dames committed inceſt."

This is likely enough: for, as has been obſerved elſewhere (11), when Kings of a lewd diſpoſition are ſent into baniſhment, this does not prove a remedy to their paſſion. By the way, this paſſage of Prudentius does not agree with the following verſes:

(11) In the text of the article BASINA, in the text, after the citation (a).

Credo pudicitiam Saturno Rege moratam
In terris viſamque diu, cum frigida parvas
Præberet ſpelunca domos, ignemque laremque
Et pecus & dominos communi clauderet umbra (12).

(12) Juvenal, Sat. 6. init.

" In Saturn's reign, at nature's early birth,
" There was that thing call'd chaſtity on earth,
" When in a narrow cave, their common ſhade,
" The Sheep, the Shepherds, and their Gods were laid:
" When reeds and leaves and hides of beaſts were ſpread
" By mountain-houſewives, for their homely bed,
" And moſſy pillows rais'd for the rude huſband's head." DRYDEN.

[C] Her grief . . . . . obliged her to beſeech the Gods to change her into ſome other being.] Hyginus ſays, that ſhe addreſſed Jupiter: but as Apollonius obſerves that Chiron was born during the infancy of Jupiter, it is more natural to ſuppoſe, that Philyra had not recourſe to him expreſsly, it not being probable, that ſhe ſtaid till he had expelled Saturn, and ſeized on the Empire of the Skies. Philyra poſtquam inuſitatam ſpeciem ſe peperiſſe vidit, petit ab Jove at ſe in aliam ſpeciem commutaret, quæ in arborem Philyram, hoc eſt tilliam commutata eſt (3). i. e. " Philyra perceiving that ſhe " had been delivered of a monſter, implored Jupiter " to transform her into ſome other being, and ac- " cordingly ſhe was metamorphoſed into a Lime-tree."

(13) Hyginus, cap. 138.

PHILLA, one of the moſt illuſtrious Ladies of antiquity, was the daughter of Antipater, Governor of Macedon in Alexander's abſence. She was a woman of fine ſenſe, and abilities, which enabled her to ſhare in affairs of Government (a). She behaved with ſo ſo much dexterity, in managing the various tempers of thoſe whom it was neceſſary to reduce, or keep to, their allegiance, that ſhe prevented an army, compoſed entirely of factious and turbulent men, from making an inſurrection. She married ſuch maidens as were poor at her own expence; and oppoſed, with ſo much vigour, thoſe who oppreſſed the innocent, that ſhe entirely freed and ſecured many perſons who were going to be ruined by ſlanderers. Her abilities were not the effect of experience; for, when but a young maiden, Antipater her father, one of the wiſeſt politicians of his time (b), uſed to conſult her on affairs of the higheſt importance. We ſhould know the particulars of this Princeſs's capacity (c), had all the books of Diodorus Siculus been tranſmitted to us; but thoſe parts of his hiſtory which treated of this are loſt. Philla's firſt huſband (d) was Craterus (e), who was better beloved by the Macedonians than any of Alexander's Captains. After Craterus's death ſhe married Demetrius (f), and was indeed her ſecond huſband's chief wife [A], but had no great ſhare in his affection. Demetrius was a voluptuous Prince (g), who kept, at one and the ſame time, many miſtreſſes, ſome of whom had been common ſtrumpets. He was diſguſted at Philla, upon pretence that he was younger than ſhe (h): and at the ſame time was diſtractedly fond of the Courtezan Lamia, whoſe charms were upon the decline (i). Philla came to a tragical end: for hearing that Demetrius had loſt his dominions, ſhe had not courage enough to ſee him in his miſerable, fugitive condition; but poiſoned herſelf, at the ſame time curſing her huſband's (k) fortune, whoſe injuries to him exceeded her favours (l). She had brought him one ſon (m); and a daughter, the famous Stratonice (n), wife of Seleucus, whom Seleucus reſigned to his ſon Antiochus (o). A niece of hers ſoon ſupplied her room [B].

(a) Diod. Sicul. lib. 19. cap. 59. p. m. 1013.

(b) Diod. Sic. lib. 19. cap. 59. p. 1014.

(c) See Diod. Sicul. ibid.

(d) Idem, ibid. p. 1013.

(e) Plut. in Demetrio, p. 895, A.

(f) Diod. Sicul. and Plut. ibid.

(g) Plut. in Demetrio, p. 895. A.

(h) Idem, ibid. p. 902, C.

(i) Vide rem. [C] of the art. LAMIA, the Courtezan.

(k) Plut. in Demetrio, p. 911.

(l) Μισήσασα τὴν τύχην αὐτῆ βεβαιοτέραν ἐν τοῖς κακοῖς ὖσαν ἢ τοῖς ἀγαθοῖς, πιοῦσα φάρμακον ἀπέθανε. Fortunam ejus execrata quæ in adverſitatibus eſſet quam ſecundis rebus ſtabilior, atque hauſto veneno extincta eſt. Plut. in Demetrio, p. 911.

(m) Idem, p. 906, E. His name was Antigonus, Idem, ibid. p. 915.

(n) Idem, ibid. p. 903, D.

(o) Idem, ibid. p. 907.

[A] She was her ſecond huſband's chief wife.] He had ſeveral at the ſame time: our Philla; Eurydice deſcended from Miltiades, and widow of Orpheltes, King of Cyrene (1): Deidamia, daughter of Æacides King of Epirus, and Pyrrhus's ſiſter (2). Of all theſe wives, Philla was moſt eſteemed, and enjoyed the greateſt authority. I wiſh the Author, who informs me of this, had aſcribed this diſtinction to the ſuperior merit of this Lady, and not merely to the glory of Antipater and Craterus. Πολλαῖς ἅμα συνῆν γυναιξὶν ὧν ἀξίωμα μέγιστον εἶχε καὶ τιμὴν Φίλλα, διὰ Ἀντίπατρον τὸν πατέρα, καὶ διὰ τὸ προσυνῳκηκέναι Κρατερῷ. Multas uno tempore conjuges habebat (Demetrius) quarum erat maxima in dignatione & honore Phila, tum propter patrem Antipatrum, tum quòd etiam matrimonio juncta fuiſſet Cratero (3). I don't doubt but that Antigonus made choice of her for his daughter-in-law, from the conſideration that ſhe was a conſiderable match, for the two reaſons juſt mentioned. Demetrius was vaſtly averſe to this match, becauſe of the diſparity of his age and that of his intended bride; but his father whiſpered in his ear a paſſage, with a little alteration, from Euripides, the ſenſe of which is, that a man ought to marry a rich wife, be his reluctance ever ſo great. Ἀπροθύμως δ' ἔχοντι, λέγεται πρὸς τὸν υἱὸν Εὐριπίδειον εἰπεῖν, Ὅπου τὸ κέρδος, παρὰ φύσιν γαμητέον. ὁμοιόπτωτόν τι τῷ δηλευτέον εὐθυρρήμονήσας. Abhorrenti vero dicitur in aurem hoc Euripideum inſuſurraſſe,

Ubi lucrum ſuadet, reluctetur licet
Natura, ducas conjugem.

Ubi Ducas conjugem, pro Servias, ſcitè ſubjecit (4). It is very probable that Demetrius had an eſteem for Philla, and gave her outward marks of his eſteem, but never made uſe of her for his pleaſures. I am to obſerve, that he deputed her to Caſſander, to juſtify his conduct with regard to Pliſtarchus, who made heavy complaints about him (5). This ſhews that he judged his wife well qualified for negotiations. I likewiſe muſt obſerve, that he was greatly exaſperated at the Rhodians, for giving the King of Egypt a veſſel they had taken, on board of which was the letter which Philla wrote to him, and the rich things ſhe ſent to him (6).

[B] A niece of hers ſoon ſupplied her room.] She was daughter of Ptolemy and Eurydice, Philla's ſiſter, and was named Ptolemais (7). She had been betrothed to Demetrius in Philla's life-time (8). He had a ſon by her named Demetrius, who was King of Cyrene (9). This doubtleſs is the ſame whom I mentioned in the article ARSINOE.

(1) Plut. in Demetrio, p. 894, E.

(2) Idem, ibid. p. 900, B.

(3) Idem, ibid. 894, 895.

(4) Idem, ibid. p. 895.

(5) Idem, ibid. p. 904, A.

(6) Idem, ibid. p. 898. Diod. Sicul. lib. 20. cap. 94.

(7) Idem, ibid. p. 911, F.

(8) Idem, ibid. p. 904.

(9) Idem, ibid. p. 915.

PHILOMELUS, General of the Phoceans, in the beginning of the ſacred war, as it is called, could not find a better expedient to oppoſe the enemies of his country [A], than by ſeizing on the Temple of Delphi. He went to Lacedæmonia to communicate his deſign to Archidamus (a), who anſwered, that he could not aſſiſt him openly in that enterprize, but promiſed to furniſh him with men and money ſecretly. Philomelus, with this ſuccour, made himſelf maſter of the Temple, and put to the ſword all thoſe who made the leaſt reſiſtance. He was invaded ſoon after by the Locrians, and defeated them: he was flushed to ſuch a degree with this victory, that he took the decrees made by the Amphictyones out of the Temple of Delphi, and forced the Prieſteſs to pronounce the oracle to him. The anſwer he received from it could not fail of pleaſing him; it declaring, that it permitted him to ſucceed in all things he might have a mind to. He procured an authentick inſtrument of this Oracle, and had it read publickly, that the world might know, that he could act, from that time, under the authority and with the approbation of a God, in whatſoever he might undertake. He ſent Embaſſadors to all the nations of Greece. The Athenians and Lacedæmonians made an alliance with him [B]: but the Thebans and others entered into a league againſt him, which gave riſe to the

(a) He was King of Lacedæmonia.

[A] The enemies of his country.] Theſe were the Thebans, who had cauſed the Senate of the Amphictyones, to ſentence the Phoceans to pay an exorbitant fine; and were going to paſs a decree, that in caſe the Phoceans did not pay it, their lands ſhould be confiſcated for the benefit of Apollo (1).

[B] The Athenians and Lacedæmonians made an alliance with him.] We learn from this hiſtory, one of the political cuſtoms of governments. The Reader has already ſeen (2), that the King of Lacedæmonia, ſo far from diſſuading Philomelus from invading the Temple of Delphi, encouraged him, and furniſhed him with ſuccours for that purpoſe. However, he managed things in ſuch a manner, that no proof could be

(1) Diod. Sicul. lib. 16. cap. 23.

(2) In the text of this article.

the ſacred war. Philomelus did not offer to touch the treaſures of the Temple; but contented himſelf with laying heavy taxes on the inhabitants of Delphi, who had enriched themſelves with the ſums which the Devotees of other nations had left there. He took the field with a powerful army, and defeated the Locrians. As this victory ſwelled his courage, and depreſſed that of the vanquiſhed, ſo it raiſed him a greater number of enemies. Finding himſelf reduced to the neceſſity of oppoſing them with a greater force, he no longer had the regard he till then had ſhewn for the Temple [C], but took away many treaſures from it. Having promiſed very great pay to all ſuch mercenaries or foreigners as ſhould enliſt themſelves under him, he raiſed a conſiderable body of forces without much difficulty, notwithſtanding that conſcientious people refuſed to fight under be brought, of his having openly eſpouſed Philomelus's quarrel; but took care, not to let it appear, that the Government was any way concerned in the ſuccours of men and money which he furniſhed the Phocean General. As the ſucceſs of this enterprize was not certain, prudence ſuggeſted to the Lacedæmonian Monarch, that it would not be adviſeable in him to hazard the glory of his country, by engaging publickly in meaſures which claſhed with the intereſt of religion; but as the invaſion of this Temple might be of prejudice to the people (3), who were at that time the moſt dreaded by all their neighbours, policy ſuggeſted, that it would be for their intereſt to favour the impious deſign of thoſe who intended to ſubdue the Oracle of Delphos. Such were the grounds of the Lacedæmonian Monarch's conduct. But after that the deſign was executed, they pulled off the maſk, and concluded an alliance publickly with Philomelus, though they knew they ſhould be attacked by a people, who would declare, that the ſole motive of their taking up arms was, to ſet the Oracle of Delphos at liberty, and puniſh the impiety and ſacrilegious actions of the Phoceans. The Citizens of Athens and Lacedæmonia were the readieſt, and diſcovered the greateſt warmth, in aſſiſting the uſurpers of the temple, as well during the life of Philomelus, who firſt plundered it, as during the adminiſtration of his ſucceſſors, who profaned all its treaſures, thoſe antient and rich monuments of the piety of ſo many Nations and Princes. Nevertheleſs, both the Athenians and Lacedæmonians pretended a mighty zeal for religion; and were greatly obſervant of feſtivals, vows and offerings. Wo be to the man, who ſhould preſume to argue againſt, or inculcate any thing in oppoſition to the worſhip of the Gods: the greateſt Philoſopher that ever lived in the world, would have run the hazard of his life, had he been ſo bold as to do this. How comes it therefore to paſs, that the Phoceans found ſo ſtrong a ſupport, and ſuch faithful allies, in theſe two cities, after the commiſſion of an impious action; after having profaned and deſtroyed the greateſt object of the devotion of all the Grecians, and even of the Barbarians? The reaſon is this: it would have been impoſſible to have puniſhed the Phoceans for their impiety, without raiſing the power and glory of the Thebans to a more exalted pitch than ever it had attained. Now the political intereſt of the Athenians and Lacedæmonians required, that the Theban power ſhould be weakned, though the intereſt of religion required, that the Phoceans ſhould be chaſtized, yet the Nations abovementioned thought it more prudent to ſupport them; and therefore they joined with them, againſt the Theban chiefs, in a kind of cruſade, raiſed for the ſetting free of Apollo. The temporal good of States has, in all ages, been preferred to that of religion.

(3) The Thebans.

Diodorus Siculus obſerves, that the Phoceans furniſhed the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, with more ſubſidies than was neceſſary for the payment of the troops (4). This therefore was not a chargeable alliance, but then it was a very ſcandalous one; it being plain to the whole world, that the Athenians and Lacedæmonians ſhared in the profit ariſing from the ſacrilege. Theſe furniſhed the Phoceans with troops, and received from them ſuch ſubſidies as were more than ſufficient for the payment of the troops. There was another affair, which made the world inveigh againſt the Athenians. Dionyſius the Sicilian Tyrant was ſending into Greece ſome ſtatues of gold and ivory, which he intended to conſecrate to the temples of Delphi and Jupiter Olympius. Iphicrates commanded at that time a fleet of the Athenians near Corcyra. He took, among other ſhips, thoſe which carried thoſe ſtatues, and aſked his Superiors, in what manner he ſhould diſpoſe of them. The people being aſſembled on this propoſal, made a decree, by which Iphicrates was commanded not to examine ſo ſtrictly thoſe matters which related to the Gods; but to take the utmoſt care of the ſubſiſtence of the forces. Περιτυχὼν ταῖς κομιζόσαις αὐτὰ ναυσὶν ὁ Ἰφικράτης ϗ κραλήσας αὐτῶν, διεπέμψατο πρὸς τὸν δῆμον, ἐπερωτῶν τί χρὴ πράτ͂ειν, οἱ δ' Ἀθηναῖοι προσέταξαν αὐτῷ μὴ τὰ τῶν Θεῶν ἐξελάζειν, ἀλλὰ σκοπεῖν ὅπως ϛρατιώτας διατρέψῃ (5). Iphicrates in naves, quæ dona votiva portabant, fortè fortuna incidens, in poteſtatem redactas Athenas mitteret, cum hac ſciſcitatione, quid facto nunc opus eſſet? populuſque contra, non ſcrupulosè Deorum res examinare, ſed quomodo militem alat, providere ipſum juberet. He underſtood the meaning of theſe words ſo well, that he ſold the ſtatues; as likewiſe all the reſt of the effects which the Privateers had ſeized upon. The Athenians were very ſtrongly inveighed againſt on that account (6); and Diodorus obſerves, that they plundered in this manner Apollo both by ſea and land, though they recognized him for their founder. He alſo takes notice of the odd humour of the Lacedæmonians. The inhabitants of this city declared, that they owed their glory and proſperity to the Oracles of Apollo; and nevertheleſs, they made a confederacy with thoſe impious people who plundered the temple of Delphi. Such is the way of the world, and ſuch it will ever be. Ἀθηναῖοι μὲν οὖν περὶ τὸ θεῖον τοιαῦτα ἔπραξαν, ϗ ταῦτ' εὐχόμενοι τὸν Ἀπόλλωνα πατρῷον αὐτῶν εἶναι ϗ πρόγονον. Λακεδαιμόνιοι δὲ τῷ περὶ Δελφοὺς μαντείῳ χρησάμενοι, ϗ τὴν θαυμαζομένην παρὰ πᾶσι πολιτείαν διὰ τοῦτο κτησάμενοι, ϗ περὶ τῶν μεγίσων ἔτι ϗ νῦν τὸν θεὸν ἐπερωτῶντες, ἐτόλμησαν τοῖς τὸ ἱερὸν συλήσασι κοινωνῆσαι τῆς παρανομίας. Hæc tum Athenienſes in Numen committere non verebantur, qui tamen Apollinem Deum patrium & progenitorem ſuum eſſe gloriari ſolebant. Lacedæmonii etiam, quamvis Rempublicam ſuam cunctis gentibus admirabilem Delphici oraculi conſilio inſtituiſſent, deque rebus maximis (ut ad hanc uſque tempeſtatem factitant) Dei voluntatem exquirerent, cum profligatiſſimis tamen fani expilatoribus ſacrilegæ impietatis ſocietatem inire non dubitant (7).

(4) Diod. Sicul. lib. 16. cap. 58.

(5) Idem, ibid. p. 453. The Latin Tranſlation of theſe words is, in the 8vo edition, in p. 781.

(6) See in Diod. Sicul. ibid. the letter which the Tyrant Dionyſius wrote to him.

(7) Idem, ibid.

[C] He no longer had the regard he till then had ſhewn for the temple.] Here follows a citation from Diodorus Siculus. Ὁ Φιλόμηλος ἤκμασε μισθοφόρων ἀθροίζειν πλῆθος, προσδεομένῳ δὲ τοῦ πολέμου χρημάτων, πλειόνων ἠνεγκάζετο τοῖς ἱεροῖς ἀναθήμασιν ἐπιβαλεῖν τὰς χεῖρας ϗ συλᾶν τὸ μαντεῖον (8). Philomelus majore conductitii militis robore ſe confirmare ſtatuit. At quia majores bellum ſumptus flagitabat, donariis ſacris manus injicere coactus, templum deprædatur (9). This is declaring very expreſsly, that Philomelus did not ſhare the treaſures and gifts of the temple of Delphi: and yet Diodorus Siculus affirms the direct contrary in the ſame book. I don't know whether this contradiction had been obſerved before. Τῶν δὲ προγεγενημένων ϛρατηγῶν ὁ μὲν πρῶτος ἄρξας Φιλόμηλος ἀπίσχετο τῶν ἀναθημάτων, ὁ δὲ δεύτερος προσαγορευόμενος μὲν Ὀνόμαρχος ἀδελφὸς δὲ ὢν Φιλομήλα πλεῖϛα τῶν τοῦ θεοῦ χρημάτων καθιεδαπάνησε, τρίτος δὲ Φάυλλος ὁ ἀδελφὸς Ὀνομάρχα ϛρατηγήσας οὐκ ὀλίγα τῶν ἀναθημάτων κατένοψεν εἰς τὰς τῶν ξένων μισθοφοράς (10). Priorum ſanè ducum, qui primus imperium geſſerat, Philomelus à ſacris templi donariis ſe continuerat, ſucceſſor verò ejus & frater Onomarchus plurimum de conſecratis Deo ad belli ſumptus convertit. Tertius inde Phayllus Onomarchi frater, dum Prætoris munere fungitur, non pauca de repoſitis in templo, ad perſolvendum conductitiis ſtipendia, concidit (11).

(8) Diod. Sicul. lib. 16. p. 430, 431. edition Hanov. 1604.

(9) Thoſe who have only the Latin edition, in 8vo, in 1611, will find this in cap. 30. lib. 16. p. 759.

(10) Idem, Diodorus, ibid. p. 452.

(11) Page 780, of the 8vo edit.

[D] Con-

under his banners [D]. He now marched into the enemy's country, and was ſucceſsful in the firſt engagements; but, not long after, he was obliged to maintain a running fight, in craggy places; when ſeeing it would be impoſſible for him to fly, and being reſolved not to be taken priſoner, he threw himſelf headlong from a rock. He was ſucceeded by Onomarchus his brother, who was afterwards ſucceeded by Phayllus, his other brother, who both carried off the remaining treaſures of the Temple. They behaved with ſome caution at firſt; but at laſt they completed the plunder of it; the Athenians and Lacedæmonians ſtill continuing their allies (b). Theſe tranſactions happened in the time of Philip of Macedon, Father to Alexander the Great. The Hiſtorian, who relates theſe particulars, does not omit the tragical end of thoſe who committed thoſe ſacrilegious actions [E].

He even obſerves, that divine juſtice purſued, with great ſeverity, thoſe women who preſumed to adorn themſelves with the ornaments which their huſbands had forced out of the Temple of Delphi (c); but he does not mention a female-dancer, to whom a preſent of this kind was very fatal [F]. Juſtin obſerves, that though the whole world had this action of the Phoceans in the utmoſt deteſtation, they yet were not ſo much hated as thoſe who (d) reduced them to that neceſſity (e). People's envy or hatred with regard to an infamous action, is generally divided after this manner, which diſtribution is not very unjuſt: for, thoſe who force a man to attempt a deſperate action, act with greater liberty than he. Pauſanias makes a remark which it may not be improper to mention here. Philomelus, ſays he, having adviſed the Phoceans to plunder the Temple of Delphi, and having employed ſeveral plauſible reaſons to prompt them to it, perſuaded them very ſtrongly to attempt it; whether God had blinded them, or that they, from their own natures, preferred gain to religion (f). He informs us (g), that Philomelus was a native of Ledon a city of Phocis, and that the Temple was plundered the 4th year of the 105th Olympiad.

(b) Extracted from Diod. Sicul. lib. 16. cap. 23. & ſeq. ad Olympiadem 106.

(c) See the cloſe of the rem. [A], of the art. CALLIRRHOE, and the rem. [S] of the art. HELENA.

(d) The Thebans.

(e) Juſtin. lib. 8. cap. 1.

(f) Εἴτε τὴν γνώμην σφίσι τῷ Θεῷ βλάπτοντος, εἴτε καὶ αὐτοῖς πεφυκόσιν ἐπίπροσθεν εὐσεβείας τὰ κέρδη ποιεῖσθαι. Sive quod mentem Deus à rectis conſiliis avertiſſet, ſeu quod is populus ſuapte natura religioni ſolitus eſſet quæſtum anteponere. Pauſanias, Lib. 10. p. 318.

(g) Idem, ibid. p. 317.

[D] Conſcientious people refuſed to fight under his banners.] Τῶν μὲν δὴ ἐπιεικῶν ἀνδρῶν οὐδεὶς ἀπεγράψατο πρὸς τὴν στρατείαν διὰ τὴν πρὸς τοὺς θεοὺς εὐσέβειαν· οἱ δὲ πονηρότατοι καὶ θεῶν διὰ τὴν πλεονεξίαν καταφρονοῦντες, προθύμως συνέτρεχον πρὸς τὸν Φιλόμηλον. i. e. "No man of virtue "would enliſt under him, becauſe the principles of "religion forbids this, whilſt every wicked wretch, "deſpiſing the Gods for the ſake of gain, was extremely deſirous of ſerving under Philomelus."

(12) Diod. Sicul. lib. 16. cap. 30. p. 759. edit. 8vo.

[E] Diodorus Siculus does not omit the tragical end of thoſe who committed thoſe ſacrilegious actions.] This obſervation of the Hiſtorian (13) ought not to be looked upon as ſuperſtitious; for though the temple of Delphi was conſecrated to a falſe God, it was nevertheleſs an impiety and a ſacrilegious action in thoſe who plundered it, and ſuppoſed Apollo to be a true God. I confeſs that the true God only can change the nature of profane things, and thoſe cannot become ſacred, but by his inſtitution. Thus all the gifts, which had been conſecrated in the temple of Delphi, remained in their firſt ſtate. The golden tiles, which King Crœſus conſecrated there (14), were nothing but gold; it was equally lawful to coin them into money, as an ingot that came from the mine; this, I ſay, was equally allowable, with regard to thoſe who were not of the heathen religion; but any man who ſuppoſed that the gifts of the temple were conſecrated to God, could not ſeize upon it, without being guilty of a ſacrilegious action; properly ſo called, which the true God, the ſole infallible judge of the quality of actions, and the only diſpenſer of rewards and puniſhments, thought fit to puniſh. I ſpeak of the puniſhments which the Jews would have deſerved, had they plundered the temple of Solomon (15).

(13) Ubi ſupra, cap. 57. p. 779, 780.

(14) Diod. Sicul. lib. 16. cap. 57. p. 780.

That the Reader may know what conſiderable votaries the antient Heathens were, with regard to their falſe Gods, I will obſerve by the way, that the gold and ſilver of which the temple was deſpoiled on this occaſion, and which was turned into current money, amounted to ten (16) thouſand talents (17). Some Authors relate, that the ſums which the Phoceans took out of it, equalled thoſe which Alexander found afterwards in the Exchequer of King Darius (18).

[F] He does not mention a female-dancer, to whom a preſent of this kind was very fatal.] That is a preſent taken from the ſpoils of the temple of Delphi. Our Philomelus gave the golden crown of the Cnidans to Pharſalia the female-dancer. A fine allotment this, and very agreeable to the end which the Cnidans had propoſed to themſelves! Non hos quæſitum munus in uſus. What a leap was this, from the arch of a temple, to the head of ſuch a woman! However this be, the female-dancer had an ill bargain of it. She went from Greece into Italy; and as ſhe was one day dancing at Metapontum, in the temple of Apollo, a company of young men flew to her crown; and fought ſo eagerly to get it, that they tore Pharſalia to pieces. This incident is related by Plutarch (19).

(15) See Penſees ſur les Cometes, num. 118. See alſo the following words of Seneca, cap. 7. lib. 7. of Benefits. Injuriam ſacrilegus Deo quidem non poteſt facere, quem extra ictum ſua divinitas poſuit: ſed punitur, quia tanquam Deo fecit. Opinio illum noſtra, ac ſua, obligat pœnæ. i. e. "A ſacrilegious "man cannot do "any injury to "God, he, by "his divinity, "being placed a"bove the reach "of men; ne"verthleſs he "is puniſhed, be"cauſe he at"tempted to in"jure God. Our "own opinion, "and his alſo, "renders us ob"noxious to pu"niſhment."

(16) About twenty millions, French money. (17) Diod. Sicul. lib. 16. cap. 57. (18) Ibid. (19) Plut. de Pythiæ Oraculis, p. 397, 398.

PHILO. Peter Bellier, Doctor of Laws, wrote a French verſion of part of Philo's works, and dedicated it to Mr. de Chiverni, Chancellor of France. This work was reviſed, corrected, and enlarged, with three books tranſlated from the original Greek, by Frederic Morel, Dean of the King's Readers and Interpreters, and then was reprinted at Paris in 1612, 8vo, and dedicated by Mr. Morel, to Philip Huraut, Biſhop of Chartres, ſon of the Chancellor of Chiverni.

PHLEGON, ſirnamed Trallianus (a), wrote ſeveral works, very little of which are now extant [A]. He was the Emperor Hadrian's freed-man. Thoſe who think he was manu-

(a) This ſignifies a native of Trallis, a city of Lydia.

(1) Suidas, in Φλέγων.

(2) Idem, ibid.

(3) Photius, Bibliotb. num. 975. p. 265.

(4) Suidas, in Φλέγων. Anonymus in deſcript. Olym.

[A] He wrote ſeveral works, very little of which is now extant.] He wrote a hiſtory of the Olympiads divided into 16 books (1). It was an univerſal hiſtory (2) beginning at the firſt Olympiad (3), and ending at the 229th (4). It is ſometimes cited under the name of Olympiads, and ſometimes under that of Chronicles. Photius joins theſe two titles together, ἀναγινώσθη, ſays he (5), Φλέγοντος Τραλλιανοῦ . . . ὀλυμπιονικῶν καὶ χρονικῶν συναγωγή. i. e. "I have read the "collection of Olympiads and Chronicles by Phle"gon Trallianus." Origen (6) and Maximus (7) have cited it under the title of Chronicles; as alſo Ste-

(5) Phot. Bibl. n. 971, p. 265.

(6) Origines, lib. 2. contra Celſum.

(7) Maximus, in Schol. ad Dionyſii Areopagitæ Epiſt. 7. apud Meurſium Not. ad Phlegontem, p. 170.

phanus

manumized by Auguſtus (b), had never peruſed his works. He lived, at leaſt, as long as the 18th year of the Empire of Antoninus Pius (c), he mentioning the Conſuls of that year (d), which is 142 years after Auguſtus's death. He had a freed-man, who was an Author [B]. It is thought that the Hiſtory of Hadrian, publiſhed under Phlegon's name, was writ by Hadrian himſelf [C]. Phlegon ſpeaks as being an eye-witneſs to the reſurrection of a young woman (e). Conſult Tillemont (f). It is ſaid that he ſpoke of the darkneſs which prevailed during our Lord's paſſion [D]. Photius blames him

(b) Suidas in Φλέγων, mentions this.

(c) The year of our Lord 156.

(d) Phleg. de Rebus mirabilib. cap. 10.

(e) Phleg. de Rebus mirab. cap. 1.

(f) Tellemont. Hiſt. de Empereurs, Tom. 1. p. 467. Bruſſels edit.

phanus Byzantinus (8), but he has cited much oftner under the title of Olympiads. Salmaſius was of opinion, that Phlegon's Chronicles were, perhaps, a ſeparate work, and divided into eight books (9); but would he have ſaid this, had he conſidered the title quoted by Photius, and the citations found in Origen and Maximus? The former cites the 13th and 14th book of the Chronicles, and the latter the 14th; to prove, by the teſtimony of a Heathen, the ſame incidents which Euſebius relates (10), as contained in the 13th book of Phlegon's Olympiads. I do not think that the following words of Suidas, τὰ πραχθέντα παντα χοῦ, i. e. "an Univerſal Hiſtory," ſhould be ſeparated from what goes before, and referred only to what follows; they agreeing perfectly well with the Hiſtory of the Olympiads, which he had ſpoke of juſt before. But if I deviate from Salmaſius's (11) opinion in that, I do not differ from it in this, viz. that we muſt ſuppoſe that Suidas meant, that Phlegon compoſed another book, divided into eight books, which alſo contained τὰ πραχθέντα παντα χοῦ, i. e. "an Univerſal Hiſtory," It happens pretty often, that a general hiſtory is written after different methods, by the ſame Author. Photius, who had read the firſt five books of Phlegon's Olympiads (12), gives a ſummary of the 177th Olympiad, where they ended. We may form a judgment of the whole piece from this ſpecimen, and we muſt own with Voſſius, that were this Chronicle extant, it might be of very great advantage in explaining a great number of particulars; but this does not prove that Photius did wrong in condemning the trifling particulars on which Phlegon expatiated, and ſuch a detail as tired the Readers, and clouded the moſt memorable incidents (13); and therefore we may juſtly cenſure ſome part of the following paſſage in Voſſius. Non penitus probare poſſum quod idem (Photius) reprehendit anxiam illam curam in Olympiadibus recenſendis, atque iis annotandis quæ ſingularum tempore contigerunt. Imo vero utinam totum Chronicon extaret. Multum enim lucis abſque dubio priſcæ inde Eccleſiæ temporibus accederet, i. e. "I cannot entirely approve Photius, for cenſuring the great diligence employed in giving an account of the Olympiads, and in taking notice of the ſeveral tranſactions which came to paſs under each of them. Wou'd that the entire Chronicle were extant; for this doubtleſs would throw great lights over the hiſtory of the primitive church." Photius's words, which I ſhall quote in the remark [E], will ſhew, that what he cenſured, was not juſtly repreſented by Voſſius. All that exiſts of this work of Phlegon, is a fragment which does not take up quite ſix pages in the Leyden edition of 1622, 4to. This treatiſe περὶ μακροβίων, i. e. "of perſons who have lived to a very advanced age," is ſhort enough; and there is great room to ſuppoſe that we have it not entire (15); it not making any mention of certain illuſtrious perſons who lived to a very great age. As to his treatiſe περὶ θαυμασίων, i. e. "of wonderful things," it contains 135 chapters, moſt of them very ſhort, and the beginning is imperfect. Theſe are the broken remains of Phlegon's works. Xylander tranſlated them into Latin, and publiſhed them at Baſil, with the Greek, and with notes, in 1568. Meurſius, in 1622, gave a new edition of them, with his notes, at Leyden. Suidas gives the titles of parts of the reſt of Phlegon's writings.

(8) Vide Meurſium, ibid. p. 169.

(9) Salmaſius, in Spartian. Hiſt. Adrian. cap. 16. p. m. 151. Tom. 1.

(10) See the rem. [D].

(11) Salmaſius, in Spartian. Hiſt. Adrian. cap. 16. p. m. 151. Tom. 1.

(12) Phot. Bibl. num. 97. p. 268.

(13) I cite Photius's words in the rem. [E].

(14) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græcis, lib. 2. cap. 11. p. m. 219.

(15) Voſſius, ubi ſupra.

[B] He had a freed-man who was an Author.] This is manifeſt from the following words of Spartianus: Legiſſe me apud Ælium Maurum Phlegontis Tralliani libertum memini, Septimium Severum immoderatiſſime cum moveretur lætatum quod duos Antoninos pari imperio reipublicæ relinqueret (16), i. e. "I have read in Ælius "Maurus, Phlegon Trallianus's freed-man, that "Septimius Severus, in his expiring moments, diſcovered prodigious joy, becauſe he left two Anto"nius's equal ſharers in the Empire." Andreas Schottus affirms, without any good reaſon for it, that there is an error in this paſſage, and that we ſhould read them thus, apud Ælii Hadriani libertum Phlegontem Trallianum (17), i. e. "in Phlegon Trallianus, "the freed-man of Ælius Hadrianus." He is ſurprized that the Criticks had not yet made this correction: quod mendum magnos ævi noſtri Criticos fugiſſe, quos nihil pæne fugit, equidem miror: ſed & poſteris ſpicas relinquunt non inviti (18). His ſurprize is ill grounded; for it is no ways probable that Spartianus cited Phlegon in that place. How could any perſon ſuppoſe, that this freed-man of Hadrian ſurvived Severus, who died ſeventy-four years after Hadrian? See Voſſius, who employed this chronological reaſon againſt Andreas Schottus (19). The printers have committed a great many errors in that place (20).

(16) Ælius Spartianus, in vita Severi, cap. 20. p. m. 632. Tom. 1.

(17) Andr. Schottus, Obſ. humanar. lib. 2. cap. 19. p. 57.

(18) Idem, ibid.

(19) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. lib. 2. cap. 2. p. 176.

(20) They have twice printed Trullanus, inſtead of Trallianus. They have put anno, inſtead of uno; and omitted ſeveral words.

[C] It is thought that the hiſtory of Hadrian, publiſhed under Phlegon's name, was writ by Hadrian himſelf.] I have already made this remark in another place (21); but will repeat it here, and add Spartianus's own words: Famæ celebris Adrianus tam cupidus fuit, ut libros vitæ ſuæ ſcriptos à ſe libertis ſuis literatis dederit, jubens ut eos ſuis nominibus publicarent: nam Phlegontis libri Adriani eſſe dicuntur (22), "Adrian thirſted ſo "much after fame, that he gave the books of his "own life, drawn up by himſelf, to his freed-men, "commanding them to publiſh thoſe books under "their own names; for we are told, that Adrian "wrote Phlegon's books." Theſe words have been miſtaken by a German Author, who writes as follows: Eos (libros de mirabilibus, Olympiadibus, & longævis) tanti æſtimavit Hadrianus, famæ percelebris cupidus, ut pro ſuis venditarit, ut colligere licet ex Ælio Spartiano in Vita Hadriani (23), i. e. "Hadrian, "who had a ſtrong thirſt of fame, ſo highly eſteem"ed the books concerning wonderful things, the O"lympiads, and perſons who had lived to a very ad"vanced age, that he pretended them to be of his own "writing, as may be inferred from Hadrian's life, in "Ælius Spartianus." How ſtrangely are Spartianus's words perverted! The Author ſuppoſes that the Emperor Hadrian put his name to Phlegon's books; and cites, to prove his aſſertion, an Author who ſays that Hadrian put Phlegon's name to his own works. I muſt not leave this ſubject, without animadverting on an error of Moreri; few committed by him ſtand in greater need of correction. Phlegon, ſays he, the Emperor Adrian's freed-man, had a great ſhare in the friendſhip of this Prince, who publiſhed a Hiſtory of his Life under his name. It is he who relates, in his 14th book, that the 4th year of the 202d Olympiad, &c. The conſtruction of theſe words is ſo bad, that a man muſt be a Conjurer to underſtand them. They imply, according to the laws of Grammar, that Hadrian ſet his name to the Hiſtory which he publiſhed of his Life; but this is falſe, and does not ſquare with Moreri's intentions. Now as theſe words are not written according to the grammatical laws of conſtruction, they may be underſtood, either as if the Emperor in queſtion had publiſhed the Hiſtory of Phlegon under Phlegon's name, or as if he had publiſhed it under his (Hadrian's) name. Here is another error. The conſtruction of the words above cited will make all Readers take them in the following ſenſe, that the event of the fourth year of the 202d Olympiad, is found in book 14, of the Hiſtory publiſhed by Adrian. But this is miſleading the Reader; for if he miſtakes this ſnare, he will fall into another, as he will ſuppoſe that Phlegon wrote but one work.

(21) Citat. (49) of the art. HADRIAN.

(22) Spartian. in Adriano, cap. 16. p. m. 1504

(23) Tobias Magirus, Eponymol. Critic. p. 659. edit. 1687.

[D] It is ſaid, that he ſpoke of the darkneſs which prevailed during our Lord's paſſion.] As the book in which theſe words are contained, is loſt, the beſt I can do is, to cite Euſebius's teſtimony: this Writer not him for expatiating too much on trifles, and for collecting too great a number of anſwers pronounced not ſaying, in a vague and random manner, that Phlegon advanced this or t'other, but quotes his own words: Γράφει δὲ καὶ λίγει ὁ τὰς Ολυμπιάδας . . . . . περὶ τῶν αὐτῶν ἐν τῷ ιγ, ῥήμασιν αὐτοῖς τάδε. τῷ δ" ἔτει τῆς σβ Ολυμπιάδ◎ ἐγένετο ἔκλειψις ἡλίᵾ μεγίστη τῶν γνωρισμένων πρότερον. καὶ νὺξ ὥρα ϛ τῆς ἡμέρας ἐγένετο, ὥστε καὶ ἀστέρας ἐν οὐρανῷ φανῆναι. σεισμός τε μέγας κατὰ Βιθυνίαν γενόμεν◎ τὰ πολλὰ Νικαίας κατεσκέψατο, καὶ ταῦτα ὁ δηλωθεὶς ἀνὴρ (24). It is according to St. Jerom's verſion; Scribit vero ſuper his & Phlegon qui Olympiadarum egregius ſupputator eſt, in tertio decimo libro ita dicens: quarto autem anno 202 Olympiadis magna & excellens inter omnes quæ ante eam acciderant, defectio ſolis facta: dies hora ſexta in tenebroſam noctem verſus, ut ſtellæ in cœlo viſæ ſint, terræque motus in Bithynia Nicææ urbis multas ædes ſubverterit. Hæc ſupradictus vir (25). Thus the abovementioned Author writes. We find that Euſebius is of opinion, that theſe words of Phlegon are relative to the prodigies, which accompanied Chriſt's crucifixion. Many more antient fathers of the Church have thought the ſame; but this belief is liable to ſome difficulties, the chief of which I take to be the following. No man had ever a ſtronger deſire than Phlegon to compile marvellous events, and to obſerve the præternatural circumſtances in them (26). How was it poſſible, that a man of this turn of mind had not taken notice of the moſt ſurprizing circumſtance in the eclipſe which he is ſuppoſed to hint at, I mean, its happening on the day when the moon was at full? This objection was no doubt propoſed; and, in all probability, ſcarce thought that the beſt way of ſolving this would be, to affirm, that he had taken notice of this circumſtance. Φλέγων ἱστορεῖ ἐπὶ Τιβερίᵾ Καίσαρ◎ ἐν παντελήᵾ ἔκλειψιν ἡλίᵾ γεγονέναι. Narrat Phlegon imperante Tiberio Cæſare ſolis eclipſin plenilunio contigiſſe (27). Theſe words of Africanus are related by Syncellus, who poſitively aſſerts therein, that Phlegon relates there happened, under the Empire of Tiberius, a ſolar eclipſe at the time when the moon was at full. But Phlegon did not ſay ſo; had he done this, Euſebius would not have omitted it; and Origen would not have ſaid, that Phlegon had omitted this particular. Et Phlegon quidam in Chronicis ſuis ſcripſit in principatu Tiberii Cæſaris factum: ſed non ſignificavit in luna plena factum (28). If it be objected, that he did not ſay that the eclipſe in queſtion did not happen during the new moon (29), I anſwer, that he had no occaſion to ſay ſo, this being a thing to be ſuppoſed. Philoponus's obſervation is of no uſe, it being a falſe gloſs. He pretends that Phlegon, taking notice of an eclipſe, the like of which had never been obſerved before, intimated the darkneſs which prevailed at the time of Chriſt's paſſion. Ἐγένετο ἡλίᵾ ἔκλειψις ὰκ ἐγνωσμένων πρότερον . . . . μὴ ἐγνῶσθαι τὴν τοιαύτην ἔκλειψιν τοῖς πρότερον χρόνοις. Contigit eclipſis ſolis cujuſmodi nulla ante cognita eſt . . . . . ſuperioribus non eſſe cognitam eclipſim hujuſmodi (30). This Author diſcovers too ſtrong an inclination, to make people ſpeak in ſuch a manner, as ſuits the intereſt of his party, and that at the expence of truth. Phlegon did not ſay, in general, that this eclipſe was of a different nature from all thoſe which preceded it: ſuch a random way of expreſſion would bear ſeveral interpretations, and might be turned to the advantage of Philoponus's cauſe. He made uſe of a limited phraſe; he obſerved that this eclipſe, with regard to the dimenſions of it, exceeded thoſe which had been obſerved before it. We ſhall take in the whole force of that expreſſion, if we ſuppoſe that the eclipſe ſpoken of in that place, happened during the perigæum of the moon, and that it was central. Such an eclipſe is ſo ſeldom ſeen, that an Hiſtorian, who relates ſuch particulars according to the impreſſion they make on people's minds, and not according to the exact obſervations of an Aſtronomer, who has conſulted the ephemerides of all ages; ſuch an Hiſtorian, I ſay, might naturally have made the ſame remark as Phlegon. See what the French Hiſtorians obſerve with regard to the eclipſe of the 2d of October 1605.

It muſt be obſerved, that it is not certain, that Phlegon ſays, that the earthquake which threw down ſeveral houſes in the city of Nicææ, happened at the ſame time with the eclipſe. He perhaps only took notice, that theſe two events were obſerved the ſame year. A perſon who ſhould abſolutely inſiſt that he intimated the ſame day, will plunge himſelf into another difficulty; for he muſt ſuppoſe the light of the ſun diſappeared at noon-day in Bithynia; and conſequently, that the darkneſs which was at the time of our Lord's paſſion, over-ſpread the whole earth. This opinion has always been oppoſed by perſons who no ways intended to prejudice in any manner the orthodox faith (31), and is ſubject to a difficulty, the ſtrength of which is not eaſily combatted; for, how can we think it poſſible, in caſe this darkneſs happened all over the world (32), Phlegon would have been the only Writer, or almoſt the only one (33), who had ſpoke of it? We muſt call to mind, that Huetius (34) blames Kepler for aſſerting, that Phlegon's eclipſe ought to be fixed to the 24th of November of the 2d year of the 202d Olympiad §α.

[§α The queſtion whether Phlegon ſpoke of the darkneſs at the time of the paſſion of our Lord, was canvaſſed here about eight years ago in ſeveral diſſertations pro and con, occaſioned by the paſſage from Phlegon being left out in an edition of Dr. Clarke's Boyle's Lectures, publiſhed ſoon after his death. Mr. Whiſton, in his Hiſtorical Memoirs of Dr. Clarke, p. 148, had ſaid, "Sometime before Dr. Clarke died, "Dr. Sykes perſuaded him to leave out of his fu-"ture editions of Boyle's Lectures that famous paſ-"ſage in Phlegon, of an eclipſe of the ſun and an "earthquake, which was cited by him, and has "been generally cited by others of the Learned, as "an atteſtation to the ſupernatural eclipſe of the "ſun, and the earthquake, at our Saviour's paſſion, "mentioned by the Evangeliſts." Mr. Whiſton then proceeds to expreſs great diſpleaſure againſt Dr. Sykes, and calls the ſuggeſtion groundleſs. Upon this Dr. Sykes publiſhed, A Diſſertation on the Eclipſe mentioned by Phlegon: Or, an Enquiry whether that Eclipſe had any relation to the Darkneſs which happened at our Saviour's Paſſion. London 1732. And he concludes it to be moſt probable, that Phlegon had in view a natural eclipſe, which happened on November the 24th, in the firſt year of the 202d Olympiad, and not in the 4th year of the Olympiad, in which year Chriſt was crucified. In this Dr. Sykes has given us Mr. Whiſton's calculation, which he computed for the city of Nice in Bithynia, which he, Mr. W. ſays, "began there a-"bout a quarter after eight, and ended a quarter af-"ter ten, and was about 9 or 10 digits only there." The Dr. has likewiſe here conſidered what is uſually ſaid from the Chineſe Hiſtories concerning a darkneſs, which is repreſented as the darkneſs at the Paſſion.

To this Mr. Whiſton publiſhed an anſwer, called, The Teſtimony of Phlegon vindicated; or an Account of the great Darkneſs and Earthquake at our Saviour's Paſſion, deſcribed by Phlegon; including all the Teſtimonies, both Heathen and Chriſtian, in the very words of the original Authors, during the firſt ſix Centuries of Chriſtianity, with proper Obſervations on thoſe Teſtimonies. By William Whiſton. 1732.

Soon after appeared, A Defence of the Diſſertation on the Eclipſe mentioned by Phlegon: Wherein it is farther ſhewn, That that Eclipſe had no relation to the Darkneſs which happened at our Saviour's Paſſion, and Mr. Whiſton's Obſervations are particularly conſidered. By Arthur Aſhley Sykes, D. D. 1733. To which the Author has prefixed a Preface in juſtification of himſelf, for entering into this debate. In this defenſe of himſelf, the Dr. examines all Mr. Whiſton's original evidences; and particularly examines his notion, that this darkneſs was cauſed by a Comet. Then he gives us Mr. Gale Morris's computation of the eclipſe Novemb. 24. which was total between Cairo in Egypt and Jeruſalem: that in the center of the ſhadow, the ſun was totally darkened about two minutes: that at Jeruſalem, the middle of the eclipſe was about a quarter of an hour after noon. Dr. Halley's account, and Mr. Hodgſon's, of the ſame eclipſe, are mentioned.

This Defence of Dr. Sykes's Diſſertation drew on him ſeveral new adverſaries. Firſt, there appeared A Letter to Dr. Sykes from Oxford, entitled, Phlegon's Teſtimony

(24) Euſeb. in Chron. ad Olymp. σβ, p. 202. edit. Scaligeri, Amſtelod. 1658.

(25) See the abovementioned edition of Scaliger, p. 158.

(26) Ex quo loco apparet quale fuerit argumentum librorum Olympiadum Phlegontis. Nam ſub quaque Olympiade, quid toto orbe geſtum eſſet recenſebat, prodigia præcipue & monſtra, reſque alias mirabiles memorabileſque. Salmaſ. in Spart. p. 152. Tom. 1.

(27) Africanus, apud Georgium Syncellum, in Chronographia, citante Huetio Demonſtrat. Evangel. Propoſ. 3. p. m. 49.

(28) Origenes in Matth. Tract. 35.

(29) Atque neque interlunio factum id adnotavit. Quare rem in medio reliquit. Huet. Demonſ. Evang. Propoſ. 3. p. 49.

(30) Philoponus, de Mundi Creatione, lib. 2. apud Huet. ibid.

(31) See Antonius Bynæus, de Morte Chriſti, lib. 5. p. 405 & ſeq.

(32) See Voſſius, Harmon. Evang. lib. 2. cap. 10. p. 322.

(33) I add this reſtriction, becauſe Huetius, Demonſtrat. Evangel. Propoſ. 3. p. 51. ſays that Tacitus the Hiſtorian ſpoke alſo of it, to which he adds the teſtimony of the Chineſe, mentioned in Adrian Greſſon's Hiſtory of China.

(34) Huet. ubi ſupra, p. 49.

Teſtimony ſhewn to relate to the Darkneſs which happened at our Saviour's Paſſion. London 1733.

Phlegon examined Critically and Impartially, in Anſwer to the late Diſſertation and Defence of Dr. Sykes. To which is added, a Poſtſcript, explaining a Paſſage in Tertullian. By John Chapman, M. A. Cambridge 1734.

An Appeal to the genuine Records and Teſtimonies of Heathen and Jewiſh Writers in Defence of Chriſtianity. By Thomas Dawſon, D. D. London 1733.

Mr. Whiſton likewiſe publiſhed ſix Diſſertations, the third of which is, A Reply to Dr. Sykes's Defence of his Diſſertation on the Eclipſe mentioned by Phlegon. London 1734.

In this Mr. Whiſton has given us ſeveral calculations or approximations made for Rome, Nice, or Jeruſalem. And has made ſeveral obſervations upon the calculations publiſhed by Dr. Sykes.

Upon this Dr. Sykes publiſhed A ſecond Defence of the Diſſertation upon the Eclipſe mentioned by Phlegon: Wherein Mr. Chapman's Objections, and thoſe of the Author of the Letter to Dr. Sykes, are particularly conſidered. London 1734. In this Dr. Sykes examined all that he thought material in Mr. Whiſton's Obſervations.

Mr. Chapman in his Treatiſe has cited Euſebius, the Chronicon Paſchale, and Joannes Philoponus among the Greeks: among the Latins, Jerom and Anaſtaſius, the Author of the Hiſtoria Miſcella and Freculphus Lexovienſis, "all concurring in one uniform repreſenta-"tion of a fragment of Phlegon, and in one reading "of a controverted numeral." This appeared ſo juſt an argument, that it might eaſily ſatisfy an ordinary Reader. This therefore made Dr. Sykes's ſecond Defence abſolutely neceſſary: and in that he ſhewed that five of the ſeven Writers here mentioned as uniform, either tranſlated or tranſcribed the paſſage not from Phlegon himſelf, but from Euſebius, who firſt quoted it. That there is no dependance upon this firſt Quoter: and that as to Philoponus, who did ſee Phlegon, he is ſo far from concurring with Euſebius, that he differs from him two years. Dr. Sykes then adds, that Maximus and Malela might likewiſe have been added, as living whilſt Phlegon's books were, according to Mr. Chapman, extant. And then the evidence would ſtand thus: "Five are Tranſcribers or Tranſlators of Euſebius. Philoponus, where he profeſſes to give the very words of Phlegon, reads it a 2d way: Maximus a 3d way: Malela a 4th. So far are they from being uniform in the reading of this paſſage.

In anſwer to Dr. Sykes, Mr. Chapman publiſhed, PHLEGON re-examined: In Anſwer to Dr. Sykes's Second Defence of his Diſſertation concerning Phlegon. To which is added, a Poſtſcript, concerning the Chronicon Paſchale. Camb. 1735. And thus this controverſy ended.

Dr. Sykes, in his Second Defence, p. 76, 77, obſerves, that he had drawn up an Enquiry, whether Phlegon made uſe of the Julian or the Aſiatic form of year, in order to ſhew, whether the Δ of Euſebius were more probably to be changed into an A, as the Doctor ſuppoſed at firſt, or into a B, as Petavius and others think more probable. But as the Doctor did not publiſh that Enquiry, we ſhall inſert it here from his original manuſcript, which he favoured us with.

Auguſtus died when Pompeius and Apuleius were Conſuls, Aug. 19. A. Per. Jul. 4727, and conſequently Tiberius's firſt year began then. His 15th therefore began A. P. J. 4741. His 18th began in A. P. J. 4744. If Chriſt therefore died in the 18th of Tiberius, it muſt be ſome time in the ſpring 4745.

Olympiad 202.	1. began in July A. P. J. 4742.	Tiberius's 15th began A. P. J. 4741.	ended Aug. 4742.
	2. Tiberius's 16th began Aug. 4742,	ended 4743.
	3. Tiberius's 17th began 4743,	ended 4744.
	4. Tiberius's 18th began 4744,	ended 4745.
203.	1. Tiberius's 19th began 4745,	ended 4746.

The Olympiadic year, and the years of Tiberius, all along vary but a little above a month from each other; and conſequently, there is but little chance of miſtaking, when one reduces any fact to thoſe reſpective years. But then, when one computes by the Julian years, it is eaſy to miſtake, becauſe there is a conſtant coincidence of the Olympiad with ſix months of one year, and ſix months of the following year. Or if a Writer makes uſe of the Syromacedonian year, or the Egyptian year, a difficulty may very eaſily ariſe how to adjuſt the Olympiad to the form of year he uſes. E. g. The Aſiatics uſed a year, which began October 1. or thereabouts. The Egyptians, notwithſtanding they uſed the Nabonaſſarean year among the Aſtronomers and Mathematicians, quite down to Ptolemy's time, yet in all other inſtances, in a little time after the battle at Actium, they began their year Auguſt 29.

When therefore we meet with any fact ſaid to be done in ſuch a year of an Olympiad, unleſs there be other given circumſtances, it may be difficult to determine in what year of the Julian period it happened. And ſo again, if an Author reckons by, or makes uſe of the Egyptian or the Syromacedonian year, and names likewiſe the Olympiad in which a fact happened, it may be hard to ſay, whether he means the current Syromacedonian year in which the Olympiad happened, or the Olympiad as the European Grecians reckoned them.

To explain what I mean, when we ſay, that A. D. 29. Nov. 24. there happened an eclipſe of the ſun: it is true, that this happened A. Per. Jul. 4742. If you reckon the Olympiadic year from July to July, it was in the firſt year of the 202d Olympiad. But ſuppoſe a man were to uſe a year that began in Auguſt or in October, ſuch a Writer might ſay that this eclipſe happened in the ſecond year of that Olympiad; and he would mean, that it happened in the year current, in which the ſecond Olympiadic year was. For with ſuch a Writer, the year ending, e. g. in September, he would conclude all the facts of the year with that; and reckon the firſt year of the Olympiad to end there, and the ſecond year to contain all that fell within his compaſs from October to October again. So that this eclipſe happening in November, he muſt ſay that it fell in the ſecond year of the 202d Olympiad; meaning, that it fell in the compaſs of the year in courſe in which the ſecond year of that Olympiad was.

And thus in the caſe before us; unleſs one could ſay with certainty what year Phlegon made uſe of beſides the Olympiad, i. e. whether he uſed the Julian or Aſiatic year, it may be impoſſible to ſay, whether the true reading of him be in the firſt, or ſecond year, notwithſtanding he meant the very ſame eclipſe, A. D. 29. Nov. 24. For as he was born at Tralles, and was an Aſiatic, and thence it may be conceived probable enough, that he uſed the Aſiatic year; ſo likewiſe being a Roman Emperor's freedman, and being always about him, it is as probable that he might uſe the Roman year. Which form of year he did uſe, muſt be our next enquiry.

The principal, if not the ſole light we can have in this diſquiſition, is to be derived from Photius. For though Philoponus had Phlegon before him, and ſays from him, that Tiberius began his reign in the 2d year of the 198th Olympiad; yet as he began his reign in Auguſt, you cannot determine any thing: for let Philoponus uſe the Alexandrian or the Julian year, Auguſt will be in the ſecond year of that Olympiad, in either account. We muſt ſee therefore what can be diſcovered from Photius, whoſe words are as follow: λεύκολ☉ ἀμωσὶν ἐπολιόρκει καὶ μυρίναν ἐπὶ τῆς πολιορκίας καταλιπὼν μετὰ δυοῖν ταγμάτοιν, αὐτὸς μετὰ τριῶν ἄλλων προῆγεν ἐπὶ καῖσαρῶν, ὅπου διεχείμαζε καὶ Ἀθριανὸν ἐπέταξε πολεμῆσαι Μιθριδάτῃ· καὶ πολεμήσας ἐνίκησε καὶ σεισμῷ ἐν ῥώμῃ γενομένῳ πολλὰ τούτῳ συνέπεσε· καὶ ἄλλα δὲ πλεῖσα ἐν ταύτῃ ξυνηνέχθη τῇ Ολυμπιαδὶ CLXXVII. Καὶ Ρωμαίων τῷ τρίτῳ αὐτῆς ἔτει ἀπεστιμήθησαν μυριάδες ἐνενήκοντα καὶ μία. καὶ Σινατρούκην τὸν Πάρθων βασιλέα τελευτήσαντα διεδέξατο. Φράτης ὁ ἐπικληθεὶς θεός· καὶ φᾶισθαι τὸν ἐπικήριον διεδέξατο Πάτραν. καὶ Οὐϊργίλι☉ μάρων ὁ ποιητὴς ἐγενήθη τούτῳ τῷ ἔτει, εἰδοῖς ὀκτωβρίαις. Τῷ δὲ τετάρτῳ ἔτει Τιγράνης καὶ Μιθριδάτης ἀθροίσαντες, πεζοὺς μὲν τεσσαράς μυριάδας, ἱππέων δὲ τρεῖς, καὶ τὸν ἰταλικὸν αὐτοὺς ταξάντες τρόπον, ἐπολέμησαν λευκύλλῳ· καὶ νικᾷ Λεύκυλλ☉· καὶ πεντακισχίλιον μὲν τῶν μετὰ Τιγράνους ἔπεσον, πλείους δὲ τούτων, ἡχμαλωτίσθησαν, χωρὶς τῶ ἄλλω συγκλυδοῦς ὄχλω. καὶ τὸ καπιτώλιον ἐν Ῥώμῃ Κάτλος καθιέρωσε. Καὶ Μέτελλος ἐπὶ τὸν κρητικὸν πόλεμον ὁρμήσας τρία τάγματα ἔχων, ἦλθεν εἰς τὴν νῆσον, καὶ μάχῃ νικήσας τὸν Λασσθένη, αὐτοκράτωρ ἀνηγορεύθη, καὶ τειχήρεις κατέστησε τοὺς Κρητας. καὶ Ἀθηνόδωρος πειρατὴς ἑξανδραποδισάμενος Δηλίους τὰ τῶν λιγομένων θεῶν ξόανα ἀπελυμήνατο. Γαίος δὲ τριάριος τὰ λελεκημένα τῆς πόλεως ἐπισκευάσας ἐτείχισε τὴν Δῆλον. Pho. Biblio. cap. 97. For if Phlegon, in his accounts of the Olympiads, mentions facts as done in any Olympiadic year, which were done between October and the July following, it is plain then, that he reckoned the Olympiads from July to July, and did not mean that the Olympiad fell in the year current.

Phlegon then tells us, that in the 177th Olympiad, "Lucullus beſieged Amiſus, and leaving Muræna with "two legions there, he marched to Cabira, and win-"tered there." The ſiege of Amyſus was began by Lucullus the autumn before, A. P. J. 4641, or Olympiad 176. 4. In the ſpring time, A. P. J. 4642, Olympiad 176. 4. Muræna was left before Amyſus , whilſt Lucullus marched to Cabira, and ſpent the following winter there. The city of Amyſus held out two years, viz. all the year 4642, and was taken in 4643, at the end of the year. Hence therefore this may be concluded, that becauſe Lucullus wintered Olympiad 177.1. at Cabira, therefore Phlegon reckoning this winter into that year, he muſt reckon the 177. Olympiad 1. to extend from July A. P. J. 4642 to 4643, and conſequently that he uſed the Julian year, and not the Aſiatic year.

 μετὰ χειμῶνα Μυρίναν ἀπολιπὼν ἐπὶ τῆς πολιορκίας. Plut. Lucullus.

In the 3d year of this Olympiad, upon the Ides of October, the Poet Virgil was born, i. e. on the 15th of October; and ſo the Writer of his Life ſays, which is uſually attributed to Donatus. But this will not determine the point, becauſe the Roman year had been ſo managed, that the autumnal months then fell in the ſummer, and the ſummer months in the ſpring. By this means their October then fell much about 63 days ſooner in the year, than it now ſtands in the preſent Julian year, and conſequently Virgil was born about the 12th or 13th of Auguſt, which makes it that nothing can be determined from that circumſtance.

So again; in the 4th year of the 177th Olympiad, he tells us, that Tigranes and Mithridates were overcome by Lucullus. Now the battle happened on the day before the Nones of October ††, 1.2. the 6th; and for the ſame reaſon that you cannot infer any thing from its being ſaid that Virgil was born on the Ides of October, you cannot infer any thing as to the point in hand, from this battle's happening on the Nones. Both theſe incidents would really happen in the year which Phlegon mentions, whether he uſed the Julian or the Aſiatic year.

†† ἦν δὲ καὶ πρὸ μιᾶς νόνων Ὀκτωβρίων. Id. ibid.

In the ſame year Metellus went to the Cretic war, and overcoming Laoſthenes, was ſaluted Imperator. Hortenſius and Metellus were choſen Conſuls towards the end of October Ante Chriſtum 68. A. P. J. 4644, and ſerved the enſuing year, A. P. J. 4645. In which year was 177.4. Olympiad. So that here were eight months from their election to the Olympiad, in July 4645. Now the Cretan war laſted near three years, ſays Eutropius *, and very great battles were fought, and hard ſieges endured, before it was finiſhed. Oroſius ſays †, that Metellus was two years in conquering it. Now if we allow the time antecedent to the Olympiad, and that whole year, from July 4645, to A. P. J. 4646, it will be eaſy to account for the ſieges, and the conqueſt of Cnoſſus, Erythræa, Cydonia, and Laoſthenes's holding out ſo long, and cauſing the war to be ſo long. Whereas if you reckon that the Aſiatic year is intended by Phlegon, this could not be done in the 177.4. Olympiad, but it ought to be 178.1. Olympiad.

* Ingentibus prælits intra triennium omnem provinciam cepit, appellatuſque eſt Creticus. Eutrop. lib. 6. cap. 11.

† Cretam inſulam per biennium Metellus evertit. Oroſ. lib. 6. cap. 4.

If this then be the caſe, then it follows, that as the eclipſe A. D. 29, was in Olympiad 202.1. the alteration of the numeral muſt be as I corrected it for a Δ into an A. But if by the year of an Olympiad, an Alexandrian ſhould mean the year current, in which ſuch an Olympiad happened, then no doubt November 24, A. D. 29, may be reckoned to be in the 2d year of that Olympiad, and then the alteration muſt be from a Δ into a B. And thus may Philoponus be ſtrictly underſtood, when he ſays that it was in the 2d year of the 202d Olympiad, and yet mean the ſame individual eclipſe that I do. To confirm this way of reckoning, I add, that Euſebius uſes the Aſiatic year, and begins it always with them in October. The firſt year therefore of the Olympiads began, according to him, in A. P. J. 3937. of his own numbers 1245. 202d Olympiad correſponds to his number 2045, A. P. J. 4741, and conſequently, the 2d year of that Olympiad began with him in October 4742; and therefore by this manner of reckoning, the Δ ſhould be changed into a B. Which of theſe is the certain ſure emendation, is of no great moment, ſince we both agree in the ſame eclipſe, and both agree that Euſebius is not to be depended on. The controverſy amounts to little more, than if a debate were to be about a fact or event which happened laſt February, ſince a number was to be altered, whether it were moſt proper to place it in 1733, or in 1734. ADD. REM.]

I will now proceed to a criticiſm of another kind. Euſebius ſays, that Phlegon wrote this in the 13th book of his hiſtory. Origen declares it to be the 13th or 14th (35). Maximus has cited only the 14th (36). Meurſius is of opinion, that Maximus's citation is the juſt one, and for this reaſon. Phlegon, ſays he (37), would include 15 Olympiads in each book; but not living long enough to finiſh the laſt, it contained only four Olympiads. It appears, upon a calculation, that he muſt have treated of the 202d in the 14 book; and conſequently he muſt have ſpoke of the eclipſe in that book. Meurſius's calculation is juſt; but he makes a falſe ſuppoſition; for this ſuppoſition that each book contained 15 Olympiads, is a mere chimera, ſince Photius affirms (38), that Phlegon's firſt five books extended to the 177th Olympiad. Salmaſius ought to have remembered this paſſage of Photius, as well as Meurſius; for, for want of knowing it, he imagined that Phlegon divided his work in ſuch a manner, that each of the eleven firſt books contained 14 Olympiads, and each of the laſt five contained fifteen books (39). All this is falſe; but here follows a conjecture which is rational enough. Phlegon divided that hiſtory into 16 almoſt equal parts. He found a greater number of materials in proportion, as he drew nearer to his own times; for which reaſon, each of his laſt books contained but a very ſmall number of Olympiads, whereas the five firſt contained 177. It is thus Mezerai's chronological epitome contains, in Tom. 1. the reign of 31 Kings, and the ſpace of 518 years; and the laſt Tom. is wholly taken up in Henry the IVth's reign (40). The like remark may be made on all the Hiſtories of a Nation divided into books (41). The firſt contains many more years than the laſt. Had Salmaſius conſidered this, he would not have meddled with the paſſage of Stephanus Byzantinus, which he pretended to correct. In voce Ὀλύμπιον (42), ſays he (43), citat (Stephanus) Phlegontem ἐν πεντεκαιδεκάτῳ Ὀλυμπιάδων: in quo niſi fallor mendoſæ ſunt editiones, legendum enim ἐν ἕκτῳ καὶ δεκάτῳ Ὀλυμπιάδων. Cujus emendationis hæc ratio eſt. Meminerat eo libro Phlegon Olympii ab Hadriano vel potius ſumptibus Hadriani ab Athenienſibus ædificati. Atqui ejus rei mentionem non niſi ultimo libro, id eſt decimo ſexto facere poterat Phlegon. Nec enim ultra tempora Hadriani Olympiadas ſuas contexuit. i. e. "Stephanus, under the word Olympion, quotes Phlegon's fifteenth book of the Olympiads; in which, "if I miſtake not, the editions are erroneous; for, "it ought to be read, the ſixteenth book of the O-"lympiads. The reaſon of this emendation is this. "Phlegon had related in this book, that Olympeium "was built by Hadrian, or rather by the Athenians, "at Hadrian's expence. But it was impoſſible for "Phlegon to mention it, except under the laſt book, "that is, the ſixteenth: his Olympiads extending no "farther than the age in which Hadrian lived." This criticiſm is grounded on two very bad reaſons; the firſt is, that Phlegon could not ſpeak of an edifice built at the expence of the Emperor Hadrian, except in the book where he treated of the Olympiads which belonged to that Emperor's reign. The ſecond is, that he wrote the Hiſtory of thoſe Olympiads only in his laſt book. If the Reader is deſirous of knowing the falſity of the firſt reaſon, he need but conſider, that the beſt Annaliſts are apt to make ſome incidental obſervations, wherein they relate the preceding, as well as following tranſactions. If they ſpeak of the burning of a city, they don't ſcruple to obſerve, that it had been founded by ſuch a one, who flouriſhed at ſuch a time; nor to ſay, by way of anticipation, that it

(35) Origenes, contra Celſum, lib. 2.

(36) Maximus Schol. ad Epiſtolam 7. Dionyſii Areopag.

(37) Meurſius, Not. ad Phlegont. p. 170.

(38) Photius, Biblioth. num. 97. p. 268.

(39) Salmaſius, in Spartian. p. 151.

(40) Of the Dutch edit. divided into 6 volumes, 12mo.

(41) See the Hiſtory of France, written by Gaguin, Paulus Æmilius, &c.

(42) It ſhould be Ὀλυμπίων.

(43) Salmaſ. in Spartian. p. 151.

pronounced by the oracles. This cenſure is ſo judicious, that I could not forbear mentioning it [E].

it was rebuilt thirty years after. They take a particular pleaſure in theſe anticipations, when they are of ſervice to applaud the reigning Monarch. Phlegon may therefore very poſſibly have ſpoke of an Olympieium, under an Olympiad prior to the Empire of Hadrian his Sovereign and Benefactor; for, in ſpeaking of an incident which happened in the iſland of Delos, before that Prince's reign, he might ſay, that the place where it happened, had afterwards great honour done to it, by the Athenians building there an edifice, which they named Hadrian's new Athens (44), becauſe that Emperor furniſhed them with the money they ſtood in need of. We may ſuppoſe, with great probability, that he did not omit one opportunity of applauding the Monarch in queſtion, and that he ſpoke of him, in ſeaſon and out of ſeaſon; for which reaſon Salmaſius did not reaſon juſtly. I nevertheleſs will ſuppoſe, that Phlegon ſpoke of the building of that edifice, under the very year in which it was raiſed; but this does not prove that he ſpoke of it in his laſt book. It is probable, on all accounts, that he expatiated more on Hadrian's reign, than on the preceding reigns; and this is the conſtant practice of all Hiſtorians. Let us therefore ſay, that probably his 15th and 16th books, included only thoſe Olympiads during which Hadrian ſwayed the ſceptre; and thus Salmaſius's ſecond reaſon will not be more juſt than his firſt. He alſo might be criticiſed for affirming that Phlegon's work did not extend beyond the reign of that Emperor: nevertheleſs father Pagi (45) and ſome other learned men affirm, that the whole 229th Olympiad was included in it; whence it follows, that it contained likewiſe the three or four firſt years of Antoninus's reign.

(44) Steph. Byzant. Voce Ὀλυμπίειον.

(45) Pagi, in his Critique on Baronius, ad ann. 136. num. 4.

[E] This cenſure of Photius is ſo judicious, that I could not forbear mentioning it.] Here follows the whole paſſage. Ἔστι δὲ τὴν φράσιν οὔτε λίαν καμαιπετὴς, οὔτε τὸν ἀττικὸν ἐς τὸ ἀκριβὲς διασάζων χαρακτῆρα, ἄλλως τε δὲ καὶ ἡ περὶ τὰς ὀλυμπιάδας, καὶ τὰ ἐν αὐλαῖς τῶν ἀγωνισμάτων ὀνόματα, καὶ τὰς πράξεις, καὶ ἡ περὶ τοὺς χρησμοὺς ἄκαιρος φιλοπονία τε καὶ φιλολιμία, εἰς κόρον ἀπάγουσα τὸν ἀκροατὴν, καὶ μηδὲν ἄλλο τῶν ἐν τῷ λόγῳ προκύπτειν συγχωροῦσα, ἀηδῆ τε σφόδρα τὸν λόγον δεικνύει, καὶ χαρίεσσιν οὐδὲν ἔχειν παρατίθησι. χρησμοῖς δὲ παντοίοις ἐς ὑπερβολὴν ἐστὶ κεχρημένος, i. e. "This Author's ſtyle is not altogether flat and mean, nor does it every where imitate the Attic manner of writing. But otherwiſe, the over nice accuracy and care with which he computes the Olympiads, and relates the names of the ſeveral conteſts, the tranſactions and even oracles, is not only very tireſome to the Reader, whereby a cloud is thrown over all other particulars in that book, and conſequently thoſe particulars are not permitted to appear; but the diction is thereby rendered unpleaſant and ungrateful; and indeed he is every moment inculcating the anſwers pronounced by all kinds of Deities (46)."

(46) Photius, Bibliath. num. 97. p. 268.

PHLEGYAS, ſon of the God Mars and Chryſe [A], reigned over a diſtrict of Bœotia after Eteocles's death. This diſtrict which before was called Audreis, was, from him, called Phlegyantis. He there built a city which he called from his own name; and invited to it the braveſt and moſt intrepid warriors of all Greece (a). As he was the braveſt warrior of his age, to what place ſoever he marched, in order to make inroads, he never returned from them without carrying off the corn, cattle, and every thing elſe (b). He uſed to act with great prudence and caution on thoſe occaſions: for inſtance, having a deſign to lay waſte Peloponneſus, he went firſt, upon pretence of travelling, and viewed the ſituation of the country, and enquired how many ſoldiers would be raiſed on it. It is related, that his daughter Coronis, who accompanied him, was then delivered of Eſculapius in Epidaurus (c). The inhabitants of the country where he reigned, led the ſame life as he had done [B]. Having no children, he was ſucceeded by one of his couſins

(a) Ex Pauſanio, lib. 9. cap. 36.

(b) Idem, lib. 2. cap. 26. p. m. 170.

(c) Ex eodem Pauſania, lib. 2. cap. 26. p. m. 176.

(1) Pauſan. lib. 9. cap. 34.

(2) Idem, ibid. cap. 36.

(3) Homer. Iliad. lib. 13. ver. 302.

(4) Idem, Hymno in Apoll. p. m. 786.

(5) Pauſan. lib. 9. cap. 36.

(6) Idem, ibid.

(7) Servius, in Æneid. lib. 6. ver. 618.

(8) Strabo, lib. 9. p. 304. obſerves, that the Gyrtoneans lived round Peneus and Peleus, and that they had antiently been called Phlegygei. Stephan. Byzant. Voce Γόρτων, ſays that Gyrton, a city of Theſſaly, was ſo called, from Gyrton, Phlegyas's brother.

(9) Schol. Homeri in Iliad. lib. 13. ver. 302.

[A] Son of the God Mars and Chryſe.] Andreus, ſon of the river Peneus, was the firſt who ſettled in a diſtrict of Bœotia, called Andreis, from his name. He married a daughter of Leucon, ſon of Athamas, and had a ſon named Eteocles who ſucceeded him, and granted part of the country to Halmus, ſon of Siſyphus (1). This Eteocles having no children, Phlegyas the ſon of Chryſe, Halmus's daughter, ſucceeded him (2).

[B] The Phlegyei led the ſame kind of life as he had done.] Homer mentions them as a people extremely brave (3), inſolent, outragious and impious (4). They uſed to make incurſions into the territories of their neighbours, to carry off whatever came in their way; and they even attempted to plunder the temple of Delphi (5). Philammon marched againſt them, at the head of a choſen body of Argivi; but himſelf, and the braveſt of his ſoldiers, were killed in battle. The impiety and cruelty of the Phlegyei did not go unpuniſhed; great numbers were killed by thunderbolts and earthquakes; others were carried off by the plague, ſome excepted, who retired into Phocis (6). Servius, on Euphorion's credit, affirms, that the Phlegyei inhabited an iſland, which Neptune, exaſperated at their ſacrilegious actions, deſtroyed by ſtriking it with his trident (7). The Scholiaſt in Homer relates, on the teſtimony of Pherecydes, that the Phlegyei or Gortynii (8), an atheiſtical people of Phocis, exerciſed a thouſand barbarities againſt their neighbours; that they burnt the temple of Delphi; that after the death of Amphion and Zethus, who had prevented their falling upon the city of Thebes, they took it; and that, as they were preparing to commit freſh acts of injuſtice, they were extirpated by Apollo (9). I muſt not forget what Ovid ſays, viz. that Ceyx, being deſirous to conſult the Oracle, was forced to go to Claros; becauſe the profane Phorbas, with the Phlegyei, prevented people from conſulting that of Delphi.

Ad Clarium parat ire Deum: nam templa profanus
Invia cum Phlegyis faciebat Delphica Phorbas (10).

" To viſit Claro's God he now prepares;
" For impious Phorbas, and the Phlegyan thieves,
" Infeſted all who ſhap'd their courſe to Delphi.

(10) Ovid. Metam. lib. 11. ver. 413.

The Phlegyei, according to Philoſtratus (11), had elected Phorbas for their King, both on account of his mighty ſtature, and becauſe he exceeded them all in barbarity. He uſed to ſtop all who went to Delphi; on which occaſion he ſent to the Phlegyei the old men and children; and fought with the young people, and overcame them, after which he cut their heads off; but he himſelf was vanquiſhed and ſlain by Apollo.

(11) Philoſtratus, in pict. of the Phlegyei.

(12) Farnab. in Ovid. Metam. lib. 11. ver. 413.

(13) Pauſan. lib. 5. cap. 1. p. m. 377.

(14) Vigenere ſur Philoſtrate au Tableau des Phlegyens, p. m. 815.

It is difficult to diſtinguiſh this Phorbas, from the ſeveral perſons who bore the ſame name. Farnaby (12) is of opinion, that Pauſanias ſpeaks of Phorbas, ſon of Lapitha (13); but he does not bring any proof for this. Vigenere was greatly puzzled on this occaſion (14), which I don't wonder at, the ſubject being too intricate. Pauſanias informs us of a Phorbas who commanded in Athens before the Olympiads (15): a Phorbas, ſon of Argus, and father of Triopas (16); a Phorbas, ſon of Triopas, and father of Pellene (17); and the Phorbas, who, according to Farnaby, was King of the Phlegyei. There was one Phorbas, the ſon

(15) Pauſan. lib. 6. cap. 19.

(16) Idem, lib. 2. cap. 16.

(17) Idem, lib. 7. cap. 26. p. 593.

cousins (d) [C]. It was feigned, that having burnt the temple of Delphi, out of revenge, becauſe his daughter Coronis had been got with child by Apollo, he was thrown into hell, and tortured in a grievous manner [D], after Apollo had ſhot him dead with arrows (e). Some ſay, that Ixion was his ſon (f); and others, that he was his brother (g). I have not yet found in any antient Author, what Charles Stephens, Lloyd, Hoffman and Moreri affirm, viz. that Phlegyas was King of the Lapithæ in Theſſaly.

(d) Ex eodem Pauſania, lib. 9. cap. 36.

(e) Servius, in Æneid. lib. 6. ver. 618.

(f) Idem, ibid.

(g) Strabo, lib. 9. p. 304.

ſon of Triopas, who killed all the ſerpents with which the iſland of Rhodes was filled (18). Homer mentions a Phorbas, ſon of Triopas (19)

[C] He was ſucceeded by one of his couſins.] This was Chryſes the ſon of Neptune, and of Chryſogenea, the daughter of Halmus, and ſiſter of Phlegyas's mother. The ſon and ſucceſſor of this Chryſes was Minyas, whence his ſubjects were called Minyans; by which name they were ſtill called in Pauſanias's time. They indeed were called Orchomenians in the reign of Orchomenus ſon of Chryſes; but they ſtill retained the name of Minyans, and were thereby diſtinguiſhed from the Orchomenians, ſituated in Arcadia (20). It is to be obſerved, that the Argonauts were commonly ſirnamed Mynians, becauſe ſeveral of them deſcended, by the mother's ſide, from Minyas (21). Other reaſons are given for this. See Lloyd under the word Minyæ, and Munckerus's notes on Hyginus (22).

(18) Hygin. in Aſtronom. lib. 1. cap. 14. See Meurſius, in Rhodo, lib. 1. cap. 5. p. 12 and 13.

(19) Homer. Hymno in Apollin. p. m. 782.

(20) Ex Pauſan. lib. 9. cap. 36.

(21) See Apollonius, and his Scholiaſt, Argonaut. lib. 1. ver. 229.

(22) Cap. 14. p. 44.

[D] He was thrown into hell, and tortured in a grievous manner.] The following words of Virgil are ambiguous:

Sedet, æternumque ſedebit
Infelix Theſeus, Phlegyaſque miſerrimus omnes
Admonet & magna teſtatur voce per umbras
Diſcite juſtitiam moniti & non temnere divos (23).

" Unhappy Theſeus, doom'd for ever there,
" Is fix'd by fate on his eternal chair;
" And wretched Phlegyas warns the world with cries;
" (Cou'd warning make the world more juſt or wiſe,)
" Learn righteouſneſs, and dread th' avenging Deities. Dryden.

(23) Virg. Æn. lib. 6. ver. 617.

It does not appear in the Latin verſes above, whether Phlegyas is the nominative ſingular, or the accuſative plural (24). In this latter caſe, the paſſage of Virgil is of no uſe to prove my text; but here follow other paſſages no ways ambiguous.

(24) See Servius, in Æneid. lib. 6. ver. 618.

Diſcumbitur altis
Porticibus: ſua cuique furens feſtinaque conjunx
Adjacet. Inferni qualis ſub nocte barathri
Adcubat attonitum Phlegyan & Theſea juxta
Tiſiphone, ſaevaſque dapes & pocula libat,
(Tormenti genus) & nigris amplectitur hydris (25).

We ſee here, that the fury Tiſiphone uſed to ſtand by the food which was offered to Theſeus and Phlegyas; and that ſhe taſted it firſt, to inſpire them with a horror for it, though they ſhould be almoſt famiſhed. Statius expreſſes this ſtill more clearly.

(25) Val. Flaccus, Argonaut. lib. 2. ver. 190.

Ultrix tibi torva Megæræ
Jejunum Phlegyam ſubter cava ſaxa jacentem
Æterno premit accubitu, dapibuſque profanis
Inſtimulat: ſed miſta famem faſtidia vincunt
Adſis ô memor hoſpitii, Junoniaque arva (26).

" The ſtern Megæra is thy dire avenger,
" And tortures Phlegyas, who for ever dreads
" The falling ſtone; excites him to devour
" The food, which he, tho' famiſh'd, cannot taſte.
" But O, propitious Deity, be preſent
" To Juno's land, the place which, glad, receiv'd thee.

(26) Stat. Theb. lib. 1. ſub. fin. ver. 712. p. m. 141. See Barthius, on this paſſage.

Virgil has finely deſcribed this kind of puniſhment; but he does not expreſsly ſay it was that of Phlegyas; and names only Ixion and Pirithous.

Quid memorem Lapithas Ixiona Pirithoumque (27).

" Ixion and Pirithous I cou'd name;
" And more Theſſalian Chiefs of mighty fame. Dryden.

(27) Virgil. Æneid. lib. 6. ver. 601.

PHOEBADIUS, Biſhop of Agen in the 4th century, ſhewed a very great zeal for the Orthodox Syſtem, and againſt Arianiſm. He wrote a book againſt the ſecond Formula of Faith [A], which Oſius and Potamius had drawn up at Sirmium, in the year 357 (a). He was preſent at the Synod of Rimini in the year 359, and defended, to the end of that Council, the Profeſſion of Faith drawn up at Nice, and refuſed to ſubſcribe that which was preſented to him. " Neither fear nor threatnings could make him alter his reſolution: but the Governor Taurus, finding he could not conquer his conſtancy by thoſe means, had recourſe to prayers, and entreated him with tears in his eyes, to uſe more gentle means, to deliver a vaſt number of Biſhops, who for ſeven months were locked up in a city, where they ſuffered great inconveniencies by the ſeverity of the winter, and for want of neceſſaries. . . . Phœbadius anſwered, he was ready to go into baniſhment, and to ſuffer all kinds of puniſhments, rather than do what was required of him, and that he would never admit a Formula of Faith drawn up by the Arians. That conteſt continued ſome days: but Phœbadius, finding it was impoſſible to agree peaceably, yielded at laſt, when Urſatius and Valens had declared, that the Creed they propoſed was Catholick, and that thoſe, who did not think it ſufficient, might add to it what they pleaſed (b)." Some Orthodox propoſitions were added to it, and among others, this; the Son of God is not a Creature; but Urſatius and Valens took care to have the following words ſlily incerted into it, namely, that he was not a Creature like the others, and by that artifice they got the ſubſcriptions they deſired (c). Phœbadius being returned into his own country, was one of the Biſhops who

(a) Du Pin, Biblioth. Tom. 2. p. 107. Dutch edition.

(b) Ibidem.

(c) Ibidem.

[A] He wrote a book againſt the ſecond Formula of Faith.] That work has been tranſmitted down to us. You will meet with the ſubſtance of it in Monſieur Du Pin (1). Father Labbe tells us, that Peter Pithou is the firſt who publiſhed it. Primum prodiit ſtudio Petri Pithœi cum aliquot aliorum Veterum Galliæ Theologorum ſcriptis, Pariſiis apud Nivellium 1586 in 4 hoc titulo: Liber contra Epiſtolam ſive Edictum ſub nomine Conſtantii Imp. emiſſum in Synodo Mediolanenſi (2). i. e. " It was firſt publiſhed by the care of Peter Pithou, with the works of ſome other antient Divines of Gaul (France), at Paris, for Nivelle, 1586, in 4to, with this title: A Book againſt the Epiſtle or Edict publiſhed in the Synod of Milan, under the name of the Emperor Conſtantius." Father Labbe adds, that it has been inſerted ſince into the Bibliotheque of the Fathers, and that Barthius has adorned it with notes. Monſieur Du Pin ſuppoſes alſo, who repented moſt of their fault, and who made amends for it by the declarations, and by the proteſtations they made againſt what they had done unawares, having been impoſed upon. He was preſent at the Council of Valence, in the year 374. We have a letter of St. Ambroſe to him, and to Delphinus Biſhop of Bourdeaux. St. Jerom aſſerts in his book of Illuſtrious Men, that Phœbadius was ſtill living in his time (d), and that he was very old. He adds, that he wrote ſome works, beſides that which we have mentioned. The memory of this Saint is chiefly revered at Agen, where he is commonly called Saint Fiari [B].

(1) In page 107 and 108, of the 2d vol. of his Bibliotheque des Auteurs Eccleſ. Dutch edit.

(2) Labbe, de Scriptoribus Eccleſiaſticis, Tom. 2. p. 221.

(d) That is to ſay, in the year 392, when St. Jerom wrote that book. See Father Labbe, Diſſertat. de Script. Eccleſiaſt. Tom. 2. p. 221.

ſo, that the edition publiſhed by Peter Pithou was the firſt, but he places it under the year 1589. John Darnalt, in the 5th chapter of his Antiquities of Agen, mentions an edition, publiſhed before that. This Epiſtle of Phœbadius, ſays he (3), was found in our time, and publiſhed immediately by Robert Stephens, and afterwards by Nivelle, in 1586. Let thoſe who have libraries, examine whether he be in the right or not.

(3) Darnalt, Procureur du Roi au Preſidial d'Agen, Antiquitez d'Agen, folio 32 verſo, of the Paris edition, 1606, in 8vo.

[B] His memory is chiefly revered at Agen, where he is commonly called Saint Fiari.] That illuſtrious Prelate's name has been ſtrongly altered and corrupted. Sulpitius Severus calls him Fegadius. In the Greek tranſlation of St. Jerom's book, he is called Soebadius. . . . . In St. Ambroſe we read Fygadius (4). Arnalt laments theſe alterations, and the deſtruction of the church conſecrated to that Biſhop. We ſhall obſerve by the by, from another Author, that the name of that holy Biſhop, has been ſo unfortunate, among his friends, that at this time it is ſo much altered and changed, not only among the vulgar, but even in the books belonging to his own church, that ſome call him Fœdarium, others Phœbadium and Feudarium ; Ephionius calls him Sebaudium, and he is commonly named Saint Fiari. To this account of the alteration and mangling of his name, I ſhall add, that the injuries of the weather and of time have been ſo great and lamentable, that his church in this city was firſt pulled down, and then razed to the very foundations ; and the place where it ſtood, is now deſigned for an unworthy and profane uſe (5). Beza relates a pretty curious particular, which belongs to the year 1561. " About that time John Barrelles, Miniſter of Tou-
" louſe, being ſick at Agen, where he took Phyſick, " preached at noon-day in the houſe of Counſellor
" Rouſſanes ; and his meeting encreaſed daily ſo
" much, that at laſt, on the 16th of March, he " preached in a little church, named St. Fiari, for" merly Biſhop of Agen, who wrote againſt the Ari-
" ans in St. Jerom's time, as he himſelf teſtifies in a
" treatiſe he wrote of the Doctors of the church,
" where his name is erroneouſly wrote Sebadius, in-
" ſtead of Fedarius. There was in that church a mar-
" ble tomb, which was ſaid to be that Biſhop's, and
" from which the nurſes uſed to ſcrape what they " could, which they ſwallowed with their broth,
" that they might have a great deal of milk. And
" yet there is a ſmall city near Toulouſe, on the ri" ver Rege (6), where on the 25th of April, which " is St. Fiari's feſtival, the neighbours uſed, time out
" of mind, to meet armed, leſt, ſay they, the people
" of Agen, from whom they pretend they ſtole the " body of that Saint, ſhould come and take it back
" again. Let them decide the matter between them :
" however it be, the tomb having at laſt been open" ed at Agen, nothing was found in it but the ſkull
" with the teeth in it, pretty whole, conſidering the " long time ſince which the Biſhop muſt have been " buried there, which was above twelve hundred
" years (7)."

(4) Du Pin, Bibliotb. des Auteurs Eccleſiaſt. Tom. 2. p. 109.

(5) Arnault, Antiquitez d'Agen, folio 33.

(6) He ſhould have ſaid Arige.

(7) Beze, Hiſt. Eccleſiaſt. liv. 5. p. 790, 791.

PHRÆA (a) * (JOHN), a learned Engliſhman, taught Polite Literature in Italy with great applauſe [A]. He tranſlated, out of Greek into Latin, ſome treatiſes of Xenophon, and ſome books of Diodorus Siculus (b). Before this, he had tranſlated a diſcourſe of Syneſius (c). This was his firſt eſſay [B]. Pope Paul II. was ſo well pleaſed with the tranſlation which this learned Engliſhman had dedicated to him, that he intended to raiſe him to the Epiſcopal See of Bath, but John Phræa was ſnatched from the world, before he had an opportunity of being raiſed to that honour. He died in 1465

(a) See the rem. [A].

* Pitſeus, in his work de illuſtribus Angliæ Scriptoribus, calls him Freus.

(b) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Latinis, p. 634.

(c) The praiſe of baldneſs.

[A] He taught Polite Literature in Italy with great applauſe.] I find this in a dedication of Beatus Rhenanus (1). Is Joannes Phræa, ſays he, quod non ſine publico Britanniæ, quam nunc Angliam vocant, honore dixerim : utramque linguam egregie percalluit, bonas literas ſumma cum laude non paucos annos, idque in Italia profeſſus, i. e. " This John Phræa, was perfectly well " ſkilled in both languages ; a circumſtance I take " notice of in honour to Britain, now called England ; " and he alſo taught, during many years, with the " higheſt applauſe, Polite Literature in Italy." I am to obſerve, that his name is Phræa, and not Phreas or Phreus, as Voſſius calls him (2). He calls himſelf Joannes Phræa, in the title of the work I am going to mention.

(1) That to the tranſlation of Encomium calvitiei. See the rem. [B].

(2) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. p. 634.

[B] A tranſlation of a diſcourſe of Syneſius was his firſt eſſay.] He informs us, in his dedication, that he was determined not to follow the method of other Tranſlators. Theſe begin with an eaſy Author ; and when years and experience have improved them, they attempt more difficult verſions. He does not cenſure this way of proceeding, but declares that he thought it would be proper for him to proceed after a quite oppoſite method, and begin with Syneſius, one of the moſt obſcure Authors that ever wrote. Every man, adds he, ought to conſider what is adapted for him ; and Syneſius muſt neceſſarily be difficult, ſince not one learned man, among the great numbers who have tranſlated out of the Greek tongue into Latin, have attempted to give a verſion of Syneſius. Here follow Phræa's words. Nos vero etſi nonnullis perſuaſi rationibus, quas nunc conſulto præterire libet, converſum ordinem magis ad doctrinam conducere arbitramur : ea tamen modeſtia hanc noſtram defenſamus opinionem, ut neque mihi ipſi arrogare, neque quod ſecus alii ſenſerint, id vitio illis dare velim. Suis enim quiſque in rebus, quid magis, quidve minus ſibi conducat, explorator eſt, & judex optimus. Itaque mihi in hoc à reliquis diſſentienti, à Syneſio ſummo philoſopho, autoreque graviſſimo, interpretationis initium auſpicari placuit. Quos autem hic ſcripſit libros, tot ac tantis obſtructi ſunt difficultatibus, ut haud ſciam ſi qua alia apud Græcos extent volumina, quæ cum his aut ſententiarum perplexitate, aut obſcuritate verborum auſim conferre. Cujus profecto rei argumentum eſt non mediocre, quod in tanto numero interpretum, quos noſtra, quoſve prior ætas vidit, nemo unquam inventus ſit, quod ſciam, qui hujus autoris opus aliquod attigerit (3), i. e. " I, though perſuaded from ſome reaſons, which I " now omit purpoſely, am of opinion, that it will be " more for the advancement of learning, to invert " the common method : I yet would willingly de" fend my opinion with ſo much modeſty, as neither
" to arrogate too much to myſelf, nor cenſure others
" for being of a different opinion from me. Every " man is beſt able to judge what is proper for him to " do, or not do. I therefore thought fit, (in which,
" however, I differ from other people) to begin with " tranſlating Syneſius, a great Philoſopher, and a " grave Author. His compoſitions abound with ſo
" many and ſuch great difficulties, that I know not
" whether anyGreek Author is ſo intricate with regard " to the thought, or ſo obſcure in his expreſſion. A " proof of this is, that, among the great number of " Tranſlators, in this or the former age, I know not
" of one who hath attempted to give us a verſion
" of this Author's works." The compoſition of Syneſius, tranſlated by Phræa, is, the praiſe or elogium of baldneſs. Beatus Phenanus printed this tranſlation at Baſil in 1515, and added a commentary to it. It is not mentioned either by Father Labbe, nor du Pin.

(3) Jo. Phræa, in Epiſt. dedicat. Encomii calvitiei.

[C] He

1465 [C], before his inſtalment (d), and it is thought that he was poiſoned by his competitor (e).

(d) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. p. 634.

(e) Veneno à competitore extinctum fuiſſe ſuſpicio erat. Idem, ibid.

Phræa was Fellow of Baliol College in Oxford (f). It is related, that Poggius pretended to be the Author of the tranſlation of Diodorus Siculus, done by our Phræa [D].

(f) See the rem. [D].

[C] He died in 1465.] It is ſurprizing that Moreri, as he gives us that date (4), ſhould yet ſay that Phræas lived in the 14th century.

(4) The numbers are tranſpoſed in the Dutch edition; 1456 being printed inſtead of 1465.

[D] It is related that Poggius pretended to be the Author of the tranſlation of Diodorus Siculus, done by our Phræa.] Peruſe what follows: Burton, Hiſt. Linguæ Græc. p. 55. ait Johannem Phræam Anglum Colleg. Baliolenſis Socium Diodori 6. libros vertiſſe, illamque verſionem Poggium nactum fuiſſe, & pro ſuo in publicum extruſiſſe, idque teſtari quoque Brian Twyn. Antiq. Oxon. l. 3. (5). i. e. "Burton, in his Hiſtory of the "Greek tongue, p. 55, informs us, that John Phræa, "an Engliſhman, Fellow of Baliol College, tranſlated "ſix books of Diodorus Siculus; that this verſion "falling into Poggius's hands, he publiſhed it as his "own; and that is alſo atteſted by Brian Twyn, in "his third book of the Antiquities of Oxford."

(5) Henricus à Sypeſtein, in Epiſtola de Plagiariis, p. 70. annexed to Amœnitates Theologico-Philologicæ of Almeloveen.

PIASECKI (PAUL), in Latin Piaſecius, Biſhop of Premiſlia in Poland, lived in the 17th century. In 1646, he publiſhed a beautiful Hiſtory of all the tranſactions in the Kingdom of Poland, from Stephen Battori till that year (a). He herein introduced, occaſionally, the principal tranſactions which happened in the Chriſtian world. The judgment of Le Laboureur, from whom I borrow theſe particulars, with regard to this work, may be ſeen hereunder [A].

(a) Le Laboureur, Relat. du Voiage de la Reine de Pologne, part 2. p. 117.

[A] The judgment of Le Laboureur . . . . may be ſeen hereunder.] He is of opinion, that this Prelate had not ſufficient informations with regard to ſome affairs of France. This circumſtance excepted, ſays he (1), it is a piece worthy the pains of a perſon of his rank; for he is a very faithful Hiſtorian; and ſo generouſly averſe to flattery, that he neither conceals the faults of the deceaſed King (2), nor thoſe of his ſon, the reigning Monarch, whom he never applauds without a juſt reaſon. He cenſures the ambition of the houſe of Auſtria; blames the injuſtice of its proceedings; and applauds very ingenuouſly the reaſon of our taking up arms, and the deſign of the alliances concluded by us, to oppoſe the attempts it meditated on all the Powers of Europe. Here follows the judgment of a German Author of that work: Quæ noſtram ætatem ſpectant, ea Paulus Piaſecius in Chronicis geſtorum in Europa ſingularium luculentius ſubminiſtrat; negant PIASECIO in omnibus ſecurè fidem adhiberi aliqui, & certum eſt, non eſſe ipſum ab omni in hiſtoria errore immunem (3), i. e. "Paul Piaſecius, in the Chronicle of the Tranſactions of Europe, has treated excellently well thoſe matters "which relate to the preſent age. Yet ſome ſay "that Piaſecius is not to be relied upon in all things; "and it is certain that there are a few faults in his "Hiſtory." This Hiſtory of Piaſecius was reprinted at Amſterdam, from the Poliſh edition: the manner in which Amelot de la Houſſaie cites it, in his notes on Cardinal de Oſſat's Letters, and elſewhere, proves that he eſteemed it.

(1) Idem, ibid. This Journey was writ in 1646.

(2) Of the King of Poland.

(3) Maurit. de Princip. Jur. Publ. cap. 2. n. 25. apud Magirum, Eponymolog. p. m. 661.

PICARDS, by this name is called the followers of a certain man, who, about the beginning of the 15th century, improved upon the errors of the Adamites with regard to nakedneſs. His name was Picard; and he went from Flanders to Germany, and proceeded as far as Bohemia. It is related, that he impoſed upon people by juggling tricks. However this be, he had, in a little time, a great number of followers of both ſexes. He commanded them to go always naked, which was more than was required by the Adamites mentioned by St. Epiphanius, who only ſtrip themſelves naked in their aſſemblies. He called himſelf the ſon of God; and pretended that, like a new Adam, his father had ſent him into the world, there to reſtore the law of nature, which, according to him, conſiſted chiefly in two things, community with reſpect to women, and the going ſtark naked (a). He fortified himſelf in an iſland of Luſmik river, ſeven leagues from Thabor, the famous Zeſca's military reſidence. Unhappily for him, forty of his followers having committed great diſorders, drew upon them the forces of that formidable General. Theſe forty Adamites being gone out upon a party, plundered ſome country houſes, and killed upwards of two hundred perſons. Upon this, Ziſca (b) attacked the iſland, took it, and put to the ſword all the Picards, two excepted [A], whoſe lives he ſpared, in order to learn, from their own mouths, what ſort of religion they profeſſed. It is farther ſaid, that though marriage was not inſtituted among them, yet no man was allowed to lye with a woman, without firſt obtaining leave of the Chief of the Sect for that purpoſe. Any man who had an inclination for a woman, was obliged to take her by the hand, and lead her to Picard, to whom he ſaid, My ſpirit is heated for this woman (c); upon which the Founder ſaid, Go, increaſe and multiply. One of the great principles of the people of this Sect was, that no perſons in the world but themſelves were free, the reſt of mankind being ſlaves, eſpecially when they hid their privities: this is what was meant by ſome female followers of Picard, whom a Bohemian Nobleman kept in priſon for ſome time; they ſaying, that thoſe perſons who wore clothes, eſpecially ſuch as wore breeches, ought not to be conſidered as free. They were delivered

(a) Varillas, Hiſt. du Wicleſian, part. 2. p. 43. and Hiſt. de l'Hereſ. liv. 2. ad ann. 1420.

(b) JohnShechta, in a letter written by him to Eraſmus, in 1519. The 20th epiſtle of book 14, of Eraſmus's epiſtle, affirms that Picard infected Ziſca and his whole army with his errors.

(c) In hanc ſpiritus meus concaluit.

[A] Two excepted.] Varillas declares that all the men were executed; but that all ſuch women as were with child had their lives ſpared (1). He adds that, after their delivery, they would not leave their diſſolute way of life; but that they were ſentenced to the flames, into which they threw themſelves laughing. I know not why he departs from Æneas Silvius's relation, where it is ſaid that Ziſca gave quarter only to two men. Adamitas omnes gladio delevit, duobus tantum reſervatis, ex quibus gentis ſuperſtitionem cognoſceret. He, perhaps, was deſirous of rectifying this paſſage, by another of that Hiſtorian, where mention is made of ſome female Adamites, who were brought to bed in priſon, and ſuffered the torment of the flames with joy; but this paſſage cannot juſtify Varillas, ſince it appears, that thoſe women were in priſon with their huſbands, and were ſentenced to be burnt with them. To adjuſt the ſeveral parts of this account, we muſt ſuppoſe, vered of children in prison; and having been sentenced to the flames, together with their husbands, they suffered death laughing and singing (d). Some Enthusiasts among the Anabaptists have endeavoured to revive the madness of the Picards, with regard to nakedness [B]. This sort of people have been as much abhorred by the Protestants as by the Romanists, as Cardinal Hosius owns (e). Nevertheless, the Bohemian brethren have been called Picards [C], though their principles bore no similitude with those who were extirpated by Zisca, almost after the same manner with the Interdict. Those who pretend that Tandemus had revived in the 12th century, the heresy of the Adamites, in the same manner as Picard renewed it in the 15th (f), do not write with accuracy; Tandemus (g) not having commanded his followers to go naked. This may be more justly affirmed of the Turlupins *, as will be shewn in its proper place.

(1) Varillas, Hiſt du Wicleſianiſme, part 2. p. 43. and Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, liv. 2. ad ann. 1420.

(d) Ex Æneas Silveo, de Origine Bohemor. cap. 41.

(e) Lib. de utriusque speciei commun. apud Prateol. Voce Pikardi.

(f) Moreri, under the word Adamites.

(g) See his art.

* Heretics, who used to go naked, &c.

suppose, either that all the Adamites were not in the island taken by Zisca, or that he had thrown some of them into prison, before the slaughter in question. If these two suppositions are denied, it cannot justly be asserted, that he saved only two Adamites. By the way, the Protestants have applauded him highly for this action (2).

(2) See du Plessis Mornay, Mystere d'Iniquite, p. 512; and Rivet, Remarques sur la reponse de au Mystere d'Iniquite, part. 2. p. 594.

[B] Some Enthusiasts among the Anabaptists, have endeavoured to revive the madness of the Picards with regard to nakedness.] I have spoke of this in the article of the ADAMITES, and have even alledged Lindanus, who is not to be very much depended on. But here follows an Author of much greater authority; I mean Lambert Hortensius (3), in his relation of the tumults of the Anabaptists, dedicated to the Magistrates of Amsterdam, whilst this affair was fresh in the memory of every one. He tells us, that on the 13th of February, 1535, an assembly, consisting of seven men and five women, met in Amsterdam, at the house of John Sibert, in Salt-house Street. One of these men, Theodoret Sartor, by name, called himself a Prophet. He fell prostrate on the ground to offer up his prayers to God; and having ended them, he said to one of his brethren, that he had seen God in his Majesty; that he had spoke to him; that he had gone from Paradise to Hell; and that, after duly considering all things, he knew that the day of judgment was at hand. They met again the same day; and after spending four hours in prayer and expounding, the Prophet took off his helmet and coat of mail; threw them, and the rest of his weapons, into the fire, and appeared naked before the whole assembly. He then commanded all the rest of the company to do the same; and his orders were so punctually obeyed, that they did not leave so much as the least bit of ribbon upon their heads, to tie up their hair; but threw every part of their dress into the flames, as a burnt-offering to the Lord. Immediately the Prophet commanded them to follow him, and do as he did. They then rush out, and run up and down the streets, crying, as loud as they could bawl, Væ, væ, væ, divina vindicta, divina vindicta, divina vindicta! i. e. "Woe, woe, woe, divine "vengeance, divine vengeance, divine vengeance!" The inhabitants, terrified at these howlings, imagined that the city was taken by the enemy, and take up arms. Presently the naked riotors are seized, and carried before the Magistrates, where they cast back with disdain the clothes which were offered them. In the mean time, a fire broke out in the house whence this infamous procession came, and was extinguished with great difficulty. March the 28th, the seven men were put to death; and some days after, nine of their accomplices were executed also. Gui de Bres, a Protestant Clergyman, relates this History in a book written against the Anabaptists, printed in 1565 (4). He did not understand the Roman manner of dating, tertio Id. Februarii, quinto Kal. Mart. which Hortensius makes use of; he translating, the 3d of February, and the 5th of March. He relates the rest exactly, except where he says that these Sectarists were put to the torture, and afterwards beat. In the Latin, (the original) no mention is made of the rack, and he ought to have translated percutiuntur, put to death.

(3) He was principal of the College of Naerden. This work was printed at Basil in 1548.

(4) It is entitled, La Racine, source, & fondement des Anabaptistes ou Rebaptisez de nostre temps. See also l'Hist. des Anabaptistes, printed at Amsterdam in 1695. p. 96 & seq. In p. 95, the figures are transposed, viz. the year 1553 for 1535.

[C] The Bohemian brethren have been called Picards.] By this name all those were called, who most vigorously opposed the progress of Popery in Bohemia; Sleidan dividing the Bohemians in manner following. Ad Bohemos quod attinet, sic habet. A morte Joannis Hussi in tres potissimum sectas divisus est populus. Una est eorum qui Pontificem Romanum ut Ecclesiæ Principem, & Christi Vicarium agnoscunt: altera eorum, qui cœnam Domini percipiunt integram, & in Missis nonnulla recitant lingua populari; cæteris autem in rebus à Pontificiis nihil differunt: tertia est eorum qui dicuntur Picardi; Pontificem hi Romanum & clientelam ejus omnem appellant Antichristium, & meretricem illam in Apocalypsi depictam; præter biblica scripta nihil recipiunt; Sacerdotes & Episcopos sibi deligunt ipsi; matrimonio nemini interdicunt; mortuis nullas faciunt exequias; dies festos & ceremonias habent perpaucas (5). i. e. "Here follows "what relates to the Bohemians. They, after John "Huss's death, were divided chiefly into three Sects. "The one acknowledge the Roman Pontiff to be "head of the Church, and Christ's Vicar. A second take the Lord's Supper in both kinds, and "some part of that service is in the vulgar tongue. "The third are called Picards; these give the name "of Antichrist, and the harlot described in the Revelations, to the Pope of Rome, and all who adhere "to him; they allow of nothing but the Scriptures; "they elect their own Priests and Bishops, forbid no "persons to marry; perform no rites at burials; and "have very few festivals and ceremonies." However, Rudigerus, in his History of the Bohemian brethren, will not allow (6) the name of Picards which was given them; and conjectures, that it was imposed on them by their enemies, in order to reflect an odium on them by that infamous name, as though we (says he) had been no more than the wretched remains of the leud Picard, who, reviving the antient heresy of the Adamites, introduced nakedness and infamous actions. This conjecture is probable enough.

(5) Sleidan, lib. 3. See also Thuan. book 6. and John Slechta's letter, among those of Erasmus, lib. 14. p. 675.

(6) Page 148.

PICCOLOMINI (ALEXANDER) Archbishop of Patras, and Coadjutor of Sienna, deserves a place among the illustrious men of the 16th Century. He was born in Sienna, and of the same family of Paul Pius (a). He was master of a great deal of learning, as appears by the books he wrote on various kinds of subjects [A]. However, I would

(a) Thuan. Hist. lib. 65. p. 233.

[A] The books he wrote on various kinds of subjects.] Ghilini mentions the following: La Filosofia morale: la Theorica de' pianetti: l'Institutione dell' huomo: l'Institutione del Prencipe Christiano: della Grandezza dell' acqua e della terra: Parafrasi sù la Rettorica d'Aristotile: della creanza delle Donne: delle Stelle fisse: due Comedie cioè l'Alessandra e l'Amor Costante: la Sfera: i Sonetti: Traduzione della Poetica d'Aristotile: Annotazione sopra la medesima Poetica d'Aristotile: Tesoro dell' huomo in tre parti diviso tratta dell' buon nome & nella terza fa menzione dell' amor sopranaturale (1). Vossius observes, that our Piccolomini printed at Venice in 1565, a Latin Commentary on Aristotle's mechanical questions (2). He bestows great encomiums on this Author: Philosophus planè eximius fuit; tum ob ingenium, & industriam; tum quia feliciter adeò Mathesin, & philosophiam, conjunxit. Utrâque sanè excelluit; ut præclara tot ejus opera ostendunt (3). i. e. "He doubtless was a great Philosopher, both "on account of his genius, and his application to "study, and because he so happily united mathe- "maticks and philosophy. His noble works prove "that he excelled in both."

(1) Ghilini, Teatro d'Huomini letterati, Tom. 1. p. 8.

(2) Vossius, de Scient. Mathemat. p. 302.

(3) Idem, ibid.

would not have people believe ſtrictly the ſeveral particulars which his panegyriſts relate concerning him [B]. He wrote on philoſophical ſubjects in his mother-tongue, and is thought to be the firſt who did ſo [C]. The treatiſe he publiſhed by order of Francis of Medicis, grand Duke of Tuſcany, with regard to the reformation of the Calendar, merited the approbation of perſons of the greateſt learning (b). He was very praiſe-worthy for having joined to the theory of the mathematics and phyſics, a regularity of manners and a very exemplary life (c). He adhered ſtrongly to the opinions of Ariſtotle (d). He was member of the Academy of the Infiammati of Padua (e). Notwithſtanding the gravity of his morals, and his cloſe application to philoſophical ſtudies, he nevertheleſs wrote ſome plays, which met with great applauſe [D]. He died in Sienna the 12th of March 1578 (f) aged threeſcore and ten years, and was buried in the cathedral (g). What Thuanus ſays of him [E] is curious enough, and worthy the imitation of ſtudious perſons: he ſpeaks of this as an eye-witneſs. It will be incumbent on me to criticize his tranſlator [F].

(b) Joh. Imperialis, in Muſæo Hiſtor. p. 82, 83.

(c) Idem, ibid. p. 82.

(d) Idem, ibid.

(e) Ghilini, Teatr. part. 1. p. 8.

(f) He did not live in 1600, as is affirmed by Moreri.

(g) Imperialis, in Muſæo Hiſt. p. 82.

PICCOLOMINI

[B] His panegyriſts relate concerning him.] I am of opinion that there is an hyperbole in the following paſſage of Thevet (4): "He really was a man, who "diſplayed a divine eloquence in his writings; and "had ſo wonderful a grace in ſpeaking, that he ſeemed "rather to charm the ears of his auditors, than perſuade them by the artifice of his rhetorick. With "regard to his ſkill in languages, he was not infe"rior to any perſon, whether with reſpect to the an"tiquity and propriety of the Hebrew tongue, the "elegance and ſweetneſs of the Latin ſtyle, in which "he was ſo great a maſter, that, it would have been "impoſſible for Tully, and the reſt of the excellent "Orators, to have expreſſed their thoughts better and "more naturally than our learned Alexander did. "He made ſo great a progreſs in divinity, law, phy"ſics, the mathematics, and philoſophy, that he "did not leave the moſt ſecret of their receſſes un"ſearched, as is well known to thoſe who had the "happineſs to ſee and converſe with him, and to "peruſe his learned and excellent works: he is ap"plauded for the eaſe with which he explained any "Authors he undertook, whoſe greateſt difficulties "he cleared up. Any one, who caſts an eye on his "Commentaries on the Meteors and other works of "Ariſtotle (5), will perceive that he diſcovered ſo "exactly his Author's ſenſe, that it would have "been ſcarce poſſible for Ariſtotle himſelf to have "illuſtrated his own opinions better than our Picco"lomini did."

(4) Thevet, Eloge des Hommes illuſtres, Tom. 8. cap. 3. p. 32, 33. edit. in 12. 1671.

(5) The Epitomizers of Geſner ſay only, that he tranſlated the Commentaries of Alexander Aphrodiſienſis, on the 4 books of Ariſtotle's Meteors.

[C] He is thought to be the firſt who did ſo.] Imperialis blames him for this, as depreciating learning, and not becoming the reſpect and veneration which was due to the language of antient Rome. Efferbuit mire, ſays he (6), ingenium Alexandri Piccolominei Senenſis in cogendo ſub Etruſcis vexillis agmine ſcientiarum omnium, quo intentato alias facinore immortalem ſibi pararet in Italica celebritate triumphum. Memorabilis profecto induſtria, niſi trito proteri ſermone rerum apices præclariſſimarum eſſet, contemptum ipſarum quendam apud viliores inducere, & quod magis intereſt, eſſet Latinæ locutionis majeſtatem ac ſtudium abdicare qua ultro utiliſſima quæque comprehenſa & conſignata eſſe palam eſt. i. e. "Alexander Piccolomini of Sienna had an ardent "deſire to bring the whole circle of the ſciences un"der the Tuſcan banners; by which attempt (where"in he was not preceded by any perſon) he hoped to "obtain an immortal triumph among the Italians. "His efforts would indeed have been praiſe-worthy, "did not his exhibiting the moſt exalted things in "the vulgar tongue bring them into ſome kind of "contempt with the meaner ſort of people; and "likewiſe baniſh the majeſty and ſtudy of the Latin "tongue, in which the moſt valuable particulars are "written." See the repreſentation, which Boccalini (7) ſuppoſes our Alexander to make on mount Parnaſſus. Some people are not willing that the key of the ſciences ſhould be permitted to come into the hands of the vulgar. They would have all books of philoſophy and erudition written in Latin; and require men of learning to deal with antient books as the Church of Rome has frequently treated the Scriptures. That Church will not permit the Scriptures to be read in the vulgar tongue without the utmoſt precautions. It is the Sanctum Sanctorum, from which the profane ought to be excluded. See the complaint which (8) Du Pin has refuted in the Preface to his new Bibliotheque of eccleſiaſtical Authors.

(6) Imperialis, in Muſæo Hiſt. p. 82.

(7) Boccalini, Ragguagli di Parnaſo, Centur. 1. cap. 73. p. m. 221, 222.

(8) It is mentioned in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for June 1686, art. 4. p. 653. See a paſſage in Tully, in Oratione pro Muræna, mentioned by Eraſmus, under the adage cornicum oculos configere. It is the 75th of century 3. Chil. 1. p. m. 123.

[D] He wrote ſome plays, which met with great applauſe.] I will here cite John Imperialis: Neque tamen his dicatus gravioribus muniis abſtinuit interdum à luſibus poetarum comicas concinnando fabulas, quarum inſigniores duæ amoris conſtantis, & Alexandri titulo feruntur impreſſæ, in quibus ſic excelluit, ut ideo comicorum Italicorum princeps Trajani Boccalini judicio cenſeatur (9). i. e. "Though he devoted himſelf to theſe graver "ſtudies, he yet ſometimes diverted himſelf with "writing Comedies; the two beſt of which are ſaid "to be printed under the title of Conſtant Love and "Alexander, which were ſo excellently well written, "that Trajano Boccalini looks upon him as the "Prince of comick Poets among the Italians." I am of opinion that Menage, from theſe words, had a right to rank our Piccolomini in the catalogue of ſuch Eccleſiaſticks as have writ amorous verſes (10).

(9) Imperialis, in Muſæo Hiſt. p. 83.

(10) Chap. 145. in the Anti-Baillet, Tom. 2.

[E] What Thuanus ſays of him.] He followed Paul de Foix, whom Charles IX. had ſent upon an embaſſy into Italy in 1573. This Embaſſador going to Sienna, went and viſited our Piccolomini, and found him reviſing his Commentaries on Ariſtotle. All the ſervants of our old Gentlemen were abroad; ſo that, by not being appriſed of the Embaſſador's coming, he found Piccolomini on a couch. I will tranſcribe, in Latin, the account he gives of the conſolation which reading adminiſtered to him, in the midſt of all the infirmities of old age. Dum in urbe eſſet Foxius, Alexandrum Picolomineum veneranda canicie ſenem in ædibus ſuis inviſit, quem culcitræ incumbentem, & Ariſtoteli ſuo, hoc eſt à ſe diverſis explicationibus illuſtrato, recognoſcendo vacantem improviſus invenit. Nam ſolus erat, & famuli huc illuc per feſtum diem diverſi abierant. Quod ille anxietate ſumma excuſavit, & gratias Foxio pro tam honorifica ſalutatione egit, tum ſedere juſſis qui cum Foxio aderant, in iiſque Thuano. Multa de ſtudiis ſuis diſſeruit, eorumque ſe demum in ea ætate dulciſſimum fructum capere dixit, aliis oblectamentis deficientibus, quibus aliæ ætates innocenter & citra offenſam gaudere poſſunt. Quod cum dicebat, non tam ſenectuti ſolatium quærere dicebatur, quam adoleſcentes qui aderant, qua humanitate erat, ad deſidiam vitandam & Philoſophiæ ſtudia capeſſenda exemplo ſuo cohortari (11). i. e. "Whilſt Mr. de Foix was in the city, he paid "a viſit to Alexander Piccolomini, a man venerable "for his ſilver hairs, and found him reclined on a "couch, and reviſing his Commentary on Ariſtotle. "The old man was alone; all his ſervants, (as it "was a holiday) being gone abroad. Piccolomini "begged a thouſand pardons of the Embaſſador; "returned him great thanks for the honour he did "him, and deſired thoſe who accompanied him, "among whom was Thuanus, to ſeat themſelves. "He then ſpoke a great deal concerning his ſtudies, "and ſaid they afforded him a vaſt deal of pleaſure "in his old age; he not being able to taſte of other "delights, which younger perſons might enjoy with "innocence and void of offence. He ſpoke this, "not ſo much to ſhew that he wanted comforts in "his old age; as kindly to excite the young perſons "preſent, by his example, to ſhun a life of ſloth, "and devote themſelves to the ſtudy of philoſophy."

(11) Thuan. de Vita ſua, lib. 1. p. m. 1170. col. 1.

[F] It will be incumbent on me to criticiſe the tranſlator of Thuanus.] I will compare his tranſlation with the Latin words of Thuanus. Alexander Picolomini, ſays he (12), endeavoured to make people believe, that

(12) In Teiſſier, Eloges tires de Thou, Tom. 1. p. 484, 485.

PICCOLOMINI (FRANCIS), was born in Sienna, and of the ſame family with him of the foregoing article. He was a very famous Philoſopher in the 16th Century. Though he was very young when he taught logic in the Univerſity of Sienna, his lectures were ſo excellent, that he raiſed the admiration of the whole city. He afterwards taught philoſophy in the Univerſity of Macerata, and afterwards ten years in that of Perugia [A]. He roſe to ſo great a height of reputation, that the Paduans invited him to accept of the ſame employment among them. Accordingly he was made Profeſſor extraordinary of philoſophy in that city in 1560; and about four years after, Profeſſor in ordinary in the ſame faculty. He publiſhed a great many Commentaries on Ariſtotle, which were highly eſteemed, on account of the clearneſs and ſubtilty with which they abounded. He endeavoured to revive the Platonic philoſophy [B], and to ſhew that it agreed, in the main, with that of Ariſtotle (a). The famous James Zabarella was his antagoniſt, and he publiſhed a piece againſt him. I ſhall take notice elſewhere of the things in which he excelled him [C]. Having obſerved that the diſputes, which the Profeſſor had appointed in the afternoon, occaſioned many quarrels and diviſions, he wiſely put an end to them (b). He took that ſtep with ſo much the leſs reluctance, as he enjoyed an annual penſion of fourteen hundred Florins (c). Thrice happy could he have appeaſed the quarrels which prevailed in his family, as happily as he did thoſe

(a) Extracted from James Philip Thomaſin, Elog. part. 1. p. 208 & ſeq.

(b) Idem, ibid.

(c) This intimates, that the Profeſſor gained ſome profit by theſe diſputes.

that he was of the family of Æneas Silvius, who, being raiſed to the Pontificate, aſſumed the name of Pius II. Here follows Thuanus's Latin. Alexand. Picolominæus Æneæ Silvii qui pontifex Pius II. dici voluit, Gentilis, &c. (13). It is plain Thuanus affirms, that our Alexander was related to Pope Pius II. but the tranſlator charges him with advancing a ſlander which reflects the higheſt odium on the memory of that learned Sienneze; he charging him with laying a falſe claim to that family. If it be an enormous blunder becauſe of the prejudice it does to an illuſtrious perſon; it is no leſs enormous, if we conſider how eaſily the original might have been underſtood. The Tranſlator adds, that John Baptiſt the Sacriſtan or veſtry keeper, Deiphobus the Arch-Prieſt, and his other brothers beſtowed an honourable elogium on him (14). I am of opinion that the following words of Thuanus are not faithfully tranſlated. In majore patriæ urbis templo ſepultus, & honorifico à Jo. Baptiſta ædituo, Deiphobo Archipreſbytero aliiſque fratribus elogio ornatus. I am perſuaded that, by aliis fratribus, we are to underſtand the reſt of the canons of the cathedral of Sienna, and not the brother of Alexander Piccolomini.

(13) Thuan. Hiſt. lib. 65. p. 233. ad ann. 1578.

(14) i.e. on Alexander Piccolomini.

[A] He taught philoſophy in the Univerſity of Macerata, and afterwards . . . . . in that of Perugia.] He quitted Sienna, in order to go to Macerata, at five and twenty; and intended to ſeat himſelf, as a ſcholar, rather than take the chair as a profeſſor: but ſoon after he came to Macerata, he was preſented to the chief profeſſorſhip in philoſophy. This we are told by Imperialis (1). He ſays nothing which intimates what is affirmed by Tomaſini, viz. that Piccolomini was logical profeſſor in Sienna before he went to Macerata. Imperialis adds, that he continued only a year in the laſt mentioned city; when being invited by the Perugians, he took that opportunity of diſplaying his capacity in a more noble theatre. During the ten years which he taught philoſophy there, he publiſhed a volume of Moral Philoſophy (De Morali Philoſophia) which was admired: Tantis omnium cætuum laudibus exceptum, cum nihil eo, vel ad efformandos mores utilius, vel ad Rempublicam rectè gerendam accommodatius, vel ad omnem bonorum, malorumque notitiam ſuavius excogitari poſſit (2). i. e. "It met with ſo univerſal an applauſe, be-" cauſe nothing could have been more happily adapt-" ed to form the manners; or more ſuited to the " well regulating of a ſtate, or better calculated for " the general knowledge of good and evil." Father le Moine (3) has mentioned this work with applauſe, and criticiſed ſome paſſages in it. Obſerve the following title, Franciſci Piccolominei Senenſis univerſa Philoſophia de moribus nunc primum in decem gradus redacta & explicata. Venetiis in folio 1583. This ſeems to intimate, that the firſt edition of this work is of 1583. If this be true, Imperialis is miſtaken, in ſaying, that our Author publiſhed his work during his profeſſorſhip in Perugia; and that this work was the occaſion of his being invited to Padua (4): for, according to Imperialis's calculation, he began to teach philoſophy in Padua, at about thirty ſeven years of age, that is anno 1557. This Hiſtorian cannot be excuſed, but by ſuppoſing that the Philoſopher in queſtion had publiſhed his moral work before the year 1557, and afterwards put it into a new order, till then unknown. Publiſhing it in that form at Venice in 1553, he might have given the title as above, though it was but a ſecond edition. I am to obſerve that he inſerted in his moral work, printed in 1583, a treatiſe De Methodo, wherein he oppoſed Zabarella his collegue and rival. The latter wrote a defenſe; but Piccolomini renewed the attack, by a piece entitled, Comes politicus adverſus Jacobum Zabarellam.

(1) Jo. Imperialis, in Muſæo Hiſt. p. 114.

(2) Idem, ibid.

(3) In his Peinturas moralez.

(4) Hoc unum effecit poſtea ut graviſſimo Venetorum judicio ad Patavinum Gymnaſium fueris convocatus. Imperialis, in Muſæo Hiſt. p. 114.

[B] He endeavoured to revive the Platonic philoſophy.] Imperialis declares, that he did not apply himſelf to this ſtudy till after he had left off teaching: but, according to Tomaſini, he read lectures, and wrote on that ſubject even in Padua. Imperialis's words are as follows. Hac igitur egregie navata Venetis opera per annos duos & viginti patriam ſibi tandem viſendam cenſuit, in qua extremos etiam ſpiritus hauſit. Ac interim pluribus ad magnum Etruriæ Ducem legationibus (5) perfunctus, plurimiſque honoribus auctus amæniſſima Platonis philoſophia vacare cæpit, quam etiam commentariis exornandam ſuſceperat, ipſum namque dicere ſolitum accepimus, Platonis & Ariſtotelis philoſophiam duos quaſi oculos humani aciem intellectus dirigere, quorum alterutro ſi quis careat Cyclopis inſtar in hac rerum univerſitate labatur neceſſe eſt: ſed communia fata præclaros hoſce illius conatus interciderunt (6). i. e. "After having happily " laboured for the Venetians twenty two years, he at " laſt reſolved to viſit his native country, in which " he died. In the mean time, after going upon ſe-" veral deputations to the grand Duke of Tuſcany, " and receiving a great many honours, he began to " devote himſelf to the delightful charms of the " Platonick philoſophy, on which he had undertaken " to write Commentaries; for I have been told he " uſed to ſay, that the philoſophy of Plato and Ariſ-" totle, like two eyes, directed the ſight of the un-" derſtanding of man; and that any perſon who had " but one of them, was like a Cyclops, and muſt ne-" ceſſarily ſtumble and fall in the world: but the " common deſtiny of mankind interrupted all the " noble deſigns of this Author." Read alſo Tomaſini's words (7), and make the neceſſary compariſons.

(5) Idem, ibid. p. 115.

(6) He mentions one of thoſe deputations, in the dedication of his book de rerum definitionibus, dated at Sienna, in 1600.

(7) Thomaſin. Elog. part. 1. p. 209.

[C] I ſhall take notice elſewhere (8) of the things in which he excelled Zabarella.] But I muſt obſerve here, that he was inferior to him in certain reſpects. He did not go to the bottom of a ſubject as Zabarella did: he uſed to ramble from one to another; and did not offer them ſo much as wine to be drank, as to be merely taſted. I take this to be Imperialis's thought. Piccolomineus, ſays he (9), oratione quidem utitur expedita, gravi, & illaborata, cæterum ſententiarum nexu frequentior quam forte conveniat, excurrit enimvero, nec in concluſionibus hæret, novis at ſubinde doctrinæ cumulis urget, ut libanda potius quàm guſtanda propoſitorum veritas offerri videatur, propterea bene ſententium calculis ſancitum, hujus ſcripta magis provectiorum auribus inſervire, illius autem juniorum. i. e. "Piccolomini's diction is ſhort, grave and unlaboured, " but perhaps too much perplexed. He employs too

(8) In the rem. [A] of the art. ZABARELLA.

(9) Imperialis, in Muſæo Hiſt. p. 115.

thoſe of his pupils; but his ſons hated one another to ſuch a degree, and were ſuch wretches, that they involved his old age in numberleſs troubles. He quitted his profeſſorſhips, after having exerciſed them with glory during fifty three years [D], and retired to Sienna, where he died in a very advanced age [E]. He left his heirs conſiderable wealth (d). His funeral obſequies ſhew, in a particular manner, the eſteem which the inhabitants of Sienna had for him; the whole city putting on mourning, and all the courts of juſtice being ſhut up (e). He had been Diſciple of the famous Zimara, and fellow-pupil of Felix Peretto, who, when Pope, aſſumed the name of Sixtus V. and who thought it a glory, ſo long as he lived, that he had been able to anſwer his objections in a publick diſputation (f) [F].

(d) Ex Tomaſini, Elog. part. 2. p. 208.

(e) Imperialis, in Muſæo Hiſt. p. 115.

(f) Idem, ibid. p. 114.

" many excurſions, and does not dwell long enough " upon a theme; but introduces, every now and then " new ſubjects; in ſuch a manner that the truth of " his propoſitions ſeems to be offered us, merely that " we may taſte, rather than drink of them; for this " reaſon the judges are of opinion, that his compoſitions are better adapted for thoſe who are of a " mature age; and thoſe of the other Author for " younger people."

[D] He quitted his Profeſſorſhips, after having exerciſed them with glory during fifty three years.] Tomaſini affirms this, but he cannot be reconciled with Imperialis, who ſays that our Profeſſor lived a year in Macerata, ten in Perugia, and twenty two in Padua *, which make but thirty three in all. Let it not be ſaid that he omitted the Profeſſorſhip in logic exerciſed by him in Sienna; for it could not continue twenty years, ſince Piccolomini was but five and twenty when he was Profeſſor of Philoſophy in Macerata, Ghilini ſuppoſes the fifty-three years mentioned by Tomaſini to be juſt (10): and he is more excuſable than Paul Freherus (11), who admits them, after affirming that Francis Piccolomini was appointed Profeſſor of Macerata at twenty-five years of age; that he was but one year Profeſſor there; that he exerciſed his Profeſſorſhip of Perugia but ten years, and that of Padua but twenty-two years. Such are the miſtakes which Writers commit, when they blend together oppoſite relations.

* He was 41 years in Padua, as appears by Tomaſini.

(10) Ghilini, Teatro, Tom. 1. p. 62. De Witte, in Diario Biogr. ad ann. 1604, ſpeaks only of 52 years.

(11) Freher, in Theatro, p. 1498.

[E] He died in a very advanced age.] Tomaſini and Imperialis agree in ſuppoſing him to be fourſcore and four years of age. They forgot to ſet down the day of his death; but we find, by the date of his epitaph in Ghilini (12), that it was in 1604. Imperialis obſerves, that our venerable old man was ſo happy as never to want Spectacles (13).

(12) Theatro, part. I. p. 62.

(13) Ex eo fœlix in tanto ſenio quod oculorum vim nullo unquam chryſtalli ſubſidio juvit. Imp. Muſæo Hiſt. p. 115.

[F] Sixtus V. . . . . thought it a glory ſo long as he lived, that he had been able to anſwer his objections in a publick diſputation.] Here follows an account of this incident, as related by Imperialis. Et quidem Fœlix adhuc Minorita quod ſemel propoſitarum in templo Theſium ex utraque philoſophia publicum impugnatorem ſortitus erat Franciſcum, ſæpius porro pontifex ejus diei memoriam recolebat, ſibi digniſſimum reputans cum acerrimo, ut ipſe ajebat, ingenio in celebri confeſſu haud ſegniter doctrinæ atque ingenii gloriam ſuſtinuiſſe (14).

(14) Ibid. p. 114.

PIENNE (JANE DE HALLUIN, LADY DE), maid of honour to Catharine de Medicis, was paſſionately beloved by Francis de Montmorency (a), eldeſt ſon of the Conſtable Anne de Montmorency. He promiſed her marriage without acquainting his father or his mother with it [A], fearing leſt they ſhould thwart his deſign. It is by no means probable that they would ever have conſented to it, though the Lady was of an illuſtrious family, and diſtinguiſhed by her virtue and merit: but there was a particular reaſon which moved them to oppoſe that marriage in the moſt publick manner, and which was, that Henry II. conſented that the Lady de Pienne's lover ſhould marry his natural daughter, the relict of the Duke of Caſtro. This alliance flattered the Conſtable's ambition ſo much, that he would not ſuffer his ſon's promiſe to be valid: and being in the higheſt favour with Henry II. in which a ſubject ever was with his Prince, he perſuaded that King to uſe all imaginable methods to have the promiſe, which the Lady de Pienne could urge, declared void. This affair became the moſt conſiderable in Chriſtendom, by the oppoſition

(a) Who was made Marſhal of France in the year 1559.

[A] He promiſed her marriage, without acquainting his father or his mother with it.] Monſieur le Laboureur, who had the originals of all the proceedings by him, relates (1), that they begin with the examination of the two lovers in the Louvre, October the 5th, 1556. " That Jane de Halluin being firſt called in, ſaid ſhe " was about 19 or 20 years old, and that it was 5 or " 6 years ſince Meſſire Francis de Montmorency propoſed marriage to her, at the Palace of Paris, or at " St. Germain's, and that their diſcourſe was, that he " took her for his wife, and ſhe took him for her huſband. " She ſaid indeed, that before that time, he had often " offered to marry her, but ſhe would not accept it, be- " cauſe ſhe ſaw he was ſtill very young, and alſo be- " cauſe ſhe feared leſt the Conſtable would be diſpleaſed " at it: to which he anſwered, that he would wait ſo " long, and be ſo dutiful to his father, that he would " make him approve it: that ſhe would not have de- " clared it, had not the Sieur de Montmorency ſpoke of " it, on account of his marriage with Madam de Ca- " ſtro." She declared alſo, " that ſhe received no " gifts nor preſents from him as pledges of their " marriage, that every thing was tranſacted only by " word of mouth, without witneſſes, and that ſhe ne" ver mentioned it to any of her relations. That he " wrote to her during her confinement, but that ſhe " burnt his letters: that he continued to hold the ſame " diſcourſes to her, ſince his return, particularly in the " Abbey of Vauluiſant, when he was there lately, and " even yeſterday at the Conſtable's houſe, he ſpoke to her " again to the ſame purpoſe, deſiring her not to be angry " at it. She added that ſhe did not know her marriage " was clandeſtine and unlawful, and that ſhe thought " he might marry, though his father and mother were " ſtill living, becauſe marriage is eſtabliſhed by God, and " the ceremonies only by the church. Upon the whole, ſhe " referred herſelf to Monſieur de Montmorency, and " ſigned her anſwer. That Lord's anſwer was much " the ſame; and after he had declared that he was " twenty-ſix years old, he confeſſed all, and even " acknowledged that the night before, he had again " promiſed her that he would marry her, when he " mentioned to her the great perplexity he was in: " only, when he was aſked whether, as his father " and mother were ſtill living, he did not know, " that he could not marry without their conſent, he " anſwered, that when he committed that folly, he did " not conſider all thoſe things, being but young ſtill, but " that if it were to be done again, he would reflect " more ſeriouſly upon it . . . . (2). Theſe depoſitions " were ſent to Rome, with all the authorities that " could be gathered from the Holy Scripture, and " from the Fathers, againſt marriages contracted " without the parents conſent: the Pope received " all at firſt pretty civilly; he gave a very kind re" ception to the Sieur de Montmorency, and promiſed " him all the ſatisfaction he could wiſh. But he " only diſſembled, or elſe he had not yet thought of " improving that opportunity to make an alliance " between his own family and the houſe of France, " which

(1) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Memoires de Caſtelnau, Tom. 2. p. 419.

(2) La Laboureur, Addit. aux Memoires de Caſtelnau, Tom. 2. p. 420. Take notice of Brantome's words, in his Elogy of the Conſtable de Montmorency, Tom. 2. of his Memoirs, p. 137. Thus when the Conſtable had negotiated . . . a marriage between him and .. King Henry's natural daughter . . . as his father acquainted him with it, telling him when the marriage was to be ſolemnized, Monſieur de Montmorency anſwered him, that he could not conſent to it, becauſe he had promiſed marriage to Mademoiſelle de Pienne. The good old man was very much ſurprized at this, and had recourſe to tears, &c.

tion of Pope Paul the Fourth's intention, who had a mind to get that daughter of Henry II. who had already been married with an Italian who was a Pope's grandſon, for another Italian who was his own nephew. . . . . This Pope's own intereſt was the only reaſon why the diſpenſation, that was aſked of him, could not be eaſily obtained ; wherefore Francis de Montmorency went in perſon to petition for it (b). The King did not think the Pope could refuſe him any thing, in ſo favourable a juncture of time as that was, in which they were negotiating an alliance together againſt Spain. And yet Paul IV. made ſo many difficulties, that the King was obliged to go another way to work [B]. He publiſhed an Edict, by which all clandeſtine marriages were declared void, and cauſed the Lady de Pienne to be ſhut up in a Convent, where they extorted from her a declaration by which ſhe gave up her claim : in a word the Pope was uſed very ſcornfully ; for the marriage of Francis de (b) Le Laboureur, Additions à Caſtelnau, Tom. 2. p. 419.

" which made him protract that buſineſs, in order to " gain his point." In a proteſt, which Monſieur de Montmorency cauſed to be drawn up at Cardinal du Bellai's houſe at Rome, March the 23d, 1557, he declares, That ſince five years and above he fell in love, through the folly of youth, with Lady Jane de Halluin, ſirnamed de Pienne, and had contracted marriage with her by word of mouth, without the conſent of the King, and his own father and mother ; that ſince that time, the King and his father having agreed upon his marriage with Diana of France, he was come to Rome, by their order, to get abſolution from the Pope, and a diſpenſation, for which he had continually petitioned his Holineſs ſince four months, having even juſtified his petition by a diſpenſation granted by the Pope in a caſe of the ſame nature : whereupon he was kept at bay with fair words and promiſes, and referred to a congregation of Divines and Canoniſts, ſummoned to meet the 23d of this month with the Cardinals, Archbiſhop and Biſhops, under colour of making the affair more legal, but in reality, as he knew from very good hands, to thwart his deſign, contrary to the Pope's promiſe, who backed the votes which were favourable to his adverſe party, though ſhe did not pretend to be a defendant in this cauſe ; the Pope alſo frowned upon and abuſed thoſe who voted for his abſolution, and ſhewed by all manner of proofs that he was againſt him. Wherefore, having notice of the Lady de Pienne's renunciation, he proteſts againſt all that the Pope might determine for the future againſt the liberty he claims to marry, and requires that the petitions preſented by him to his Holineſs for that purpoſe be regiſtred, together with the diſpenſation granted by the Pope in a caſe of the ſame nature (3). His complaints of the Pope's conduct are grounded on the particulars, which will be mentioned hereunder (4).

(3) Le Laboureur, Addit. à Caſtelnau, Tom. 2. p. 432.

(4) In the rem. [B].

[B] Paul IV. made ſo many difficulties, that the King was obliged to go another way to work.] Let us ſee how Monſieur le Laboureur continues (5) : The Pope kept Monſieur de Montmorency a great while at Rome, referring him from one Congregation to another, till at laſt his artifice was diſcovered ; the King and the Conſtable being diſappointed in their expectations they had conceived of him, and unwilling to be fruſtrated in an affair, which would thus have made a great noiſe only to their own diſadvantage, cauſed an Edict to be drawn up on purpoſe, which was publiſhed and recorded, by which all clandeſtine marriages were declared void : on the other hand, the King's authority was made uſe of, to oblige the poor Lady to give up her claim : ſhe was ſhut up in the Convent of the Maidens of God *, where for fear of being uſed worſe ſtill, and deſpairing to ſucceed in her wiſhes, ſhe was alſo made to believe that Monſieur de Montmorency had obtained a diſpenſation from the Pope.

(5) Addit. à Caſtelnau, Tom. 2. p. 420.

* Au Couvent des Filles de Dieu.

In order to know how much this Pope was influenced by the private intereſt of his family, we muſt always have this capital point in view, namely, that Paul IV. had a mind to marry his nephew with the natural daughter of Henry II. which deſign could not ſucceed, if the promiſe made to the Lady de Pienne were declared void. We ſhall ſee that he wiſhed on this occaſion that the Papal authority had been leſs, and that he had been deprived of a right, of which he would have been very jealous in any other caſe. He was more concerned for the advantage of his family, than for the privileges of the Holy See, either becauſe he imagined that his ſucceſſors would eaſily find means to retrieve the damage he did them, or becauſe he conſidered only the preſent time, and preferred abſolutely his own private advantage, before that of the Papal authority. The buſineſs was very briſkly proſecuted by the Court of France ; nothing was omitted to make it ſucceed. They produced the deed by which the Lady de Pienne gave up all her claim, and the Edict againſt clandeſtine marriages (6). They found means to get (7) a copy of a diſpenſation which the Pope had granted in a like caſe. Here follows a paſſage from the account which Doctor de la Haye ſent to the Conſtable (8) : it contains a curious particular. Paul IV. (9) ſent from the Datary, to know from him how that diſpenſation had been delivered ; for he wondered at it, and more ſtill, how it came to fall into our hands : to which the ſaid Datary anſwered, that it had been delivered in a full Court of the Chancery, and ſigned by his Holineſs himſelf, which the Pope could well remember, ſince his character was ſuch, that he would hear and ſee every thing that was done in his Chancery more carefully, than any of his Predeceſſors were wont to do. His Holineſs was quite amazed at it, and aſked his Datary by what means the ſaid diſpenſation could be reverſed and called in, which the Datary anſwered was abſolutely impoſſible, conſidering the diſpenſation was in the hands of the parties concerned, who by virtue of it were already married.

(6) Le Laboureur, Addit. à Caſtelnau, Tom. 2. p. 424.

(7) Ibidem, p. 425.

(8) Ibidem, p. 424.

(9) Ibid. p. 426. See alſo the rem. [D].

Let us alſo give ſome account of the firſt congregation, which was held for the diſpenſation of that marriage. The Pope preſided in that congregation (10), to which he alſo called ſeveral Divines and Canoniſts. . . . . The Pope ſpoke firſt, and having propoſed the caſe, he ſaid (11) ; " We aſk whether a marri- " age contracted by word of mouth, which is a true " marriage, and a true ſacrament, according to the " opinion of the moſt holy Divines, can be broke " and declared void by us, I mean when it has not " been conſummated. Then he added this ; pray, " do not pretend to urge the proceedings and in- " ſtances of our Predeceſſors, which I proteſt I will " not follow, but ſo far as authority of the Scrip- " ture, and the arguments of the Divines will move " you to approve them. He ſaid alſo what follows : " I do not queſtion but my Predeceſſors and myſelf " may have done wrong ſometimes, not only in this " point, but in many others : and yet we are by no " means to blame for it : for God rules and governs " his Church ſo, as to conceal from her ſeveral " things for ſome time, which he reveals to her after- " wards ; which Chriſt himſelf hints plainly enough " to us, when he ſays to St. Peter, what I do thou " knoweſt not now, but thou ſhalt know hereafter * : " In another place he ſaid, I have yet many things to " ſay unto you, but you cannot bear them now †, but the " Holy Ghoſt, whom the Father will ſend in my name, " ſhall teach you all things . Who knows then, " but what God kept formerly concealed concerning " the indiſſolubility of the holy matrimony, he is " now determined to declare by us ? Wherefore, " dear brethren, and children, you muſt endeavour " to aſſiſt me in this affair, and without minding " what ſuch or ſuch of my predeceſſors have done, " ſee whether it be not true that they have not ſuffi- " ciently underſtood, what we deſign now to examine " concerning the indiſſolubility of marriage. Hav- " ing ſaid this, he directed his diſcourſe to the Arch- " biſhop of Couſance, formerly Nuncio to the Em- " peror's Court, and commanded him to declare his " opinion. This Prelate did his beſt endeavours to " prove that ſuch a marriage cannot be declared void, " and as the Pope ſignified by ſeveral hints, that he " was extremely pleaſed with his opinion, as by his " ſmiles, by his looks, by his nods, and by his clap- " pings ; this determined the Archbiſhop to add a " great many things, which he had not thonght of " before, as appears both from his minutes, and by

(10) Ibidem, p. 427.

(11) Ibidem.

* John xvii. 7.

† Ibid. xvi. 12.

 Ibid. xiv. 26.

de Montmorenci with Henry the Second's daughter was celebrated with great pomp, though the diſpenſation was not granted [C]. The Pope owned a thing, which deſerves to be taken notice of [D]. The proceedings were carried on in a very unfair manner [E], and the Conſtable's ſon felt ſome remorſes of conſcience, which obliged him to apply

" the conferences which he had held : the Pope ſaid " aloud that the Archbiſhop had ſet the whole matter in a very clear light. After him ſpoke Biſhop " Antoniellus, a very antient and venerable man, " who was of a quite contrary opinion, and proved " in a few words, that the Pope could grant what " was required of him ; his Holineſs anſwered him " that he did not thank him for the great power he " gave him in that affair : and as that Prelate had " ſupported his opinion by ſome paſſages from St. " Thomas, the Pope obſerved, that St. Thomas " might have aſſerted many things in his youth, " which he recanted when he came to riper years " and to have more learning ; his Holineſs added " this paſſage from St. Paul, when I was a child, I " ſpoke as a child, ... but when I became a man, I " put away childiſh things * ; then he ſaid, it is not " with any deſign that I give you this warning, " but that they, who are ſtill to deliver their opinion, " may not lay any ſtreſs on what St. Thomas thought " in his youth. After him voted the Sacriſtan †, " who was of the ſame opinion with Biſhop Anto- " niellus, namely, that the Pope might and ought " to declare ſuch marriages void, when there is a rea- " ſonable cauſe for it ; and as among his arguments, " which where pretty long and not leſs learned, he " happened to quote ſomething from Doctor Da- " rand concerning the ſubject of matrimony, Da- " rand's writings not being allowed as good autho- " rities, and he quoting them without pretending to " defend them, the Pope who had already taken offence " at his opinion, fell into a paſſion againſt him, as " tho' he had been theauthor or aſſertor of Darand's " ſentiments ; and as the Sacriſtan endeavoured to " vindicate himſelf, the Pope ſilenced him with oppro- " brious language, and by dreadful threatnings, ſay- " ing ſeveral times, that he deſerved to be puniſhed, " and that he would tell him more of his mind in " private. This terrified the others ſo, that ſeveral " of them reſolved to alter their opinion entirely."

* 1 Cor. xiii. 11.

† I ſuppoſe the Keeper of the Sacred Palace is meant here.

There were but ſeven perſons who voted in that congregation : the reſt were kept to be heard another time (12). The Cardinals retired being very ill pleaſed, and one might eaſily underſtand, without any other intelligence of what paſſed there . . . . . that there aroſe no leſs diſorder and confuſion among them, than what happens generally among the flock, when the ſhepherd is ſmitten and wounded. For they all went away quite aſtoniſhed, and almoſt with tears in their eyes, one one way, another another, without being able to relate to any of their friends or ſervants, how things paſſed, and to what reſolution they were come (13). Cardinal du Bellay and Monſieur de Montmorenci having ſent word to the Conſervator of Naples, that conſidering the King's Edict, they might very well proceed without the Pope's diſpenſation, and that he ſhould remember, that a leſs material affair than this determined Germany and England to break off with the Holy See, to which they uſed to pay obedience (14) ; that Conſervator ſent the Datary to the Cardinals of Caraffa and Piſa to tell them, " that he was very much aſtoniſhed at " his Holineſs's proceedings, and that he could never " have thought the Pope would have ſet up both for " a judge and a party concerned in that affair, and " that he ſhould imagine the Holy Ghoſt directed " him only, and not alſo the reſt of his Counſellors : " deſpiſing every one's opinion, with ſo little regard " for his own dignity, and for thoſe, whom he com- " manded to ſpeak, and to whom he gave the com- " miſſion to deliver their opinions freely, without " any favour or biaſs whatſoever ; and that on a " leſs conſiderable occaſion than the preſent was. " Cardinal Cajetan's obſtinacy had reduced Germany " to the condition it was in, there being no great " hopes of ſeeing it brought to better terms, unleſs " by God's grace alone. They ſhould duly conſider " the contents of the King of France's Edict, by " which together with the cenſure of the Sorbonne, " and the Ordinary's authority, without any diſpen- " ſation from his Holineſs, Monſieur de Montmo- " renci might ſet himſelf at liberty, and marry " whom he pleaſed (15)." All this was preſented to the Pope, but did not make him alter his proceedings. Whence we may infer, that the Court of France looked upon that negotiation as a moſt important affair ; but that the Pope did not think it leſs important with regard to his own intereſt, not to determine any thing. If we had two or three volumes in folio, containing ſuch accounts as thoſe of Doctor de la Haye, and of Cardinal du Bellay (16), it would be one of the moſt curious works that could be placed in a library.

(12) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Memoirs de Caſtelnau, Tom. 2. p. 429.

(13) Ibidem.

(14) Ibidem. P. 430, 431.

(15) Ibidem.

(16) Monſieur Le Laboureur gives us the latter at length, in his Addit. à Caſtelnau, Tom. 2. p. 432, &c.

[C] The Pope was uſed very ſcornfully : for the marriage was celebrated, . . . though the diſpenſation was not granted.] " The King and the Conſtable did not " think they could revenge themſelves better of the " Pope, for the little account he made of their re- " commendations, than by concluding the marriage " by virtue of the Edict againſt clandeſtine mar- " riages ; the ceremony was accordingly celebrated " with but greater pomp and ſolemnity on Monſieur " de Montmorenci's arrival in the month of May " 1557, the Court being then at Villier-Cotrez (17).

(17) Ibid. p. 437.

[D] The Pope owned a thing, which deſerves to be taken notice of.] It was in the congregation I have mentioned above. I knew, ſaid he (18), that the Popes my predeceſſors have given ſeveral diſpenſations in ſuch caſes ; they are before God to anſwer for them. If they happen to have done wrong, I will not follow their example ; they may have done it out of ignorance, and thoſe ages did not know perhaps, what the following ages continually diſcover to us, according to JESUS CHRIST'S words, ſcietis autem poſtea, &c. non poteſtis omnia portare modo, &c. Veniet Paracletus, &c *. And as for what is objected, that I have given a diſpenſation in a like caſe, I would not have this to be any ways prejudicial to the ſubject before us, for God knows that I never underſtood it. There are in the Chancery a multitude of people, prelates, referendaries, and others, who are perpetually bawling one one way, another another, ſo that a poor decrepid Pope cannot hear or underſtand things accurately : for my part, I declare ſolemnly, that I never underſtood the matter ; and what is more, if, as a man, I have erred in one thing or another, I would not perſiſt in my error. This is an abſtract from an account drawn up by Cardinal de Bellay, which Monſieur le Laboureur has inſerted among his additions to Caſtelnau's Memoirs : and here we have a man who truſted to a very weak diſpenſation ; for the ſame Pope, who had granted it to him, declared to the ſacred College, that he never underſtood that queſtion, and that old as he was, he could not be attentive to particulars among the clamours which reſounded throughout the place, where diſpenſations and other deeds are ſigned. And yet the man, who had obtained that diſpenſation, thought himſelf lawfully married : but if that diſpenſation were void, he committed ſo many acts of adultery every time he enjoyed his wife. Nothing ſeemed ſhameful to Paul IV. if he could but find pretences not to declare Monſieur de Montmorenci's marriage void.

(18) Ibid. p. 433.

* The paſſages from the Bible are tranſlated above in the rem. [B], a little below the quotation (11).

[E] The proceedings were carried on in a very unfair manner.] Nothing ſuited the Pope's purpoſe better than to urge that the Lady de Pienne required the confirmation of her marriage : in order therefore to anſwer that argument, a deed was procured in due form, by which it appeared that ſhe laid no manner of claim to Monſieur de Montmorenci. But ſuch a declaration could not be forced from her but by making her believe that the Pope had already granted the diſpenſation. Wherefore her lover did not ſcruple to write that falſity to her. Here follows his letter, which is as unkind as his former letters were ſweet and loving. " MADAM DE PIENNE, being ſenſible " of the fault which I have committed unawares, " and very ſorry that I offended againſt God, againſt " the King, and againſt my Father and Mother, I " have given our holy Father the Pope to underſtand " how

" how things paſſed between us both, and aſked his " Holineſs's pardon for it, which in his great good- " neſs and mercy he has granted me, giving me " alſo, as far as it may be neceſſary, a diſpenſation " to reſtore me to my former liberty; of which I " judged it proper to give notice. And to extricate " us both out of the misfortunes and perplexities we " are in, I deſiſt from all words and promiſes of " marriage which paſſed between us both, of which " by that diſpenſation we are diſcharged, and I " hereby diſengage you from them, deſiring you " moſt earneſtly to do the ſame with regard to me, " and to provide for yourſelf as you ſhall think fit: " for I am determined never more to have an intimate " communication or correſpondence with you; not but " that I eſteem you a very modeſt and virtuous Lady, " and of a very good family: but I muſt do my " duty, in order to avoid the unhappineſs and miſ- " fortunes, which might otherwiſe befal us, and " eſpecially to give his Majeſty and my parents an " opportunity to forget the offence I have committed " againſt them, and to endeavour to deſerve their fa- " vour again; and alſo to perform what I owe to " them by God's commandments, to whoſe grace " and providence I recommend you, MADAM DE " PIENNE; from Rome February the 5th. He, " whom you will always find ready to ſerve you, " MONTMORENCI (19)." Francis de la Porte, Gentleman to Monſieur de Montmorenci, a Maſter of the Requeſts, and one of the King's Secretaries, attended by two Notaries of the Chaſtelet, went to the Convent in which the Lady was ſhut up; the gates were opened to them (20) by virtue of a letter ſigned by the King's own hand. They ſent for the Lady, and after ſhe had read Monſieur de Montmomrenci's letter aloud, the Sieur de la Porte told her, Madam, all that I have to ſay to you is by Monſieur de Montmorenci's order, and I ſhall tell it you, if you pleaſe, becauſe he has charged and commanded me to do it. You have ſeen by his letter, which you have juſt now been reading, how grievouſly he thinks he has offended againſt God. . . . . (21) He has moſt humbly entreated his Holineſs to pardon him the ſin he had committed by the promiſe of marriage which paſſed between you both, and to grant him a diſpenſation, that he and you may be at liberty to marry whom you pleaſe; which our holy Father has done, and by that means he has reſtored both Monſieur de Montmorenci and you to your former liberty, as he writes to you in the letter, which I have here delivered to you: wherefore, as he is, by the diſpenſation granted to him, free and at liberty to marry any other but you, whenever he ſhall think fit, I declare to you by his order, that he acquits and diſengages you from all words and promiſes of marriage, that may heretofore have paſſed between you both, and I deſire and require of you in his name, to declare to me whether you do not alſo acquit him of his promiſes to you? To which the Lady de Pienne, with tears in her eyes and ſobbing, replied after this manner. Monſieur de la Porte, I am much better pleaſed that the breaking off the promiſes between Monſieur de Montmorenci and me, ſhould come from him, than from me. He ſhews but too plainly by what you have told me from him, that his heart is leſs generous than a woman's, and this is nothing like what he told me ſo often, that he would loſe his life rather than alter his mind. He has deceived me very much; I ſee very well that he chooſes rather to be a rich, than an honeſt man. There being nothing poſitive in this anſwer, the Sieur de la Porte repeated his arguments, inſiſting chiefly on the Pope's diſpenſation, and required that the Lady ſhould ſpeak plain. " Where- " upon the Lady crying as before ſpoke theſe words. " Why, Monſieur de la Porte, what anſwer would " you have me make? Could Monſieur de Mont- " morenci be ſo hard-hearted as to write me ſuch a " Letter?" This anſwer was not more to the purpoſe than the firſt. But the third queſtion was ſo home, that the Lady was under a neceſſity to come to the point. Monſieur de la Porte, ſaid ſhe (22), ſince Monſieur de Montmorenci is determined to diſengage me from the promiſes of marriage paſt between us, and does actually diſengage me from them, I neither will nor can hinder him from doing what he pleaſes, and can have no will contrary to his own. Monſieur de la Porte was not fully ſatisfied with this third anſwer, he inſiſted again, and obtained at laſt the following reply. " Monſieur de la Porte, ſince Monſieur de Montmo- " renci acquits me now of the promiſes of marriage " which have been interchanged between him and " me, if he were a King's ſon, or a Prince, after he " wrote me ſuch a letter as that which you have de- " livered to me from him, I would not marry him, " and I diſengage him from his promiſes. However, " I am aſtoniſhed at the manner after which he " writes to me in that letter you have given me; I " cannot well believe that he wrote it; ſince he was " uſed to write to me in a quite different ſtyle (23)" She was anſwered that they had ſeen Monſieur de Montmorenci write that letter with his own hand. The Lady, as ſhe was going away, endeavoured to recover her ſpirit, in order to excuſe her tears, which ſhe was ſeen to ſhed; but it was impoſſible for her to appear proud: all that ſhe ſaid betrayed the mortification, the ſorrow, and the grief ſhe had, not to marry that inconſtant lover. Men are uſed to ſay either out of joke or out of gallantry, that it is with the utmoſt reluctancy a miſtreſs is prevailed upon to pronounce that terrible yes, which ſhe muſt anſwer to the queſtion, do you conſent to be the wife of ſuch an one? But it is very probable that a yes of this kind was never more difficult to ſpeak, than that, which the Lady de Pienne anſwered to the queſtion, do you conſent, that Monſieur de Montmorenci ſhould not marry you?

There happened a particular, in which that Lord did in all probability forſwear himſelf. The fact is as follows. Being returned from Rome he gave a declaration in writing before the chief perſons of the King's Council, aſſerting, that there was not between him and the Lady de Pienne a marriage contracted by word of mouth, and by reciprocal promiſes paſt between them, but only an agreement to make it be thought ſo, in order to endeavour by that means to obtain the conſent of his Father the Conſtable (24). He affirmed upon oath, that that declaration written by his own hand contained the truth (25), and that if he petitioned for a diſpenſation from the Pope, by confeſſing to him more than he ſhould have done, it was only becauſe he hoped to obtain it eaſily, whereby it would not have appeared, that he made him at firſt believe a falſity: but that meeting with great difficulties at Rome, he was at laſt determined to declare the whole truth to the King and to the Conſtable. As though he had ſaid, I did not promiſe marriage to the Lady de Pienne, who had only agreed together to ſay that there was ſuch a reciprocal promiſe between us: we had no other deſign, than to engage my father and mother by that lie to conſent to our marriage. Having aſſerted that falſity very often, I could not reſolve to unſay it again, and that I might not be obliged to be inconſiſtent with myſelf, I choſe rather to aſk a diſpenſation of the Pope, and continued all along to tell lies to his Holineſs: but as I was not able to avoid inconſiſtencies by that means, I acknowledge at laſt, that my aſſertions were falſe, and I ſwear before the chief members of the King's Council, and certify it in writing, that I have been telling lies a long while, in order to impoſe upon my Father, my Mother, the Pope, &c. Muſt not ambition have a moſt tyrannical power over a man, when it forces ſuch a confeſſion from him? Is it probable that this lover ſhould have entered only in ſo ſlight an engagement with his miſtreſs, who was ſo young and ſo beautiful? The remorſes of conſcience, which ſtung him, as you ſhall ſee hereunder, confirm my opinion (26).

I muſt examine in this place an anſwer, which to me ſeems very ſophiſtical. Cardinal de Lorrain, after the outrage I have mentioned above (27), cauſed a letter to be publiſhed, in which we meet with theſe words. I have heard others fetch the cauſe of the Marſhal de Montmorenci's ill-will ſomewhat higher, and even from the time when he was in great perplexity and trouble about his marriage with the Lady de Pienne, which he acknowledged and confeſſed before the ſaid Lord Cardinal, and other Lords, appointed by the late King Henry to examine that matter, and afterwards he denied it, and ſwore to the Pope, that he made no promiſe whatſoever to the ſaid Lady: ſo that the ſaid Sieur de Montmorenci was aſhamed that the Lord Cardinal ſhould know him to be a forſworn perſon, unworthy to bear witneſs, and who deſerved to be degraded of all his honours (28). Here follows the anſwer of the Proteſtant who refuted that Letter. " The ſecond cauſe of the Marſhal de " Mont-

(19) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Memoires de Caſtelnau, Tom. 2. p. 421.

(20) Ibidem.

(21) Ibidem, p. 422.

(22) Idem, ibid.

(23) Ibidem, p. 423.

(24) Ibidem, p. 437.

(25) Ibidem, p. 439.

(26) Add to this the Diſcourſes which the Lady de Pienne held to the Sieur de la Porte, as we have related above.

(27) Rem. [L], of the article LORRAINE (Charles de).

(28) Lettre d'un Seigneur du pais de Haynault envoyée à un ſien voiſin & amy ſuyvant la Cour d'Eſpaigne, p. m. 5 and 6. i. e. " A letter from " a Lord of the " Country of " Haynault, ſent " to one of his " neighbours " and friends, " who attended " the Court of " Spain."

apply to Pope Pius IV. for abſolution[F]. The Lady married afterwards a man of a much lower rank than the lover ſhe had loſt [G]. We have here a remarkable inſtance from which it appears that the paſſions of a Prince, which occaſion very often many abuſes, prove ſometimes a remedy to the diſorders of the State. The Edict, by which clandeſtine

" Montmorenci's enmity proceeds, you ſay, from " your holding him for a perjured man, on account " of the Lady de Pienne's marriage. Before I " clear him from that calumny by unqueſtionable " witneſſes and authorities, I muſt humbly deſire the " King's Majeſty to conſider your audaciouſneſs, by " which being carried beyond the bounds of reaſon, " you dare to publiſh that the marriage of his ſiſter " the Marſhal's wife is unlawful. For is it poſſible " not to draw that inſtance from your aſſertion? I " could eaſily pardon your ignorance, if it were not " attended with malice. For (though your imputa- " tion were as true, as it is falſe) can the promiſes of " children of diſtinguiſhed families be any ways " valid for the contracting of marriage, when they " are not approved by the conſent of their parents, " under whoſe authority they live? The examples " of Abraham and Iſaac ſhew us ſufficiently that it " is a father's buſineſs to marry his children accord- " ing to his own will and pleaſure. And if a vow " (which is a promiſe we make to God) made by a " maiden without her father's conſent, be void ac- " cording to the laws of Moſes, how much more " muſt a promiſe of marriage, which is made by " one perſon to another, be void, if the father does " not conſent to it? And though the antient Greeks " were too uncertain and wavering with regard to " ſuch marriages, yet they were not ſo far deprived " of the light of Nature, as to approve them; for " we ſee in Euripides, that a maiden anſwers to a " lover who courted her, I cannot marry without my " father's conſent, to whom I am ſubject. If you " ſhould urge, that a father has not ſo great an au- " thority over his ſons as over his daughters, all the " laws would be againſt you, by which a father may " even ſell his children in caſe of neceſſity (29)." After this the Author quotes the Scripture, the Fathers, the Councils, the Civilians, in order to prove that the marriage of children muſt depend on the will of their parents. But all that long diſcourſe is nothing but an evaſion; it is miſleading the reader, and paſſing de genere in genus, from one genus or kind to another. The queſtion was not, whether the Marſhal de Montmorenci's marriage with Henry the Second's natural daughter were lawful or not. The Author of the letter had not meddled with that queſtion, he had only aſſerted that the Marſhal was perjured by confeſſing and denying ſolemnly, that he promiſed marriage to the Lady de Pienne. Theſe two facts are an evident proof of perjury, whether the promiſes were obligatory or not: for if a man promiſed to commit a crime, he might indeed obtain from any tribunal to be diſengaged from his promiſe: but if he ſhould ſwear before ſome perſons that he had promiſed, and before others that he had not promiſed, he would be guilty of perjury. This is the caſe in which the Marſhal de Montmorenci was ſuppoſed to be; this was the chief point of the accuſation. The accuſer did not examine whether he ought to have performed his promiſe of marriage, or whether the promiſe were lawful or not: and yet the Proteſtant, who anſwered Cardinal de Lorraine's letter, ſuppoſed that the whole charge was grounded on the lawfulneſs of that promiſe which was not kept. Having made theſe falſe ſuppoſitions, he expatiates at random on ſeveral ſubjects; he quotes the divine laws, the law of nature, he treats of the right of fathers and parents, and ſays a thouſand uſeleſs things, and not one word to the purpoſe. This is the common practice of thoſe who have nothing material to anſwer, and yet fear leſt they ſhould hurt their cauſe if they made no reply. They alter the ſtate of the queſtion, that they may have an opportunity to talk a great deal. I do not doubt but a great many readers imagined that the Marſhal de Montmorenci's Apologiſt triumphed, and were very much edified to ſee that he made Henry the Second's daughter a party concerned in that affair. But this is an artifice too frequently uſed in polemical writings, and which after all is nothing but a trick and an evaſion to miſlead the readers.

(29) Reſponſe à l'Epiſtre de Charles de Vaudemont Cardinal de Lorraine, fol. E 3 verſo.

[F] Some remorſes of conſcience . . . . . obliged him to apply to Pope Pius IV. for abſolution.] " Things re- " mained in that condition as long as the Pope and " the King lived. But whether it was that the Mar- " ſhal de Montmorenci had afterwards ſome ſcruples " of conſcience, and aſcribed the ill ſucceſs of his " wife's pregnancy, who though ſhe had been ſeve- " ral times with child, had yet had but one alive, " and died even in a little time, or for ſome other " reaſon, he applied again to the Holy See, and af- " ter Paul the Fourth's death he ſent a petition to " Pius IV. of which I have the original draught by " me: and in which he ſet forth, how being ſur- " priſed by love he had heretofore promiſed marriage " to the Lady de Pienne, yet with condition to get " his father's conſent to it, and not otherwiſe; but " as he could not obtain it, the ſaid Lady had freely " acquitted him of his promiſe both by word of " mouth, and by a juridical declaration ſigned by her " before witneſſes, and in which ſhe ſtill perſiſted: " and he himſelf thought he was lawfully married " to another; yet becauſe of the promiſes made by " him, he deſired an abſolution à Cautela or for his " greater ſecurity, and that the commiſſion of it " might be directed to the Biſhop of Paris. Pope " Pius IV. whoſe private intereſt was not concerned " in this affair, as his predeceſſor's was, did not " make many difficulties, and ſent him a large and " full diſpenſation (30). . . . . This diſpenſation ſet " his conſcience at reſt, and did not much alter the " condition of his marriage, which continued to be " fruitleſs (31)" Monſieur le Laboureur was, for ſome reaſons relating to his own family, very much inclined to juſtify thoſe of the houſe of Montmorenci, as much as lay in his power: and yet he ſeems to think it was not true, that the promiſe meant here was only conditional. If Diana of France's marriage with the Marſhal Duke de Montmorenci was both advantageous and honourable in the ſight of men, it has been juſtly queſtioned whether it were acceptable to God, ſince it was contracted with more violence than juſtice, againſt a pre-engagement of the Marſhal with Jane Halluin, founded on that Lord's love, and on his promiſe (32).

(30) La Laboureur, Addit. à Caſtlenau, Tom. 2. p. 439.

(31) Ibidem.

(32) Ibidem.

[G] The Lady married afterwards a man of a much lower rank than the lover ſhe had loſt.] Brantome acquaints us with this: it is a parentheſis he has inſerted in the account he gives us of the reſtitution of the Duke of Savoy's towns: what he obſerves is a proof, that love intrudes itſelf into every buſineſs, and often becomes a ſpring which influences the moſt important affairs of the ſtate. There were ſome wiſe and prudent perſons in the King's Council, whoſe opinion was, that it was not proper to reſtore to the Duke of Savoy the cities he demanded. The King of Navarre (33) maintained that the reſtitution muſt be made reſolutely, otherwiſe he ſhould not get the Kingdom of Sardinia ſo often promiſed to him, and that the Duke of Savoy had ſent him word and aſſured him, that he would aſſiſt him effectually at the Court of the King of Spain. . . . . At laſt after many debates, the weaker party prevailed over the ſtrongeſt, and for that purpoſe the King diſpatched to Piedmont, from the Bois de Vincennes, after the taking of Bourges, I being a witneſs to it, the Lord d'Alluye (Florimond Robertet) one of the four principal Secretaries of State, who was then deeply in love with the Lady de Pienne (34). . . . . .

deſtine marriages were declared void, was a very good law, which proved very uſeful to the whole Kingdom [H]; but it was not with a view to promote the publick good that Henry II. made that law; it was only for the private intereſt of his favourite, and that he might not have the diſgrace of being over-reached by the Pope's artful intrigues (c). The (c) See the rem. [B].

I have been told by many perſons of our Court; nor was it the King of Navarre's favour that induced her to it, for he had been dead then above a year; but yet it was he who firſt ſupported and encouraged that gentleman in his love, and aſſiſted him as much as lay in his power: for in ſuch affairs great men at Court can do much, and prove often very uſeful to their friends and fellow-courtiers. The King of Navarre knew very well how to chooſe his Miniſters, ſince on this occaſion he made uſe of a man deeply in love, whom he flattered with the hope of enjoying the object of his paſſion.

[H] The Edict, by which clandeſtine marriages were declared void, was a very good law, which proved very uſeful to the whole Kingdom.] One of the moſt able Advocates in the Parliament of Paris argues very well upon that ſubject in his letter to Robert and Fournier Profeſſors of Law at Orleans, and is angry becauſe the law was not ſevere enough. He wiſhed men had not ſtopt half way, and that all marriages in general, contracted againſt the conſent, or without the knowledge of the parents, had been void. His letter begins thus. "THE EDICT concerning marriages has been publiſhed in our Court of Parliament; it is indeed a noble and admirable Edict: but you would think it more noble ſtill, if you knew the reaſon of it. For ſome of thoſe who hold the higheſt poſts in France have been the occaſion of it. It is obſerved that moſt of the bad examples ariſe generally from ſuch things as were formerly eſtabliſhed with good and holy deſigns, but which in time come to be abuſed. On the other hand there never was a good law but was occaſioned by ſome ſcandalous practices. The diſtemper muſt come before one thinks of a remedy againſt it. As for this Edict, every one rejoices at it as a noble action, worthy of a King. I alone, like another Timon, and a Man-hater, ſigh and lament, not but that I am glad of the power and authority it gives to fathers over their children, but I am ſorry that they have not a greater power ſtill; and that, as Alexander the Great coming into Aſia did not unty the Gordian knot, like the other Princes, who had been there before him, but to have ſooner done cut it with his ſword, ſo they had finiſhed the buſineſs quite, by an order or decree made by the common conſent of the Gallican Church, declared all the marriages whatſoever void, when contracted only by promiſes, and without the authority and conſent of fathers and mothers. Here I cannot but pity our country (France) which being never tired with bringing all eccleſiaſtical affairs under a lawful and wholeſom diſcipline, did not put the finiſhing hand to this material buſineſs (35)." What he adds contains very judicious obſervations, but his concluſion is too ſevere, for he would have all thoſe puniſhed capitally, who by fair words inticed either a young man or a maid into the ſnares of matrimony. Our Anceſtors, ſays he (36), knowing of what dangerous conſequence it would be, if a child under twenty five were judged to be lawfully married by a mere verbal promiſe, to the prejudice of the paternal authority, eſtabliſhed an action of rape (which was commonly called raptum in parentes) and which is unknown to all other nations. By which they gave leave to fathers and mothers, and even to guardians, to proſecute before the Royal Judge, him or her, who by ſuch fair words had inticed and ſuborned one of their children to marry: the conſequence and effect of that proſecution was ſuch, that it ſuſpended and ſtopt all other proceedings, that might be begun before the official and eccleſiaſtical Judge about the validity of the marriage. But what advantage did you ever reap from ſuch a proſecution? No other, but that, like true Frenchmen, we are at firſt ſtronger than men, and at laſt weaker than women. At the firſt beginning of the proſecution every one ſeems zealous to have it carried on rigorouſly, even the Judges ſeem to be infinitely favourable to the proſecutors: but in the end you never ſee any one puniſhed in an exemplary manner; and after all the raviſher gets the better of juſtice, and of the afflicted family, and continues in a peaceful poſſeſſion of her whom he had carried off. For my part I am of opinion, either that we ſhould have never eſtabliſh'd ſuch an action among us, or that it was neceſſary to make it end in the death of the perſon who committed the crime; that by his death the marriage might alſo be diſſolved. He did not write perhaps all that he had in his thoughts; he meant perhaps thoſe, who do not only ſeduce a young maiden, but perſuade her alſo to ſuffer herſelf to be run away with. If he omitted inadvertently that part of the definition of a rape, his concluſion cannot be looked upon in France as too ſevere, for the French puniſh with death all thoſe who ſteal a maiden away, whether it be with or without her conſent. But perhaps this law was not yet eſtabliſhed in France, when Paſquier wrote his letter to the two Profeſſors of Orleans. I am apt to think it was enacted ſince that time, becauſe it was obſerved that the law, which puniſhed thoſe only, who carried a maiden away againſt her will, was not effectual enough. It was eaſily evaded; for it was no difficult taſk to make a woman confeſs, after ſhe had been run away with, that it was done with her conſent. Such a confeſſion ſaved a man's life, and a woman would not have it upon her conſcience that ſhe ſuffered a man to be put to death, who proteſted that nothing but his violent love for her determined him to ſteal her away: beſides this, a woman was diſgraced, expoſed to a thouſand ſuſpicions, in danger of not meeting afterwards with a good match, and of being conſidered only as another's leavings, after ſhe had been for ſome time in the power of a raviſher (37): all this being duly conſidered both by the girl and her relations, determined them to get the raviſher off ſo that he might not be puniſhed; ſhe had only to declare that ſhe was conſenting: ſo that the affair ended like all thoſe mentioned by Paſquier (38): it was therefore become a common practice to ſteal maidens away; the antient law proved ineffectual, ſo that it was neceſſary to make one more ſevere, by which no account was to be made of the declarations which maidens might make that they conſented to be ſtoln away. It was thought proper to puniſh even their conſent; impunity being proper only to multiply thoſe bad examples: the firſt who ſucceed are an encouragement to others, and men are not aſhamed to follow a road which many others have followed to their ſatisfaction, and without danger. Compare this with what you will meet in the remark of the article ARIOSTA.

The Author examines the Edict with regard to the leave it gives to fathers and mothers to diſinherit their children, who had been ſo ill adviſed as to marry without their conſent (39); he ſhews that it is neither a remedy nor a comfort, but a new misfortune (40): and he aſſerts that there is no other remedy, but an order of a Council, by which all ſuch marriages be abſolutely declared void (41). He quotes the Scripture, the Fathers, the Roman Laws, and the French Laws under Charles the Bald, and he obſerves that we do not find there was ever a Council ſince that time, which deprived the Fathers of that noble authority over their children." "I know very well, continues he, that ſome centuries ago, there have been Monks, who patching up ſome obſolete gloſſes, have hinted this barbarous and bruciſh opinion, namely, that according to the Canon Law, the father and mother's conſent is not requiſite in the marriage of their children, but only for decency's ſake, and not by any neceſſity. Theſe profeſſed a perpetual celibacy. And would to God, that as that wiſe King of Sparta, Ageſilaus, being found once by a friend playing the fool with his children, deſired him to ſuſpend his judgment about what he had ſeen, till he was a father himſelf; ſo all theſe Monks would forbear giving their opinion in matters relating to matrimony, ſince by their vows, and their rules, they have not the liberty to become fathers. This is the reaſon why they judge of a father's love by their own, which is but common and cold (42)." I wonder he did not obſerve, that the permiſſion to diſinherit does not ſufficiently deter young lovers: for there

(35) Paſquier, Lettres, liv. 3. p. 111. of the 1ſt vol.

(36) Ibidem, p. 112, 113.

(37) Compare this with rem. [E] of the art. HELENA.

(38) When a maiden is ſtoln away, men make at firſt a great noiſe, they apply to the Courts of Juſtice, they cry aloud for puniſhment; but they cool by degrees, the prize continues in the Raviſher's poſſeſſion, and is declared a lawful prize. The worſt is, that he makes himſelf often dreadful. The relations fear, leſt, after he had diverted himſelf with his miſtreſs, he ſhould leave her in the lurch; he muſt be entreated, and is maſter of all the marriage articles which are to be drawn up according to his own wiſhes.

(39) Paſquier, Lettres, Tom. 1. p. 113.

(40) Is it not making me moſt unfortunate in my old age, not only to ſee that fool half miſerable, becauſe he engaged himſelf fillily, but alſo that I ſhould have no other comfort, but to make him quite miſerable, by diſinheriting him, as the Law gives me a power to do? Ibidem, p. 114.

(41) Ibidem.

(42) Paſquier, Lettres, Tom. 1. p. 117.

The houſe of Guiſe contributed moſt effectually to raiſe the difficulties, which Francis de Montmorenci met with at the Court of Rome [I].

there are ſo many fathers, who have eaſily pardoned a marriage contracted againſt their will, and there are ſo few inſtances of fathers who perſiſted in their reſentment, and ſhewed it by their laſt will, that young people flatter themſelves eaſily to ſee their parent ſoon reconciled with them. They depend very much on the ſtrength and force which nature gave to paternal affections (43), and they knew that a ſhort mortification is a ſufficient atonement for great faults with a father, pro peccato magno paululum ſupplici ſatis eſt patri (44).

Paſquier's cenſure is after all a great commendation of Henry the Second's Edict: for ſince that learned Civilian wiſhed, that the rebellion of children under age had been more ſeverely puniſhed, he commends and approves the new degree of puniſhment to which it was made liable. And beſides it muſt be obſerved, that he declares that what was wanting in that Edict, muſt be ſupplied by the eccleſiaſtical, and not by the Royal Authority.

Let it not be objected that that Edict is prejudicial to thoſe whoſe fathers are ſo covetous, or ſo fantaſtical and ill humoured, that they will never conſent to the marriage of their children. That objection is not reaſonable; there is no law which is uſeful to all perſons without exception (45): it is therefore enough that the Edicts prevent the greateſt evils. Now there are infinitely more young perſons, who out of love or out of a frolick will untimely marry, than there are fathers who would refuſe their conſent to reaſonable marriage. It is better therefore that the laws ſhould reſtrain the liberty of the children, than leſſen the authority of the parents: beſides, after a certain age the children are no longer under conſtraint by Henry the Second's Edict. Nor ſhould it be objected, that the liberty of marrying without the parent's conſent affords to many honeſt men who have no eſtate an opportunity of mending their fortune. This is what I have heard ſome Engliſhmen urge, who pretended to vindicate the privilege which ſome Churches at London enjoy, in which the Prieſts may marry, without the preliminary formalities, and thereby render the moſt clandeſtine marriages good in law; by that means, ſaid they to me, the eſtate of a very rich heireſs is come more than once to a poor family, which has flouriſhed ſince that time, and done a great deal of honour to her country. By ſuch an argument one might vindicate the ſtealing away of a maiden, and maintain that it ought to go unpuniſhed. But this is a wretched apology; for there is no abuſe, let it be ever ſo great, but is uſeful to ſome perſons. Muſt one therefore take care not to remove it? Can a man be really honeſt, and have true merit, when he endeavours to deprive fathers of the authority, which all the laws, human and divine, give them over their children? If you reckon right, you will find that for one man of worth who got an eſtate that way, there are twenty who had no other merit but the art of making themſelves beloved by a fair outſide, and by their courting and flattering, which won the heart of a young girl, either ſilly and ſimple, or angry at the ſevere uſage of a mother, a guardian, &c. The falſity of theſe apologies for privileged Churches muſt have been well underſtood, ſince it is not long ſince the news-papers have told us, that the parliament of England was about taking away the privilege of theſe Churches.

(43) O nimium potens Quanto parentes ſanguinis vinclo tenes Natura! quam te colimus inviti quoque! Seneca, in Hyppolyto, Act. 4. ver. 1114. i. e. "Oh too powerful nature, how ſtrong is the tye of blood in fathers! How much do we worſhip thee, even againſt our will!

(44) Terent. in Andria, Act. 5. Sc. 3. in fine.

A REFUTATION of thoſe who endeavour to juſtify clandeſtine marriages, and the ſtealing away of maidens.

(45) See above, the rem. [E], of the art. PATIN, quotation ().

[I] The houſe of Guiſe contributed moſt effectually to raiſe the difficulties . . . . . at the Court of Rome.] "The "Duke of Guiſe's preſence at Rome, and the jea- "louſy of authority which was between him and the "Conſtable, gave ſo much the more room to ſuſpect, "that he would oppoſe the granting of the diſpenſation, "as it was deſigned for a marriage more advantageous "to the houſe of Montmorenci than the private in- "tereſt of the Guiſes could bear. He and his bro- "ther the Cardinal had made a ſtrict alliance with "Pope Paul IV. and with the whole family of the "Caraffes: they had been the chief authors of the "breaking of the truce with Spain, and the Conſta- "ble oppoſed it. It is therefore very probable that "they urged the Pope on; and if they did not of "their own accord propoſe to him to aſk Diana of "France for one of his nephews, yet it is very like- "ly, that they made him believe he might get her "by means of the difficulties he ſhould raiſe againſt "granting the diſpenſation, and that they gave him "to underſtand, ſuch a match would be a moſt pow- "erful ſupport for his family. So that they would "not only have broke a marriage of the utmoſt im- "portance to the houſe of Montmorenci, but have "alſo rendered another valid, contracted in a very "noble family indeed, but yet inferior to the other "in dignity and riches (46)." The Marſhal de Montmorenci's marriage with the Lady de Pienne was in many reſpects ſo diſadvantageous to the Guiſes, as Monſieur le Laboureur ſhews, that we may be very certain they acted the part he mentions. If they had not urged on the buſineſs, and prepoſſeſſed Paul the Fourth's mind, it is by no means probable that that crafty and ſubtle Pope would have had ſo little power over his own paſſions. You have ſeen (47) in what manner he ſhewed his partiality, by his anger, and by his rough way of proceeding againſt thoſe, who did not vote according to his own wiſhes. It was becauſe if he had left every one at liberty to vote freely, he did not know how to compaſs his deſigns, I mean, to execute the project which the Guiſes had put into his head. Had it not been for that reaſon, he would have acted with temper, and concealed his deſigns: he would have thus perſuaded a great many perſons, that a zeal for the diſcipline obliged him not to infringe the holy Canons in the leaſt, even tho' he could thereby oblige the moſt Chriſtian King, and extend the Papal Authority as far as his Predeceſſors had done more than once. If that had been the caſe, Monſieur Eſprit might have urged that Pope's conduct as a new inſtance of the falſity of human virtues *.

(46) Le Laboureur, Addit. à Caſtelnau, Tom. 2. p. 437.

(47) In the rem. [B].

* Monſieur Eſprit has publiſhed a book with that title.

PIGHIUS (ALBERTUS), born at Campen in Overyſſel, is reckoned among the learned men of the 16th Century: Moreri has given a large account of him, but he has not taken notice of a groſs blunder of Lewis Guicciardini [A], which we ſhall cenſure hereunder,

[A] A groſs blunder of Lewis Guicciardini.] Having obſerved that Albertus Pighius, an eminent Divine, and a great Mathematician, being loaded with honour and riches by the Popes Hadrian VI. Clement VII. and Paul III. left Italy, and returned into his own country, where he died glorioufly a few years after; Guicciardini adds that ſeveral Authors have nevertheleſs aſſerted, that Pighius was killed at Bologna by the fall of a bridge in the year 1530. He obſerves that Paulus Jovius is the firſt who related that falſity, and that Surius and others tranſcribed him blindly, whereupon he cenſures the raſhneſs of all wretched tranſcribers. Paullus tamen Jovius, quem ſecuti ſunt poſtmodùm Frater Laurentius Surius, & alii quidam Scriptores, qui non inſtituta priùs collatione, neque adhibitâ ullâ conſimili diligentiâ, (digni ſanè hoc nomine qui repræhendantur) alienâ fide ſubnixi ad alios ſeſe perpetuò referunt: Paullus (inquam) Jovius, libro hiſtoriarum ſuarum vigeſimo ſexto, Albertum hunc, multò anteà tempore, anno ſcilicet Chriſti 1530 & in ipſa Caroli Quinti Cæſaris inauguratione, fortuita pontis ruinâ Bononiæ mortuum perhibet (1). i. e. "And yet Paulus "Jovius, whom Frier Laurence Surius and others "followed afterwards, depending on the credit of "others, whom they perpetually imitate, without "examining things themſelves, and without uſing "any care or diligence, (for which they are cer- "tainly very much to blame:) Paulus Jovius (I ſay) "aſſerts in the 16th book of his Hiſtory, that this "Albertus Pighius was killed long before, at Bo- "logna,

(1) Ludovicus Guicciardinus, in Deſcriptione Belgii Provinciarum, p. m. 237.

hereunder, nor of Albertus Pighius's frightful uglineſs and bad pronunciation [B]. Moreri's errors of commiſſion are conſiderable enough [C]. Beza has aſſerted that Pighius wrote a book againſt Calvin, with a deſign to get a Cardinal's hat [D]. Others pretend that

" logna, by the fall of a bridge, in the year 1530, " at the time of the Emperor Charles the Fifth's " Coronation." Here is a cenſure very much to the purpoſe indeed! Guicciardini cenſures very ſeverely thoſe, who admit an Author's account without examining whether it be true or not; he uſes them, I ſay, with the utmoſt contempt; and he himſelf commits moſt fooliſhly the very ſame fact for which he blames them. For if he would have been at the trouble of conſulting Paulus Jovius and Frier Laurence Surius, he would have found that they do not aſſert, that Albertus Pighius loſt his life in the year 1530. He muſt therefore have copied blindfold ſome Writers, who aſcribe that falſity to thoſe two Authors. I have conſulted the Paſſage of Paul Jovius, which Guicciardini quotes, but I have found nothing there, relating to Pighius's death: I have conſulted the paſſage where he gives an account of Charles the Fifth's Coronation, and I have found there only, that Pighius was one of thoſe who fell down when the bridge ſunk in. Ibi plerique militibus immixti, fœdo caſu procidentes, ſeſe pilis atque ſecuribus induerunt; inter quos fuit Albertus Pighius Belga theologus Lutheromaſtix, minima tamen pro tumultu clades incidit (2). i. e. " Moſt of them being there mixed " with the ſoldiers, falling down moſt dangerouſly, " were mingled among the javelins and axes. One " of them was Albertus Pighius, a Dutch Divine, " and a great antagoniſt of Luther: but yet there " was little harm done, conſidering the great noiſe " the fall of the bridge made." A man who obſerves expreſsly that the bridge falling down made more noiſe than did harm, and who does not aſſert that Pighius, the only perſon he names of all thoſe who fell down, was killed by the fall, hints plainly enough that that Doctor eſcaped with his life. Obſerve that he calls him Lutheromaſtix, Luther's antagoniſt, which convicts Guicciardini of a new blunder; for he charges Paulus Jovius with accuſing Pighius of Lutheraniſm (3). His cenſure of Surius is very ill grounded; ſince that Carthuſian Monk has faithfully tranſcribed Paulus Jovius (4), and ſince he aſſerts alſo in another place that Pighius died only in the year 1545 (5). I add that Paulus Jovius obſerves, that Pighius's piety preſerved him from the fatal conſequences of that fall. Quum id volumen (de Hierarchia) commentaretur . . . . . eum è ſummo vitæ periculo certiſſimum Dei maximi numen eripuit. Bononiæ enim in celeberrima pompa, quum tranſeunte coronato Cæſare Carolo Quinto, pars lignei pontis juxta Cæſarem turbæ pondere corruiſſet, Albertus lignorum atque hominum ruina ita oppreſſus eſt, ut probitatis ac inſtituti operis merito ſervaretur. Obiit nondum ſenex in patrio ſolo, ſacerdotiis à Clemente, & Paulo liberaliter honeſtatus (6). i. e. " Whilſt he was " compoſing that work (of the Hierarchy) . . . God's " providence delivered him from a moſt imminent " danger of his life. For during the great ſolemnity which was celebrated at Bologna, when " Charles V. returned from the place where he had " been crowned, part of the bridge, near the Emperor, ſunk in by the weight of the people, and " Albertus Pighius, being almoſt ſqueezed to death by " the boards and the people that fell upon him, " would probably have periſhed, had not the merit " of his piety, and of his intended work ſaved him. " He died in his native country, before he was an " old man, being honoured with Church-preferments " by the Popes Clement and Paul." Hoſpinianus, anſwering thoſe, who pretended to ground an argument againſt Zwingle's Doctrine on that Author's dying a violent death, urges, among other reaſons, a recrimination. He names ſome perſons zealous for Popery, who met with a tragical end. He places Pighius among them. De Pighio aliqui ſcribunt, ſays he (7), fuiſſe illum in tumultu oppreſſum in magna hominum frequentia una cum pecunia illa, quam à Papa & Cardinalibus propter operam ſuam in cauſa pontificia defendenda collocatam, acceperat. i. e. " Some write that " Pighius periſhed in a tumult which aroſe among a " great crowd of people, together with the Money " he had received from the Pope and the Cardinals, " for the pains he had taken in defending the cauſe " of Popery." We meet in all communions with Hiſtorians who make an advantage of falſe reports. Orthodoxy does not cure that defect. See in the remark [F] the words of a Divine of the Augſburg Confeſſion, who was guilty of the ſame falſity with Hoſpinianus.

(2) Paulus Jovius, Hiſtoriar. lib. 27. folio m. 3 verſo.

(3) Lutheraniſmi inſuper, etſi injuſtiſſime quidem, eum inſimulans: cum (ut diximus) a doctrinâ Lutheri fuerit alieniſſimus, adeoque ſummus illius hoſtis & antagoniſta. Lud. Guicciardin. in Deſcript. Belgii, p. 237.

(4) Surius, Commentar. p. m. 239. ad ann. 1530.

(5) Idem, ibid. p. 491. ad ann. 1534.

(6) Jovius, in Elogiis, cap. 105. p. 246.

(7) Hoſpinian, Hiſt. Sacrament. Tom. 2. p. 210.

[B] Pighius's frightful uglineſs and bad pronunciation.] Paulus Jovius pretends that nature abuſed Pighius with ſome impudence, and concealed the eminent learning and Chriſtian eloquence, which ſhe beſtowed upon him, under a frightful face. Magna hercle naturæ illudentis inverecundia, excellentem doctrinam cum illuſtri eloquentia conjunctam, ſi Chriſtiani ſcriptoris decus ſpectetur, multa infaceti oris truculentia opertam, in Alberto Pighio conſpeximus. . . . . In differendo vultus Scythico more contuſus & enormis, & aſpero gutture vox educta, & graviter reſonantis naſi tumultus, totam ferè ſapientiæ gloriam deformabant (8). i. e. " Nature ſeems indeed " to have abuſed Pighius very indecently: for we " have ſeen his excellent doctrine joined with an " eminent eloquence, if you conſider the glory of a " Chriſtian Writer, hid as it were under the deformity of his diſagreeable face. . . . . His enormous " features diſtorted when he ſpoke, his words fetched " from his rough throat, and the diſagreeable noiſe " of his noſe did almoſt entirely ſpoil the glory of " his wiſdom."

(8) Jovius, in Elogiis, cap. 105. p. 245.

[C] Moreri's errors of commiſſion are conſiderable enough.] I. I do not pretend to determine the queſtion whether Pighius's father was a nobleman or not: but I dare to aſſert that Moreri takes the affirmative ſide of the queſtion a little too raſhly: the word Patricius, on which he grounds his aſſertion, is equivocal; and when it is uſed with regard to modern families, it ſignifies generally a man, whoſe anceſtors have been raiſed to the poſt of Senators or Burgomaſters, &c. The Patrician families in the imperial cities and in other places are ſometimes noble, but whether they be ſo or not, they are called Patrician, provided the offices of the Magiſtracy were ſucceſſively held by fathers and ſons, for ſome time. Herein conſiſted perhaps the whole Nobility of our Pighius's father (9). I am not ignorant, that Pighius had ſeveral conſiderable Lordſhips (10), and that this is generally a proof of a man's noble extraction; but as it is not a demonſtrative proof of it, I will not determine any thing poſitively. I am content with having taken notice of the ambiguous ſenſe of the word, on which Moreri grounded his aſſertion. II. To ſay, Marc. Benevento ſpoiled Alphonſus's opinions concerning the ſituation of the eighth Circle, is a condemnable expreſſion: there are but two blunders here: Moreri ought to have ſaid, that that man ſpoiled Alphonſus's Hypotheſis concerning the motion of the eighth Heaven (11). III. This expreſſion, he wrote in 1538 an apology for the Council, which Pope Paul III. had publiſhed, is abſurd; for that Pope did not publiſh an apology for the Council, but a Bull for the meeting of the Council. IV. That apology of Pighius was not rewarded by a preſent of two thouſand Ducats, and by the proveſtſhip of St. John at Utrecht; for Pighius received theſe two gratifications in the year 1535 (12), three years before the publication of that apology. V. To ſay that he died at Utrecht December the 24, 1543, is not an accurate tranſlation of Valerius Andreas, who ſaid, obiit, VII. Kalend. Januarii, anni ineuntis CIↃ IↃ XLII. That Latin paſſage ſignifies that Pighius died December the 26th 1542. Valerius Andreas is not miſtaken here: ſo that Spondamus committed a blunder, when he aſſerted, that Pighius and Eckius died both in the year 1543 within the ſpace of a month. He places Eckius's death on the 10th of February (13): Swertius places Pighius's death on the 29th of December 1543 (14), and Bullart follows him herein (15): but they are miſtaken; for there is a letter of Cardinal Sadolet, dated June the 17th 1543, in which Pighius's death is mentioned (16). See the remark [F].

(9) Albertus Pighius Campenſis Tranſiſalanus patricio ſanguine natus. Valer. Andreas, Bibl. Belg. p. 38.

(10) See the rem. [F].

(11) Valerius Andreas's words (Bibl. Belgic. p. 39.) which Moreri pretended to tranſlate are as follow. Poſitionem Alphonſinam de motu octavi orbis depravantem.

(12) Val. And. ibidem.

(13) Spondanus, Ann. Eccleſ. ad ann. 1543. num. 12. p. m. 479. He has tranſcribed this from Surius, except the day on which Eckius died, which Surius does not mention.

(14) Swert. Ath. Belg. p. 115.

(15) Bullart, Academ. des Sciences, Tom. 2. p. 14.

(16) See page 686, of Sadolet's letters, of the edition printed at Lyons, 1554.

[D] Beza has aſſerted, that Pighius wrote a book againſt Calvin with a deſign to get a Cardinal's cap.] All that the reading of Calvin's works ſhook Pighius's orthodoxy a little [E] with regard to the merit of good works, and the juſtification of a ſinner. Others maintain that Pighius examined Calvin's works with ſuch a paſſionate deſire to refute them, that he receded ſo far from their adverſary's opinions as to run to the contrary extreme. They ſay he followed the ſteps of the Pelagians, for which reaſon Cardinal Bona adviſes us to read Pighius's works with caution (a). His treatiſe of free-will againſt Calvin, and his work concerning original ſin have been put by the Inquiſition of Spain into the catalogue of prohibited works. Poſſevin has given his readers notice, that this man's opinions concerning original ſin and grace are diſliked by the Divines, becauſe he ſeems to recede from St. Auguſtin's doctrine, which is approved by the Church (b). The Janſeniſt, who publiſhed ſome letters of the Prince de Conti, expreſſes himſelf in much ſtronger terms. He aſſerts that Pighius cannot be looked upon (c) but as a wretched Divine, ſince he was a man to whom St. Auguſtin's Theology ſeemed ſuſpicious, a man who adviſed thoſe, who would learn the true doctrine concerning free will, to read the other works of St. Auguſtin rather than thoſe which he wrote againſt the Pelagians, &c. (d). I ſhall tranſcribe ſome remarks, which have been made againſt John Gerhard, and which contain ſome particulars very proper for this article [F]; nor ſhall I forget to obſerve that Pighius was

(a) Albertus Pighius ita preſſe Pelagianorum ſectabatur veſtigia ut opera ejus caute legenda meritò cenſuerit Cardinalis Bona. Narratio Chron. Cauſæ Michaelis Baji, p. 192. Tom. 2. Oper. Baji. See the remark [G], quotation (32) and (33).

(b) Poſſevin. in Apparatu.

(c) See at the end of the Prince de Conti's Letters to Father de Champs, printed in the year 1689, the Treatiſe, intitled, S. Auguſtin juſtifié de Calviniſme, p. 181, 182.

(d) You will meet with the following part of this paſſage in the rem. [G], towards the end.

All honeſt men, adds Beza, deſpiſed that work of Pighius, and Satan diſappointed the Author's expectations. Such was his reward. Adverſus Albertum Pighium Campenſem, ſophiſtam illius ætatis facilè principem, à quo etiam fuerat pro Antagoniſta delectus, ex quo videlicet reportata inſigni victoria, galerum mox à Pontifice conſequeretur. At ille hoc ſuo labore fruſtratus, id unum aſſequutus eſt quod merentur veritatis hoſtes, nempe ut & doctis ſaniſque hominibus fœteret, & ab ipſo Satana deciperetur (17). i. e. "Againſt Albertus "Pighius of Campon, the chief Sophiſt of that age, "which choſe him for its champion, that having "gained a moſt illuſtrious victory, he might get a "Cardinal's Cap from the Pope: but he was fruſtrated "of the fruits of his labours, and the only reward "he got, was that, which the enemies of truth de"ſerve, namely, to be deceived by all good and "learned men, and to be deſpiſed by Satan himſelf."

(17) Beza, in Vita Calvini, ad ann. 1543.

[E] The reading of Calvin's works ſhook Pighius's orthodoxy a little.] Theophilus Raynaud having ſuppoſed that there are ſome Hereticks, whom a man cannot read without ſome danger, if he be not deeply learned; but that there are others who deliver their errors in ſo groſs a manner, that there is nothing to fear from them, even though a man be not very learned; that Author, I ſay, having ſet down that maxim as a principle, ſpeaks of Luther and Calvin: the latter he places in the former claſs of theſe Hereticks, and the former in the latter claſs: and he gives Pighius as a glaring inſtance of what he aſſerts. Qua ratione Lutherus, qui ubique ſtercora, & cœnum crepat, ſuamque animi impotentiam ubique prodit, minoris legentis peritiam expoſcit, quam Calvinus, cujus in ſcribendo vafrities, etiam mediocriter doctis fraudi eſſe queat, ut in Alberto Pighio eſt deprehenſum, quem conſtat ex lectione librorum Calvini impactum non rarò eſſe in ſcopulos: tametſi homo erat non ineruditus, quod edita ab eo volumina teſtatum faciunt (18). i. e. "Wherefore "Luther, who is continually flinging dirt about him, "and cannot reſtrain his paſſion, requires leſs ſkill in "his Readers, than Calvin, whoſe crafty way of "writing is apt to miſlead even thoſe who have ſome "learning, as it was obſerved in Pighius, whom it is "certain that the reading of Calvin's works led often "aſtray, though he did not want learning, as ap"pears by the works he has publiſhed." An Engliſh Proteſtant aſſerts that Pighius is abſolutely orthodox with regard to the article of Juſtification (19): another Proteſtant of the ſame country obſerves, that the Papiſts charge Pighius with being ſpoiled by the reading of Calvin's works; but that Pighius aſſerted, he had borrowed his doctrine only from the holy Scripture. Dicunt Pontificii Pighium. alioqui Catholicum Doctorem, ſeductum ex Lectione librorum Calvini. At Pighius ipſe teſtatur, ſententiam ſuam ſe è lectione Scripturarum hauſiſſe: O Calvinum vel Adverſariorum teſtimonio beatum, cujus Scripta tantum cum Sacris Scripturis conſenſum retinent, ut ſi quod Pontificius Doctor celeberrimus fatetur ſe ex Sacræ Scripturæ lectione habuiſſe, id alii Pontificii lectioni librorum Calvini tribuant. Profectò niſi Scholaſticorum ſententia cum manifeſtis Scripturis pugnaſſet, nunquam illam deſeruiſſet Pighius (20). i. e. "The Papiſts maintain, that Pighius, o"therwiſe a Catholick Doctor, was ſeduced by read"ing Calvin's works: but Pighius himſelf declares, "that he took his opinions from the Holy Scripture. "Happy Calvin, whoſe writings, even by his very "adverſary's Teſtimony, agree ſo well with the Scrip"ture, that if a moſt celebrated Popiſh Doctor con"feſſes he borrowed ſomething from the Bible, other "Papiſts aſcribe it to the reading of Calvin's works. "And really, if the opinion of the Schoolmen were "not inconſiſtent with the Scriptures, Pighius would "never have renounced it." Let us add a French Miniſter to theſe two Engliſhmen. "Cardinal Roſ"fenſis and Pighius, who wrote alſo againſt Luther, "aſſerted the Doctrine of Grace, and the latter even "maintained that we are not juſtified by any inherent "juſtice, reſiding within us. But he was paſſionately "refuted by the * Dean of the Univerſity of Louvain, "who charged him with having baſely forſaken the "Doctrine, which they had learnt together in Ha"drian the Sixth's ſchool, and with ſuffering him"ſelf to be corrupted by reading Calvin's Inſtituti"on (21)." I have juſt now ran over the Treatiſe de Fide & Juſtificatione (of Faith and Juſtification), which is the ſecond of the nine Controverſies which Pighius publiſhed at Cologne in the year 1542, with this title; De Controverſiarum præcipuarum in Comitiis Ratiſbonenſibus tractatarum, & quibus nunc potiſſimum exagitatur Chriſti fides & religio, diligens & luculenta explicatio, i. e. "An accurate and full Expoſiti"on of the chief Controverſies, which have been car"ried on at the Diet of Ratiſbone, and which "chiefly at this time diſturb Chriſt's Faith and Re"ligion." I have met with ſuch things there, that I cannot comprehend how it could be aſſerted, that his opinion about Juſtification, is entirely the ſame with that of the Proteſtants. He exerts all his ſtrength to refute them, and he aſſerts in ſo many Words, that God regards chiefly men's good works to juſtify and ſave them. Ad amorem noſtrum atque opera præcipuum a Deo & majorem quam fidei reſpectum haberi in donando nobis juſtificationis & ſalutis gratiam, i. e. "That "God regards chiefly our love and good works, and "even more than he does Faith, in the Grace of "Juſtification and Salvation he beſtows upon us." Such is the ſummary he has put in the margin, folio 63 verſo; in the following leaf he has put this, opera noſtra coram Deo eſſe meritoria, i. e. "That our "works are meritorious before God." I have examined the text, and found that the Doctrine delivered in it agrees exactly with the ſummary in the margin. We ſhall ſee hereunder (22), that Calvin and the Janſeniſt charge him with being a downright Plagiary.

* Tapperus.

(18) Theophil. Raynaudus, de malis ac bonis Libris, num. 453. p. m. 263.

(19) Mortonus, Antidot. contra merita, cap. 6. ſect. 1. apud Pope Blount, Cenſ. Author. p. 418.

(20) Epiſc. Conſ. Carleton. Eccleſ. Catbol. contra Tridentin. cap. 3. apud Pope Blount, ibid.

(21) Baſnage, Hiſt. de la Religion des Egliſes Reformees, Tom. 2. p. 39. of the edition publiſhed in 1690, in 12m.

(22) In the remark [G] towards the end.

[F] I ſhall tranſcribe ſome remarks which have been made againſt John Gerhard, and which contain ſome particulars very proper for this article.] The Author of theſe remarks was of Utrecht, and a Lawyer by profeſſion: his name was Giſbertus Lappius à Waveren. He ſent his remarks to Nihuſius, who inſerted them into his Hypodigma, printed in the year 1648. They are a ſharp cenſure of a paſſage of John Gerhard, Profeſſor of Divinity at Jena. The paſſage is in the 5th volume of that Profeſſor's Common-places, in the 14th was charged with Plagiariſm [G], and that they who wrote againſt him (e), confeſs that he had eloquence and wit, and all the qualities of a good Sophiſt, or of a very good Advocate of bad cauſes; that he knew how to give an odious turn to his adverſary's opinions, and to declaim effectually in thoſe paſſages, in which he could raiſe the Reader's indignation by means of ſome principles, which are acceptable to the generality of the people; that he knew how to cover the weak ſide of his cauſe, to ſpeak with aſſurance, and 14th ſection, where the Author refutes the 14th mark, which according to Bellarmine, is peculiar to the true church, namely, that they who oppoſe it die miſerably. John Gerhard retorts the argument upon him; he urges the unfortunate end which the perſecutors of the Reformed Religion met with, and places Pighius among them. Eodem anno CHRISTI CIↃ IↃXLIII, ſays he, mortuus eſt Albertus Pighius, Papatûs defenſor non poſtremus; de quo ſcribunt, fuiſſe illum in tumultu oppreſſum, in magna hominum frequentia, unà cum pecunia, quam à Papa, & Cardinalibus propter operam ſuam, in cauſa Pontificia defendenda collatam, acceperat *. The Cenſurer proves by the words of Paulus Jovius, which I have quoted (23), that the bridge broke down in the year 1530, and that Albertus Pighius was not killed by the fall. He adds, that the Pope's generoſity to him is poſterior to the year 1530; ſo that after all, he could not have been buried under the ruins of that bridge with his money, as the Divine of Jena ſuppoſes he was. He proves afterwards, that Albertus Pighius Præpoſitus & Archidiaconus Eccleſiæ Divi Johannis, liber Dominus in Midrecht, Wilnes, Cudelſteert, Zevenhoven, Tamen, Dominus in Achtienhoven, Blocklant, Nuythoorn (24), i. e. "Dean and Arch-deacon "of St. John's church, free Lord of Midrecht, Wil- "neſs, Cudelſteert, Zevenhoven, Tamen, and Lord "of Achtienhoven, Blocklant, Nuithoorn;" died, being duly attended with the ſacraments of the church, and with a great preſence of mind, December the 26th, 1542, in a ſtately houſe of his own at Utrecht. Ultrajecti in ædibus clauſtralibus, quas in immunitate collegiatæ Eccleſiæ Divi Johannis magnificas poſſidebat (25). That date of the day and year is contained in a letter, which John Vorſtius of Lombeca, Dean of the Cathedral of Utrecht, and one of the Executors of Albertus Pighius's teſtament, wrote December the 29th, 1542, to Gerart Hamont, Prior of the Carthuſians at Cologne. There is an abſtract of that letter, in which we meet with a remarkable particular, which is, that Pighius being nettled to the quick by a work of Bucer, was ſo animated by it, that notwithſtanding his diſtemper, he applied himſelf daily to draw up his vindication, nor could he be prevailed upon by any argument, to have any regard for the ill ſtate of his health. He would never interrupt the writing of his reply to Bucer, and this haſtened his death. The work was left imperfect, and was printed nevertheleſs (26). Here follow the Dean's expreſſions in his letter (27). Hoc adjiciam, præfatum Præpoſitum, D. Pighium, libello quodam, nomine Buceri emiſſo, quo eum acrius punxit, ita, durante ſua ægritudine, fuiſſe commotum, ut nullâ perſuaſione induci potuerit, ut aliqua ſuæ valetudinis habita ratione, Apologiam quandam reſponſivam edere, & indies ſcribere, voluerit omittere. Quam quidem, inchoatam tantum, morte præventus, reliquit: quæ certe indubitata fuit cauſa celerioris ejus deceſſus. Eandem Apologiam, ſic inchoatam, curabo viſitari, ac deinde typis excudi. As to what Gerhard aſſerts, that the Cardinals gave Pighius a large ſum of money, it is anſwered, that it is very probable, they ſhewed him their eſteem and good will by fair words only. Two letters are quoted to prove this, the one of Cardinal Sadolet, written in the year 1539, and the other of Cardinal Marcellus Cervinus, dated from Rome October 27. 1542. Sadolet aſſures Albertus Pighius, that he will recommend him to the Pope and the Cardinals; and Cervinus promiſes to repreſent Pighius's ſervices and want to the Pope, and proteſts, that if he could give him wherewithal to ſatisfy his creditors, he would do it with all his heart. Quantum verò attinet ad æs alienum tuum, ſi ejus diſſolvendi facultas in mea poteſtate eſſet poſita, non laborares. Et tamen, quamvis S. S. D. N. multis magniſque hoc tempore impenſis ſimul gravetur, non deero, tua merita atque neceſſitates commemorare, & juvare rem tuam familiarem, quantum potero (28). Laſtly, it is obſerved, that Pighius was grown poor by being engaged in ſeveral law-ſuits, the chief of which was, that which he proſecuted moſt vigorouſly againſt the Emperor, and againſt the Court of the Province *, who diſputed him the juriſdiction of his Provoſtſhip of St. John.

(e) Calvin, Bucer, &c.

* Of Utrecht.

When all his proceedings are narrowly looked into, one cannot forbear obſerving, that he was a very intriguing man, and a pretty great Faciendaire §α or Buſy-body. I make uſe of that old word, becauſe it ſeems very expreſſive to me; and I met with it in good Authors, who lived in the beginning of the 17th century (29). I wiſh it were ſtill in uſe, and I wonder it is not to be met with in Nicot, nor in Monet, nor in Furetiere: but they have been unacquainted with ſeveral other words as remarkable as that is.

(29) Monſieur Du Pleſſis Mornai uſes it ſometimes.

§α [That word comes from the Italian Facenda, buſineſs, whence Facendaro, a Negotiator, a man of buſineſs, or a buſy-body, which anſwers to the French Faciendaire. Hence it is, that though that word be wanting in Nicot, in Monet, and in Furetiere, yet we meet with the word Facende in Oudin, who is more modern than Nicot and Monet. We meet alſo with Facienda in the Spaniſh, French and Italian dictionary, printed in 4to at Geneva, 1671. Let us obſerve that the word Faciendaire is to be met with in Paſquier, l. 6. c. 12. of his Recherches. CRIT. REM.]

[G] Pighius was charged with Plagiariſm.] Calvin charges him with it. His name is not to be met with in the Catalogues of Plagiaries, which have been yet publiſhed. Pighius began his book concerning free-will, with the connexion there is between the knowledge of God, and the knowledge of man. He had obſerved that method in Calvin's inſtitution; he followed it without declaring from whom he had borrowed it. Calvin blames him for that proceeding, and does not know how to account for ſo great a familiarity. He could give no other reaſon for it but a right of preſcription, conſidering it was a long time ſince Pighius practiſed Plagiariſm. Miror quæ fronte auſus fuerit, nulla mei mentione facta, tam familiariter ſumere de meo libro, quod in ſuum tranſcriberet. Neque enim quo jure id faciat, video: niſi fortè præſcriptionem obtendat, quia ſic facere pridem ſolitus ſit. Nam in magno illo libro, quem adverſus noſtram confeſſionem edidit, integra ſæpe ex Inſtitutione mea paginas, ubi viſum eſt, infercit, ac ſuo commodo ſic adaptat, quaſi aliunde non ſumpſiſſet. Vellem nunc ſcire quo jure aut titulo mea ſic pro ſuis uſurpet. Si qua magna eſſet inter nos neceſſitudo, ego hanc confidentiam amicitiæ non difficulter concederem. Sed nunc huic veniæ non eſt locus. An quia hoſtis ſum, ſe jus direptionis in omnia mea habere putat? At hoc prædæ genus nullo, nec jure, nec more, defendi poteſt. Unus ergo prætextus reſtat, homini docto potuiſſe non minus venire in mentem quæ dixeram, quàm mihi prius venerant. Sed lectores obſecro, ſi tantum habeant otii, ut caput primum libri Pighiani cum primo Inſtitutionis meæ capite conferat. Nihil dico, niſi quod non ſine riſu ac ſtomacho perſpicient nimis perditam hominis impudentiam. Quòd ſi ulterius pergere libeat, percurrant quæ de Juſtificatione tractat in altero illo opere, & ad ſextum Inſtitutionis meæ caput exigant: mirum ſi bilem continere queant. Neque enim clanculum furatur aut carptim: neque artificio tegere ita ſtudet ſuas rapinas, ut apud ſe natum videatur, quod apud me legit, ſed ita palam mea ad verbum recitat, ut videatur paginas ipſas totas pigritiæ aſſuiſſe, quò deſcribendi laborem fugeret. Si fateretur authorem, eum dicerem mutuari: nunc quid cauſari poteſt, quo minus plagiarius palam vocetur, i. e. "I wonder "how he had the aſſurance to tranſcribe ſo familiar- "ly ſeveral things from my book into his own, "without ſo much as naming me. I do not ſee by "what right he could do it, unleſs it be by right of "preſcription, becauſe he has been long uſed to it. "For in that great book, which he has publiſhed a- "gainſt our Articles of Faith, he has often tranſ- "cribed whole pages from my Inſtitutions, and "adapted them to his purpoſe, as though he had not "taken them from another. Now I would fain "know

(30) Calvin, Reſponſ. contra Pighium de libero arbitrio p. 140. Opuſcul. Theolog.

(23) See the remark [A].

(24) Gisbertus Lappius à Waveren, apud Nihuſium, in Hypodigmate, p. 339, 340.

(25) Idem, ibid.

(26) See Cochlæus, in Actis Lutheri, ad ann. 1542, folio m. 322.

(27) Apud Nihuſium, in Hypodigmate, p. 340.

(28) Ibidem, p. 342, 343.

* See the tranſlation of this paſſage, above, quotat. (7).

(f) See Cochlæus, in Actis & Scriptis Lutheri, ad ann. 1542. ſubfin. folio m. 322.

and to uſe a certain diſorder which made the Readers loſe ſight of the chief difficulty; that in general, he could handle his ſubjects very methodically when he pleaſed. He was ſure to inſert in a Perface what his antagoniſts confeſſed with regard to his noble talents (f).

" knew, what right or title he has to uſe what is " mine as his own. If there were a great correſpon- " dence between us, I would not ſcruple to pardon " his freedom on the ſcore of friendſhip. But this " is not the caſe. Does he think he has a right to " plunder me becauſe I am an enemy? But ſuch a " kind of depredation cannot be juſtified neither by " law, nor by cuſtom. He has therefore but one " pretence left, which is to ſay, that being a learned " man, he may have had the ſame thoughts which I " had. But if the Readers have any time to ſpare, " let them compare the firſt chapter of Pighius's book, " with the firſt chapter of my Inſtitutions. I ſay no- " thing, but that they will not be able to behold the " man's bare-faced impudence without laughter and " indignation. If they have a mind to go a little far- " ther, let them look over what he wrote concern- " ing Juſtification in his other work, and compare it " with the ſixth chapter of my Inſtitutions; it will " be a wonder if they can reſtrain their paſſion. For " he does not ſteal ſecretly, and here and there a " paſſage; nor does he endeavour to conceal his " theft by ſome artifice, to make that appear his " own, what he read in my work; but he gave my " own expreſſions word for word, ſo that he ſeems " to have tacked whole pages of my book to his " own, out of lazineſs, to ſave himſelf the trouble " of tranſcribing them. If he had named his Au- " thor, I would ſay, that he only borrowed from " me; but what can he ſay for himſelf to hinder " me from ſtyling him publickly a Plagiary?" You ſee that he is charged here with ſtealing word for word whole pages from Calvin's Inſtitutions, and tacking them to his own work, without concealing or diſguiſing his plagiariſm. This is a ſurpriſing aſſurance; but in order to excuſe him, it is added, that he minded only to pleaſe thoſe, who never conſulted the writings of the other party, and who admitted all that was publiſhed againſt the Proteſtant ſect. Mirabitur quicunque leget, unde tantus homini ſtupor: qui nihil veritus ſit, in ipſo ſtatim veſtigio deprehendi. Ego verò dum omnia bene reputo, habeo quod pro hominis excuſatione dicam: eum ſecuritate magis quàm ſocordia id feciſſe. Satis enim habuit, ſi modo iis placeret, qui non minori religione à noſtris abſtinent, quàm facilitate omnia laudant ac mirantur, quæ nos quovis modo impugnant (31), i. e. " Whoever reads this, will " wonder at that man's ſtupidity, who did not fear to " be taken in the very fact. But for my part, having " duly conſidered the whole, I have ſomething to " ſay in his defenſe; namely, that he acted out of " ſecurity, rather than out of ſilline ſs: for it was " enough for him, if he could but pleaſe thoſe, " who do not more ſcrupulouſly abſtain from read- " ing what we publiſh, than they eaſily commend " and admire all that is written againſt us." Obſerve that Calvin does not acknowledge that his works communicated ſome ſhare of orthodoxy to Pighius, and that he ſtyles him a Pelagian. Hoc totum non modo Pelagii ſcholam tedolet, ſed mera eſt Pelagianæ impietatis magna ex parte profeſſio (32). . . . Quòd autem toties cum Pelagianis nihil ſe habere commune jactat, neſcio quos hic Pelagianos comminiſcatur. Neque enim tantùm cum iis, quos deſcribit Auguſtinus, multa habet ſimilia, ſed eorum quibuſdam multò eſt deterior. . . (33) Ergo, ut aliquando claudatur hic liber, fruſtra, aut ſe à Pelagio diſjungere conatur Pighius, cujus ſocietate eum teneri implicitum tam apertè demonſtravimus: aut nos Manichæo, aliiſque hæreticis adjungere, à quibus non minus diſſidemus, quàm ipſe ab orthodoxo Eccleſiæ ſenſu (34), i. e. " All this does not only ſavour of Pelagi- " us's ſchool, but is even for the greateſt part a plain " confeſſion of the Pelagian impiety. . . . As for his " boaſting ſo often that he admits nothing of the " Pelagian ſyſtem, I do not know what kind of Pe- " lagianiſm he pretends to forge. For he does not " only admit many things like thoſe whom St. Au- " guſtin deſcribes, but he is alſo worſe than them in " ſome reſpects. . . . . Therefore, to put at laſt an " end to this book, it is to no purpoſe, for Pighius, " both to endeavour to ſeparate himſelf from Pelagi- " us, with whom we have ſo plainly demonſtrated " that he is intimately united, and to labour, to join " us with the Manicheans, and other Hereticks, " from whom we differ no leſs, than he does from " the orthodox ſenſe of the church."

(30) Calvin, Reſponſ. contra Pighium de Libero Arbitrio, p. 140. Opuſcul. Theolog.

(32) Idem, ibid. p. 163, 164.

(33) Idem, ibid. p. 188. col. 1.

(34) Idem, ibid. p. 191. col. 1.

The Janſeniſt, from whom I have tranſcribed ſome words (35), ſtyles him alſo a Pelagian. He is a man, ſays he (36), who could not well underſtand the Doctrine of St. Auguſtin, nor that of the church concerning Grace and Free-will, ſince he was not thoroughly acquainted with the corruption of our nature, nor with original ſin, which is the key of that doctrine. A man who is really prepoſſeſſed with errors entirely Pelagian upon that ſubject, who ſpeaks againſt divine Predeſtination and againſt efficacious and gratuitous Grace, in a very indiſcreet and ignorant manner, not to ſay any thing worſe, though he knows it was St. Auguſtin's opinion; a man who takes the writings of a Semi-Pelagian, ſuch as Gennadius of Marſeilles was, for a rule of faith, and Pelagius's confeſſion of faith for a work of St. Auguſtin. Laſtly, having ſo much abuſed his doctrine, he does not ſpare his perſon, and would make him paſs for a Caviller: declinat, fugit, diſſimulat; aliquid quærit quod cavilletur; i. e. " He (St. Auguſtin) uſes ſhifts and evaſions; " he diſſembles; he would find ſomething to cavil at;" for a Writer who is dangerous with regard to the ſubject of free-will, and who refutes it wilfully: ſtudio iniquiſſimus libero arbitrio; aſcribing as little to it as he can, depriving it of all its ſtrength, and uſing diſſimulation and artifices, in order to weaken and depreciate it. The Janſeniſt Author concludes (37), " that we ought not " to wonder the whole Faculty of Louvain, in her fa- " mous cenſure paſt in the year 1587, ſhould . . . . . " ſtyle Pighius a favourer and fellow of the Semi-Pe- " lagians; that the Faculty of Douay, in her cen " ſure, ſhould place him among the Diſciples of " Fauſtus de Riez; that the learned Eſtius . . . ſhould " ſpeak of him almoſt after the ſame manner; that " the learned John Molanus ſhould ſay, that he was " blamed by the moſt eminent Divines, for renouncing St. " Auguſtin's doctrine, WHICH IS THAT OF THE " CHURCH, concerning Original Sin, Predeſtination, " and Grace of the Mediator, to which Aubertus Miræus " gives his conſent."

(35) In the text of this article.

(36) St. Auguſtin Juſtifié de Calviniſme, p. 182.

(37) Idem, ibid. p. 183.

PIN (JOHN DU) in Latin Pinus, Biſhop of Rieux in the 16th century, was of Thouloufe. He went into Italy to improve his mind, and ſtudied Eloquence and the Law at Bologna, and publiſhed ſome books there, which gained him a reputation. Thoſe he publiſhed ſince, confirmed and encreaſed his glory [A]. He applied himſelf to write

[A] He . . . publiſhed ſome books, which gained him a reputation. Thoſe, he publiſhed ſince, confirmed and encreaſed his glory.] He wrote the life of Father Philip (1) Beroaldus, and that of Catharine of Sienna. Theſe two works were printed at Bologna, in the year 1505. A Letter, and ſome Epigrams, which he wrote to the honour of Codrus Urſeus, were printed with this Codrus's works. He wrote alſo a treatiſe De vita aulica, of a Court-life; his book De claris fœminis, of illuſtrious women, was printed at Paris in the year 1521, in folio (2). His Life of Saint Roch was printed at Paris in 4to apud Joannem Parvum, for John Petit: He was then Senator Toloſanus & Orator Regius (3), Counſellor in the Parliament of Thouloufe, and the King's Attorney. The Allobrogicæ Narrationis Liber was printed at Venice in 4to, in the year 1516, and then at Paris, by Badius, the ſame year (4).

(1) And not Peter, as it is in Moreri.

(2) Ex Epitome Bibl. Geſneri, p. 485, vel ex Veſſio de Hiſt. Lat. p. 662.

(3) Du Verdier Vau-Privas, in Supplemento Epitomes Bibl. Geſneri, p. 53.

(4) Idem, ibid.

[B] He

write a polite ſtyle in Latin [B]. He was Counſellor in the Parliament of Thouloufe, and Embaſſador of France, I do not know where, but I believe it was in Italy. I would not expreſs my ſelf thus, and I would give a more particular account of him, if I had his books, or if the Authors who ſpeak of him, and whom I could conſult, had related ſome facts concerning the hiſtory of his life; but they know nothing of him: Catel, his contemporary was ſo little acquainted with him, that he has committed a notorious Anachroniſm, when he mentioned him [C]. I cannot tell at what time Du Pin was made Biſhop of Rieux, nor when he died: I know only that he was ſtill in poſſeſſion of that Biſhoprick in 1530, and that he did not live beyond the year 1538 [D].

[B] He applied himſelf to write a polite ſtyle in Latin.] Let us prove this by a paſſage from Eraſmus. Poſſet inter hujus laudis (Tullianæ dictionis) competitores numerari, (Joannes Pinus) niſi & hunc negotiorum tumultus & eccleſiaſtica dignitas à ſtudiis avulſiſſent. Olim certè præclarum ſui ſpecimen dedit, quùm Bononiæ Muſarum ſacra coleret. Nunc epiſcopum audio factum, quid acceſſerit eloquentiæ neſcio. Fieri poteſt ut plus acceſſerit eruditionis quàm dignitatis (5), i. e. "John Du Pin "might be reckoned among thoſe who endeavour- "ed to imitate Tully's ſtyle, had not the hurry of "buſineſs, and eccleſiaſtical preferments hindered him "from proſecuting his ſtudies: he had indeed given "formerly a noble inſtance of his ſkill that way, "when he ſtudied at Bologna. I hear that he is "now made a Biſhop; how far he is improved in "eloquence I cannot tell; he has perhaps acquired "more learning than honour."

(5) Eraſmus, in Ciceroniano, p. m. 74.

[C] Catel . . . . . has committed a notorious Anachroniſm when he mentioned him.] See in his Memoirs of the Hiſtory of Languedoc (6) the catalogue of the Biſhops of Rieux; you will find John Du Pin two degrees higher than Peter Lewis de Voltan, Biſhop of Rieux in 1515.

(6) In page 1035.

[D] He was ſtill in poſſeſſion of that Biſhoprick in 1530, and . . . . did not live beyond the year 1538.] The firſt of theſe particulars may be proved by a letter, which Sadolet wrote Pino Rivenſi Epiſcopo (to Du Pin, Biſhop of Rieux) the 1ſt of March 1530 (7); it contains a noble elogium of our Du Pin, to whom the Author ſent a copy of his firſt work, which was a Commentary on the 90th Pſalm. The ſecond particular is proved by Hubert Suſſanneau's verſes, in obitum Pini Rivorum Epiſc. cum interfuiſſet ejus funeri, "On the death of Du Pin, Biſhop of Rieux, after "having been at his funeral." They are in folio 41 verſo of the four books of that Author's Ludi, of the Paris edition, apud Simonem Colinæum 1538, in 8vo. We find there that this Prelate was buried at Toulouſe with great pomp.

(7) It is in the 4th book of Sadolet's Letters, p. 150. edit. Lugd. 1554, in 8vo.

☞ PIN (LOUIS ELLIES DU), a very learned French Writer in the 18th century, was ſon of Louis Ellies du Pin, deſcended of a noble family in Normandy, by Mary Vitart, of a family in Champagne (a). He was born at Paris June 17th, 1657, and being inſtructed in the firſt rudiments of grammar by his father and maſters, was entered at ten years of age in the College of Harcourt under Mr. Lair, Profeſſor there. Under this excellent Maſter he conceived ſuch a reliſh for learning, that he afterwards applied himſelf to it with indefatigable induſtry. In 1672, he was admitted Maſter of Arts. Being determined then to enter into the church, he ſtudied at the Sorbonne; and having paſſed through the uſual courſe of ſtudies, applied himſelf intirely to the reading of the Fathers and Eccleſiaſtical Writers. He had then no other view, than to employ himſelf in an advantageous manner, and to prepare himſelf for the Licentiateſhip in Divinity, which he was then too young to be admitted into. In 1680, he took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity, and on the 1ſt of July 1684, that of Doctor. He ſoon after undertook to publiſh an Univerſal Bibliotheque of all the Eccleſiaſtical Writers [A], containing the Hiſtory of their Lives, the Catalogue, Critique, and Chronology

(a) Du Pin, Nouvelle Bibl. des Auteurs Eccleſiaſt. Tom. 19. p. 176. edit. Amſt. 1715, in 4to. Europe Sçavante, Tom. 4 and 9. Nouv. Litter. Tom. 10.

[A] Soon after undertook to publiſh an Univerſal Bibliotheque of all the Eccleſiaſtical Writers.] The firſt Tome containing the Writers of the three firſt centuries, was printed at Paris 1686, in 8vo. The ſecond edition, which was but little different from the former, was printed at Paris 1688, in 8vo. The third edition was printed there in two Tomes, 8vo, 1698. In this edition the preliminary diſſertation upon the Bible, which was inſerted in the preceding editions, is retrenched, and there are added the ſucceſſion of the Biſhops of the great Sees, and the hiſtory of Perſecutions, Councils, and Hereſies, which contains the whole of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. The ſecond Tome, containing the Writers of the fourth century, was printed at Paris 1687, in 8vo, and the 2d edition 1689, in 8vo, in two volumes. The third edition, which is the moſt exact and complete, was printed at Paris 1702, in 8vo, in three Tomes. The firſt part of the third Tome, containing the Writers who flouriſhed in the beginning of the fifth century, was printed at Paris 1688, in 8vo, and the ſecond edition there in 1690, in two volumes in 8vo. The ſecond part of the third Tome, containing the Writers of the fifth century, from the year 430 to 500, was printed at Paris 1690, in 8vo, and the ſecond edition there in 1702, in two volumes in 8vo. The fourth Tome, containing the Writers of the ſixth century, was printed at Paris 1690, in 8vo, and afterwards re-printed with great alterations. The fifth Tome containing the Writers of the ſeventh and eighth centuries, with an Anſwer to the Remarks of Father Petitdidier, upon the firſt volume, was printed at Paris 1691, in 8vo, and afterwards re-printed with many additions. The Supplement, containing the principal points of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the fourth, fifth, ſixth, ſeventh, and eighth centuries, with a Chronological Table, was printed at Paris 1711, in 8vo. As our Author had treated in the preceding volumes only of the Lives and Writings of the Eccleſiaſtical Writers, and the Acts and Canons of Councils, he thought proper to publiſh a Supplement, in which, as likewiſe in the third edition of the 3 firſt centuries, we have the ſucceſſion of the Biſhops of the great Sees, the Hiſtory of Perſecutions, that of Hereſies, and Controverſies with regard to Doctrine, with a Chronological Table of the Hiſtory of thoſe ſeveral Centuries. The freedom which our Author uſed in this work in his judgments on the ſtyle, character, and doctrine of the Eccleſiaſtical Writers, having diſpleaſed ſome perſons, it was complained of to the Archbiſhop of Paris, who in 1693, publiſhed the following Decree or Ordonnance againſt it. "Fran- "cis, by the Grace of God, and of the Holy Apo- "ſtolic See, Archbiſhop of Paris, Duke and Peer of "France, Commander of the King's Orders, Provi- "ſor of the College of Sorbonne, and ſuperior of "that of Navarre; to all thoſe to whom theſe pre- "ſent letters ſhall come, health and benediction: "The firſt duty of the Prieſts and Doctors of the "church is to preſerve its doctrine, wherewith they "are intruſted, as they have received it from the "Apoſtles, whoſe ſucceſſors they are; and not to "ſuffer any perſon, who makes any alteration there- "in, to go unpuniſhed. And ſince tradition is the "chanel, which ought to convey to us, by an unin-logy of their works, a ſummary of what they contain, and judgment of their ſtyle and doctrine, and a Liſt of the ſeveral editions of their works. This was a vaſt deſign; but our Author's reſolution was not deterred; and he did not even confine himſelf to this work, though the execution of it ſeemed ſufficient to employ the lives of ſeveral perſons.

" terrupted courſe, the articles of the Catholic Faith " in their utmoſt purity; and ſince thoſe books, the " Authors whereof profeſs to repreſent it intire to us, " by carrying it up to the fountain-head, ſo that it " may be traced from age to age down to our own " times, ought to be ſtudied with the greateſt atten- " tion: we have thought ourſelves obliged to a more " particular examination of a book printed ſome " years ago in this city, intitled, A new Bibliotheque " of Eccleſiaſtical Authors, &c. whereof five Tomes, " divided into ſeven volumes, have been ſucceſſively " publiſhed. The deſign of this work is to treat of " all the Eccleſiaſtical Authors, who have lived ſince " the firſt beginning of the church, to give an ac- " count of their writings, and to acquaint the world " with their characters and worth; which the Au- " thor pretends to have executed for the firſt eight " centuries, in the volumes which he has already " publiſhed, intending to carry it on to our times in " thoſe which are to follow. And we have believed " ourſelves the more engaged to enter upon the exa- " mination of this book, becauſe we have heard, " that ſeveral perſons have found conſiderable faults " in theſe firſt Tomes. Therefore, that we might do " nothing in this matter without mature delibera- " tion and perfect knowledge, we have ordered this " work to be read by four Doctors of Divinity of the " Faculty of Paris, who having each of them in par- " ticular read all the Tomes, and having conferred " long together, have given us an exact report in ſe- " veral meetings. We have alſo examined this book " ourſelves with all poſſible attention, and we find; " that it is ſo far from being a work uſeful to the " church, that on the contrary, it would be very pre- " judicial to it, if it were ſuffered to be diſperſed. " We were alſo very willing to hear what defenſe " the Author could make, that we might know his " opinions and preſent diſpoſition. For which rea- " ſon we gave him the moſt favourable hearing that " we could in ſeveral meetings, in the preſence of " the aforeſaid Doctors; and ſince we have found in " him an intire ſubmiſſion to whatſoever we ſhould " enjoin, he having put into our hands a writing " ſigned by himſelf, and annexed to theſe preſents, " wherein upon twelve heads, which we thought " were the moſt liable to exception in his book, he " does in particular retract a great many propoſitions, " which he had advanced; and in general declares, " that he ſubmits himſelf without reſtriction or re- " ſerve to our judgment; and that this abſolute ac- " quieſcence (without which we ſhould not have be- " lieved his paper ſufficient, there being very many " propoſitions in his book, which deſerve condem- " nation, not touched upon in this writing) puts his " religion out of queſtion, we having nothing to " do but to give ſentence againſt the Doctrine of his " book. We could have wiſhed, indeed, to have " found this work capable of a limited correction; " and ſo have contented ourſelves with taking notice " to the Author of ſome alterations, which we ſhould " have obliged him to have made, and have ſaved " the reſt, without coming to a greater condemnati- " on, and an intire ſuppreſſion. But the evil being " diffuſed almoſt every where throughout the work, " we could not diſpenſe with condemning this book, " and forbidding all thoſe, whom God has been " pleaſed to put under our care, to read it, that the " miſchief, which it otherwiſe might poſſibly cauſe " amongſt the people, if its courſe were not ſtopped, " may be prevented, that the church may receive no " farther ſcandal, and that the Hereticks may take " no advantage from it againſt the Catholicks. For " theſe reaſons, having implored the aſſiſtance of the " Holy Ghoſt to guard and to direct us, we have " condemned, and do condemn the book intitled, " A New Bibliotheque, &c. By Monſieur Ellies du " Pin, Doctor of the Faculty of Paris. Printed by An- " drew Pralard, at the Occaſion in St. James's Street, " in Paris, as containing ſeveral propoſitions, that " are falſe, raſh, ſcandalous, capable of offending " pious ears, tending to weaken the arguments, " which are brought from tradition, to prove the " authority of the canonical books of holy ſcripture, " and of ſeveral other articles of faith, injurious to " General Councils, to the holy Apoſtolic See, and " to the Fathers of the Church, erroneous, and lead- " ing to Hereſy; forbidding, under the ſevereſt pe- " nalties, all perſons in our Dioceſe, of both ſexes, " to read this book, or cauſe it to be read, or to ad- " viſe the reading of it to any perſon whatever, or " to keep it in their houſes, or any where elſe; " commanding them, under the ſame penalties, to " return it into our hands as ſoon as poſſibly they " can. And we alſo command the Officers of our Ec- " cleſiaſtical Court to aſſiſt in the execution of this " preſent decree, to fix it up on the doors of the " churches of this city and of the ſuburbs thereof, " and wherever elſe there ſhall be occaſion; and al- " ſo to deſire, if need be, the aſſiſtance of the Magi- " ſtrates, whoſe zeal and piety we have upon ſo ma- " ny other occaſions had experience of, thereby to " hinder, by all due and reaſonable ways, the print- " ing, ſale, and diſperſing of the aforeſaid book. " Given at Paris in our Archiepiſcopal Palace, the " 16th day of April, MDCXCIII. Signed,

" Francis, Archbiſhop of Paris.

" Underneath,

" Monſeigneur Wilbault."

To this decree was annexed Monſieur du Pin's Retractation. Theſe pieces were tranſlated into Engliſh, and printed at London 1703, in folio, under this title: The Decree or Ordonnance of the Archbiſhop of Paris; wherein he condemns Monſieur du Pin's Bibliotheca of Eccleſiaſtical Authors. To which is annexed, M. du Pin's Retractation of the ſaid Bibliotheca. Printed in French at Paris, by order of the Archbiſhop. Done into Engliſh by William Wotton, B. D. with his Preface and References. In the preface Mr. Wotton obſerves, that in Monſieur du Pin's Retractation, dread of farther miſchief ſeems to be far more viſible in almoſt every article, than real conviction ariſing from an inward ſenſe of the Author's having been in an error; at leaſt; that it is written in ſuch manner, as may very juſtly make one think ſo. Notwithſtanding this ſubmiſſion of our Author to the Archbiſhop's judgment, his work was ſuppreſſed by an Arret of the Parliament. However he reſolved to continue his Bibliotheque, and ſoon after obtained a permiſſion for it, being obliged only to change the title, and ſomething of the method of it, by inſerting alſo the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. The Hiſtory of the Controverſies and Affairs Eccleſiaſtical in the ninth century, was printed at Paris 1694, in 8vo, and re-printed there 1698, in 8vo. The Hiſtory of the Controverſies, &c. of the tenth century, was printed at Paris 1696, in 8vo: that of the eleventh century at Paris 1696, in 8vo. in two volumes: that of the twelfth century at Paris 1696, in 8vo. in two volumes: that of the thirteenth century at Paris 1698, in 8vo. that of the fourteenth century at Paris 1698, in 8vo. and that of the fifteenth century at Paris 1698, two volumes in 8vo. There is ſubjoined to the ſecond volume a curious Diſſertation upon the Author of the book De Imitatione Chriſti. The Hiſtory of the Church and Writers of the ſixteenth century was printed at Paris 1701, 1703, in five volumes in 8vo. The 3 firſt volumes treat of the Church Hiſtory, and the two laſt of others of the Writers. The Bibliotheque of the Eccleſiaſtical Writers of the ſeventeenth century was printed at Paris 1708, in ſeven volumes in 8vo. Our Author in theſe volumes reſumed his former title, but omitted his name. The Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the eighteenth century was printed at Paris 1714, in four volumes in 8vo. The Bibliotheque of the Eccleſiaſtical Writers of the eighteenth century from the year 1700 to 1710 perſons. The different books, which he wrote [B], ſhew his prodigious readineſs in compoſing, and his uncommon application to ſtudy. But this will appear ſtill more extraordinary, when we conſider, that he was engaged in a great variety of incidental affairs;

1710 was printed at Paris 1711 in two volumes in 8vo. The preliminary diſcourſe upon the Old and New Teſtament was printed at Paris 1699 in three volumes in 8vo. Our Author had only given a ſhort eſſay of this work in the firſt edition of the firſt tome of his Bibliotheque, from which he afterwards ſeparated it, and enlarged it ſo as to make three volumes. Monſieur Baſnage de Bauval in his Hiſtoire des Ouvrages Sçavans * tells us, that in this work "we ſhall find all "the queſtions, which can be formed upon the ſubject, "treated with great order and method, and with that "good ſenſe and candour conſpicuous in all the writ-"ings of Monſieur du Pin." The univerſal Table of the Eccleſiaſtical Writers was printed at Paris 1704 in five volumes in 8vo. This is the moſt defective of all our Author's works. There are groſs errors to be met with in every page, and omiſſions without number. However, it is a rough draught of a work, which would be of great uſe, if it were perfected. All theſe volumes, which compoſe the Bibliotheque of Eccleſiaſtical Writers, are in number 47 in 8vo. They were reprinted at Amſterdam in 19 volumes in 4to. But as moſt of thoſe volumes were printed from the firſt editions, that edition is imperfect. This work was begun to be tranſlated into Latin, and the three firſt volumes printed at Amſterdam; but no farther progreſs was made. Monſieur du Pin was engaged at his death in a Latin tranſlation, to which he intended to make conſiderable additions. This Bibliotheque was likewiſe tranſlated into Engliſh, and printed at London in ſeveral volumes in folio. This work of our Author was attacked by Monſieur Simon in a book printed at Paris 1730 in four volumes in 8vo. under the following title; Critique de la Bibliotheque des Auteurs Eccleſiaſtiques & de Prolegomenes de la Bible publiez per M. Elies du Pin. Avec des Eclairciſſemens & des Supplemens aux Endroits, où on les à juge neceſſaires, par feu M. Richard Simon, avec des Remarques. Monſieur Simon undertook this criticiſm at the deſire of a friend, who having applied himſelf to the reading of Monſieur du Pin's Bibliotheque, requeſted Monſieur Simon to make ſome obſervations upon the laſt edition of it, which was reckoned to be the moſt correct. Monſieur Simon was eager to peruſe it; but at the opening only of the firſt volume, ſo many miſtakes occurred, that he thought it neceſſary for the publick good to undertake the correcting it. For however great Monſieur du Pin's capacity was, the vaſt compaſs of the work made it impracticable for him to read the originals; ſo that he was obliged to have recourſe to other Bibliothecarians, and to copy what they had written. This made him often fall into groſs errors, and likewiſe occaſioned his omitting the moſt material and uſeful things in thoſe Authors, whom he analyſes. To this we may alſo aſcribe his abſolute ſilence as to ſome Authors, his aſcribing works to others, which they never wrote, his omitting a great part of the works of many, &c. Monſieur Simon ſupplies theſe defects; and where he is not ſo exact as could be wiſhed, the Remarks of an anonymous Author at the end of each volume make up the defect. To give ſome inſtances of the want of accuracy in Monſieur du Pin; he frequently miſtakes widely in geography, taking the Euxine See for a country; confounding Mortaigne in Picardy with Mauritania; Fleſſinghen in Zeland with Friſinghen's in Bavaria, &c. But ſuch errors had been pardonable in him, if he had been exact in more material points; but on the contrary, in his analyſis of Authors, he ſhews that he did not underſtand them. For inſtance, in his analyſis of St. Jerom's 52d Letter, he makes him ſay, that he had written Commentaries upon the Book of Kings, which he never did, nor does he here ſay he had done. St. Jerome's words are theſe: Miſeram quædum τῶν ὑπομνημάτων in Prophetas duodecim ſancto Patri Domnioni, Samuelem quoque & Malachim, id eſt, quatuor Libros Regum. Whoever underſtands Latin, may ſee plainly, that he does not here ſpeak of Commentaries upon the books of the Kings, but only upon the twelve Prophets. Nor are the miſtakes leſs conſiderable, which Monſieur du Pin is guilty of in his account of the different editions and beſt impreſſions of the eccleſiaſtical Writers. For inſtance, ſpeaking of Origen againſt Celſus, he ſays, that treatiſe was printed at Rome in 1471 in Greek, with the tranſlation of Gelenius, and the notes of Hoeſchelius and Chriſtopher Perſona; whereas Gelenius lived in the 16th Century, and the tranſlation did not appear before 1605. Pope Nicholas V. the Mecænas of his time, having got a copy of that treatiſe of Origen in Greek from Conſtantinople in 1447, promiſed a great reward to any perſon, who ſhould tranſlate it into Latin. Upon this offer, a certain Grecian named Gaza undertook it; but the Pope dying before it was finiſhed, and with him the hopes of the reward, Gaza gave over the work. After this, Chriſtopher Perſona, a Roman, applied himſelf to tranſlate this treatiſe, and publiſhed it, in Latin only, at Rome in 1471. There was no other tranſlation of it till Hoeſchelius publiſhed it in 1605, from other Greek copies found in Germany, together with the Latin tranſlation of Gelenius. This account is very different from Monſieur du Pin's. But theſe miſtakes are nothing, when compared with his error in relating Epiphanius's opinion about the origin of the word Apocrypha. To underſtand this, it muſt be obſerved, that the Jews had, in the Eaſt end of every Synagogue, a kind of preſs, which in Hebrew is called Aron, in memory of the ark of the Teſtament, which was in the Temple. In this Aron they put thoſe books only, which they owned for divine and canonical; ſo that in the Hebrew phraſe, a canonical book, and a book kept in the Aron, are the ſame thing. Epiphanius therefore ſpeaking of the books of Wiſdom and Eccleſiaſticus, ſays, they were not in the claſs of canonical books among the Jews, not having been put into the Aron or Ark. Tertullian uſes the ſame way of ſpeaking, when he ſays, that ſome did not receive the book of Enoch, quia nec in Judaicum Armarium admittitur. Now to diſcover Monſieur du Pin's miſtake, we need only repeat his words: "St. Epiphanius, ſays he, ſeems to have an "opinion a little ſingular concerning the origin of the "term Apocrypha, when he ſays, that the books of "Wiſdom and Eccleſiaſticus are not among the number "of the ſacred books, becauſe they were put in the "Aron, that is to ſay, in the Ark of the Teſtament." If Epiphanius had ſaid what Monſieur du Pin puts into his mouth, his opinion had indeed been more than a little ſingular. In the ſame place Monſieur du Pin acquaints his readers, that ſome have been of opinion, that the Apocryphal books were called ſo, ἀπὸ τῆς κρυπτῆς, becauſe, ſays he, they were extra Cryptam. He ought at leaſt to have named the Author of ſo peculiar an opinion. Any one, who had the leaſt knowledge of Greek, would have tranſlated ἀπὸ τῆς κρυπτῆς, à cryptâ. And indeed the books, which were not canonical, were kept hidden, and for that reaſon were called by the Greeks ἀπόκρυφοι, and by the Hebrews Guenouzim; and the canonical books, as being in every one's hands, were called φανεροὶ. The two laſt volumes of Monſieur Simon's work contain a criticiſm upon the Prolegomena or Preliminary diſcourſes upon the ſacred Writers, publiſhed by Monſieur du Pin.

* For the year 1701.

[B] The . . . . . books which he wrote.] Beſides his Bibliotheque mentioned in the preceding remark, he wrote the following works. I. De antiquâ Eccleſiæ Diſciplinâ Diſſertationes hiſtoricæ. Paris 1686 in 4to. Coloniæ Agrippinæ (i. e. Amſterdam) 1691 in 4to. If the reader wants to be informed of the real ſentiments of the Author with regard to Church-power, he muſt procure thoſe paſſages, which were retrenched, and are to be found at the beginning of ſome copies of this work. II. Liber Pſalmorum cum Notis, quibus eorum ſenſus literalis exponitur. Paris 1691 in 8vo. Theſe notes are ſhort and clear, and remove almoſt all the difficulties, which the reader can meet with in underſtanding the text. This is the judgment given of this work in the Journal des Sçavans. III. Le Livre des Pſeaumes traduit ſelon l'Hébreu, avec des courts notes. Paris 1691 in 12mo. reprinted there in 1710 in 12mo. This is a tranſlation of his Latin Notes on the Pſalms. V. La juſte Défenſe du Sieur du affairs; that he was Commiſſary in moſt of the affairs of the faculty; he then being appointed Profeſſor of Divinity in the Royal College, he was employed in his Lectures, as well as in the Journal des Sçavans, in which he had a ſhare for many years, that he furniſhed

Pin, pour ſervir de Réponſe à un Libelle anonyme publié depuis peu contre les Pſeaumes qu'il à donnes au public. Cologne 1693 in 12mo. V. S. Optati Afri Milevitani Epiſcopi de Schiſmate Donatiſtarum Libri ſeptem ad MSS. Codices & veteres Editiones collati. Quibus acceſſere Hiſtoria Donatiſtarum, unà cum Monumentis veteribus ad eam rem ſpectantibus, necnon Geographiâ Epiſcopalis Africæ. Paris 1700 in folio. VI. Notæ in Pentateuchum. Paris 1710 in two volumes 8vo. Theſe are notes on the Pentateuch, like thoſe, which he wrote on the Pſalms. VII. Défenſe de la Cenſure de la Faculté de Theologie de Paris contre les Mémoires de la Chine. Paris 1701 in 8vo. This is a defenſe of the cenſure of the Sorbonne againſt Father le Comte's Mémoires de la Chine. VIII. De la Neceſſité de la Foy en Jeſus Chriſt, pour être ſauvé, ou l'on examine ſi les Payens ou les Philoſophes, qui ont eu la connoiſſance d'un Dieu, & qui ont moralement bien vecu, ont pû être ſauvés ſans avoir la Foy en Jeſus Chriſt. Paris 1701 in two volumes in 8vo. This treatiſe was written by Monſieur Arnaud, and our Author only wrote the Preface, and made conſiderable additions to it. IX. Dialogues poſthumes du Sieur de la Bruyere ſur le Quietiſme. Paris 1699 in 12mo. Monſieur de la Bruyere wrote only ſeven of theſe dialogues, to which Monſieur du Pin added two others in order to complete the Author's deſign. The Author of the Journal des Sçavans obſerves, that theſe dialogues are full of wit and pleaſantry, and at the ſame time contains the principles and maxims of Chriſtian Morality treated with great force and eloquence. The characters of the perſons in the dialogues are well drawn and ſuſtained. The two laſt dialogues, which are written by Monſieur du Pin, are not inferior to the former in agreeableneſs and politeneſs of ſtyle. X. Traité de la Doctrine Chretienne & Orthodoxe. Paris 1703 in 8vo. This volume, which is the firſt of a Body of Divinity in French that he deſigned to publiſh, tho' he did not execute it, contains the Prolegomena of Divinity. The method propoſed by him, was to divide his work into five parts. The firſt was to treat of the Doctrines; the ſecond of the Sacraments; the third of Diſcipline; the fourth of Ceremonies; and the fifth of Morals. This diſpoſition, though a new one, is not immethodical. He was engaged in this work at his death; and hoped to finiſh his courſe with it. XI. Joannis Gerſonii Doctoris & Cancellarii Pariſienſis Opera, quibus præfixa ſunt Gerſoniana & adjuncta aliorum hujus temporis ſcriptorum Opera ac Monumenta omnia ad negotium Joannis Parvi ſpectantia. Amſterdam 1703 in five volumes in folio. Monſieur du Pin omitted nothing to render this edition complete; but he owns, that he could have wiſhed for the ſake of the correctneſs of it, that it had been printed under his inſpection. XII. L'Hiſtoire d'Apollone de Tyane convaincue de fauſſeté & d'impoſture. Paris 1705 in 12mo. Our Author publiſhed this under the name of Monſieur de Claireval. XIII. Traité de la puiſſance Eccleſiaſtique & temporelle. Paris 1707 in 8vo. This is a large Commentary upon the four propoſitions of the declaration of the aſſembly of the Clergy in 1682. XIV. Bibliotheque Univerſelle des Hiſtoriens. Paris 1707 in two volumes in 8vo. Amſterdam 1708 in 4to. Our Author in this work follows the ſame method with that of his Bibliotheque of Eccleſiaſtical Works; but he did not proceed far in it. It was tranſlated into Engliſh, and printed at London 1709 in two volumes in 8vo. under the following title; The univerſal Library of Hiſtorians, viz. The Oriental, Greek, Latin, French, German, Spaniſh, Italian, Engliſh, and others. Containing an account of their Lives; the Abridgment, Chronology, and Geography of their Hiſtories; with critical Obſervations on their Style and Character; and a Catalogue of the ſeveral Editions of their Works. Alſo Chronological and Geographical Tables. Written in French by Lewis Ellies du Pin, Author of the Eccleſiaſtical Bibliotheque, now Abbot of Claraval. Done into Engliſh from the Paris Edition. The Author in his Advertiſement to the Reader obſerves, that this work not only repreſents the lives of the Hiſtorians, and the catalogue of their works, but enters alſo into the detail of the hiſtories themſelves, and is indeed an abridgment of them; ſo that the reader may ſee here in little, not only the general Hiſtory, but likewiſe the particular and different relations of Hiſtorians, which has not hitherto been done. "Suidas, ſays he, ſpeaks of the Hiſtorians "and their works in his Dictionary. Voſſius after- "wards collected, with his uſual exactneſs, the names, "lives, and titles, of the writings of the Greek and "Latin Hiſtorians. But no Bibliotheque Writer has "yet attempted to make an abridgment of hiſtories; "though it is the moſt important, moſt uſeful, and "moſt agreeable part of a Bibliotheque, and the moſt "eſſential duty of a Bibliotheque Writer. It is not "enough for him to place the books in good order, "to exhibit the titles, to inform us who the Authors "were, and when and how they lived; but he ought "alſo to open them, to acquaint us what is contained "in them, to point out the fineſt paſſages, and the "advantages, which may be drawn from them, ei- "ther for the arts and ſciences, or for civil and po- "litical life. This is what has been chiefly endea- "voured in this Bibliotheque to be added to what Voſſius "and other Bibliotheque Writers have ſaid concerning "the Greek and Latin Hiſtorians. And we ſhall, "after the ſame manner, continue to treat of the "antient and modern Hiſtorians of other nations. "By this means, the Reader, in this work, will learn "the hiſtory of the world, as well as that of the "Authors. We cannot know the former but from "the report of the Hiſtorians; and all the conſide- "rable Hiſtorians extant will be abridged in this "work. This method of learning hiſtory will be "ſo much the more uſeful and certain, as the reader "will go to the ſources, and ſee the different manner, "in which the ſame events are related by different "Authors. He may in ſhort place them all in their "true epocha's and countries, where and when they "happened, by help of the chronological and geo- "graphical tables at the end of each volume." XV. Lettre ſur l'ancienne Diſcipline de l'Egliſe touchant la Célébration de la Meſſe. Paris 1708 in 12mo. XVI. Hiſtoire des Juifs depuis Jeſus Chriſt juſqu' à preſent, contenant les Dogmes des Juifs, leurs Confeſſions de Foy, leurs Variations, & l'Hiſtoire de leur Religion, depuis la ruine du Temple; pour ſervir de ſupplement & de continuation à l'Hiſtoire de Joſeph. Paris 1710 in 7 vols in 12mo. This hiſtory is that of Monſieur Baſnage, in which Monſieur du Pin made ſeveral alterations. As he ſuppreſſed the Author's name, Monſieur Baſnage complained of the injury done to him in a book, entitled, Hiſtoire des Juifs reclaimée & rétablie par ſon veritable Auteur M. Baſnage, contre l'Edition anonyme & tronquée, qui s'en eſt faite à Paris. Rotterdam 1711 in 8vo. He aſſures us likewiſe, that a great many errors were continued in the Paris edition, which had been corrected in the Errata of the Holland edition; that there were contradictions in the Paris edition by making alterations in one place, and by ſuffering in another place things repeated in both; and that every thing was retrenched, which was of any advantage to the Proteſtants, or which ſhewed the faults and defects of any of the Kings of France and Spain. XVII. Diſſertationes hiſtoriques, chronologiques, & critiques ſur la Bible, Tome I. Paris 1711 in 8vo. Theſe diſſertations relate only to the book of Geneſis, and were not continued. XVIII. L'Hiſtoire de l'Egliſe en abregé par demandes & par réponſes, depuis le commencement du Monde juſqu' à preſent. Paris 1712 in four tomes in 4to. It was reprinted at Paris 1714 in four tomes in 12mo. The Writers of the Journal de Trevoux ſpeak of this work in ſtrong terms of commendation. The Author, ſay they, who is an indefatigable writer, and of ſurprizing facility in compoſing, is maſter of his ſubject. His deſign is to be conciſe, and he is ſo without being obſcure, and without omitting any conſiderable fact. Another commendation due to him is, that he is not at all biaſſed by prejudice or paſſion. He furniſhed ſome with memoirs, others with advices, and wrote Prefaces to many books; and that notwithſtanding all this, he found opportunity to relax himſelf with his friends one part of the day, and never refuſed the viſits of any perſon, being as courteous and affable in converſation, as unwearied in his ſtudies. However, his frankneſs of temper, as well as the nature of ſome of his writings, raiſed him a great number of enemies, who did not fail to take advantage of the opportunity, which the caſe of conſcience ſupplied them with, to bring him into trouble. Monſieur du Pin [C], who had ſigned it, was baniſhed to Chatelleraut, and deprived of his profeſſorſhip. A perſon uſed, as he was, to live at Paris in the midſt of men of letters, and only employed in his ſtudies, could not without great regret continue in the country at a diſtance from all converſation, and cut off even from the pleaſure of ſtudy. In order to procure leave to return, he began with retracting his ſubſcription, and then engaged ſeveral perſons of conſideration to intereſt themſelves in his affair; and at laſt diſowned a great many propoſitions, which he had advanced in ſome of his writings. By this means he obtained leave to return;

He acts the part of an Hiſtorian; he relates, and that is all. There is great judgment neceſſary to ſupport that character. We ſee him ſometimes at the brink of a precipice, but he knows how to ſtop: we perceive very well on what ſide his heart is; but in this work at leaſt his heart is not maſter of his pen. The ſtyle is not intirely correct, nor very much laboured; but it is clear and flowing, and that is ſufficient. A Carmelite, who aſſumed the name of Salvaggio Canturani, tranſlated this Hiſtory into Italian, and his tranſlation was printed at Venice 1716 in four volumes in 12mo. The Author of the Journal of Venice ſpeaking of this tranſlation in his 27th Tome, ſays that there are different opinions concerning the Author of the French original; but that it is of no conſequence to ſtay and examine that point. This is a piece of Fineſſe in that Journaliſt, who knew that the name of Monſieur du Pin was not well reliſhed in Italy. XIX. L'Hiſtoire profane depuis ſon Commencement juſqu' à preſent. Paris ſix volumes in 12mo. the two firſt in 1714, and the four others in 1716. Reprinted at Antwerp 1717 in ſix volumes in 12mo. This laſt edition is full of errors; and the proper names are almoſt every where diſguiſed. XX. Analyſe de l'Apocalypſe, contenant une nouvelle explication ſimple & litterale de ce Livre, avec des Diſſertations ſur les Millenaires, &c. Paris 1714, two tomes in 12mo. XXI. Traité hiſtorique des Excommunications, dans lequel on expoſe l'ancienne & nouvelle diſcipline de l'Egliſe au ſujet des Excommunications & des autres cenſures. Paris 1715 in 12mo. XXII. Méthode pour etudier la Theologie, avec une Table des principales Queſtions, à examiner & à diſcuter dans les Etudes Theologiques, & les principaux Ouvrages ſur chaque Matiere. Paris 1716 in 12mo. XXIII. Dénonciation à M. le Procureur Général d'un Libelle injurieux aux Eveques, à S. A. R. Monſeigneur le Duc d'Orleans, intitulé Mémoire pour le Corps des Evêques, qui ont reçû la Conſtitution Unigenitus, in 12mo. XXIV. Défenſe de la Monarchie de Sicile contre les entrepriſes de la Cour de Rome, avec une relation veritable des precedez des deux Cours de Rome & de Sicile ſur les Conteſtations au ſujet du Tribunal de la Monarchie. Amſterdam [Lyons] 1716 in 8vo. Amſterdam 1716 in 12mo. XXV. Traité Philoſophique & Théologique ſur l'Amour de Dieu, dans lequel on établit & on explique les Veritez Catholiques, contre les Erreurs de quelques nouveaux Théologiens. Paris 1717 in 12mo. XXVI. Continuation du Traité de l'Amour de Dieu, contenant une Réponſe à un libelle injurieux, calomnieux, & ſeditieux, intitulé, Dénonciation du Traité Philoſophique, &c. Paris 1717 in 8vo. XXVII. Bibliotheque des Auteurs ſeparez de la Communion Romaine du XVI. & XVII. Siecle. Paris 1718 in 8vo. two Tomes in four volumes. In the Europe Sçavante, Tome VII. p. 35. we have the following character of this book. "This work has no occaſion for any other commendation or cenſure than the name of Monſieur du Pin. There is ſtill the ſame rapidity in compoſing, the ſame haſtineſs in the ſtyle, the ſame moderation in the ſentiments, the ſame ſagacity in the judgments, the ſame precipitation in the enquiries, the ſame inaccuracy in the facts; in ſhort it is the ſame M. du Pin ſtill. He has omitted Authors more conſiderable than thoſe mentioned by him. The lives, which he gives, are too ſhort; two dates complete the whole affair; and amongſt thoſe, which are more ample, the facts are not ſufficiently ſtated, or they are related without any order. The Author has not even beſtowed the time or attention neceſſary to diſcuſs the facts: the chronological table is frequently inconſiſtent with the work itſelf. The catalogues of the books are not at all more perfect. To conclude, the extracts of the books are made with judgment, and contain only what is conſiderable or remarkable in them." Monſieur du Pin being ſhocked at the liberty, which had been taken in this Journal in paſſing the above-mentioned judgment upon his work, added to his firſt volume a very ſmart anſwer, to which the Authors of the Journal replied with great vivacity, though with ſomewhat more moderation in, Tome VII.

Beſides theſe works, Monſieur du Pin was employed in the later editions of Moreri's Dictionary, in which he made conſiderable additions and corrections. And he reviſed the tranſlation of Petavius's Rationarium Temporum, printed at Paris in 1715. and Monſieur le Cointe's Hiſtory of Lewis XIII.

[C] Monſieur du Pin . . . . . had ſigned the Caſe of Conſcience.] The affair of this Caſe of Conſcience was as follows (1). A Confeſſor in the country propoſed to the Doctors of Sorbonne a Caſe of Conſcience with relation to an Eccleſiaſtic, who was under his care. This Confeſſor had for ſeveral years heard the confeſſions of this Eccleſiaſtic, and given him abſolution without ſcruple concerning his doctrine and ſentiments, believing him to be a Man of God. At laſt ſome ſcruples aroſe in his mind, becauſe other Eccleſiaſtics told him, that his penitent entertained new and ſingular opinions. The Confeſſor not being willing, however, to condemn the perſon accuſed without hearing him, deſired to have ſome converſation with him out of the confeſſional. This was agreed to, and the Eccleſiaſtic opened his ſentiments to him; but the Confeſſor not thinking, that he had lights ſufficient to determine upon the novelty and ſingularity of theſe opinions, or to judge certainly whether they were thoſe condemned by the Church, addreſſed himſelf to theſe Doctors, in order to have their judgment upon the ſuſpicions, which were formed againſt this Eccleſiaſtic, and the anſwers, which he made in his juſtification. I. Concerning the five propoſitions of Janſenius condemned by the Popes Innocent X. and Alexander VII. he declared, that he condemned them, and always had condemned them ſimply and without reſtriction in all the ſenſes, in which the Church had condemned them, and even in the ſenſe of Janſenius, in the manner in which Innocent XII. had explained them in his brief to the Biſhops of the Low Countries. He had ſigned the Formulary, when it was required of him, and had a certificate of it. With reſpect to the caſe of Janſenius, as according to an Ordonnance of Monſieur de Perefixe, one muſt be either ignorant or malicious to pretend, that the Church requires the ſame belief of the fact as of the Right; the Eccleſiaſtic anſwered, that he did not pay the ſame regard to that deciſion as he did to the deciſion of the right, in the condemnation of the propoſitions; but that he believed, that it was ſufficient to ſhew a ſubmiſſion of reſpect and ſilence to what the Church had determined about the fact; and that as long as he could not be judicially convicted of having maintained any of the propoſitions condemned, he ought not to be diſturbed, nor have his faith ſuſpected; ſince Innocent XII. had forbid this by return; but his profeſſorſhip was not reſtored to him. After he came back to Paris, his pen became more copious in its productions than before; he purſued all the ſeveral kinds of Literature; he was at the ſame time a Divine, Canoniſt, Hiſtorian, with regard to both ſacred and profane hiſtory, a Critic, and even a Philoſopher; and all this with the ſame eaſe, though ſometimes at the expence of his reputation; however his works had always a quick and large ſale: but the facility, with which he wrote, being ſuſpected by many perſons, it was frequently diſcovered, that either his accuracy was by no means equal to his diligence, or his diſquiſitions too ſuperficial to render ſome of his latter works of any uſe but to beginners. However, it muſt be acknowledged, that he was a man of excellent taſte, great freedom from ordinary prejudices, of a clear, exact, and methodical head, of infinite reading, a lively but regular imagination, an eaſy and noble ſtyle, and equitable and moderate temper, exempt from the violence of a party-ſpirit, and proper to form a plan for a reunion in religion. He correſponded with learned men of different communions; and Dr. Wake, the late Archbiſhop of Canterbury, wrote to him ſeveral letters, in which he expreſſed his regard for our Author's moderation, learning, and judgment. The Czar of Muſcovy, while he reſided at Paris, conſulted him upon ſome projects of a reunion. He had a great ſhare in oppoſing of the conſtitution Unigenitus: he was the ſoul and inſtrument of all that was done in the Sorbonne againſt by a brief, which the Clergy of France had juſt authorized in their laſt aſſembly. II. Concerning Predeſtination and Grace, he anſwered, that he was perſuaded, that the one is gratuitous and antecedent to all foreſight of merit, and that the other is efficacious of itſelf and neceſſary to every good work; becauſe having ſtudied divinity, he was convinced, that theſe are the ſentiments of St. Auguſtin, whoſe Doctrine the Popes and Church of Rome direct to be followed, and whoſe ſentiments they ſtyle tutiſſima & inconcuſſa Dogmata. He owned however, that there are inward Graces, which give a real poſſibility of fulfilling the Commandments of God, but have not their full effect through the reſiſtance of the will. III. He declared, that he believed, that we are obliged to love God above all things and in all things, as our ultimate end; and that, as St. Thomas Aquinas expreſſes it, we are obliged to refer all things virtually to him. Whence he infers, that all actions, which are not referred to him, at leaſt in this manner, and which are not done by an impreſſion ariſing from ſome motion of the love of God, are ſins, for want of a good and right end; though theſe actions may be good with reſpect to the particular object or end. IV. He agreed, that the Church had not determined any thing concerning the ſufficiency or inſufficiency of attrition. He owned alſo, that attrition conceived through the motive of the fear of puniſhment is good, becauſe this fear is the gift of God, and is of great uſe. But he believ'd, that in order that this attrition may be a diſpenſation ſufficient to receive abſolution and remiſſion of ſins in the ſacrament of penance, it is neceſſary, that beſides this motive of fear it ſhould contain a beginning of actual charity and love towards God above all things, or as the ſource of all righteouſneſs, in order that the grief for ſin in this attrition may be predominant, and exclude the will of ſinning. This he pretended to ſhew from a great number of Theſes maintained in the Sorbonne. In ſhort he declared, that he thought he could not be juſtly reproached upon this ſubject, ſince the laſt aſſembly of the Clergy had revived in their cenſure the condemnation of the 85th, 86th, and 87th propoſitions, which they rejected as heretical, tending to hereſy, and contrary to the Council of Trent; and ſince the Archbiſhop of Roan had cenſured in his paſtoral letter of 1697, as an error oppoſite to Scripture and ſound doctrine, the opinion of thoſe, who aſſert, that a Man fallen into Sin may be juſtified by the Sacrament of Penance, without returning to what is right through the love of God. V. With regard to the manner of being preſent at Maſs, his opinion was, that it ought to be done with devotion and a ſpirit of penitence, if a perſon finds himſelf guilty of any mortal ſin; and that he, who is preſent at that ſacrifice, and brings thither the will and affection for any mortal ſin, without any ſentiment of penitence, commits a new ſin by this criminal diſpoſition, which is directly contrary to piety and the reverence due to God in the exerciſe of that ſovereign worſhip, which he profeſſes to pay to him. VI. He profeſſed to believe, that it is very uſeful to every Chriſtian to have a great deal of devotion for the Saints, and eſpecially the Holy Virgin, who is the Mother of God, and the Queen of Saints. But that he did not believe, that this devotion conſiſts in all the vain requeſts and abſurd practices, which are to be met with in certain Authors. He believed, that true devotion conſiſts in a warm love towards the Holy Virgin, full of reſpect and veneration; in a love, which occaſions us to rejoice in the favours, which God has conferred on her, which leads us to the imitation of her humility and other virtues, which is attended with confidence in her on account of her intereſt with her ſon, and which leads us to apply ourſelves to her as a powerful advocate, who can obtain for us all that ſhe aſks of God for us. But he cannot approve of preaching, that we ought to confide as much, or even more in her, than in God himſelf; or of aſſerting, that ſhe has delivered from eternal pains ſouls, which the juſtice of her ſon had condemned to them. He does not ſcruple to ſay, that ſuch diſcourſes as theſe are injurious to religion, and amuſe ſouls, and lull them a-ſleep in vice, thro' this falſe confidence in ſome outward practices, to which ſuch Preachers frequently reduce the devotion due to the holy Virgin. VII. Being aſked what he thought of the conception of the Virgin Mary, he anſwered, that he was inclined to believe what the church ſhould think proper to determine. That indeed he did not believe it to be immaculate, and that he was at liberty not to believe it by the conſtitution of Alexander VII. He declares, that he does not decide the queſtion, but that he takes care not to ſay any thing againſt the opinion of thoſe, who believe the immaculate conception, ſince the conſtitution forbids this. VIII. Being told, that the books which he had, occaſioned it to be thought, that he entertained ſingular and erroneous opinions; and that it gave ſcandal, that he read the treatiſe of Frequent Communion, the Letters of Monſieur de S. Ciran, the Hours of Monſieur du Mont, the Morale de Grenoble, the Rituel d'Alet, which were conſidered as bad books; he anſwered, that all theſe books having been printed with permiſſion, approved by ſeveral Biſhops and Doctors, and being in publick uſe, and univerſally received, he did not think, that he ought to be accuſed of entertaining a ſuſpected doctrine: that the treatiſe of Frequent Communion was approved by above thirty Biſhops and twenty Doctors; that it was never condemned at Rome, though it had been ſent thither under two Popes; that the rules propoſed in it are true and very ſafe, ſince they are taken from Councils, Fathers, and the beſt Eccleſiaſtical Authors, and are approved and practiſed by the moſt zealous Biſhops. That the Letters of Monſieur de S. Ciran had not been condemned by any Univerſity or Biſhop, but on the contrary, were printed with the approbation of ſeveral Doctors, and the recommendations of ſeveral Biſhops, whoſe buſineſs it is to judge of Doctrine, and upon whoſe judgment the faithful ought to reſt. That with reſpect to the Hours of Monſieur du Mont, he had made a preſent of them to a perſon, who did not underſtand Latin, for his edification, not having againſt that conſtitution. The deputations, commiſſions, and memorials, all paſſed through his hands. At laſt being exhauſted by his labours, and by a regimen, which contributed to ſhorten his days, he died June the 6th 1719, aged ſixty two years. While he was in his laſt ſickneſs, Father le Courayer of St. Genevieve came to ſee him with another of his Brethren. Monſieur du Pin began the converſation at firſt with mentioning the criticiſm, which had been publiſhed in the Europe Sçavante, upon the firſt Tome of his Bibliotheque des Auteurs ſeparez de la Communion Romaine, and ſpoke of it with great ſeverity, not knowing that Father Courayer was the Author of it. Theſe Fathers then went up to the chamber of Monſieur le Cointe, who had written in conjunction with Monſieur du Pin, and was Author of the Anſwer to that Criticiſm, which had been erroneouſly aſcribed to Monſieur du Pin himſelf. Monſieur le Cointe, who likewiſe knew not, that Father Courayer was their antagoniſt, began upon the ſame ſubject, and told them, that if he lived, he would deſiſt from writing againſt thoſe, who had attacked having any reaſon to ſuſpect that they were erroneous or prohibited, ſince they were ſo publickly uſed in the ſight and with the knowledge of the Eccleſiaſtical Superiors, with the approbation of the Doctors, and privilege of the King; that the decree of the Inquiſition, which had condemned them, came from a tribunal, which did not at all oblige, and was not acknowledged in France. With reſpect to the Morale de Grenoble, and the Conferences de Luçon, they are indeed new books; but that the doctrine of them was antient; and that he believed, that it was more advantageous to him to make uſe of them, than of a great many of the Caſuiſts. That the Rituel of Monſieur d'Alet had not been condemned by a conſtitution but through a ſurprize, from which even the moſt pious Popes do not think themſelves exempt; for beſides the proofs, which are to be had, we find that the ſame Pope, who had given it in 1668, without having required any retractation of Monſieur d'Alet, ſent him a Brief of Communion on the 19th of January the year following, with favourable teſtimonies of his virtue, piety, learning, and ſanctity. The laſt objection made to this Eccleſiaſtic by his Confeſſor was, that thoſe, by whom he was ſuſpected, were extremely diſpleaſed, that he had a French tranſlation of the New Teſtament. He anſwered, that he had one indeed; but that certainly he was not prohibited reading the New Teſtament tranſlated into the vulgar tongue, and adviſing the reading of it to the Faithful, ſince it was a practice which all the Fathers have taught us, and which the Cardinal de Noailles following their ſteps had authorized by the permiſſion, which he granted for the tranſlation of the whole Bible, ſold by William Deſprez, Rüe S. Jacques. That though there ſhould be a doubt about the tranſlation printed at Mons, he thought it would be allowed to adhere to the ſentiments of the Biſhop of Meaux, who being conſulted about the reading of tranſlations of the New Teſtament, anſwered, that any perſon might read them with the advice of his Rector or Confeſſor, if they judged, that he had the diſpoſitions neceſſary to profit by that reading. The only prohibition, to which the Biſhop of Meaux ſhews any regard, was the Ordonnance of Monſieur de Perefixe, Archbiſhop of Paris; but he ſays, that this prohibition does not oblige in other Dioceſes, where Prelates have determined nothing upon that ſubject, and conſequently left intire liberty to every perſon to chooſe what he ſhould think moſt uſeful to him. Theſe were the principal grounds of the ſcruple, which was raiſed in the Confeſſor, with relation to the conduct of this Eccleſiaſtic. He declared to the Doctors, whom he conſulted, that as the perſons, who had raiſed thoſe ſcruples, were perſons of a regular and pious behaviour, and great zeal for the ſervice of the church; and as the Eccleſiaſtic, whom they accuſed, ſeemed to be a man of piety, he durſt not condemn him upon this ſingle motive, meaning his excuſes, and being apprehenſive of paſſing a raſh judgment, if he did not ſee the reaſons, which might oblige him to it. If thoſe, ſays he, which theſe Eccleſiaſtics alledge againſt him, ſhould appear to the Doctors ſufficient to condemn his ſentiments, it would be eaſy to ſee what method he ought to take, that their judgment ſhould regulate his; and that the Eccleſiaſtic, concerning whom he conſulted them, having a deſire to be ſaved, and being a man of a ſincere mind, and not at all attached to his notions, he thought he would make no difficulty of renouncing whatever of his opinions ſhould be found prejudicial to his ſalvation. He requeſted therefore the aſſiſtance and directions of the Doctors, and deſired them very earneſtly not to refuſe him them for his inſtruction, by declaring plainly what regard he ought to ſhew to theſe accuſations and theſe juſtifications of this Eccleſiaſtic. The Doctors having conſidered the caſe above-mentioned, were of opinion, that the ſentiments of the Eccleſiaſtic in queſtion were neither new, nor ſingular, nor condemned by the Church, nor ſuch in ſhort that his Confeſſor ought to require him to abandon them before he gave him abſolution. This is what was deliberated in the Sorbonne on the 20th of July 1702, and ſigned by forty Doctors, whoſe names are as follow: N. Petit-pied, Profeſſor of Sorbonne; G. Bourret, Profeſſor of Sorbonne; Sarraſin, Royal Lecturer and Profeſſor; Pinſſonat, Royal Lecturer and Profeſſor; Ellies du Pin, Royal Profeſſor; F. N. Alexandre; Le Pêcheur; Soullet; Deſhayettes; Verdier; De Cougniou; Herlau; Camet, Contet, Ruffin Le Beau, all three Canons regular of S. Croix; De Bourges, Prior of St. Victor; De Longueil, and Gueſton, Canons regular of St. Victor; De Combes, Abbot of St. Geneviève; Le Franc; Jollin, Rector of St. Hilary; Tullou, Rector of St. Bennet; Hideux, Rector of the Innocents; Blampignon, Rector of St. Merry; Feu, Rector of St. Gervais; De Voulges, Rector of St. Martin; Deſprez, Rector of Rouelle; Le Febvre des Chevaliers, Archdeacon of the Church of Troyes; Veron, Treaſurer of the Church of Zangres; Hyacinthe Delan, Theologal of Roan; Molin; De la Rogue, formerly Theologal of Meaux; De la Geneſte; Girard; Picard, Rector of St. Cloud; Borrey; L. de la Mare; G. de la Mare; Joly.

(1) See Bernard's Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, Mois de Mars 1703. p. 335 & ſeqq. April, p. 477. & Mai 1703. p. 594, 595.

There were ſeveral pieces publiſhed on occaſion of this Caſe of Conſcience. The firſt, which appeared, was a pamphlet in 4to. entitled, Dialogues entre un jeune & un vieux Docteur ſur le Cas de Conſcience ſigné par quarante Docteurs. This piece is very ſevere upon the Doctors for approving the Caſe of Conſcience.

There was publiſhed ſoon after another pamphlet upon the ſame ſubject, under this title, Entrepriſe de quelques Docteurs contre la Cenſure de la derniere Aſſemblée du Clergé, &c. The ſubſtance of this Author's reaſoning is in ſhort this. The aſſembly of the Clergy has cenſured the propoſition, which aſſerts, that Janſeniſm is a phantom. Now every body allows, that it is abſolutely the ſame thing to ſay, that Janſeniſm is a phantom, as to ſay that Janſenius did not teach the Hereſy of the five propoſitions condemned by the Popes. It is alſo the ſame thing, to ſay, a perſon obſtinately perſiſts in maintaining that the five propoſitions condemned are not in Janſenius; as to ſay, he continues in a reſpectful ſilence upon that ſubject: therefore that man ought not to be abſolved, who maintains, that one may continue in a reſpectful ſilence, any more than he who ſhould maintain, that Janſeniſm is a phantom.

The Doctors, who ſigned the Caſe of Conſcience, were attacked by ſeveral pamphlets; for, beſides the two abovementioned, there appeared three others. The firſt was intitled, Attentat de 40 Docteurs contre l'Egliſe, dénoncé à tous les Evêques du Royaume, in 4to, pagg. 41. The ſecond was called, Entretien d'un Prélat & du R. P. Alexandre Dominicain; and the third, Entretien d'un Docteur de la Maiſon de Sorbonne avec un Docteur Ubiquiſte, qui à ſigné la Deciſion du Cas de tacked Monſieur du Pin, whom he ſtyled his dear Maſter; and though he had but a very ſmall eſtate, would at his death leave money for a foundation to ſupport thoſe, who ſhould defend his memory. Monſieur le Cointe died about fifteen days after Monſieur du Pin, but without performing his promiſe.

Conſcience couchant le Fait de Janſenius, in 4to. pag. 7. Monſieur d'Argenſon, Lieutenant of the Police, being informed, that there was printing at the Widow Mazuel's an Apology for the Caſe of Conſcience, ordered all that was printed off to be ſeized, the preſs to be broken, and the Widow to pay a conſiderable fine. The forty Doctors preſented a petition to the Cardinal de Noailles Archbiſhop of Paris, acquainting him with the reaſons which induced them to ſign the Caſe of Conſcience, and complaining of the defamatory pieces publiſhed on that ſubject. Monſieur Bourlet, Vicar of St. Mareel, who had ſolicited ſubſcriptions to the Caſe of Conſcience, was baniſhed to Quinpercorentin by a Letter de Cachet ſent to him on the 5th of February 1702-3. Several of the forty Doctors, who had ſigned the Caſe of Conſcience, wrote a Letter to the Cardinal Archbiſhop of Paris, to aſſure his Eminence, that they were perſuaded, that it was their duty to ſubmit their private judgment to that of the Church, even when the queſtion was about facts. However, the Caſe of Conſcience was condemned by an Ordonnance of the Archbiſhop, a brief of the Pope, and an Arret of the Council. And Monſieur du Pin was baniſhed to Chatelleraud in Poitou by order of his Majeſty; and before his departure was obliged to reſign abſolutely before a Notary his place of Profeſſor in the Royal College; and all the privileges granted by the King for printing of his books were revoked. Monſieur Petit-pied, Doctor and Profeſſor of Sorbonne, was likewiſe baniſhed to Baulne in Burgundy; and another Profeſſor choſen by the King's Order in his room. T.

PINCIER (JOHN), was born at Wettera in the country of Heſſen in the year 1521. He ſtudied firſt at Marpourg, and then at Louvain, and afterwards at Paris, at Zurich, and at Straſburg, and was Miniſter of the Proteſtant Church in his native place above thirty years; after which he performed the ſame functions in another place (a), till the infirmities of old age obliged him to petition to be diſcharged from his functions. Having obtained that favour, he retired to Franeberg, where his wife had a houſe. He died there January the 26th 1591 (b). He publiſhed ſome works, and deſerves a place among the Pſeudonymous Authors [A]. He declared againſt the Lutherans with regard to the Doctrines of Ubiquity and the Real Preſence. I have obſerved in another place (c), that he was Hyperius's brother-in-law.

(a) In Cœnobio Henetienſi.

(b) Extracted from the Epitaph, which his daughter, and his ſon-in-law, who was a Miniſter of the Goſpel, ſet up for him. It is to be met with in the Deliciæ Itinerum of Nathan. Chytræus, p. m. 651.

(c) In the art. KUCHLIN, in the marginal quotation (a).

[A] He publiſhed ſome works, and deſerves a place among the Pſeudonymous Writers.] He publiſhed two books under the name of Helias Palingenius, the one entitled Dipnoſophiſticæ Tragœdiæ procataſtrophe tractans & explicans controverſiam de Cœna Domini, at Geneva 1569, in 8vo. The title of the other is Elenchus ſanæ de Euchariſtia doctrinæ atque fidei ab incommutabili tam ſententiarum quam connexionum veritate inſtructus ad Auguſtini præſcriptum, at Heidelberg 1575, in 8vo. (1). This is what I meet with in the epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheque, in which it is conjectured that Helias Palingenius is a fictitious name, but we are not told there which is the true name. It is obſerved in another place (2) that John Pincier wrote a very learned and pious work De Cœna Domini, which was printed at Baſil in 8vo. it was in the year 1561, if we may believe Hoſpinianus (3). We are told in the Author's epitaph, that the two books, which he publiſhed under the name of Helias Palingenius were printed at Heidelberg, and that his Antidotus was printed at Geneva firſt under the name of Johannes Pincierus, and afterwards without any name (4). Monſieur Placius has not mentioned this Pſeudonymous Writer, and Monſieur Baillet has not put him into his catalogue. I imagine that the Antidotus is the ſame book, the ſubſtance of which we meet with in Hoſpinianus (5), who obſerves that it was reprinted at Heidelberg in the year 1575. He obſerves (6) alſo, that the Elenchus was printed firſt at Newſtad in the year 1575, and then at Heidelberg in the year 1583.

(1) Ex Epitome Bibliotb. Geſneri, p. 212.

(2) Ibidem, p. 485.

(3) Hoſpin. Hiſt. Sacram. Tom. 2. p. 480.

(4) See Pincier's Epitaph in Nathan. Chytræus, Delic. Itinerum, p. 651, 652.

(5) Hoſpin. Hiſt. Sacram. Tom. 2. p. 602.

(6) Idem, ibid. p. 604.

PINEAU (SEVERIN), in Latin Pinæus, born in Chartres (a), publiſhed at Paris, where he exerciſed the profeſſion of a ſurgeon, a Latin book in 1598, which has borne ſeveral impreſſions (b). He therein treats of the marks by which a maid's virginity may be known, a circumſtance that probably was the chief occaſion of its being ſo much ſought after by the publick. It is affirmed that the German tranſlation of it, publiſhed at Francfort about the beginning of the 17th Century, was prohibited by the Magiſtrates [A], who did not think it proper that thoſe ſubjects ſhould be treated in the language of the country. The Author wrote his book originally in French, and intended to publiſh it in that tongue; but finding, by the ſpecimens of it which he ſhewed to ſome perſons, that it gave occaſion to looſe diſcourſes or impertinent jeſts, he reſolved to write only for the learned [B]; and accordingly concluded his Preface with the following verſes of the antient Author (c):

Odi

(a) Cornutenſis, and not Cornutenſis, as in Draudius; or Camutenſis, as in Lindenius renovatus.

(b) Lindenius renovatus, mentions eight editions of it.

(c) Horace, Od. 1. lib. 3.

[A] It is affirmed that the German tranſlation of this work . . . . was prohibited by the Magiſtrates.] I find this particular in a letter written to Goldaſtus, which is the CLXXII. of the collection printed at Francfort in 1688. One Segeth, a friend of his, in a letter written to him from Hanaw, the 5th of Auguſt 1607, deſires him to buy that verſion for him, tho' it ſhould coſt ever ſo much; and he ſays that he was the more deſirous of having it, becauſe he had heard that the ſale of it was forbid. Si in libellum quendam Severini Pevini (1) de dignoſcendis virginibus è Gallica in Germanicam linguam verſo incidas, eum mihi quocunque pretio compares, quod cum gratiarum actione reddetur. Audio iſthic apud Spieſſium excuſum, & interdictum ejus venditione, quod fateor mihi calcar addidit ad poſcendam.

(1) Read Pinæi.

[B] The Author wrote his book originally in French, and intended to publiſh it in that tongue; but finding . . . that it gave occaſion to looſe diſcourſes . . . . . he reſolved to write only for the learned.] His intention was good; he deſigning to do ſervice to judges, who were very frequently puzled in certain cauſes wherein the women were plaintiffs; ſometimes becauſe they ſtill kept their virgin-flower, at other times becauſe they had loſt it. In the firſt caſe, a woman complained of her being married to an impotent huſband; and in the ſecond, of being raviſhed. There might be abuſes in both theſe complaints: there might alſo be ſome abuſe or error in the information of the fact; for either the matrons or other perſons appointed to inſpect the parts, were either not well enough acquainted

Odi profanum vulgus, & arceo :
Favete linguis : carmina non prius
Audita, Muſarum ſacerdos
Virginibus puerisque canto.

Hence, ye profane, I hate you all,
Both the great, vulgar, and the ſmall.
To virgin minds, which yet their native witneſs hold,
Nor yet diſcolour'd with the love of Gold,
That jaundice of the ſoul,
Which makes it look ſo gilded and ſo foul
To you, ye very few, theſe truths I tell :
The Muſe inſpires my ſong, hark, and obſerve it well.
COWLEY.

PINEAU (GABRIEL) DU), in Latin Pinellus, Counſellor in the preſidial Court at Angers, was a famous man. He died at Angers in 1644, in the ſeventy third year of his age (a).

(a) See Menage, Remarks on the Life of William Menage, p. 333, where he gives a catalogue of ſuch works of our Pineau as had been publiſhed, as likewiſe of thoſe which had not.

quainted with nature, or were unfair in their proceedings. Such are the reaſons why Pineau thought it incumbent on him to publiſh his diſcoveries, and render them intelligible to perſons who were ignorant of the Latin tongue : however, other reaſons prompted him to change his deſign. Here follow his own words (2) : Te autem monitum volumus (amice lector) hoc opuſculum primum nos Gallicum feciſſe, ſicque in publicum proditurum decreviſſe ad eorum ſublevationem, qui judicibus & parentibus referre debent de conformatione naturali, aut vitiata pudendorum virginum nuptarum aut innuptarum, quarum hæ maximam vim à procis integritati ſuæ : illæ verum nullam à maritis aut ſaltem ſponſis imbecillioribus & fatuis illatam fuiſſe conqueruntur. Sed cum primas delineationes quibuſdam expoſuiſſemus, cognoviſſemuſque horum alios ad laſciviam, alios ad vaniloquium & procacitatem potius quam ad fructum aliquem ex eo ſibi & reipublicæ utilem colligendum expetere, inſtituti noſtri rationem mutavimus, atque in ſermonem Latinum convertimus, philiatriſque ſolis & literatis hominibus devovimus Horatii exemplo impulſi (3). It is to be obſerved that his book conſiſts of two parts. In the firſt he inquires into the ſigns of virginity ; and aſſerts, in the ſecond, that two bones (4), at the time that women are delivered, part aſunder. He exhorts phyſicians and ſurgeons to remember his Hypotheſis ; either to facilitate the diſjunction of theſe two bones, or to join them together again after the child is born. Propterea mulieres in utero habentes, & pueros adhuc in eo degentes ac ſtabulantes non ſic negligendos eſſe hortamur, ſed omni auxilio & arte juvandos, ut non minus ſaltem diligentes ſe præbuiſſe videantur Medici & Chirurgi in partibus dilatandis, per quas exit fœtus de utero matris, quam quum editus eſt, in iiſdem conſtringendis ſolliciti ſunt. Quod ſit apte & convenienter, ſi medicamenta emollientia qua voles forma parata ſymphyſibus prædictorum oſſium pubis & ilium adhibita fuerint, ut natura docet, atque ipſamet quantum poteſt, præſtat. Quæ oſſa his in ſymphyſibus adeo vehementer conſtricta ſunt reliquo vitæ tempore, ut citius alibi, puta, in medio ſui frangerentur, quam à cauſa quadam procatarctica ab invicem diducerentur, quæ tamen tempore partus diſtrahuntur (5).

(1) Severinus Pinæus, in Præfat. ad Lectorem, p. 22.

(3) He here annexes the verſes of Horace, quoted at the end of the text of this article. The application of thoſe verſes is agreeable to the title which has been given to a book De organis generationis ; it was entitled, Sacra Eleuſinia patefacta. See Nouv. de la Rep. des Lettres, for July 1684 p. 535 ; but obſerve that Reinerus Rolfinctus, the Author of that book, did not give it that title. It was by a trick of the Bookſeller that his work was publiſhed, as a new one, under the above-mentioned title in 1684, and without the Author's name.

(4) The os pubis, & Os ilium.

(5) S. Pinæus, in Præf. p. 21, 22.

PINET (ANTHONY DU), Lord of Noroy, was born in the 14th Century in the Franche Comté at Bezançon, according to La Croix du Maine (a), or at Baume les Nonnes, if Lewis Gollut may be credited (b). He publiſhed ſeveral books [A], ſome of which ſhew that he was zealous for the Proteſtant Religion. This is evident chiefly from the notes he added to the French tranſlation of the Tax on the Chancery of Rome [B]. He

(a) La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. Franc. p. 19.

(b) Gollut, Memoires de la Franche Comté, p. 6.

[A] He publiſhed ſeveral books.] The moſt conſiderable are only French tranſlations. I ſhall take notice of the beſt in the laſt remark of this article. The reſt are, a verſion of the third part of the Letters of Don Antonio de Guevara, and that of Guevara's treatiſe concerning the working and privileges of gallies (1). That of the Commentaries of Father Andrew Mathiolus of Sienna, on the Hiſtory of Plants of Pedacion Dioſcorides Anazarbeus, Lyons, folio (2) anno 1566 (3). That of the Secret Miracles of Nature, by Levinus Lemnius, a Phyſician of Ziriſea, Lyons 1567 (4). That of Common Places of the Scriptures, collected by Wolfgang Muſculus, in 66 titles, Geneva, by Euſtace Vignon, folio, 1577 (5). That of the Tax of the caſual Forfeitures, &c. I ſhall ſpeak of it in the following remark. As to the books written by him, here follow ſome of the controverſial kind : The Conformity between the Proteſtant Churches of France, and the primitive Church, in Polity and Ceremonies, Lyons 1564, 8vo (6). Sermons on the Revelations (7). Here follows a work of another kind. Plans, Pictures and Deſcriptions of ſeveral Cities and Fortreſſes in Europe, Aſia, Africa, as in the India and America ; their Foundations, Antiquities, and Manner of Living ; with ſeveral general and particular maps, in a Coſmographical Way, with their Explications, Lyons, by John Ogerolles, in 1564, folio (8). The Reader will find, in the remark [C], a critical remark againſt this compilation.

(1) Du Verdier, Vau Privas, Biblioth. Franc. p. 76, who ſays that theſe two verſions were printed together at Lyons, in 4to, anno 1560.

(2) Idem, p. 78.

(3) La Croix du Maine, p. 19.

(4) Ibid. p. 20.

(5) Du Verdier Vau Privas, Biblioth. Franc. p. 78.

(6) Ibid. p. 75.

(7) Ibid. p. 76.

(8) Ibid. p. 75.

[B] The notes he added to the French tranſlation of the Tax on the Chancery of Rome.] The title of this work is as follows. The Tax on the caſual Forfeitures of the Pope's Shop, in Latin and French, with Annotations taken from the Decrees, Councils, and Canons, antient and modern, to verify the Diſcipline antiently obſerved in the Church ; the whole enlarged and reviſed. By A. D. P. The Dedication to all faithful Chriſtians, is dated from Lyons, the 26th of March 1564. I'll tranſcribe ſome words from it, to give my Readers a ſpecimen of the freedom this Author wrote with, which indeed was the cuſtom of thoſe times. For this reaſon I have ſet before them the aſſeſſment of their ſouls, according to the rates ſet upon them by their terreſtrial God : to the end that, ſeeing the trade they make of them and their conſciences, and the tyranny to which they are ſubject, and the danger to which they are obnoxious, they may lift up their eyes towards heaven, and at laſt know, how ſignal the grace of God is with regard to thoſe whom he delivers from ſuch a ſlavery. And leſt any Dataries, Auditors, Romancers, Bulliſts, Copiſts, Notary-Bankers, and all perſons of that ſtamp, ſhould imagine that I have miſtaken matters, I have faithfully annexed the Latin text of the Tax of the Papal Chamber, with a French tranſlation, and have added ſome annotations for the uſe and benefit of the Church. For the contents of the text are ſo ſhameful and abominable, that I muſt intreat you, my brethren, to pardon me, for offering it to ſo holy a ſociety as yours, where nothing is heard but ſpiritual ſongs, pſalms and praiſes to the Lord our God. But it is incumbent on us to ſhew a wicked man his wickedneſs, and the fool his folly, leſt we ſhould be judged to reſemble him (9). We may naturally ſuppoſe, that a man who ſpeaks in this manner in his dedication, has expreſſed himſelf very bluntly in his Commentary on a text which lies ſo open to ſatyr

(9) Pinet, Dedication to the Tax on the caſual forfeitures, &c.

He puliſhed ſome very wild chimeras with reſpect to the genealogy of certain families ſatyr and invective, as that of the Tax of the Roman Chancery. I wiſh that all du Pinet's notes were not in the controverſial caſt, and that ſome of them explained certain forms of expreſſion which occur very often: but I am of opinion, that he was not ſufficiently ſkilled in the Canon Law, nor the ſtyle of the Court of Rome, to clear up thoſe obſcure particulars. He intended, at the very opening of his Commentary, to exhibit the price of every tax, but was forced to confeſs that it was not in his power to do it. No Reader could be ſatisfied with what he ſays, as I will now make appear. The three ſorts of money mentioned in this apoſtolical Tarif of Rome, are Turonenſes, Ducatus and Carlinus, on which he has the following note. "As to the gold Tournois, ſome take "it for a Paris livre or pound. Others ſay that it is "an old crown, and others again that it is worth a "Philippus. In a word, I have not yet met with a- "ny thing certain with regard to that money; tho' "the Tournois de Chambre is generally worth a Real; "a Ducat is worth a Piſtolet, and four Sous or Pence "Tournois; and a Carlin is worth four Sous (10)." Thoſe who deſire to underſtand perfectly all they read, require a much better explication than that above; and it is certain, that this is one of the paſſages which the Author of the notes ought to have illuſtrated to the beſt of his power. His work was re-printed at Leyden in 1607 (11); and was re-printed at Amſterdam, with a new preface, in 1700. The Author of this preface obſerves, that he had done all that lay in his power to reduce to our money, the Tournois, Ducats and Carlins, employed in the Tax of the Pope's Chancery, but was not able to get any inſight into that matter; but that in caſe he did, he would inſert it in the next edition. He takes notice of what du Pinet obſerves with regard to the value of the three coins; and adds, that the Author of the notes, on the confeſſion of Sancy, affirms, that at the end of the book of the Taxes of the Roman Chancery, there is a Tarif, which ſettles the Gros at four Sous Tournois, the Ducat at forty Sous, and the Carolus at eight Blancs (12). The Author of theſe notes obſerves this, where he illuſtrates part of the following paſſage of D'Aubigne. "There is another book, "which thoſe I lately mentioned have endeavoured "to the utmoſt of their power to ſuppreſs; but the "Roman Pontiffs would never permit it. . . It is the "book on the Taxes, where a good Catholick ſees "a low price ſet upon ſines; and knows, at one "glance, how much he is to pay for them. He who "has deflowered a virgin, muſt pay ſix gros. Any "man who ſhall have known, carnally, (but with "mutual conſent) his own mother, ſiſter, couſin- "german, or god-mother, pays five gros. However, "if that be known in the church, he ſhall give ſix. "A ducat or five carlins muſt be paid by any perſon "who kills a father or a mother (13)." The Commentator on the words five gros, declares that this is found in folio 36 verſo. He doubtleſs means that edition mentioned by d'Aubigné, viz. that of Paris 1570 (14), by Touſſaint Denis, in St. James's-Street, at the Sign of the wooden Croſs, and entitled, Cancellaria Apoſtolica, the following note being made by him on theſe words, It is the book of Taxes. "Taxæ "Cancellariæ Apoſtolicæ, & Taxæ Pœnitentiariæ iti- "dem Apoſtolicæ. Printed at Paris, with his Majeſty's "licence, for three years, in 1520, for Touſſains "Denis, in St. James's-Street, at the wooden Croſs; "having, in the title-page, the arms of France, and "thoſe of the houſe of Medicis, to which Leo X. "was related (15)." He affirms, that this book, tranſlated into French in 1564, by Anthony du Pinet, printed the ſame year in 8vo, at Lyons, for John Saugrain, and re-printed with the Latin (16) at Leyden in 1607, with this title, Taxe des parties caſuelles de la Boutique du Pape, is condemned among the anonymous Authors of the letter A, in the catalogue of books prohibited in 1685, by order of the Archbiſhop of Paris; and the Authors of that catalogue did not think it neceſſary to mention the Latin and Gothic original; becauſe that du Pinet's book is in French, and full of annotations, wherein the Author has endeavoured to point out a great deal of turpitude in the old book of taxes; whereas thoſe Gentlemen perhaps imagined, that the original was loſt; and farther, they doubtleſs did not dare to command it to be ſuppreſſed, by reaſon of the two great authorities which gave a ſanction to it. By the way, the Tax of the Chancery, &c. was re-printed in 1613, with the Pragmatic Sanction. I am ſure that he will permit me to obſerve to him, that the book which du Pinet tranſlated is not the ſame cited by d'Aubigné. There is not any coin called gros, in the Tax which du Pinet tranſlated and illuſtrated with notes. We don't there ſee the chapter of perpetual diſpenſations mentioned by d'Aubigné, nor any particular concerning the tax laid on thoſe who commit inceſt with their mother, ſiſter, &c. Now ſince the Author of the notes affirms, that the perſons hinted at are taxed only five gros, folio 36 verſo, we muſt ſuppoſe that d'Aubigné does not aſſert a falſity. How comes it therefore to paſs, that neither du Pinet, nor thoſe who re-printed his tranſlation and commentary, knew any thing of that other tax, which was much more infamous than that they got printed? I am greatly ſurprized at it, and think he ought to be cenſured for not mentioning the edition he made uſe of. D'Aubigné's Commentator affirms, that the Paris edition of 1520 is the firſt: but I know, that in 1664, Stephen du Mont, a Bookſeller of Boiſleduc, puliſhed in Latin and Flemiſh, from an edition printed at Rome in 1514, a book entitled, Taxæ Cancellariæ Apoſtolicæ, & Taxæ Sacræ Pœnitentiariæ Apoſtolicæ, and that he collated, word for word, his edition with that of Rome, of which a certificate was given, printed in page 131, by a Secretary of the city of Boiſleduc. It is ſaid in the preface in queſtion, that this ſame work was printed at Colen apud Goſvinum Colinium in 1515 (17). I likewiſe know, that a Law-Profeſſor (18) in the Univerſity of Franeker, puliſhed, in 1651, with notes, a Taxa Cameræ Apoſtolicæ, which is different from the book printed at Boiſleduc.

As the particulars mentioned by d'Aubigné are found in the book of taxes cited by him, it is ſurpriſing ſuch a book ſhould have been puliſhed; and that even ſince it has afforded the Proteſtants a ſubject for ſo many triumphs, it yet ſhould have been reprinted with authority. Here follows the complaint made by a proteſtant Miniſter of Paris to the Biſhop of Belley on that account. "I dare not ſay all that "Dr. Diſpenſe * has hinted againſt this book, ſo "far as to apply to it the following words,

"Proſtat & in quæſtu pro meretrice ſedet.

"She, like a Proſtitute's let out for hire.

"Thoſe of your communion, ſo far from being a- "ſhamed of this book, which invites traders with "the ſound of the trumpet, that they are perpetu- "ally puliſhing and expoſing it to ſale. I myſelf "have ſeen three Paris editions of it. The firſt is of "anno 1520, which has been often cited by our "Authors. The ſecond was printed in 1545 †, and "the third in 1625, by the very man who prints "your books . Among my books, I have the "edition of 1520, and that which was puliſhed in "our time, in 1625. I collated them, and find "them to agree; particularly in the following words "which cry aloud to God for vengeance. Et nota "diligenter quod hujuſmodi gratiæ & diſpenſationes non "conceduntur pauperibus, quia non ſunt, ideo non poſſunt "conſolari, i. e. "Take notice particularly, (and in- "deed the thing deſerves it) that ſuch graces and "diſpenſations are not granted to the poor; for, "not having wherewith to pay, they therefore can- "not be comforted." Theſe words, I ſay, which "are in folio 23 of the old edition of 1520, are alſo "in page 208 of the new edition of 1625: and thoſe "who are poſſeſſed of the edition of 1545, will "find them in folio 130 (19)."

Had D'Aubigné been aſked, whence it came that the Court of Rome, which is ſo highly inveighed againſt for its avarice, had taxed only at twenty pence tournois for the moſt flagrant ſpecies of inceſt; he doubtleſs would have anſwered, that traders who get their goods for nothing, find their account better in ſelling

(10) Du Pinet, Taxe des Partes caſuelles, p. 7.

(11) Note, that the Leyden edition is not exactly the ſame in every part, as that of Lyons 1564.

(12) Notes in the Confeſſion of Sancy, p. 101. edit. of 1699.

(13) Confeſſion de Sancy, lib. 1. chap. 2. p. 66.

(14) A typographical error, probably for 1520.

(15) Notes on the Confeſſion of Sancy, p. 100, 101.

(16) This implies that the edition of 1564, had not the Latin, but the Latin is certainly in it.

(17) See the art. BANCK.

(18) Laurence Bankius.

* In Epiſt. ad Titum, cap. 1. Digreſſ. 2. It is in p. 479. Paris edit. 1619, for Claude Morel.

† Apud Galeatium à Prato.

 Apud Gervaſium Alliot.

(19) Drelincourt's Reply to the Anſwer of Biſhop de Belley, p. m. 370, 371.

families [C]. The moſt valuable of all his pieces is his tranſlation of Pliny [D].

PINON

ſelling them at a very low rate, than in keeping them up at an extravagant price; for the cheap rate at which they ſell them, gets a much greater quantity off their hands by which means they indemnify themſelves largely, and with intereſt, by the great number of purchaſers they procure, the greateſt part of whom would not buy any thing, were it fixed at a very high price. But let no one miſtake the latter. The tax mentioned in this work is not all that is to be paid. The ſinner muſt alſo treat with the Datary, who proportions the ſum according to his circumſtances (20).

(20) Vide the remark [C] of the art. PARRHASIUS.

[C] He publiſhed ſome very wild chimeras with reſpect to the genealogy of certain families.] One of our ableſt Hiſtoriographers, ſpeaking of Francis d'Agoult Count de Sault (21), the chief Nobleman in Province, and one of the greateſt Captains of his age, and formerly devoted to the Huguenot's Party, by which means he loſt his life, with John d'Agoult his brother, in the battle of St. Denys, anno 1567. This Hiſtoriographer, I ſay, making the elogium of this Nobleman, ſays as follows (22): "He was valiant, generous, ſplendid, poſſeſſed very fine talents, and a lover of learning, and it was out of regard to him (23), that Anthony du Pinet, Lord of Noroy, collected, in his treatiſe on cities and fortreſſes, ſome whimſical traditions with regard to the origin of the houſe of Sault, to form from thence a romance more incredible than the apologues and converſations between men and beaſts; and which would have ruined this Author's reputation, had he not ſupported it by his tranſlation of Pliny's works. It is my opinion that poetry does not admit of ſuch fictions, ſo marvellous and incredible as this ſeems to be, as well as the Fable of Berold of Saxony, the pretended anceſtor of the Dukes of Savoy, and Ferry Borſtelſtickel, whom Thevet the Romancer makes the head of the illuſtrious houſe of Chabot: and it is a ſtrange circumſtance, that it muſt always coſt ſome King's or Emperor's daughter her honour, to lay the baſis of a falſe migration. All that can be alledged in excuſe for du Pinet is, that he wrote in an age when phantoms were given for anceſtors, to ſuch perſons, who having no traces of thoſe from whom they ſprung, gave, in order to dreſs them up, ſome traditions and old wives tales, of which flatterers made myſteries, with the alluſions which they ſought in the names and coats of arms of families; not knowing that coats of arms and ſirnames have their limits: and not ſuſpecting that an age of ignorance would be ſucceeded by ſo enlightened a one as ours, ſo as to go into the foreign countries, where they ſought for the firſt heroes of every race. That which du Pin made choice of for that of Agoult, is one Hugh, Prince of Tric, an imaginary State in Pomerania, whoſe valour and beauty rendered him worthy the love of the Infanta Valdugue, daughter of King Valdugue of Pomerania. He had a ſon by her, whom that Princeſs, when in priſon, letting down a window, to put the child into the hands of a peaſant, who was to carry it to the nurſe, a ſhe wolf came, who, notwithſtanding the ſtout reſiſtance made by the peaſant, ſeized it, and carried it to her den, among her cubs. She ſuckled it till the next day, when the King meeting with her as he was a hunting, purſued, and killed her, as alſo the cubs, and found the infant ſwathed in a rich cloth. The King cauſed the child to be baptiſed; and having diſcovered the hiſtory of its birth, he took off his illegitimacy by marrying his daughter to Prince Hugo, whom ſhe left a widower a little after, and who, being gone to make war upon the Greeks, took to his ſecond wife the daughter of the Emperor of Conſtantinople, where he lived and had many children by her. Wolf of Tric, his ſon by the firſt venter, ſo called in remembrance of ſo marvellous an accident, married Sidrac, daughter to the King of Ruſſia; and his eldeſt ſon of the ſame name having married a Princeſs of Saxony, came, with Berold of Saxony, to fight under the King of Arles (of Burgundy) and won the territory and valley of Sault in Provence, where he built the caſtle of Agoult, that gave a ſirname to his poſterity which left that of Tric. He adds, that the territory of Sault was ſettled in fee to him in 1200. Here we have a fine hotch-potch of hiſtory, chronology, and coſmography, all blended together; and the whole grounded on this, that the arms of Agoult are, not a ſhe wolf, as it ſhould have been, but a wolf with the marks of its gender, and becauſe ſome of that houſe aſſumed to themſelves, in the Latin titles, the ſeveral ſirnames of Agouto, & de Tritis, on account of the territory of Trez, an antient portion of the Viſcounts of Marſeilles, which fell to them by marriage."

(21) Le Laboureur, Addit. de Caſtelnau, Tom. 2. p. 511.

(22) Ibid.

(23) I ſuppoſe that this Count de Sault was one of thoſe whom du Pinet hints at in the preface to his tranſlation of Pliny, when he ſays, "during the fifteen months that I toil'd in making this tranſlation, I was often ſick, and employed in the affairs of ſome perſons of great diſtinction, to whoſe ſervice I am devoted."

This is not the only place where Le Laboureur exclaims very juſtly againſt the abſurd impertinence of Genealogiſts. See p. 801. Tome 1. of his additions to Caſtelnau's Memoirs, and it will appear that du Cheſne has undeceived the houſe of Rochefoucaut, to its honour as well as to his own, with regard to the ignorant and whimſical impoſtures of brother Stephen of Luſignan, who makes more tribes ſpring from his Melluſina (24), than God promiſed to Abraham. See alſo p. 559. Tom. 2. where he ſays, that in 1560, Renatus of Sanzay, *built, with John le Feron, King at Arms of France, this genealogy of the houſe of Sanzay, made up of near fifty deſcents, moſt of them enumerated year by year, with the names, ſirnames, and coats of arms of the women; whilſt all thoſe names, families and arms, are mere phantoms. This noble work having been imparted to brother Stephen of Luſignan, a Franciſcan Friar , made it ſerve as the foundation of his grand romance of the 67 illuſtrious houſes ſprung from that of Luſignan, ſtill more incredible than that of Melluſina, out of whoſe mighty tub, as from a publick fountain, he let flow the nobility and blood of Luſignan to all perſons who deſired any of it. Peruſe what follows. "In that age, people had not the method of drawing up genealogies from deeds and records, but contented themſelves with traditions and old wives fables to ſupply the defect of memory: they ſcarce knew their grandfathers by rule; and with regard to whatever were higher, they admitted as true all that was vented by certain falſe antiquaries, and downright enthuſiaſts, ſuch as John le Maire de Belges, the Author of the Romance, entitled, Le Chevalier du Cygne, (the Knight of the Swan,) written in honour of the houſe of Cleves; Forcatel, a Civilian, Author of Montmorency Gallois, brother Stephen of Luſignan, an egregious impoſtor; and John le Feron, whom I will charge with nothing but a too great credulity; and who, as King of arms, permitted his name to be put to ſeveral falſe genealogies, as did, in imitation of him, Bernard de Girart, S. du Haillan, genealogiſt of the Order of the Holy Ghoſt (25)"

(24) See what he ſays of Melluſina, p. 702, 703. Tom. 1. of his Additions to Caſtelnau.

* [He was a Dominican.] From the additions to the Paris edition of Bayle's Dict. Tom. 4. p. 973. col. 2.

(25) Le Laboureur, p. 320. Tome 2.

[D] His tranſlation of Pliny.] I believe the firſt edition is of anno 1562, at Lyons in two volumes fol. Du Verdier Vau-Privas mentions only that of 1566, printed at Lyons by Claude Senneton. I make uſe of the fourth, that printed at Paris, by John Houzé 1608. We may juſtly affirm, without flattering du Pinet, that he deſerves a great applauſe for this tranſlation. He employed great pains in that work: he conſulted the antient MSS. and the old editions of Pliny; corrected and compared his work with them; made a great many original notes; drew up two large indexes; wrote a treatiſe on antient weights and meaſures reduced to thoſe of the French, and prefixed it to his verſion. This muſt neceſſarily have taken up a great deal of time. I am ſenſible that he committed a great number of errors, many of which are very abſurd. "He makes two Roman Gentlemen of two kinds of marble, the one called Lapis Numidicus, and the other Sinandicus. This is in Chap. I. Book XXXV. (26)." The perſon from whom I borrow this remark adds, that our Author had committed a great many more errors, notwithſtanding which his work was very uſeful. A reader who has ever ſo little equity, and has any idea of the difficulty of this undertaking, will be infinitely more inclined to eſteem that Author, for ſo happily tranſlating the greateſt part of it, than to deſpiſe him for his blunders. The peruſal of his Preface will ſhew, that he knew extremely well where the difficulties lay, and the helps that ſuch an undertaking required.

(26) La Mothe le Vayer, Hexamer. Ruſtique, p. m. 30.

PINON (JAMES), Abbot of Condé, Canon of the Church of Paris, ſon of James Pinon Dean of the Parliament of the ſame city (a), lived in the 17th Century. He gained applauſe by his Latin Poetry (b), though he applied himſelf very late to it [A]. In 1661 Mr. de Marolles, Abbot of Ville-loin, dedicated to him his French Verſion of Ovid's Poem in Ibin; and annexed to the book a letter he addreſſed to him. He beſtows great applauſes on him in both thoſe places, and declares him poſſeſſed of excellent qualities. He inſerted, at the end of the book in queſtion, ſeveral pieces of poetry by James Pinon, to whom the publick is obliged for an edition of Amiot's Plutarch in four volumes folio (c). His father alſo publiſhed ſome Latin Poems. Abbot de Ville-loin calls his Poem De Anno Romano, a famous one: that which he wrote, De Crucifixo, has been greatly applauded by a good Poet, I mean Nicholas Bourbon (d).

(a) Abbot de Marolles, Denombrement des Auteurs, p. 431.

(b) Ibid. Dedication to the French tranſlation of Ovid. in Ibin.

(c) L'Abbé de Marolles, Denombrem. des Auteurs, p. 431.

(d) See Nicolai Borbonii Poemata, p. 144. edit. 1630.

[A] He gained applauſe by his Latin poetry, though he applied himſelf very late to it.] I am informed, ſays Abbé de Ville-loin (1), "that you was not leſs "than thirty five years of age, when you firſt tried "that noble talent, which you exerted in a devout "ſeaſon, on the ſubject of David's penitential Pſalms. "And I know that your father, who alſo was a good "Latin poet, upon ſeeing that noble production of "your genius, (he being a great judge of all things) "was aſtoniſhed at them, as alſo was Mr. Bourbon "of the oratory, your dear friend, who is as able a "judge: ſo that you would have excited a reciprocal "jealouſy to one another, whatever powerful relation "and ſtrong friendſhip there was between you, had "they not been, at leaſt, as ſolicitous for your fame "and reputation as yourſelf. The latter adviſed you "to publiſh that excellent work: accompanying it, "at the ſame time, with a particular mark of his "eſteem, by the Hendecaſyllables, worthy of his ge-"nius, which he prefixed to it." He ſpeaks this of you, alluding to your name, in his beautiful epiſtles.

(1) Marolles, Abbé de Ville-loin, Epitre à Mr. l'Abbé de Condé, annexed to the tranſlation of Ovid in Ibin.

Uni condere carmen
Condæo latius atque exercere camœnas.

And elſewhere, after ſpeaking of your rare ſkill in ſacred as well as profane learning, he adds, with his uſual eloquence; that being poſſeſſed of all thoſe riches, neither the graces of poeſy, nor the Latin Muſes, have any ſecrets or myſteries but what they reveal to you.

Inſtructo tantis opibus, veteriſque Latinæ,
Arcana, & Muſarum adyta haud adeunda prophanis, Tota patent.

..... You immediately gained a very extraordinary reputation by your poetry; and ſome learned men of Germany, who ſaw a panegyrick of yours on the late King, ſpoke of it to Mr. d'Avaux Embaſſador for the peace at Munſter, and ſaid that it was one of the fineſt pieces they had ever ſeen. Such an elogium did not any way ſurprize that excellent man, who knew your merit, and who knew how greatly you was eſteemed by Believre and Depeſſes, as well as Father Gondran General of the Oratory, who, ſpeaking of your verſes, ſaid they were not dictated by man. ..... Collect all your noble compoſitions, which are in looſe ſheets, ſome of them printed, and others in MS. Theſe will form a very conſiderable collection: and I am certain that an honourable place will be aſſigned to it in the beſt choſen libraries. The variety will be admirable; becauſe, beſides that the ſubjects which are very different from one another, you have employed very aptly all kinds of ſtyles and characters of the beſt Authors of antiquity, but without taking whole verſes or periods from them, though the words are the ſame; nor their thoughts, your own genius, which is very prolific, ſuggeſting enough to you. As to your elegiac poetry, the verſification of Tibullus and Propertius is not more poliſhed than yours: there is as much wit in them as in Ovid's writings: your Hendecaſyllables are after the manner of thoſe of Catullus: your epiſtles and ſatyrs bear a great reſemblance to thoſe of Horace: and your epigrams are as ſprightly and witty as thoſe of Martial. I do not mention your heroic poetry, your genius for which you have ſufficiently ſhewn in your panegyrick on the late King, and in ſeveral ſacred pieces dedicated by you to Cardinal de Richelieu, the year his Majeſty was born (2). Abbé de Marolles informs us in another place (3), that he kept, among the pieces of his own writing, an epiſtle to "Abbot Pinon, who delights ſo "much in Latin poetry, that no poet in this age "writes more pieces in every kind of poeſy, and in "which all judges allow him to have ſucceeded to "perfection. And though he had writ nothing but "his Foreſt of Pine-trees, entitled by him Pinea "Sylva; yet this is ſo perfect a piece, that one "might juſtly doubt whether any of the antients had "more genius, wit, and invention, than he, to ex-"preſs clearly and agreeably all his ideas, wherein "is conſidered the great number of perſons of all "ranks who have employed themſelves that way, "to whom alſo due praiſe could not be refuſed, in "caſe particulars were to be examined, which ſub-"ject has been expatiated elſewhere; but they cer-"tainly could not be finer than thoſe of Abbot "Pinon."

(2) Abbot de Marolles, Dedication to the tranſlation of Ovid, in Ibin.

(3) Ibid. in the catalogue of his works, p. 22.

The reader will doubtleſs wonder that Poems, on which ſo many elogiums were beſtowed publickly, ſhould be quite unknown in foreign countries; and that even ſo little notice ſhould have been taken of them in France, that Baillet has not given them a place in his vaſt collection of Poets: but two things muſt be conſidered; firſt, that a great deal ought always to be ſubtracted from the encomiums which are beſtowed publickly by friends; ſecondly, that Abbot de Condé, in all probability, did not follow his friend's advice, in collecting his ſcattered poems, and printing them in a volume. This was almoſt the only way of preſerving them: for pamphlets which contain only a few pages, though ever ſo finely written, are ſoon ſcattered (4): and, if not bound, are quite loſt in thirty years time; for which reaſon a ſecond edition ought to be made of them in one volume. Bookſellers undertake with pleaſure this trouble, with regard to ſuch French Poems as have had the good luck to pleaſe ſeverally: but they muſt be ſolicited and encouraged, when a Collection of Latin Poems is to be printed.

(4) We might apply to Poets, in a ſenſe of accommodation, the following verſes of Virgil. Foliis tantum ne carmina manda; Ne turbata volent rapidis ludibria ventis. i. e. "But oh! "commit not "thy prophetic "mind "To flitting "leaves, the "ſport of every "wind; "Leſt they diſ-"perſe in air or "empty fate, "&c." Dryden. See Nouv. de la Rep. des Lettres, for Feb. 1687, at the cloſe of the firſt article. Æneid. lib. 6. ver. 74.

PINSSON (FRANCIS), Profeſſor of the Civil Law in Bourges, was admitted to that employment the 8th of February 1611. He had before taught, for ſome time, the inſtitutes in that city. He applied himſelf ſo diligently to the duties of his profeſſion, that he never failed in his Lectures; and, rather than miſs any of them, he uſed frequently to travel five leagues from his country-houſe, in order to be at his auditory at the time appointed. He taught the Canon Law a great many years, and had always five or ſix hundred ſcholars. He died at Bourges in 1643, aged ſixty three years. His firſt wife was Mary Bengy *, daughter of Anthony Bengy, whom I ſhall mention hereunder [A], and his ſecond wife N. d'Amours. He had no children but by his firſt wife. We are promiſed

* It ſhould be Bargy. From the addit. to vol. 4. p. 973. col. 1. of the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict.

[A] Anthony Bengy, whom I ſhall mention hereunder.] This Anthony Bengy, Eſq; Sieur de Puy-Valleé, was taken from the bar at twenty ſix years of age, to ſucceed Cujas in his profeſſorſhip of the civil law at Bourges in 1595. He exerciſed this employment with great aſſiduity till his death, which happened in 1616, promiſed the publication of the things (a) he dictated in the ſchools of Bourges in 1625, Ad Philippi Imperatoris reſcripta; his Commentary on the Epiſtles of Pope Honorius III. and his funeral Oration ſpoke at the opening of the ſchool of Bourges in 1643, by Mr. de Roye, who was afterwards Law-Profeſſor in Angers (b).

(a) Mr. Pinſſon des Riolles his grandſon, intends to print thoſe pieces.

(b) Extracted from a manuſcript memoir.

1616, and had had two thouſand ſcholars. He dictated, among other things, the treatiſe on benefices, as far as Chap. IV. entitled De oneribus & immunitatibus Eccleſiarum. I ſhall ſpeak of it hereunder (1). He was Echevin (a kind of Sheriff) of Bourges in 1603 and 1604. The ſpeech he made at the opening of his Lectures in 1600, was printed the ſame year at Bourges, and entitled, Concio funebris in memoriam defuncti Joannis Mercerii Juris utriuſque Doctoris in Schola Biturigum (2). He wrote an epitaph on Cujas, which is printed no where but in the collection of Privileges and Antiquities of Bourges of John Chenu, but not in the laſt collection of the works of Cujas in ten volumes by Mr. Fabrot. In 1614 he wrote the epitaph of Marſhal de la Châtre which was never printed. I am to obſerve, that he had been a Counſellor in the profeſſorſhip of Bourges, He left, among other children, a ſon, who was his Majeſty's Counſellor and Advocate in the Preſidial Court of Bourges; afterwards the King's Advocate in the Finances or Exchequer; and who married, in 1618, Francis Chenu, daughter of John Chenu, a famous Advocate, and Author of ſeveral works (3).

(1) In the rem. [A] of the following article, in the title of the firſt book publiſhed by Francis Pinſſon the Advocate.

(2) To this funeral oration was added, honeſtorum virorum lamenta Latinis Græcis & Gallicis verſibus ſcripta. All theſe take up 38 pages in 4to.

(3) Extracted from a manuſcript memoir.

PINSSON (FRANCIS), ſon of the foregoing, was born in Bourges the 5th of April 1612; and after he had compleated all his ſtudies in that city, and even taken his degree, he came to Paris, where he was admitted an advocate the 5th of November 1533. He firſt applied himſelf to the Chatelet, and afterwards to the King's Bench, where he had a great deal of buſineſs, eſpecially in affairs relating to benefices. He printed ſeveral books on that ſubject. Hereunder is a catalogue of all the works he publiſhed [A], whence it may be juſtly inferred, that he was a man of great capacity and reputation. He was Batonnier of the Company of Advocates and Attornies of Parliament in 1682 [B]; and was admitted one of the twenty four honorary Doctors of the Faculty of the Impoſts at Paris, in the room of Mr. Boſcager, the 25th of February 1688. At his death he was Sub-Dean of the Company of Advocates the 10th of October 1691, aged upwards of threeſcore and nineteen, and was buried at St. Stephen du Mont. He left ſeveral children (a), and among the reſt, Mr. Pinſſon des Riolles, Advocate in the Parliament

(a) Extracted from a manuſcript memoir.

[A] A catalogue of all the works he publiſhed.] It appears to me ſo well drawn up, that I ſhall tranſcribe it verbatim as I received it. "The firſt work publiſhed by Francis Pinſſon was his Latin treatiſe on eccleſiaſtical benefices, which he finiſhed after the deceaſe of Mr. Bengy, his grandfather by the mother's ſide, for which reaſon this work is entitled as follows: Antonii Bengei in Alma Biturigum Academia Anteceſſoris primicerii, & Franciſci Pinſſonii Pariſienſis Advocati ejuſdem ex filia Nepotis Tractatus de Beneficiis Eccleſiaſticis ex definitione deſumptus ad uſum fori Gallici & libertatum Eccleſiæ Gallicanæ accommodatus, Pariſiis ſumptibus Antonii de Sommaville 1654, in folio, dedicated to Mr. du Bellievre, the firſt Preſident. He has reviſed, corrected, and enlarged that work conſiderably, which is now ready for the preſs, he having even obtained the Chancellor's privilege for that purpoſe. In 1663 he cauſed to be printed by Francis Muguet in 4to. Sancti Ludovici Francorum Regis Pragmatica Sanctio, & in eam hiſtorica præfatio & Commentarius, dedicated to his Majeſty. In 1666 he printed that of Charles VII. with the following title: Caroli Septimi Francorum Regis Pragmatica Sanctio cum gloſſis Domini Coſmæ Guymier Pariſini ſupremæ Gallicarum curiæ Senatoris, & Inquiſitionum præſidis, & additionibus Philippi Probi Biturici ad Pragmaticæ Sanctionis & Concordatorum diſſidia componenda; accedunt hiſtoria Pragmaticæ Sanctionis & Concordatorum, annotationes marginales, & veterum inſtrumentorum ſupplementa, opera & ſtudio Franciſci Pinſſonii Biturici Advocati Pariſienſis, Pariſiis apud Franciſcum Clouzier 1666, in folio, dedicated to the King. In 1674, he wrote an anſwer to the treatiſes publiſhed at that time under the title of l'Abbé Commendataire, a work in two little volumes 12mo. printed at Colen for Nicholas Schouten in 1673. the one under the name of the Sieur des Bois, Doctor of Laws, who is ſaid to be Gabriel Gerberon, a Benedictin; and the ſecond part in 1674, under the name of the Sieur Fromont, who is ſaid to be Delfau, a Benedictin alſo. This anſwer is only in manuſcript, and will be inſerted in the new edition of his treatiſe on benefices. The 18th of December 1668, he wrote a conſultation or caſe, ſince printed in the ſecond volume of his Traité des Regales, to ſhew that the King, by virtue of the treaty of peace of Aix la Chapelle, containing the ceſſion of the city of Ath, has a juſt right to the fortreſs of Condé, as being dependent on the Châtellenie of Aith. Since the 17th of June 1669, he wrote another printed in the ſame place, and which is a ſequel of the foregoing, wherein he ſhews, that the additional buildings in the city of Condé ought to belong to the King, as well as the city itſelf. In 1673 he publiſhed ſome ſummary notes on the indulto's granted to the King, printed in two volumes 12mo. by Charles de Sercy, and dedicated to his Majeſty. In 1681 he publiſhed his notes on the Corpus Juris Canonici inſerted in the works of Charles du Moulin, in the fourth volume of this laſt edition, with the following title: Franciſci Pinſſonii Biturici Pariſienſis Advocati Manuale juris Pontificii Cæſarei & Gallici, compactum ex annotationibus Caroli Molinæi ad jus Pontificium ſive Canonicum; adverſariis Gabrielis du Pineau (1) Senatoris Andegavenſis ad Molinæanas annotationes, animadverſionibuſque ejuſdem Pinſonii ad utrumque; in quibus jus quotidianum & forenſe exhibetur ex libertatum Eccleſiæ Gallicanæ uberiori penu: Conſtitutionum Regiarum tùm antiquiorum, tùm recentiorum inexhauſto fonte, & ſuperiorum Galliæ tribunalium decretorio ſtylo. Theſe notes are dedicated to Mr. Colbert, in folio, at Paris by Guignard, &c. Laſtly, in 1688. his treatiſe on the Regale or the King's rights over eccleſiaſtical benefices (2), dedicated to his Majeſty, was printed by John Guignard and Anthony Dezallier in two volumes 4to. He added to this work the conference on the edict of the Controlle, and the declaration of the regiſtering of benefices (3), with ſeveral other inſtructions on matters beneficiary, dedicated to Mr. de Lamoignon, the Advocate General, and Mr. de Lamoignon de Baſville, Intendant of Languedoc. He alſo had a hand in the publication of Anthony Mornac's works, printed in four volumes folio, for Anthony de Sommaville in 1654; and the two laſt editions of Charles du Moulin's works. He alſo wrote ſome remarks on a work of Mr. du Bois, Advocate of Parliament, entitled, Maxims of the Canon Law, which have been publiſhed ſeveral times with the book, by John Guignard, in two volumes 12mo, 1678 and 1684, &c. by Denis Simon, Counſellor in the Preſidial Court, and Aſſiſtant Judge in the Marſhalſea of Beauvais (4)."

(1) He whom I mentioned before, in the article PINEAU (GABRIEL DU).

(2) See the extract of it in the Acta Eruditor. Tom. 1. of the Supplement, p. 570 & ſeq.

(3) Extracted from a manuſcript memoir.

(4) Furetiere's Dict. under the word Baſtonnier.

[B] He was Bâtonnier of the Company of Advocates lament of Paris, a Gentleman of merit; very well known to the Literati, and a very kind friend. He is writing, among other works, the lives of the poſſeſſors of Bourges.

and Attornies of Parliament.] As many of my readers may not have Furetiere's Dictionary, I will here explain the meaning of the word Bâtonnier. "It is "a Law-term, and ſignifies an antient Advocate, "who is choſen annually, according to ſeniority, to "be Principal of the Company of Advocates and "Attornies; to be Maſter of their Chapel and Fra- "ternity; and to preſide, when they aſſemble, for "maintaining the good order of the Court of Juſ- "tice, and the ſeveral regulations. To him alſo be- "longs the commiſſion of the employments of ſub- "altern Judges, whilſt they are ſilenced." The Authors of the Acta Eruditorum, make a very juſt excuſe, for their not giving an extract of this part of the work; Quia, ſay they, ibid. p. 574. nec res nec verba facile intelligi poſſunt ab iis qui extra Galliam vivunt, & tabem illam fori Eccleſiaſtici, liteſque innumeras, ut & diſſenſiones ignorant, quæ non ſolum inter partes fervent, ſed & ſæpe inter Parliamentum & Tribunal regium. i. e. "Becauſe neither the things nor "the words can eaſily be underſtood by ſuch perſons "as live out of France; and that they know no- "thing of this reproach of the Eccleſiaſtical Courts, "the numberleſs law-ſuits, and the conteſts which "ariſe, not only between the parties, but often be- "tween the Parliament and his Majeſty's Council."

PISTORIUS (JOHN), ſirnamed Niddanus, becauſe he was of Nidda in the country of Heſſen, gained a great reputation by his learning and his works. His Father JOHN PISTORIUS was a Knight of Malta, but he profeſſed Luther's Reformation very ſoon, and was one of the Miniſters who were preſent at the reading of the Augſburg Confeſſion in the Imperial Chamber, July the 25th 1530. He was the firſt who was appointed Superintendent of the Churches in the county of Nidda, and died January the 25th 1583, at the age of fourſcore and one (a). His ſon, who is the ſubject of this Article, was born February the 4th 1546. He choſe at firſt to follow the profeſſion of a Phyſician, and took his degree of Doctor in that Faculty; but he applied himſelf afterwards to the Law.

(a) Ex Frehero, in Theatro, p. 348.

☞ PITCAIRNE (ARCHIBALD (a), and eminent Phyſician an great promoter of mechanical principles of Phyſic, was born at Edinburgh Dec. 25. 1652. His Father was a Merchant and a Magiſtrate of that city, deſcended of an antient family in Fife, in which county the lands of Pitcairne had belonged to them for ſeveral ages [A]. He begun his ſtudies at the ſchool of Dalkeith, a village near Edinburgh; and having gone through a courſe of Philoſophy in the Univerſity of Edinburgh, he applied himſelf at firſt to the ſtudy of Divinity, which he ſoon grew weary of, and changed for that of the Civil Law. He had not continued his ſtudies long, when by too aſſiduous an application his health was conſiderably impaired; ſo that he grew hectic, and had all the appearances of a conſumption; for which being adviſed by his Phyſicians to travel to Montpellier in the South of France, he found himſelf entirely recovered by the time he reached Paris. He reſolved to proſecute the ſtudy of the Law in that Univerſity, but meeting with ſome of his countrymen there, who were ſtudents of Phyſic, and who informed him that there was no able Profeſſor of Law at Paris, he was perſuaded to join with them in their ſtudies during his abode there, which was only for a few months. Being called home ſo ſoon by his parents, it could not be expected that he ſhould have made any great progreſs in ſo ſhort a time; ſo that upon his return to his own country, he was abſolutely undetermined which profeſſion to follow. It was then he applied himſelf to the Mathematics, in which he made a prodigious progreſs without the aſſiſtance of a maſter. At laſt reſolving in earneſt to purſue that ſtudy of Phyſic, after applying himſelf for ſome time at Edinburgh to Botany, Pharmacy, and the Materia Medica, he went to Paris a ſecond time, where he finiſhed his ſtudies; and upon his return to Scotland came very ſoon into great reputation, ſo that within a few years, before he had publiſhed any thing conſiderable to recommend himſelf to the learned world [B], he had an invitation from the Curators of the Univerſity of Leyden to be Profeſſor of Phyſic there, which he accepted of. He pronounced his inaugural Oration April the 26th 1692. N. S. with great applauſe; and immediately got the ordinary ſtipend augmented by half. He continued there little more than a year, during which ſhort ſpace he publiſhed ſeveral Diſſertations, wherein by explaining ſome of the moſt important as well as moſt difficult parts of the animal Oeconomy, he has ſhewn the uſefulneſs of the Mathematics in improving the Theory of Phyſick. He returned to Scotland in the year 1693 to diſcharge an engagement, which he was under to a young Lady, daughter to Sir Archibald Stevenſon, an eminent Phyſician in Edinburgh; and being ſoon after married to her, was fully reſolved to ſet out again for Holland at the time the Colleges uſe to open at Leyden; but finding Sir Archibald and his Lady very unwilling to part with their daughter, in compliance with their earneſt entreaties, though againſt his own inclination, he ſettled at Edinburg, and wrote

(a) The particulars of this article were communicated by a very intimate and learned friend of our Author.

[A] Deſcended of an antient family in Fife, in which county the lands of Pitcairne had belonged to them for ſeveral ages.] In the reign of James IV. of Scotland, Andrew Pitcairne, of Pitcairne, went with his ſeven ſons to the battle of Flouden, where they were all killed. The widow was delivered of a poſthumous ſon; but by the hardſhips of thoſe times, both were turned out of poſſeſſion. The Doctor had amongſt the charters of his family, one from James V. reſtoring the widow to her jointure, and the heir to his eſtate, with this honourable narrative, that his father with ſeven ſons had died on Flouden-field, fighting valiantly for his royal father. The Doctor's mother's name was Sydſerf, of a good family in Eaſt Lothian, deſigned of Rochlaw.

[B] Before he had publiſhed any thing conſiderable to recommend himſelf to the learned world.] He had publiſhed nothing but the Solutio Problematis de Inventoribus, in 1688.

[C] He

wrote a valedictory letter to the Univerſity of Leyden. His extenſive practice made ſufficient amends for the loſs of his Profeſſorſhip; but the abrupt manner of taking leave, as it was diſobliging to his Collegues and the Curators of the Univerſity, ſo it was exceedingly diſagreeable to himſelf. He publiſhed his Diſſertations in one volume with ſome new ones in 1701 [C]; and dedicated them to the famous Bellini, Profeſſor at Piſa, in return to the ſame compliment, which the latter had made him, when he publiſhed his Opuſcula. This edition being printed in Holland, was by reaſon of the Author's diſtance from the preſs extremely incorrect; and as ſeveral pamphlets were publiſhed againſt his works, ſome advantage was taken even from the errors of the preſs. It was an eaſy taſk for his friends to repel theſe attacks; for he never gave himſelf any trouble about them. The laſt edition publiſhed in his life-time came out at Edinburgh a few months before his death, which happened October the 20th 1713. He was then in no capacity to reviſe it, or finiſh ſome rude draughts of papers, which were taken from his Adverſaria,

[C] He publiſhed his Diſſertations in one volume, with ſome new ones, in 1701.] They were printed at Rotterdam in 4to, under this title, Archibaldi Pitcairnii Diſputationes Medicæ. This volume contains 8 diſſertations. The 1ſt is concerning the Principles of Geometry, which are the only ones that can be applied to Phyſic. The 2d is concerning the circulation of the blood by the ſmalleſt veſſels. The 3d, concerning the cauſes of the different quantity of blood, which is carried to the lungs of animals not yet born, and of ſuch as are already born. The 4th, concerning the motion, whereby food becomes fit to ſupply the blood. The 5th, concerning the inventors. The 6th, concerning the circulation of the blood in animals that are born, and thoſe that are not. The 7th, concerning the cure of fevers by evacuating medicines. The 8th, concerning the effects of acids and alcali's in the cure of diſeaſes. In the firſt diſſertation our Author obſerves, that nothing hinders Phyſic more from being improved, than the curioſity of ſearching into the natural cauſes of the effects of medicines. The buſineſs of men is to know the virtues of medicines; but to inquire whence they have that power, is a ſuperfluous amuſement, ſince nature lies concealed. Beſides, this knowledge, if it were poſſible, would be uſeleſs. A Phyſician ought therefore to apply himſelf to diſcover by experience the effects of medicines and diſeaſes; and reduce his obſervations into maxims, and not needleſsly fatigue himſelf by enquiring into their cauſes, which are neither poſſible nor neceſſary to be known. If all Phyſicians would act thus, we ſhould not ſee Phyſick divided into ſo many ſects. There would be but one ſentiment, ſince men would then found their opinion on obſervation and experience. Remark the Aſtronomers; they do not trouble themſelves with ſubſtantial forms, or ſubtile matter, or concourſe of atoms; and yet they know exactly the motions of the heavens. Phyſicians ought to act in the ſame manner; they ought to examine well the effects, which medicines produce, and obſerve the motions in human bodies, and paſs by all the reſt as a curioſity, which ſerves only to introduce errors, that are unjuſtly charged on Phyſic, inſtead of being imputed to Phyſicians. An art, the deſign of which is to preſerve men's lives, ought not to be built on ſuch weak and frivolous foundations as ſyſtems, which any perſons may form. They ought to look back to the antient times, in order to obſerve what was then diſcovered; and to add to this all modern diſcoveries, and to make ſome themſelves, and to lay a foundation independent of the caprices of opinion. The antients being miſled by a love to particular ſects of philoſophy, introduced into Phyſic the fear of a vacuum, occult qualities, &c. and the better to deceive themſelves and others, they laid down this axiom, that the Phyſicians begin where the Naturaliſts end. How deformed ſoever the face of Phyſic was then, our Author obſerves, that it is no leſs ſo now, notwithſtanding the many happy diſcoveries which have been made in Botany and Anatomy of late years. It is true, we hear no more mention of the qualities, the fear of a Vacuum, attractive virtues, and ſubſtantial forms; but we ſpeak of pores differently ſhaped, ſecret fermentations, ſubtile matter, &c. terms which are no more inſtructive than thoſe of the antients. And I dare add, ſays our Author, that it will be eaſy to prove, that there is no ferment in the glands of the body; that all the orifices of the veſſels, and all the pores, are of the ſame ſhape, and conſequently that the different configuration of the pores, and the ferments, which Phyſicians have introduced, are mere chimera's. In the ſecond diſſertation he obſerves, that the circulation of the blood is an undoubted fact; but that the manner, by which the blood paſſes from the arteries to circulate in the veins, is a myſtery, which hath never yet been well explained. Some ſay, that this paſſage is made by the glands ſituated at the mouth of the arteries, and the entrance of the veins, and ſo ſerves as a medium for the communication of the blood. Others ſay, that the arteries and veins enter into one another immediately. There are others likewiſe, who maintain, that a vein and an artery is but one and the ſame veſſel bended like a Syphon. Our Author is of the laſt of theſe opinions; only in the place of the bending he ſuppoſes a gland, by the help of which the blood is filtrated before it paſſes into the other branch of the veſſel. He aſſerts, that the various filtrations in the body do not in any manner depend on the different ſhape, which the pores are ſuppoſed to be of, but only on the greatneſs or ſmallneſs of the paſſages, ſince in effect if bodies, which would come out, have leſs diameters than the pores they meet with, the difference of ſhape will not hinder their paſſing. The ſmallneſs or greatneſs of the paſſages is ſufficient to cauſe ſome bodies to paſs, and others to ſtay. This explication is ſimple and natural; and this ſimplicity, ſays he, ought to induce us to think it true, ſince God, that admirable Geometrician, acts always by the moſt ſimple methods. He takes occaſion here to recommend the uſe of Geometry, as it relates to Phyſic. In the third Diſſertation, he endeavours to ſhew, that in order to explain a certain effect we muſt not have recourſe to uncertain cauſes. I cannot bear with thoſe, ſays he, who to give us a reaſon of the effect of mercury in diſeaſes, make no difficulty to aſcribe to this mineral a virtue like that of Lixivial Salts extracted from plants, ſo that, ſay they, it is not ſtrange, that Mercury having the quality of thoſe ſalts draws along with it the acid ſalts, which cure the diſeaſes, where it is uſed. This explication ſuppoſes two doubtful, not to ſay falſe things to be true, viz. that the diſeaſes, which are cured by mercury, proceed from too great an acid; and that mercury is of the nature of ſalts, which are extracted from vegetables by calcination. They argue no better, ſays our Author, who, in order to ſhew why Guiacum is the moſt proper of all woods for theſe diſeaſes, ſay, that Guiacum is of the ſame nature with volatile ſalts; for this is ſuppoſing, that the action of the ſtomach and inteſtines occaſion in things, which enter into the body, the ſame changes as the action of fire by chemical operations, which is very doubtful. As for me, ſays our Author, I obſerve, that among the minerals uſed by Phyſicians againſt the ſame diſeaſes, mercury is the moſt weighty, and conſequently preſſes with moſt force againſt the obſtacles, which it meets with it, and moves them moſt violently. But to know whether Mercury be of an analogous nature with Salt of Tartar, is impoſſible, unleſs we can ſhew that gold is of the nature of acids, and at the ſame time be able to prove ſeveral other doubtful points. But to return to Guaiacum, the acid liquor, which is drawn thence by diſtillation, cannot be a ſign of the heavineſs of that wood; but at the ſame time it is not one of a ſmall force, that ought to be uſed againſt acids. Thence it follows, that mercury hath ſo much more virtue, the more it is purified from every light body; and that gold reduced into a form proper to mingle itſelf with the blood cannot ſurpaſs in virtue other medicines but as it exceeds them in weight. Theſe reflections are uſeful to thoſe, who would explain the reſpiration of animals; for in this more than in any other ſubject Phyſicians are apt to ſuppoſe many falſe things to be true. In order to explain reſpiration, our Author gives us a particular detail of the moſt ſimple Phænomena, which are obſerved in it; and then aſks with Dr. Harvey, whence it comes to paſs, that the infant doth not die in its mother's belly, though it receives no air through the windpipe; and yet as ſoon as it is born and breathes, it cannot live without reſpiration. He inquires alſo why an infant born in its teguments and waters, or taken out ſo by operation, continues ſeveral hours without being ſuffocated; and that as ſoon as theſe teguments are broke, and air gets into the lungs, it cannot live without air. Before he reſolves theſe queſtions, he relates what learned Phyſicians have moſt plauſibly aſſerted on theſe ſubjects; and proves, that they have often forgot the rules which he laid down at firſt, viz. that we muſt not, in order to explain any Phænomena, ſuppoſe for truth that which is doubtful. Borelli is the firſt, whoſe opinion he examines: that learned writer ſays in his treatiſe of the motion of animals, that particles of air are mixed with the blood by help of reſpiration. George Wolfgangus is almoſt of the ſame opinion in his book of Phiſiology Reformed, p. 127. Bohnius ſays in his anatomy, that by reſpiration there enters into the blood ſubtile air; but that it hath no ſpring, though with relation to continual motion, which is proper to a ſpherical figure, it is in itſelf, ſays he, the cauſe of the elaſtic virtue of the air. Our Author obſerves, that we ſuppoſe a fact not true, when we ſuppoſe that air enters into the blood by reſpiration. He examines the reaſons, that Dr. Richard Lower, John Majow, and ſome others urge to prove, that it enters into the blood, and endeavours to confute them. He then explains the ſeveral Phænomena related by him, and concludes this diſſertation with obſerving, that the reaſon, which induced him to write, was to ſhew Phyſicians, that they ought not always to think that they have ſolved the difficulties propoſed to them, when they have called to their aſſiſtance, figures, pores, ætherial matter, ſalts, ſecret motions, and an infinite number of other terms, which properly ſpeaking are but pompous names for vain-glorious ignorance. In the fourth Diſſertation he propoſes to ſhew, that the Digeſtion of our aliments is not cauſed by an acid, ſalt, or ſharp liquor, or by any other diſſolvent. Van Helmont's and Veledius's Archeus pleaſes him as little. He owns no other cauſe of digeſtion than the motion of the food performed by the help of the tunicles of the ſtomach. In the fifth Diſſertation he treats of Inventors, and gives us rules to know, whether an Author had really diſcovered that which ſome ſay he has, and others ſay he has not diſcovered. He mentions as an inſtance, the pretence of ſome, that Hippocrates had diſcovered the circulation of the blood, which he declares to be falſe. He explains the word period, which Hippocrates uſed with relation to the blood, and proves that we groſsly deceive ourſelves, if we think that Hippocrates uſed this word in any other ſenſe than that of fluctuation. In this point our Author differs from Monſieur Dacier; who in the Preface to his tranſlation of Hippocrates pretends, that he perfectly knew this circulation. In the ſixth Diſſertation Dr. Pitcairne explains the various Phænomena of the circulation of the blood. He amply inquires into the effects of opium, and refutes Etmuller's opinion on the head. In the ſeventh Diſſertation he treats of the cure of fevers by evacuating medicines. He pretends, that the beſt way of curing a fever is to cauſe ſweat; and gives this reaſon for it, that the evacuation made by tranſpiration is much greater than that made by ſalts and urine; and that ſo it is eaſier to cure a fever by this way than by any other. He compares thoſe three kinds of evacuation together, and is of Sanctorius's opinion, that evacuation made by ſalts is of four parts, that of urine ſixteen, and that of tranſpiration forty. In the eighth Diſſertation he attacks the opinion of thoſe, who attempt to explain all by acid and alkali; and obſerves, that theſe do neither good nor harm; and relates ſeveral remarkable experiments to prove this.

Adverſaria, and never deſigned to be publiſhed in the ſame form wherein they appear. His dictates to his ſcholars, which he always was at great pains to ſuppreſs [D], were printed ſome years after his death both in England and Holland, under the title of Elementa Medicinæ Phyſico-Mathematica, from an imperfect and incorrect copy. As he had not continued above a year in the Profeſſor's chair, he could not have taken much time or pains in theſe dictates, and as he had never reviſed them after he had left Holland, it could not be expected, that they ſhould be a very finiſhed work. It contains however many uncommon things not unworthy of its Author. The Diſſertatio de Legibus Hiſtoriæ Naturalis written by him for his diverſion, while he was confined by a fit of ſickneſs; but upon his recovery being reconciled to Sir Robert Sibbald, againſt whoſe Prodromus Hiſtoriæ Naturalis Scotiæ it was written, he ſuppreſſed it for fourteen years; and ſome copies of it coming abroad by accident, he diſowned it; ſo that Sir Robert believing it not to be his, wrote an anſwer to it, and dedicated it to him. He never finiſhed the Commentary on Caſſii Problemata, which he promiſed to publiſh, though it was pretty near complete; and the papers are now loſt. He diverted himſelf at his leiſure hours with Latin poetry, for which he had no ſmall talent, as appears from ſome of his compoſitions equal to the beſt performances of the moderns. He publiſhed himſelf a few of them under the title of Poemata Selecta, moſtly epigrams of the Lyric kind. A larger edition of them has been publiſhed ſince his death with the addition of ſome trifles by other hands to encreaſe the volume. The tranſlation of the 104th Pſalm was the production of a Certamen Poeticum, with Walter Danniſton, a country ſchoolmaſter and no bad Poet; which, upon acknowledging it to be better than his tranſlation, he allowed him to publiſh as his own. He borrowed Danniſton's name to many of his poems afterwards; one of which is publiſhed and tranſlated by Mr. Prior in his collection of Poems. His poetry has been accuſed of obſcurity, which indeed he affected in many of his pieces on a political account, he being no friend to the Revolution, which happened in his time. Beſides, many poems both antient and modern founded on private hiſtory fall under the imputation of obſcurity. Dr. Pitcairne's Poem ad Robertum Lindeſium is an inſtance of this, which is quite unintelligible without knowing a circumſtance of the Doctor's life, which he often told, and never without ſome commotion of ſpirit.

[D] His dictates to his ſcholars, which he was always at great pains to ſuppreſs.] He ſhews ſome concern about this in his Diſſertatio de Circulatione Sanguinis in Animalibus genitis & non genitis, § 16. His words are:

rit. His friend Mr. Lindeſey upon reading with the Doctor, when very young, the known ſtory of the two Platonic Philoſophers, who promiſed to one another, that whoever died firſt, ſhould return a viſit to his ſurviving companion, entered into the ſame engagement with him. Some years after Pitcairne at his father's houſe in Fife dreamed one morning, that Lindeſey, who was then at Paris, came to him and told him, that he was not dead, as was commonly reported, but ſtill alive, and lived in a very agreeable place to which he could not as yet carry him. By the courſe of the poſt news came of Lindeſey's death, which happened very ſuddenly the very morning of the dream. After knowing this the Poem is eaſily underſtood, Lindeſi, ſtygias jamdudum vectæ per Undas, &c. An ingenious Fiction entitled, Archimedis ad Regem Gelonem Epiſtola, Albæ Græcæ reperta, is generally aſcribed to our Author, and the more probably ſo, ſince the chaſm at the end of it is ſuppoſed to be ſupplied with his Diſſertatio de Inventoribus.

are; Evidens eſt virum illum doctiſſimum [Etmullerum] ſuo emendatiora fuiſſe editurum, ſi per fata aſpera licuiſſet; omniaque illa quæ titulum Praxeos Etmullerianæ nunc ferunt, in lucem eſſe protruſa ab hominibus inhoneſto quæſtui inhiantibus. Quod ideo commemoro, ne quis meæ eſſe credat, quæ Bibliopolæ tanquam diſcipulis meis dictata, me inſcio, forſitan emittant. T.

PITHOM, a city in Egypt. It was one of the two cities which Pharoah cauſed the deſcendants of Jacob to build (a). If we may believe Sir John Marſham (b), it is the ſame with that which was called Peluſium, and with that which Manetho calls Abaris. That city of Abaris was called thus according to the antient Theology (c). It was ſituated in the diſtrict or diviſion of Sais on the Eaſt of the River Bubaſtis (d). Its agreeable ſituation determined Saltis, King of a certain nation who had ſubdued Egypt, to enlarge and fortify it. He kept there a garriſon of two hundred and forty thouſand men. In that city the ſame nation entrenched herſelf after ſhe had loſt again all the reſt of Egypt. They defended themſelves there a great while, but capitulated at laſt, and obtained the liberty to retire whitherſoever they pleaſed. They went into Syria and ſettled in Sudea (e). It appears from that diſcourſe of Manetho, that he meant the Iſraelites. He adds (f) that Amenophis, who about five Centuries after reigned over the Egyptians, wiſhed to ſee the Gods, and that a great Prophet gave him hopes that he ſhould have that comfort, in caſe Egypt was cleared of all ſorts of perſons infected with the leproſy, or ſuch other diſtempers. They gathered all thoſe people together, and found fourſcore thouſand of them: they were ſet about drawing and cutting ſtones along the Nile. Having bore that hard labour for ſome years, they petitioned the King to appoint them a city where they might live ſecure and quietly. He granted them the city of Abaris, which was then uninhabited, and had belonged to the Paſtors (g): it was called the city of Typho according to the antient Theology. They were no ſooner got into that city, but they thought of making an advantage of the place to revolt: they fortified it with care, and choſe for their Chief a Prieſt of Heliopolis, who changed his name of Oſarſiphus into that of Moſes: they were aſſiſted by the inhabitants of Jeruſalem, whoſe anceſtors had been in poſſeſſion of Abaris, &c. Their victories were great and cruel; but at laſt the King of Egypt vanquiſhed them, and drove them out of the country (h). You will meet with the refutation of theſe ſtories in Joſephus, and with ſome inſtances of Sir John Marſham's learning in my remark [A].

(a) Exod. chap. i. ver. 11.

(b) Marſh. Chron. Can. Sæculo 8. p. m. 107.

(c) Manetho, apud Joſephum, lib. 1. contra Appium, p. 1040.

(d) Idem, apud eund. ibidem, p. 1039.

(e) Ex eodem, apud eund. p. 1040.

(f) Idem, apud eund. ibidem, p. 1052.

(g) That is to ſay, to the Iſraelites, who, according to Manetho, had ſubdued Egypt, and whoſe King, Saltis, had enlarged and fortified the city of Abaris.

(h) Manetho, apud Joſephum, lib. 1. contra Appion. p. 1052, & ſeq.

[A] You will meet with ſome inſtances of Sir John Marſham's learning in my remark.] He obſerves (1), that the city of the Paſtors, named Abaris by Manetho, is called Peluſium by another Hiſtorian of Egypt (2). This is not accurate: that Hiſtorian obſerves only that the maimed and diſtempered perſons, who were driven out of Egypt retired to Peluſium, where they joined with 308 thouſand men, whom Amenophis had left there. Obſerve that Joſephus (3) made an advantage of the difference there is between Manetho and Chæremon as to the place, whither theſe lame and leprous perſons were ſent. Sir John adds that Ptolomæus Mendeſius (4) mentioned the city of Abaris (5), and that the fables concerning Typho belong to that city. The Lake Serbonide, continues he, where Typho had been hid (6), and the city Heropolis, where he was ſtruck with a thunder-bolt, were not far from theſe quarters (7). The name πιθὼμ or πιθὼμ given to one of the cities built by the children of Iſrael, alludes to the name of Typho. The Egyptians always called this Typho by the name of Seth (8), hence it is that they called Typho's city Sethron. The diſtrict or diviſion of Sethron was thus called from the name of that city. And therefore what we read in Joſephus is not true, namely, that the city of Abaris was built in the diſtrict of Sais: for it was ſituated on the Eaſt ſide of the River Babaſtius, and that diſtrict was ſituated in the Weſtern part of the Delta. It is better therefore to follow the Manetho of Africanus (9), quoted by Syncellus: for according to that quotation theſe people took Memphis, and built a city in the diſtrict of Sethron. Let us infer from thence, that the city of Abaris, of Typho, of Sethron, of Pithom, mentioned in Exodus, are the ſame which the Greeks called Peluſium. Theſe are Sir John Marſham's inferences.

(1) Marſh. Chron. Can. Egypt. Sæculo 8. p. 107.

(2) Named Chæremon, Joſephus, lib. 1. contra Appion. p. 1057, tranſcribes his words.

(3) Joſephus, ubi ſupra.

(4) Ptolom. Mendeſius, apud Euſebium, Præparat. Evangelicæ, lib. 10. cap. 12. p. 497, A.

(5) He calls it Ἄβαρις.

(6) Herodotus, lib. 3. cap. 5.

(7) Steph. Byſantinus, in Ἡρώ.

(8) Plut de Iſide, p. 357, D.

(9) Rectius ex Manethone Africanus, Marſh. Chron. Can. Egypt. Sæculo 8. p. 108. He quotes Syncelus, p. 61, a.

PITISCUS (BARTHOLOMEW), Preacher to the Elector Palatine, was born the 24th of Auguſt 1561 at Schlauna, a village in Sileſia near Grunberg. The bad circumſtances of his family determined the Miniſter of his native place to recommend him to the Lord of that village, as a lad proper for the ſciences, and who deſerved to be furniſhed with the neceſſary means to proſecute his ſtudies. That Gentleman promiſed to pay his expences, and ſent him to the ſchool of Grunberg. The young lad did ſoon excell above all his ſchool-fellows. At the age of eighteen he was ſent to Breſlaw, and entered as tutor in an honeſt man's family, who had a very fine library. He often ſhut ſhut himſelf up there with Amandus Polanus, which proved very uſeful to them both. Having loſt his Mecænas, when it was time for him to go and viſit the Univerſities, he had the good luck to be aſſiſted by the generoſity of a Lady of the Proteſtant Religion (a), who at her own expence maintained a certain number of young men, who ſtudied Divinity. He choſe the Univerſity of Serveſta, being determined to it by the great reputation of Profeſſor Wolfgang Amlingus, and went thither in the year 1583. The next year he removed into the Palatinate, and after he had given there many inſtances of his great merit, he was appointed (b) one of the tutors to Prince Frederic IV. (c). He acquitted himſelf ſo ſucceſsfully of that employment, that Prince Caſimir, Adminiſtrator of the Palatinate, deſigned him for ſecond Preacher to his pupil, who, when he came to be of age, was ſo well pleaſed with his tutor's ſermons, that he appointed him firſt Preacher to the Court. Pitiſcus acquitted himſelf glorioufly of that employment till his death, which happened the 17th of July 1613 (d). We muſt not omit, that he made a great progreſs in Mathematicks [A], and that he publiſhed a book, in which he ſhewed it was very neceſſary that the Proteſtants ſhould ceaſe writing books of controverſy againſt each other [B]. He did it out of obedience; I mean, that there had been a conſultation upon that ſubject, after which he was ordered to take that work upon himſelf.

(a) Joachin of Bergue's wife.

(b) It was in the year 1588. Scultetus, in Narrat. Apologet. p. 11.

(c) He was afterwards Elector.

(d) Extracted from Melchior Adam, in Vitis Theolog. German. p. 833, & ſeq.

[A] He made a great progreſs in Mathematicks.] In the year 1599 he publiſhed in Latin five books of Trigonometry, which were reprinted with additions in the year 1612. We meet in that work with ſix books of aſtronomical Problems: one book Problematum Geodæticorum ſive de agro plano metiendo ac dividendo, i. e. "Problems concerning the ſurveying, "meaſuring and dividing land." Problemata Geographica, i. e. "Geographical Problems." One book Problematum Gnomonicorum ac Architectonicorum, in quo ſe ait præcipua Architecturæ militaris myſteria reſeraſſe (1), i. e. "Problems relating to Dialling and Architecture, "in which he ſays he has explained the chief myſte- "ries of military Architecture." Ticho Brahe had a great eſteem for our Pitiſcus, on account of his ſkill in the Mathematicks, and wiſhed that the number of Preachers well verſed in that ſcience, were greater: for he imagined that the ſtudy of Mathematicks would give them a more ſolid judgment, and make many controverſies vaniſh away. Here follow his words. Doctiſſimi illius Bartholomæi Pitiſci de triangulis acutum & compendioſum libellum lubens accepi: rogoque ut illi ex me gratias agas. Optarem, plures ejuſmodi concionatores reperiri: qui Geometrica gnaviter callerent: forte plus eſſet in iis circumſpecti & ſolidi judicii, rixarum inanium & logomachiarum minus. Si is mihi aliquando ſcripſerit; & de iis ſtudiis mecum contulerit, inveniet reſponſorem non invitum (2), i. e. "I have re- "ceived with pleaſure the moſt learned Bartholomew "Pitiſcus's ingenious and compendious book about "Triangles, and deſire you to give him thanks in "my name. I wiſh there were more ſuch Preachers, "well verſed in Geometry; this would perhaps give "them a more wiſe and ſolid judgment, and there "would be fewer empty controverſies and diſputes a- "bout words. If he ſhould write to me, and conſult "me about theſe ſtudies, he may be ſure that I will "anſwer him with all my heart." Tycho Brahe's wiſh, which you ſee here grounded on very good reaſons, is nevertheleſs liable to ſome inconveniencies. A pompous eloquence, ſupported with figures of Rhetorick, is neceſſary to all Preachers: a dry and conciſe way of arguing, after the manner of the Mathematicians, is not proper for them, and would not make on their audience ſuch impreſſions, as the condition of man requires. Obſerve, that Pitiſcus learnt of himſelf, without a Maſter, all that he knew of Mathematicks (3).

(1) See Voſſius, de Scient. Mathem. p. 306, & alibi.

(2) Tycho Brahe, Epiſtola ad Conradum Aſſachum, apud Melchior. Adamum, in Vitis Theol. p. 840.

(3) Illud vero mirandum, quod homo Theologus, in Mathematum ſtudiis, nullo, niſi ſe magiſtro, eo uſque progreſſus eſt: ut editis ſcriptis, diſciplinæ illius gloriam magnis Matheſeos profeſſoribus præripuerit. Melchior Adam, ibidem.

[B] That the Proteſtants ſhould ceaſe writing books of controverſy againſt each other.] In the year 1608, the Eccleſiaſtical Senate of the Elector Palatine, took into conſideration what remedies might be uſed againſt the fatal controverſies carried on among the Proteſtant Divines (4). Scultetus, Preacher to his Electoral Highneſs, and ſome others were of opinion, that it was neceſſary, for the good of the church, that for the future the Reformed ſhould ceaſe writing Apologies, Antilogies, and ſuch other pieces of religious controverſies; that nothing could be ſaid, nor wrote, but what had already been ſaid or written long ago; that the Confeſſions of Faith, with the Expoſitions of them, were ſufficient for any one who inquired ſincerely after the truth; that one could not meet with any inſtance of ſuch obſtinate controverſies among the Prophets nor among the Apoſtles; that that kind of books multiplied the controverſies inſtead of ending them: that the ſatyrical bitterneſs, which the Authors diſperſed throughout their works, was a ſport to the profane, made the Papiſts triumph, and inſpired many people with religious ſentiments. The Latin paſſage, which I ſhall now tranſcribe, expreſſes all this more at length, and with a greater ſtrength. Nec componi, ſed multiplicari controverſias iſtis contentionibus: paucos veritatis inquirendæ, gloriolæ vanæ aucupandæ gratiâ multos in arenam diſputandi deſcendere: Diabolum hoc agere; ut totus Spiritus Theologicus, & quicquid ferè DEI providentia donorum huic ſeculo contulit, contentionibus impendatur: ut fratres ſtylo Satyrico ſe mutuò exagitent & deforment, utque adeò per iſſiuſmodi ſcriptiones bonâ à vocationis ſuæ officiis arceantur, mali in capitali, quo ab antagoniſtis diſſident, odio firmentur; denique mutuis iſtis convitiis, quibus libri inter ſe litigantium ſcatent, creari profanis riſum, Pontificiis jubilum, & magnæ auditorum parti omnis religionis contemtum (5), i. e. "That the controverſies are not ended, "but rather encreaſed by thoſe diſputes: few enter "the liſt from a deſire to find out the truth, but ma- "ny from a vain ambition to gain ſome reputation: "that the Devil labours to get the whole Theological "ſpirit, and all the gifts, which God's providence "beſtowed on this age, waſted away in idle contro- "verſies; to make the brethen expoſe and defame "each other by their ſatyrical and bitter ſtyle; that "by that means the good may be drawn off from "the duties of their calling, and the wicked confirm- "ed in that mortal hatred, which they have once "conceived againſt their antagoniſts; laſtly, that "thoſe mutual reproaches, with which the books of "the contending parties abound, are a ſport to the "profane, and a triumph to the Roman Catholicks, "and inſpire a great part of the audience with a "contempt for religion." The concluſion was, that our Pitiſcus ſhould repreſent all this in the ſtrongeſt and moſt ſolemn manner in a publick work. He acquitted himſelf extremely well of the taſk (6). He exhorted the Proteſtants to join all together againſt the common enemy, and to renounce all their controverſies de perſona Chriſti & de cœna Domini, about the perſon of Chriſt, and the Lord's Supper; he repreſented to them, that nothing could hinder them from living together in a perfect union, notwithſtanding they differed about the ſenſe of ſome paſſages of the Scripture (7). That work did more harm than good: for, as though he had given a new ſignal of war, the Divines of Saxony, and thoſe of Tubingen, came from all quarters to take up arms, and maintained with an exceſſive warmth, that the Lutherans cannot make peace with thoſe who deny the oral manducation. Verax & hic fuit, quod proverbii locum obtinuit, ſapientis effatum: ſæpe optimè cogitata peſſimè cadunt. Vix enim lucem publicam aſpexerat pia exhortatio illa, cùm, quaſi claſſicum cecinissent noſtri, ad arma undique concurritur in Saxoniâ & Sueviâ, magnoque ſtudio & labore orbi Chriſtiano demonſtratur: oralis manducationis in Euchariſtiâ patronos non poſſe pacem colere cum Reformatis (8). Scultetus did very much wiſh for a reunion between the Lutherans and the Reformed. He exhorted the Divines of Wittenberg to it, both

(4) Quænam triſtiſſimis Theologorum Evangelicorum certaminibus medicina reperiri queat. Scultet. Narrat. Apologet. p. 45.

(5) Scultet. Narrat. Apol. p. 45.

(6) His book was wrote in the German tongue.

(7) Scultet. Narrat. Apol. p. 46.

(8) Idem, ibid.

ſelf. He publiſhed ſome other books [C].

(9) Expoſitis malis, quæ ex mutuis Evangelicorum digladiationibus orirentur, atheiſmo auditorum, contemptu miniſtrorum verbi, jubilo Papiſtarum. Idem, ibid. p. 72. ad ann. 1616.

both by word of mouth and by his letters: he repreſented to them the misfortunes which would attend their diſunion, namely, the Atheiſm of their Hearers, the contempt of the Miniſters, and the triumph of the Papiſts (9). But all was to no purpoſe: he was anſwered, that as for a political friendſhip it had been never refuſed to the Reformed, and never would be refuſed for the future; but as for a theological friendſhip, that is, a brotherly and chriſtian love, it would never be granted to them. Fruſtrà omnia: Reſponſum enim: ſe in amicitiam politicam nos ſemper recepiſſe, recepturoſque deinceps; in Theologicam, hoc eſt, fraternitatem Chriſtianam nunquam (10).

[C] He publiſhed ſome other books.] Moſt of them in the German tongue; but that which he wrote againſt a Jeſuit of Mentz, and which is intitled Anti-Roſarium, is in Latin. See Monſieur Baillet's Anti's (11).

(10) Ibem, ibid.

(11) Num. 219.

☞ PITS or PITSEUS (JOHN), a learned Engliſh Writer in the 17th Century, ſon of Mr. Henry Pits by Elizabeth his wife, ſiſter to Dr. Nicholas Saunders, was born at Aulton, a Market-town in Hampſhire, and educated at Wykeham's ſchool near Winchester (a). He was admitted Probationer-fellow of New College in Oxford in 1578, being then about eighteen years of age; but leaving that College before he was perpetual Fellow, which was to have been in 1580, he went beyond the ſeas, and at Doway was kindly received by Dr. Thomas Stapleton, who gave him advice relating to his ſtudies. Thence he went to Rheimes, and after one year ſpent in the Engliſh College there, was ſent to the Engliſh College at Rome, where he continued his ſtudies in philoſophy for ſeven years, and was ordained Prieſt. He returned then to Rheims, where he taught Rhetoric and Greek for two years. But the troubles in France induced him to retire to Lorraine, and he took the Degree of Maſter of Arts at Pont-a-muſſon, and ſoon after that of Bachelor of Divinity. Thence he went into Germany, and continued at Triers an year and an half, where, after he had performed certain exerciſes, he was made a Licentiate in Divinity. Thence, after he had ſeen ſeveral of the moſt conſiderable cities in Germany, he removed to Ingolſtadt in Bavaria, where he reſided three years, and took the Degree of Doctor of Divinity. He afterwards returned to Lorraine, where he was preferred by Charles Cardinal of Lorraine to a Canonry of Verdun. After two years ſpent there he received an invitation from Antonia, daughter to the Duke of Lorraine, and Ducheſs of Cleves, and was made Confeſſor to her; and that he might be the more ſerviceable to her, he learned the French language to ſuch a perfection, that he often preached in it. In her ſervice he continued twelve years; during which he had leiſure to turn over the Hiſtories of England, both Eccleſiaſtical and Civil; whence he made ſeveral collections and obſervations, which he digeſted into four volumes [A]. At the end of twelve years the Ducheſs of Cleves dying, our Author went a third time to Lorraine, where by the favour of John Biſhop of Toul, formerly his ſcholar, he was promoted to the Deanery of Liverdune of conſiderable value; which with a Canonry and

(a) Pitſeus, Relation. Hiſtor. de Rebus Anglicis, p. 817. and Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 405. 2d edit.

[A] Digeſted into four volumes.] One of theſe volumes was concerning the Kings, another of the Biſhops, a third of apoſtolical, and a fourth of the illuſtrious and learned men of England. The laſt was publiſhed by Dr. William Biſhop, at Paris 1619, in 4to, under the title of Relationum Hiſtoricarum de Rebus Anglicis Tomus primus, quatuor partes complectens. It is commonly quoted under the title of Pitſeus de illuſtribus Angliæ Scriptoribus. The firſt part contains Prolegomena de Laudibus Hiſtoriæ; de Antiquitate Eccleſiæ Britanniæ; de Academiis, tam antiquis Britonum, quam recentioribus Anglorum. The ſecond part contains the Lives and Characters of three hundred Engliſh Writers. The third is an Appendix; and the fourth contains fifteen Indexes. Mr. Wood (1) makes the following reflections upon this work. 1. That according to the time, wherein it was written, things are expreſſed in eloquent Latin. This is a very odd reflection, ſince that age was as remarkable as any for elegant Writers in the Latin tongue; an age, wherein Aſcham, Muretus, and Buchanan flouriſhed. 2. That the greateſt part of the work, eſpecially that concerning the Writers, is taken from John Bale's book, De Scriptoribus majoris Britanniæ, though Pits (2) declares an abhorrence of him and his book. 3. That he omits Wickliffe and all the Wickliffiſts, together with the Iriſh and Scots Writers, who are for the moſt part mentioned by Bale; and in their room gives us an account of Roman Catholick Writers, eſpecially thoſe, who left England upon the Reformation made by Queen Elizabeth; which is the beſt and moſt deſired part of his book. 4. That ſeveral Writers in the Appendix are taken from Dr. Thomas James's Ecloga Oxonio Cantabrigienſis; of which book Pits makes uſe, when he informs us, in what libraries the manuſcrips of certain Authors mentioned by him are preſerved. 5. That though he pretends to give an account only of Roman Catholic Writers, eſpecially about the time of the Reformation, yet he ſets down ſome who were ſincere Proteſtants, or at leaſt more Proteſtants than Papiſts; as Sir Anthony Cope, who died in 1551; John Redman, who died the ſame year; Thomas Key or Cay, Maſter of Univerſity-College in Oxford, who died in 1572; John Leland, the Antiquary; Robert Record, the Mathematician; Dr. Alb. Hill, an intimate friend of John Bradford the Martyr; John Cay, the Antiquary of Cambridge; Peter Morwyn or Morwyng, of Magdalen College, &c. and in the Appendix George Coryat, rather a Puritan, than a ſtrict Conformiſt to the Church of England; Roger (whom he erroneouſly calls Robert) Taverner; Timothy Bright, M. D. of Cambridge, and Rector of Methley in Yorkſhire; Thomas Mouffet, M. D. John Huntingdon. 6. That whereas he pretends to follow Leland's Collectanea de Scriptoribus Angliæ, which he frequently quotes; it is only that he may avoid the naming of Bale, "for "whom all Roman Catholicks, nay zealous Proteſ- "tants, have little or no kindneſs at all, becauſe "his book is ſtuffed with revilings and ſuch language, "that befits rather a Huckſter at Billingſgate, than "the meaneſt or worſt of Scholars. The truth is, "our Author Pits never ſaw the ſaid Collectanea, he "being but twenty years of age, or little more, "when he left the nation; neither was it in his "power afterwards, if he had been in England, be- "cauſe they were kept in ſuch private hands, that "few Proteſtant Antiquaries, and none of thoſe of "the Church of Rome, could ſee or peruſe them." 7. That in the ſaid work are very many errors, miſnomers, &c. which he copied from Bale. 8. That whereas Pits pretends to ſet down only Engliſh Writers, he hath inſerted among them ſome, who are foreigners; as Herbertus Liſinga, born, as he ſays, in Suffolk; but falſely, "for the MS. which I follow, "ſays Mr. Wood, in my marginal notes and addi- "tions of and to the Biſhops of Norwich, mention- "ed by Francis Biſhop of Landaff in his book de "Præſulibus Angliæ Commentarius, ſaith, that he was "born in Pago Oxinnenſi or Oximenſi in Normannia."

(1) Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 406. 2d edit.

(2) Relat. Hiſt. part. 1. p. 53, 54, &c.

and an officialſhip of the ſaid Church, he kept to his death, which happened at Liverdune October the 7th new ſtyle in the year 1616. He was interred in the Church there, and the following inſcription put over his grave: Hic jacet D. Pitz, quondam Decanus, Officialis, & Canonicus hujus Eccleſiæ, Doctor SS. Theologiæ, qui deceſſit ex hac vitâ 17 Octob. an. 1616. Beſides his Relationes de Rebus Anglicis, he publiſhed De Legibus Tractatus Theologicus, Triers 1592. De Beatitudine Ingolſtadt 1595. and De Peregrinatione, Lib. VII. Duſſeldorp 1604 in 12mo. dedicated to the Ducheſs of Cleves.

He ſaith likewiſe that Joannes Erigena was born in the city of St. David's in Wales; but the generality of writers affirm, that he was born in Ireland. 9. That in his Appendix, which is chiefly compiled from Bale and Dr. Tho. James's Ecloga, many writers are inſerted, who had been before-mentioned in the work itſelf, though under different names. Thus Godfridus Hiſtoricus, p. 844. is the ſame with Godfridus Arturius or de Monmouth, num. 212. and Gualterius Cepton, p. 846. is the ſame with Gualterius Catton, p. 449. and Guilhelmus Califord, p. 851. the ſame with Guilhelmus Cockisford, p. 524.

As for the other three volumes, which our Author had written, viz. that of the Kings, the other of the Biſhops, and the third of Apoſtolical Men, of England, they were not buried with him, as he deſired, in caſe he ſhould not live to finiſh them, but were preſerved among the Archives of the Church of Liverdune. One of the ſaid volumes, if not more, were made uſe of and quoted by Edward Maihew, a Benedictin Monk, and formerly ſcholar to our Author, in a book, which he publiſhed at Rheims in 1619, entitled, Congregationis Anglicanæ Ordinis S. Benedicti Trophææ. The other volume relating to the Biſhops of England, which our Author often refers to in his book De Scriptoribus is chiefly a collection from Biſhop Godwin's Catalogue of the Biſhops of England, printed in 1601, as Mr. Wood was informed by one, who peruſed the manuſcript (3). T.

(3) Wood, ubi ſupra, col. 408.

PLACE (PETER DE LA), in Latin Plateanus, or a Platea, a native of the country of Angoumois (a), was from his youth ſo well educated in polite Literature, that he alone, of all his brothers, reſolved to apply himſelf to the ſtudy of the Law, wherein he made ſuch a progreſs, that he was not yet twenty two when he wrote a Paraphraſe on Actions (b), and about that time he began to plead at the bar of the Parliament of Paris, where he gained the reputation of a man of ſenſe, of eloquence, and eſpecially of a tender conſcience (c). This was the reaſon why Francis I. appointed him his Advocate in the Court of Aids at Paris. He acquitted himſelf of his functions in that poſt with great honeſty; whereby Henry II. himſelf choſe him (d) among many others for his firſt Preſident in the ſame Court of Aids. He embraced in his heart the Doctrine of the Reformed Churches as ſoon as the year 1554 [A], and made a publick profeſſion of it after the death of Francis II. But the troubles which aroſe early after obliged him for his own ſecurity to retire into a houſe of his in Picardy. The publick tranquillity being reſtored in the year 1562, he went to meet the King, in order to clear himſelf of ſeveral falſe imputations, which ſome ill deſigning perſons had laid upon him: when he had juſtified himſelf to his Majeſty's ſatisfaction, he went to pay his reſpects to the Prince of Condé, who from that moment truſted him with the direction, and ſuperintendency of the affairs of his family: from that time he had ſo great an affection for that Prince, that he ſpared neither his eſtate, nor his children, nor even his own perſon, to promote his Highneſs's dignity in every thing that related to it, ſo much was he devoted to his ſervice. The civil broils, which aroſe afreſh five years after, obliged him to leave Paris again, and retire into the Caſtle of Vé in Valois (e), where he underwent great perſecutions [B]. The Reformed Church being ſuffered to enjoy ſome peace, he returned

(a) La Croix du Maine, Bibl. Franc. p. 408, ſays he was born at Angouleſme.

(b) See the end of the laſt rem.

(c) See the Opuſcules de Loiſel, p. 511, 512.

(d) In the year 1553, ſee the Opuſcules de Loiſel, p. 511.

(e) Belonging to his nephews, whoſe Guardian he was then, on the account of his wife the Lady Ragonde Luillier, P. de Farnace, Vie de Place, p. 15.

[A] He embraced in his heart the Doctrine of the Reformed Churches as early as the year 1554.] We ſee in the diſcourſe of his life that God called him to his knowledge at that time, in a very ſurprizing manner. "Being a ſchool-boy at Poitiers about twenty years "before, God gave him an opportunity to ſee John "Calvin, when he paſſed through that place with "Archbiſhop du Tillet (1); he heard that great man "with pleaſure, whilſt he ſpoke with great dignity "of the knowledge of God in general: but when "he came to ſpeak of the true worſhip of God, he "could not hear him any longer, being very zealous "for the religion in which he had been carefully "educated. There remained nevertheleſs ſome doubts "in his mind, which made him think that he might "very well be miſtaken: and he reflected often upon "this, as he has declared it ſince; which was as a "kind of preparation deſigned to nouriſh that ſeed, "till it came to ſpring out and bud at the time appointed by God. This happened one day as he "ſtood before his door: for a certain ſtranger, by a "wonderful providence of God, not being in the "leaſt acquainted with him, but ſeeing that he was a "man of diſtinction, and wanting to be aſſiſted in his "exceſſive poverty, applied very humbly to him, "and made him a long diſcourſe in good Latin, "explaining the cauſe of his miſery. De la Place "finding him a man of learning, conducted him "into his own ſtudy, that he might examine him "more leiſurely. This poor man then, as though "he had been ſent by God, began to expoſe very "freely the abuſes of the Church of Rome, and to "explain the true and only way to worſhip God. "Which de la Place having heard quietly enough, "honoured him with ſome preſents, and deſired him "nevertheleſs not to come to ſee him again, for fear "of the faggots, which were ready againſt thoſe, "who were in the leaſt ſuſpected of the Evangelical "Doctrine: and indeed that poor ſtranger was ſoon "after tried in the furnace at Paris. Now from that "time Peter de la Place never ceaſed conſulting both "the holy Scripture and the antient Doctors, and "even the ſchoolmen, that he might be able to remove thoſe difficulties, which nigl t and day perplexed his mind. Thus in a ſhort time God "touched his heart, and opened his eyes, that he "might ſee the light of the Goſpel, ſo that when "Francis II. died, he declared himſelf openly to "be one of thoſe who profeſſed the Reformed Religion (2)." Papyrius Maſſo's brother aſſerts (3), that Peter de la Place, and his brother Bertrand de la Place, and John du Tillet followed John Calvin to Lyons, who had infected them with his Hereſies at Angouleſme. This is not probable with regard to him, whoſe article I give here; for if he had followed Calvin to Lyons, the Author of his life would have known it, and would not have related a particular quite different from that.

(1) This du Tillet never was a Biſhop nor an Archbiſhop, but only Chancellor and Archdeacon of Angouleſme. See what Papyrius Maſſo's brother has added to Calvin's Life, at the end of the Papyrii Maſſonis Elogia varia.

(2) P. de Farnace, Brief Recueil des principaux Poincts de la Vie de Meſſire Pierre de la Place, p. 11 & ſeq.

(3) See Papyrius Maſſo's Elogies, in Calvin's Life.

[B] He underwent great perſecutions.] "Neither "the loſs of his place, nor the ſale of his perſonal "eſtate, returned into his houſe, and notwithſtanding all the reſiſtance he met with from a perſon, who during the war had been favoured with his poſt [C], he obtained again his place of Preſident, and enjoyed it without any blemiſh, being revered by all honeſt men, and dreaded by the wicked, till the maſſacre on St. Bartholomew's Day, when he was murdered, as we ſhall relate hereunder (f) [D]. He wrote ſome books which have been Traicté de l'Excellence de l'Homme Chreſtien, p. 68.

(f) Extracted from P. de Farnace, in his Brief Recueil des principaux poincts de la Vie de Meſſire Pierre de la Place, prefixed to the

" eſtate, nor the ſeizing of his real eſtate, grieved " him ſo much, and cauſed him ſo great a vexation " as the unworthy uſage he met with from one of " thoſe, from whom he ought naturally to have ex- " pected all kind of aſſiſtance, they being his near " relations. . . . A certain Counſellor of the Court . . " who had profeſſed the Reformed Religion, even " after the firſt commotions, knowing that God was " going to put his flock to a ſevere trial, revolted " immediately, and finding himſelf in ſome danger " by the threatnings that were made againſt thoſe " who had been Proteſtants, and to remove all ſuſ- " picions that he might ſtill retain ſome remorſe of " his apoſtacy, or ſome deſire to return among the " faithful, reſolved to commit a moſt notorious act, " which was, to perſecute Peter de la Place with all " kinds of calumnies and injuries, who was guardian " to his nephews, the children of that Counſellor's wife ; " and who was alſo retired to a caſtle belonging to his " nephews. Whereupon the Counſellor in numberleſs " ſcandalous petitions, never ceaſed to invent and hint " to the Court a thouſand ſlanders and calumnies ; ſo " that at laſt he not only got de la Place ignominiouſly de- " prived of the guardianſhip, though abſent and unac- " quainted with theſe proceedings, but obtained alſo a " commiſſion, to ſeize both the caſtle and de la Place him- " ſelf. And this would have been executed accordingly, " in ſuch unhappy and tumultuous times, conſidering the " great ſpeed Tanchou and his bailiffs made, as " though it had been to take ſome robbers : but God raiſed " him a friend, who the night before their arrival gave " him notice of every thing. Whereupon, though he was " ſtill very much out of order, labouring under a continual " fever, yet he was obliged to riſe before break of day, " and to make his eſcape into the foreſt of Rez, which is " pretty near that caſtle, where he met with a ſtranger " who received him afterwards into his houſe : whereas " on the contrary that Counſellor, breaking through all " the laws not only of affinity, but alſo of humanity, " ſeized upon the caſtle, drove de la Place's children from " thence, plundered all that was left there, and ſent " Tanchou with his bailiffs after him : ſo that he was " obliged to wander ſome days in the woods, till at laſt " le Sieur de Bouchavane did him the kindneſs to receive " him ſecretly into his caſtle of Couſſy, and to hide him " there in a little room (4)."

(4) P. de Farnace, Vie du Preſ. de la Place, p. 15 & ſeq.

[C] The reſiſtance he met with from a perſon, who . . . had been favoured with his poſt.] This perſon is no other but Stephen de Neuilly. We find in the Dialogue of the Advocates in the Parliament of Paris, that he made himſelf firſt Preſident in the Court of Aids, when the Sieur de la Place was killed on St. Bartholomew's Day (5). Let us ſee the marginal note which has been made on that paſſage of the Dialogue. " Miraumont, tit. de la Cour des Aydes, obſerves, that " the Sieur de Neuilly was appointed firſt Preſident " January the 11th 1569. of which office he per- " formed the functions ſince, on account of Monſieur " de la Place's abſence. And yet Paſquier in the " 16th book of his letters, page 245. writing to his " eldeſt ſon Monſieur Theodore Paſquier, ſays that " he was made firſt Preſident by Monſieur de Mayen- " ne, that is to ſay during the league." The difficulty urged in that marginal note is not ill-grounded ; for Paſquier (6) ſpeaks only of the poſt of Preſident au Mortier, which the Duke of Mayenne beſtowed on Stephen de Neuilly, who was already firſt Preſident of the Court of Aids. See above the article NULLY.

(5) Opuſcules de Loiſel, p. 487.

(6) Paſquier, Lettres, liv. 16. p. 245, of the 2d vol.

[D] The maſſacre on St. Bartholomew's Day, when he was murthered, as we ſhall relate hereunder.] Captain Michel, one of King Charles the Ninth's Arquebuſiers, went at ſix of the clock in the morning to Peter de la Place's houſe. He was armed with an arquebuſe on his ſhoulder, and a piſtol at his girdle : and as a ſign that he was one of the murtherers, he had a napkin tied about his left arm. The firſt words he ſpoke were that Monſieur de Guiſe, by the King's command, had killed the Admiral, and ſeveral other Huguenot Lords, and as all the other Huguenots, of what quality ſoever they might be, were doomed to die, he was come to the Sieur de la Place's houſe, in order to preſerve him from that misfortune. But that he would have them ſhew him all the gold and ſilver, which was in the houſe (7). The Sieur de la Place's anſwer made that Captain ſwear a great oath, and ſay, that he commanded him to come and ſpeak to the King. De la Place ſuſpecting then that there was a great ſedition throughout the city, ſtole away by the back door, with an intention to retire into ſome neighbour's houſe. In the mean time moſt of his ſervants made their eſcape, and the Captain having received about a thouſand crowns, was going away, when Mademoiſelle des Maretz, the Sieur de la Place's daughter, deſired him to conduct her to ſome Roman Catholick friend, which he granted her, and did it accordingly. After this the Sieur de la Place having been refuſed entrance at three different places, came back into his own houſe, where he found his wife in the utmoſt conſternation (8). He exhorted her to take patience, " and then ordered " to call the men and maid ſervants who remained " in the houſe ; when they were come into his room, " it being his cuſtom to make a kind of exhortation " to his family every Sunday, he began to pray, then " he read a chapter of Job, with Calvin's expoſition " or ſermon upon it, and diſcourſed a little on the " juſtice and mercy of God, who like a kind father " (ſaid he) tries his elect by ſeveral chaſtiſements, that " they may not be too much taken with the things of " this world. . . . . Then he began again to pray, " diſpoſing himſelf and his whole family, to ſuffer " the greateſt torments, and even death itſelf, rather " than do any thing againſt the glory of God. Hav- " ing finiſhed his prayer he was told that Monſieur " de Seneſcay Provoſt of the Hotel, was at the door " with his archers, requiring in the King's name " that they ſhould let them in, and declaring that he " came to preſerve de la Place's perſon, and to pre- " vent his houſe being plundered by the mob. Where- " upon the Sieur de la Place ordered to open him the " door, who being come in declared to him the " great ſlaughter that was committing on the Hugue- " nots throughout the city by the King's command, " adding theſe words mixed with Latin, that there " would not be one of them left, qui mingat ad pa- " rietem, that piſſeth againſt the wall. Yet that he " was expreſsly commanded by his Majeſty to pre- " vent him from ſuffering the leaſt harm, and even " to conduct him to the Louvre, becauſe the King " deſired to know from him ſeveral particulars relat- " ing to the affairs of the Reformed, of which he had " the management ; that he ſhould therefore get " himſelf ready to go and ſpeak to his Majeſty. The " Sieur de la Place anſwered, that he ſhould always " think himſelf very happy, if before he left this " world, he could give his Majeſty an account of all " his actions, and of his whole conduct. But that " conſidering the horrid maſſacre that was perpetrat- " ing throughout the city, it was impoſſible for him to " go to the Louvre, without a great and unavoidable " danger of his life ; but that he deſired him to ſecure " his perſon to his Majeſty, by leaving in his houſe " as many of his archers as he ſhould think. Seneſ- " cay granted him this, and left with him one of his " Lieutenants named Toutevoye, with four of his " archers. Soon after Seneſcay was gone, the Preſi- " dent Charon, then Provoſt of the Merchants of " Paris, came to de la Place's houſe, and having " ſpoke ſome time with him privately, he went " away, leaving him four of his archers, beſides " thoſe of Seneſcay (9). . . . . Seneſcay coming again " the next day about dinner time, declared to him " that he had a moſt expreſs and repeated command " from his Majeſty to bring him with him, and " that he would not be refuſed (10)." De la Place's prayers proving ineffectual, he deſired Seneſcay at laſt, that he would be pleaſed to accompany him in perſon, to which the other replied, that being engaged in other buſineſ

(7) De Farnace, Vie du Preſ. de la Place, p. 19.

(8) Ibid. p. 20.

(9) Ibid. p. 22 & ſeq.

(10) Ibid. p. 24.

been printed [E].

buſineſs he could not accompany him farther than about fifty ſteps (11). The Sieur de la Place's wife, fell on her knees before Seneſcay to beg of him that he would "accompany her huſband. Whereupon de la Place, "who never gave the leaſt ſign of faintheartedneſs, "took his wife up, and reproved her, telling her, that "they were not to have recourſe to the arm of men, "but to God alone: then turning himſelf he perceiv- "ed that his eldeſt ſon had put a croſs made of paper on "his hat, which he had done out of weakneſs, hoping "thereby to eſcape death: but his father rebuked "him ſeverely for it, and commanded him to take "off immediately from his hat that token of ſedi- "tion, repreſenting to him that the true croſs we "ought to bear is that of tribulations and afflic- "tions, which God ſends us as a certain pledge of "the happineſs and eternal life which he has pre- "pared for his children. Then finding that Se- "neſcay preſſed hard upon him to go to his Majeſty, "and being fully determined to ſuffer death, which "he ſaw was deſigned for him, he put on his cloak, "took his leave of his wife, recommending to her to "have above all things the glory and fear of God "before her eyes, and thus went out very chearfully: "being come to the ſtreet of the Glaſs-houſe *, "over-againſt Cock-ſtreet †, ſome murderers, who "had been waiting for him about three hours with "drawn daggers, killed him as a poor lamb, in the "midſt of ten or twelve archers of the Sieur Seneſ- "cay, who conducted him, and his houſe was plun- "dered five or ſix days after. The Sieur de la "Place's corps (his ſon being gone to Heaven) was "carried to the Town-houſe , and put into a ſta- "ble, where his friend covered his face, and the next "morning it was caſt into the river (12)."

(11) P. de Farnace, Vie du Preſident de la Place, p. 25.

* De la Verrie.

† La Rue du Coq.

 L'Hoſtel de Ville.

(12) P. de Farnace, Vie du Preſ. de la Place, p. 26 & ſeq.

[E] He wrote ſome books which have been printed.] Soon after Francis the Second's death he publiſhed a treatiſe of Vocation (13), which he dedicated to Charles IX. and then another treatiſe of the true uſe of Moral Philoſophy in the Chriſtian Doctrine. During his firſt retirement he applied himſelf entirely to the ſtudy of Divinity . . . . . He ſpent alſo ſome hours in drawing up an hiſtory of what happened in his time with regard both to civil and religious affairs, ſome ſpecimen of which was printed in the year 1565, though without his knowledge (14). During his ſtay in the caſtle of Couſſy, he reflected ſeriouſly on the excellency of the Chriſtian man, and wrote a ſmall tract upon that ſubject, which he dedicated to the Queen of Navarre (15). The dedication is dated from Paris, May the 20th, 1572. The edition I make uſe of was printed in the year 1585, in 12mo. Here follows what we find in La Croix du Maine. "He wrote a very learned and excellent "treatiſe of Vocation, and of the manner of living "in every ſtation in which Providence places men; "it was printed at Paris for Frederic Morel, in the "year 1561, in 4to, and contains twenty-one ſheets. "That book has been reprinted ſince for Robert le "Mangnier, who has intitled it otherwiſe than it "was before; for the laſt title is thus: Diſcours po- "litiques ſur la voye d'entrer deüement aux Eſtats, & "la maniere de conſtamment s'y maintenir & gouverner; "i. e. Political diſcourſes on the manner after which "every one ought to come to his particular calling, and "how he muſt conſtantly maintain and behave himſelf in "it; the whole divided into chapters, (which was "done in the former edition). Some think that the "Sieur de la Place is the Author of a book intitled, "De l'Etat de la Religion en France, i. e. Of the State "of Religion in France, printed in the year 1557; "but I will not be poſitive that they are in the right, "for his name is not prefixed to that book (16)." I am apt to think there is a miſtake in theſe words, in the year 1557; for the firſt edition of this work of Peter de la Place, was printed in the year 1565, and the title of it is thus: Commentaires de l'Eſtat de la Religion & Republique ſous les Rois Henry & François ſeconds, & Charles neufieme, i. e. "An Account of "the State of Religion and of the Commonwealth "under the Kings Henry II. Francis II. and Charles "IX." Neither the Author's name, nor the Printer's, nor the place where it was printed, are ſet down. The work is divided into ſeven books, it begins with the year 1556, and ends with what happened towards the latter part of the year 1561: it contains 282 ſheets in 8vo. Let us not forget theſe other words of la Croix du Maine. "He was a man very "well verſed in the Law (as appears from his Latin "works, printed a great while ago, and which we "ſhall mention in another place) and beſides this, "he was alſo very eloquent (17)." Du Verdier Vau-Privas mentions but one Latin book of this Author. Petri Plateani Angoliſmæi . . . . . Paraphraſis in titulos Inſtitutionum imperialium de Actionibus, Exceptionibus, & Interdictis. Scholiis ſeorſum margini adpoſitis, Pariſiis 4 apud Galeotum à Prato 1548 (18), i. e. "Peter "de la Place of Angouleſme's . . . . . Paraphraſe on "the Titles of the Imperial Conſtitutions concerning "Actions, Exceptions, and Prohibitions. With mar- "ginal Notes by another Hand, 4to, at Paris, for "Gabriel du Pré, 1548."

(13) Ibid. p. 13.

(14) Ibid. p. 18.

(15) Idem, ibid.

(16) La Croix du Maine, Bibl. Franc. p. 408.

(17) La Croix du Maine, ibid.

(18) Du Verdier Vau-Privas, Bibl. Franc. p. 1038.

PLANTEVIT-LA-PAUSE (JOHN), in Latin Plantavitius Pauſanus, Biſhop of Lodeve, was born in the Caſtle of Marcaſſargues belonging to his mother, in the Dioceſe of Niſmes. He made a very great progreſs in the oriental languages, as appears from the books he has publiſhed [A]. He was not only born in the Reformed Religion, but had alſo been a Miniſter of the Church of Beziers (a). He turned Catholick in the year 1604, and was immediately ſent for to Court, where Henry the Great ſhewed him a great deal of kindneſs. He went to la Fleche, in order to go through a new courſe of Divinity under the Jeſuits. He returned from thence in 1609 to go to Rome (b). He was one of the Biſhops of Languedoc who engaged in Monſieur de Montmorenci's Rebellion (c). Moreri has committed ſome blunders [B].

(a) See the teſtimonials he gave to Fitz Simon, inſerted in that Jeſuit's Britannomachia, p. 122. He is erroneouſly called there John Plantavil.

(b) See the ſame Teſtimonials.

(c) See the paſſage from Rivet in Jeſuita vapulante, quoted by Colomiés, Bibl. Orient. p. 182.

PLATINA

[A] The books he has publiſhed.] Here follow the titles of ſome of them. Florilegium Biblicum, Heb. Lat. at Lodeve 1645. Florilegium Rabbinicum, Heb. Lat. cum Bibliotheca Rabbinica, printed in the ſame city, the ſame year. Theſaurus Synonimicus Hebræo-Chaldæo-Rabbinicus, printed alſo the ſame year in the ſame city. An Hebrew Lexicon. Monſieur Colomiés mentions a book of Michael Beraud, Miniſter at Montauban, upon Juſtification, againſt this Author (1).

(1) Colomiés, Bibl. Orient. p. 182.

[B] Moreri has committed ſome blunders.] 1. It appears plainly, from the teſtimonials which I have quoted, that the Sieur Plantevit-la-Pauſe celebrated the ceremony of his abjuration at Beziers, and not at Bourges. Honeſt Moreri has been no doubt miſled by the Latin word Biterrenſi, (of Beziers) which he thought was the ſame with Bituricenſi, (of Bourges). 2. I imagine, that by the ſame miſtake, we are told, that this Prelate retired into the Caſtle of Margon, in the Dioceſe of Bourges, and that he died there May the 28th, 1651. 3. One cannot ſay that this Prelate behaved himſelf with a great deal of prudence, from the year 1625, till 1648, when it is certain that he declared for the Rebels in the year 1632. It is leſs pardonable to omit ſuch a particular, than what relates to the Sieur de la Pauſe's being a Miniſter, his ſtudying at la Fléche, and ſome other particulars of that kind, of which we do not find the leaſt hint in Moreri's Dictionary. 4. This Expreſſion, He applied himſelf particularly to the ſtudy of Divinity in the College of Foix at Toloſe, is captious and very bad, for it leads us to believe this falſity, namely, that the College of Foix is a place where the Sciences are taught (2).

(2) Compare this with what is obſerved above, in the rem. [B] of the article BOSQUET (Francis).

[A] He

PLATINA (BARTHOLOMEW (a), Author of a Hiſtory of the Popes, flouriſhed in the 15th Century. He was born in 1421, in a village called Piadena [A], between Cremona and Mantua. He firſt embraced a military life (b), which he followed for a conſiderable time; but afterwards devoted himſelf to ſtudy, and made a conſiderable progreſs in it. He went to Rome (c) under the Pontificate of Calixtus III. (d), where getting himſelf introduced to Cardinal Beſſarion, he obtained ſome ſmall benefices of Pope Pius II. and afterwards was appointed apoſtolical abbreviator. Paul II. ſucceſſor of Pius II. removed all the abbreviators from their employments, notwithſtanding they had paid great ſums for the purchaſe of their places; and notwithſtanding that Platina moſt humbly beſought him to order their cauſe to be judged by the auditors of the Rota (e). The Pope was offended at the liberty Platina took on this occaſion, and accordingly gave him a very haughty repulſe [B]. Theſe unhappy men, thus diveſted of their employments, uſed their utmoſt endeavours, during ſome days, to obtain audience of the Pope, but were repulſed with the utmoſt contempt. Upon this Platina wrote a letter to him [C], in which he informed him, that he deſigned to travel up and down the world, in order to exhort Princes to convene a Council, to enquire whether the abbreviators ought to have been removed from their employments. This letter was conſidered as an act of rebellion, ſo that he was thrown into priſon, put in irons, and was left in this condition four months, expoſed to numberleſs inconveniencies [D]. He afterwards had his liberty, at the requeſt of Cardinal Francis de Gonzaga, but was ordered not to leave Rome. He continued quiet in it three years, but afterwards was perſecuted in a more cruel manner than before. Some perſons had perſuaded the Pope that Callimachus had engaged in a plot againſt him, and that Platina was one of the conſpirators. Many perſons were impriſoned, and put to the rack, on that account. Platina was treated with

(a) And not Baptiſt, as he is called by Jacobus Bergamenſis, Leandro Alberti, Floridus Sabinus, &c. See the authorities for this in Voſſius de Hiſt. Lat p. 589. See alſo the cloſe of the rem. [H].

(b) Volaterrannus, lib. 21. p. 777.

(c) Jovius, Elog. cap. 19.

(d) And not Calixtus II. as Moreri ſays.

(e) Platina, in Paulo II. folio 150 verſo.

[A] He was born in 1421, in a village called Piadena.] I do not meet with any Author who mentions that date; but ſince Jacobus Bergamenſis and Maſſæus (1) fix his death under the year 1481; and that Raphael Volaterrannus (2), and Leandro Alberti (3), affirm that he died at threeſcore years of age, it follows that he was born in 1421. Thoſe who relate, like Moreri, that he was a native of Verona, are miſtaken (4), of which the following is a proof. Idem fecit Theodorus Hexarchus Ravennas cui quidem in magiſtratu mortuo non ita multo poſt Joannes Platina ſucceſſit. Hunc ego crediderim dediſſe nomen meo natali ſolo quod Platina appellatur in agro Cremonenſi poſitum, i. e. "The ſame was done by Theodore Exarch or Lieu-"tenant of Ravenna, who dying in his poſt, was "ſucceeded not long after by John Platina. I am "of opinion, that this latter gave the name to my "native place, which is called Platina, ſituated in "the territory of Cremona." Theſe are Platina's own words (5). The Italians do not call this village Platina, but Piadena, as is manifeſt from the Italian tranſlation of a journey into Italy, written in Latin by Andrew Schottus (6). I am of opinion, that Platina was ſo called from the place of his birth. The name of his family was Sacchus or Saccus.

(1) In Chronic. They ſay that he died of the plague.

(2) Commentar. Urban. lib. 21. p. 777.

(3) In Deſcriptione Italiæ, p. m. 626.

(4) Hofman, in voce Platina, & Cave in Cartophylac. Eccleſiaſt. edit. Lipſ. p. 369, are cenſured for this by Daniel William Mollerus, Diſſert. de Platina, p. 4. Sir Thomas Pope-Blount, Cenſura Authorum, p. 339, cites a long paſſage from Boiſſard in Iconib. where Platina is called Veronenſis.

(5) In Vita Coronis, folio m. 104. This Pope ſat in the Pontifical Chair in 686.

(6) Da Cremona a Mantoua ſi va per una ſtrada piana e diritta ove ſi trova Piadena. (In my edition of Vicenza 1622, it is Pianeda) Patria di Bartolomeo Platina.

[B] The Pope was offended at the liberty Platina took, and . . . . gave him a very haughty anſwer.] The Pope's anſwer was very much in an Anti-chriſtian caſt; he roundly declaring, that all the right, and all the laws, were comprized in his will. Here follows Platina's Latin (7): Tentarunt tamen ii ad quos res ipſa pertinebat hominem è ſententia demovere: atque ego certe qui horum de numero eram rogando etiam ut cauſa ipſa judicibus publicis (quos Rotæ auditores vocant) committeretur. Tum ille torvis oculis me aſpiciens, ita nos inquit ad judices revocas? ac ſi neſcires omnia jura in ſcrinio pectoris noſtri collocata eſſe? Sic ſtat ſententia, inquit: loco cedant omnes, eant quo volunt, nihil eos moror: pontifex ſum, mihique licet pro arbitrio animi aliorum acta & reſcindere & approbare, i. e. "In the mean time, "thoſe, whom that affair concerned, endeavoured to "make him change his reſolution: I alſo, being one "of them, begged that the cauſe might be tried "before the publick Judges, called Auditors of the "Rota. At theſe words, looking at me with a ſtern "countenance; is it thus, (ſaid he), that you appeal "from me to the Judges? as though you don't "know that all laws are centered in my breaſt? "Such is my decree: they ſhall all go hence whither-"ſoever they pleaſe. I am Pope, and have a right "to give a ſanction to, or diſannul, at pleaſure, the "acts of others."

(7) In Paulo II. folio m. 350 verſo.

[C] Upon this Platina wrote a letter to him.] The ſubſtance of it is as follows. Ego vero, ſays he (8), tanta ignominia excitus quod mihi ac ſociis meis coram non licebat, id agere per literas inſtitui. Scripſi itaque epiſtolam his verbis. Si tibi licuit indicta cauſa ſpoliare nos emptione noſtra juſta ac legitima, debet & nobis licere conqueri illatam injuriam inuſtamque ignominiam. Rejecti à te ac tam inſigni contumelia affecti dilabemur paſſim ad reges, ad principes, eoſque adhortabimur ut tibi concilium indicant, in quo potiſſimum rationem reddere cogaris cur nos legitima poſſeſſione ſpoliaveris, i. e. "I myſelf being "enraged at this great affront which was put upon "us, was determined to do that by letter, which my "Collegues and I were not permitted to do in his "preſence. I therefore wrote to him in the follow-"ing terms. If you had a right to diſpoſſeſs us, "without permitting our cauſe to be heard, of the "employments we had lawfully purchaſed; we on "the other ſide, ought to be permitted to complain "of the injuſtice we ſuffer, and the ignominy with "which we are branded. As you have repulſed us "ſo contumelioufly, we will go to all the courts of "Princes, and entreat them to call a Council, whoſe "principal buſineſs ſhall be, to oblige you to ſhew "cauſe, why you have diveſted us of our lawful "poſſeſſions." In my opinion, Platina's character may very well be known from this letter. It ſhews that he was very impatient and too conceited, but at this time ſincere; for ſince he did not ſcruple to inform the public of his conduct, though no ways agreeable to his duty, we may juſtly ſuppoſe, that he took a pleaſure in writing the truth It is certain that a Subject, who is removed from his place by his Sovereign, has no right to threaten that he will complain on that account to other Princes, and exhort them to get juſtice done him. The Pope is ſupreme in Rome, with regard to the putting down or eſtabliſhing of certain employments; and he cannot be ſubjected to a Council upon that account. Beſides, the threats employed muſt greatly offend the Pope in queſtion. He was threatened with a Council; which was treating him like a ſchool-boy, when a perſon ſays, that he will tell the Maſter of him. Farther, I would aſk any one, whether the putting down of a college or community of Sectaries, deſerves ſo much buſtle, and is of ſo much conſequence, as to merit the convening of a Council. But ſuch is the character of impatient men; they imagine that nothing is of greater conſequence to the world, than what is ſo to themſelves. Platina troubled his head very little about the reſt of the abuſes, but would have the Council chiefly employed in taking cognizance of the loſs which the apoſtolical Abbreviators had juſt before ſuſtained.

(8) Ibid.

REFLECTIONS on this Letter, which ſhew Platina's character.

[D] He was expoſed to numberleſs inconveniencies.] He was not permitted to have a fire in the depth of winter, though impriſoned in a tower which lay open to all the winds (9).

(9) Revinctus compedibus & quidem graviſſimis media hieme ſine foco, celſa in turri ac ventis omnibus expoſita coerceor menſibus quatuor. Platina, in Paulo II. folio 351.

[E] The

with as much ſeverity as the reſt: this conſpiracy was found to be a mere chimera, and yet not one of the priſoners was ſet at liberty; for the Court of Rome would have been aſhamed, to own her having treated perſons of merit with ſo much cruelty, on mere ſuſpicions [E]. When the charge of treaſon appeared too ill grounded, to inſiſt upon it, they turned the charge to that of Hereſy [F], which at laſt fell to the ground like the other. The priſoners were not ſet at liberty till a year after [G]. The Pope flattered Platina with the hopes that he would raiſe him to ſome good employment, and by that means prevented his leaving Rome. He ſpent two years in the vain expectation of the effect of theſe promiſes, after which the Pope died of the Apoplexy (f). Sixtus IV. his ſucceſſor, appointed Platina Librarian of the Vatican (g), whereby Platina found him-

(f) Extracted from Platina, in Vita Paulii II.

(g) The Vatican Library was ſet up by this Pope. Jovius, Elog. cap. 19.

[E] The Court of Rome would have been aſhamed to own their having treated perſons of merit with ſo much cruelty, on mere ſuſpicions.] I don't know whether, of all the defects found in man, vanity does not occaſion his committing the greateſt number of crimes. How many people begin an act of injuſtice, with a firm perſuaſion that they act juſtly? However, though they ſoon perceive the miſtake, pride not permitting them to own their fault, they proceed in their injuſtice, to prevent its being known that they began it without a cauſe. Every man chooſes to ſave his own reputation, rather than that of his neighbour; and hence ariſes the numberleſs ſhifts and cavils of ſuch informers, who are conſcious of their having calumniated others, and are afraid they ſhall be convicted on that account. Here we ſee a Pope, on account of a falſe punctilio of honour, obſtinately perſiſting in perſecuting men, who, contrary to his firſt ſuſpicions, were found innocent. Chriſtophorus Veronenſis Pauli Medicus ad me veniens, bono inquit animo te eſſe jubet Paulus: ac de ſe bene ſperare brevique liberum futurum: ſciſcitor quando id fore ſperaret. Reſpondet homo liber audientibus omnibus qui tum aderant: non ita cito fieri poſſe ne levitatis & ſævitiæ argueretur pontifex, quod illos quos tanto tumultu concitato cepiſſet ac torſiſſet, ſtatim veluti innoxios dimitteret (10), i. e. "Chriſtopher "of Verona, Phyſician to Pope Paul, coming to me "ſaid, Paul bids you be of good chear; to expect "the kindeſt treatment from him; and affirms "you will ſoon be ſet at liberty. I enquired, when "he imagined that would be. He anſwered, with "his uſual freedom, before all the perſons then pre"ſent: this cannot be done ſo very ſoon, leſt the "Pontiff ſhould be charged with being fickle and "cruel, in caſe he ſhould immediately diſcharge, as "being innocent, a ſet of men whom he had cauſed "to be ſeized in a tumultous manner, and put to the "torture." See the remark [A] and [B] of the article EXPERIENS.

(10) Platina, in Paulo II. folio 358.

[F] They turned the charge to that of Hereſy.] We are told this by Platina: Neque hoc quidem contentus Paulus quos paulo ante conjurationis & majeſtatis accerſierat, eoſdem mutata ſententia ob divulgatam fabulam hæreſeos accuſat (11). Pomponius Lætus was ſeized in Venice and carried to Rome. He was accuſed of changing the names of ſome young men, and giving them Heathen names in the place of their Chriſtian ones. It is pretended that he did this, in order to excite them the more to honour and virtue; but the only anſwer he made was this; what is it to you or the Pope, if I have a mind to call myſelf Fennel, provided I have no evil deſign in it? Rogatus cur nomina adoleſcentibus immutaret, ut homo liber erat, quid ad vos, inquit, & Paulum, ſi mihi fœniculi nomen indo, modo id ſine dolo ac fraude fiat. Amore namque vetuſtatis antiquorum præclara nomina repetebat, quaſi quædam calcaria quæ noſtram juventutem æmulatione ad virtutem incitarent (12). Farther, theſe priſoners were charged with having embraced the principles of Plato; of diſputing in a doubtful manner on the immortality of the ſoul, and the exiſtence of God; and of having too great a regard for the heathen ſyſtem. Multa nobis objicit (Paulus) ſed illud potiſſimum quod de immortalitate animorum diſputaremus, teneremuſque opinionem Platonii . . . . in dubium, inquit Paulus, diſputando Deum vocabatis. . . . . Præterea vero Paulus crimini nobis dabat, quod nimium gentilitatis amatores eſſemus (13). They anſwered, 1ſt, That, if they had an affection for Plato, they did but imitate the great St. Auſtin. 2. That all the Divines and Philoſophers of that age diſputed on thoſe very truths, and called them in queſtion, in order to diſcover the certainty of them; for it is a rule in diſputation, not to look upon the ſubject in queſtion as certain; but to ſuppoſe it, for ſome time, to be uncertain, in order to ſearch, with an unprejudiced mind, for the reaſons and foundation of the belief a perſon entertains of it (14). 3. That, according to St. Auſtin, a perſon's obſtinacy in defending his errors, is what makes him a Heretic; but that they had always paid obedience to the diſcipline of the church. Platina inſiſted particularly on the innocence of his actions; that he had never omitted Confeſſion, and receiving the Sacrament once a year; and that he had never let drop a ſingle word againſt the Apoſtles Creed, or that favoured ever ſo little of Hereſy. Nullum mihi facinus impingi poteſt, non furtum, non latrocinium, non ſacrilegium, non depeculatus, non parricidium, non rapina, non ſimonia. Vixi ut Chriſtianum decebat: confeſſionem & communionem in anno ſemel præſertim intermiſi nunquam. Nil ex ore meo excidit quod contra ſymbolum eſſet, aut hæreſim ſaperet. He obſerves, that no perſon ſhewed a greater fondneſs for heathen antiquities than the Pope himſelf, he purchaſing all the antient ſtatues he could meet with, to adorn his palace, &c (15). Notwithſtanding this, the Pope ſet a mark of ignominy on the name of Academician or Academic; and pronounced all thoſe Hereticks, who, from that time, ſhould mention the word Academy, either in jeſt or earneſt. Veteres Academicos ſequebamur, novos contemnentes qui in rebus ipſis nil certi ponebant. Paulus tamen hæreticos eos pronunciavit, qui nomen Academiæ vel ſerio vel joco deinceps commemorarent. Junƈta eſt hæc ignominia Platoni; ipſe ſe tueatur (16), i. e. "We followed the opinions "of the old Academics, deſpiſing the new, they "not allowing any certainty in the nature of things. "And yet Paul pronounced thoſe to be Hereticks, "who, from that time forward, ſhould mention the "word Academy, either joking or in earneſt. This "caſts an odium on Plato; let him defend himſelf." I have read in more than one Author, but I cannot now call any of them to mind, that this Pope was ſo great an enemy to the Sciences, that he forbid any perſon to uſe the word College or Academy. But thoſe who declared this, are groſsly miſtaken. For Paul II. did not condemn thoſe, who ſhould uſe the word Academy, in the ſignification of College or Houſe in which the Sciences are taught: He only condemned the ſceptical turn of mind of the Wits of his time, who, upon pretence of philoſophiſing in the manner of Plato, Founder of the antient Academy, made all things doubtful, and grew dangerous with reſpect to the foundations of the Goſpel.

(11) Ibid.

(12) Idem, ibid.

(13) Idem, ibid. folio 359.

(14) In dubium, inquit Paulus, diſputando Deum vocabatis. Quod quidem omnibus Philoſophis & Theologis noſtrorum temporum objici poteſt, qui & animos & Deum & omnes intelligentias ſeparatas diſputandi ac veri inveniendi cauſa in dubium plerumque vocant. Ibid. See the rem. [L], of the art. MALDONAT.

(15) Cum nemo eo hujus rei ſtudioſior eſſet, quippe qui & ſtatuas veterum undique ex tota urbe conquiſitas in ſuas illas ædes quas ſub Capitolio extruebat congereret. Ibidem.

(16) Ibid. folio 359 verſo, and folio 360.

[G] The priſoners were not ſet at liberty till a year after.] This proves Abbot Trithemius to have aſſerted a falſhood, he ſaying that our Platina was not releaſed out of priſon by Sixtus IV. till after the death of Paul II. Multas à Paulo Papa II. calamitates ſuſtinuit, adeo ut bonis omnibus & dignitate ſpoliatus poſt equulei ſuſpenſionem in carcerem crudeliſſime detruſus, uſque ad mortem ipſius Pauli detentus ſit, qui à Sixto mox liberatus, &c (17). When an Author writes the hiſtory of his own misfortunes, we ought to believe him, and not ſuppoſe that he has any occaſion to amplify matters. Trithemius ſhould have followed that maxim, and conſulted the life of Paul II. writ by the ſame perſon whoſe elogium he made. He then would have found the exact time he continued in priſon, and not have enlarged it, and thereby miſled many people to this day. A. Paulo II. in carcerem conjectus, menſeſque quatuor ipſos detentus eſt, donec à ſucceſſore Sixto IV. liberatus (18), i. e. "Paul II. threw him into "priſon, where he lay four months, till he was ſet at "liberty by Sixtus IV. his ſucceſſor."

(17) Trithem. de Scriptor. Eccleſ. p. 356. Boiſſard ſays the ſame in Sir Thomas Pope-Blount, Cenſ. Author. p. 339.

(18) Boſius, de comparanda Prudentia civili, p. 377. Tom. 2. of the treatiſes de ratione ſtudiorum, collected and illuſtrated with a Commentary, by the learned Cremus, at Leyden 1696.

[H] Here

PLATINA (BARTHOLOMEW (a), Author of a Hiſtory of the Popes, flouriſhed in the 15th Century. He was born in 1421, in a village called Piadena [A], between Cremona and Mantua. He firſt embraced a military life (b), which he followed for a conſiderable time; but afterwards devoted himſelf to ſtudy, and made a conſiderable progreſs in it. He went to Rome (c) under the Pontificate of Calixtus III. (d), where getting himſelf introduced to Cardinal Beſſarion, he obtained ſome ſmall benefices of Pope Pius II. and afterwards was appointed apoſtolical abbreviator. Paul II. ſucceſſor of Pius II. removed all the abbreviators from their employments, notwithſtanding they had paid great ſums for the purchaſe of their places; and notwithſtanding that Platina moſt humbly beſought him to order their cauſe to be judged by the auditors of the Rota (e). The Pope was offended at the liberty Platina took on this occaſion, and accordingly gave him a very haughty repulſe [B]. Theſe unhappy men, thus diveſted of their employments, uſed their utmoſt endeavours, during ſome days, to obtain audience of the Pope, but were repulſed with the utmoſt contempt. Upon this Platina wrote a letter to him [C], in which he informed him, that he deſigned to travel up and down the world, in order to exhort Princes to convene a Council, to enquire whether the abbreviators ought to have been removed from their employments. This letter was conſidered as an act of rebellion, ſo that he was thrown into priſon, put in irons, and was left in this condition four months, expoſed to numberleſs inconveniencies [D]. He afterwards had his liberty, at the requeſt of Cardinal Francis de Gonzaga, but was ordered not to leave Rome. He continued quiet in it three years, but afterwards was perſecuted in a more cruel manner than before. Some perſons had perſuaded the Pope that Callimachus had engaged in a plot againſt him, and that Platina was one of the conſpirators. Many perſons were impriſoned, and put to the rack, on that account. Platina was treated with

(a) And not Baptiſt, as he is called by Jacobus Bergamenſis, Leandro Alberti, Floridus Sabinus, &c. See the authorities for this in Voſſius de Hiſt. Lat p. 589. See alſo the cloſe of the rem. [H].

(b) Volaterrannus, lib. 21. p. 777.

(c) Jovius, Elog. cap. 19.

(d) And not Calixtus II. as Moreri ſays.

(e) Platina, in Paulo II. folio 150 verſo.

[A] He was born in 1421, in a village called Piadena.] I do not meet with any Author who mentions that date; but ſince Jacobus Bergamenſis and Maſſæus (1) fix his death under the year 1481; and that Raphael Volaterrannus (2), and Leandro Alberti (3), affirm that he died at threeſcore years of age, it follows that he was born in 1421. Thoſe who relate, like Moreri, that he was a native of Verona, are miſtaken (4), of which the following is a proof. Idem fecit Theodorus Hexarchus Ravennas cui quidem in magiſtratu mortuo non ita multo poſt Joannes Platina ſucceſſit. Hunc ego crediderim dediſſe nomen meo natali ſolo quod Platina appellatur in agro Cremonenſi poſitum, i. e. "The ſame was done by Theodore Exarch or Lieu-"tenant of Ravenna, who dying in his poſt, was "ſucceeded not long after by John Platina. I am "of opinion, that this latter gave the name to my "native place, which is called Platina, ſituated in "the territory of Cremona." Theſe are Platina's own words (5). The Italians do not call this village Platina, but Piadena, as is manifeſt from the Italian tranſlation of a journey into Italy, written in Latin by Andrew Schottus (6). I am of opinion, that Platina was ſo called from the place of his birth. The name of his family was Sacchus or Saccus.

(1) In Chronic. They ſay that he died of the plague.

(2) Commentar. Urban. lib. 21. p. 777.

(3) In Deſcriptione Italiæ, p. m. 626.

(4) Hofman, in voce Platina, & Cave in Cartophylac. Eccleſiaſt. edit. Lipſ. p. 369, are cenſured for this by Daniel William Mollerus, Diſſert. de Platina, p. 4. Sir Thomas Pope-Blount, Cenſura Authorum, p. 339, cites a long paſſage from Boiſſard in Iconib. where Platina is called Veronenſis.

(5) In Vita Coronis, folio m. 104. This Pope ſat in the Pontifical Chair in 686.

(6) Da Cremona a Mantoua ſi va per una ſtrada piana e diritta ove ſi trova Piadena. (In my edition of Vicenza 1622, it is Pianeda) Patria di Bartolomeo Platina.

[B] The Pope was offended at the liberty Platina took, and . . . . gave him a very haughty anſwer.] The Pope's anſwer was very much in an Anti-chriſtian caſt; he roundly declaring, that all the right, and all the laws, were comprized in his will. Here follows Platina's Latin (7): Tentarunt tamen ii ad quos res ipſa pertinebat hominem è ſententia demovere: atque ego certe qui horum de numero eram rogando etiam ut cauſa ipſa judicibus publicis (quos Rotæ auditores vocant) committeretur. Tum ille torvis oculis me aſpiciens, ita nos inquit ad judices revocas? ac ſi neſcires omnia jura in ſcrinio pectoris noſtri collocata eſſe? Sic ſtat ſententia, inquit: loco cedant omnes, eant quo volunt, nihil eos moror: pontifex ſum, mihique licet pro arbitrio animi aliorum acta & reſcindere & approbare, i. e. "In the mean time, "thoſe, whom that affair concerned, endeavoured to "make him change his reſolution: I alſo, being one "of them, begged that the cauſe might be tried "before the publick Judges, called Auditors of the "Rota. At theſe words, looking at me with a ſtern "countenance; is it thus, (ſaid he), that you appeal "from me to the Judges? as though you don't "know that all laws are centered in my breaſt? "Such is my decree: they ſhall all go hence whither-"ſoever they pleaſe. I am Pope, and have a right "to give a ſanction to, or diſannul, at pleaſure, the "acts of others."

(7) In Paulo II. folio m. 350 verſo.

[C] Upon this Platina wrote a letter to him.] The ſubſtance of it is as follows. Ego vero, ſays he (8), tanta ignominia excitus quod mihi ac ſociis meis coram non licebat, id agere per literas inſtitui. Scripſi itaque epiſtolam his verbis. Si tibi licuit indicta cauſa ſpoliare nos emptione noſtra juſta ac legitima, debet & nobis licere conqueri illatam injuriam inuſtamque ignominiam. Rejecti à te ac tam inſigni contumelia affecti dilabemur paſſim ad reges, ad principes, eoſque adhortabimur ut tibi concilium indicant, in quo potiſſimum rationem reddere cogaris cur nos legitima poſſeſſione ſpoliaveris, i. e. "I myſelf being "enraged at this great affront which was put upon "us, was determined to do that by letter, which my "Collegues and I were not permitted to do in his "preſence. I therefore wrote to him in the follow-"ing terms. If you had a right to diſpoſſeſs us, "without permitting our cauſe to be heard, of the "employments we had lawfully purchaſed; we on "the other ſide, ought to be permitted to complain "of the injuſtice we ſuffer, and the ignominy with "which we are branded. As you have repulſed us "ſo contumelioufly, we will go to all the courts of "Princes, and entreat them to call a Council, whoſe "principal buſineſs ſhall be, to oblige you to ſhew "cauſe, why you have diveſted us of our lawful "poſſeſſions." In my opinion, Platina's character may very well be known from this letter. It ſhews that he was very impatient and too conceited, but at this time ſincere; for ſince he did not ſcruple to inform the public of his conduct, though no ways agreeable to his duty, we may juſtly ſuppoſe, that he took a pleaſure in writing the truth It is certain that a Subject, who is removed from his place by his Sovereign, has no right to threaten that he will complain on that account to other Princes, and exhort them to get juſtice done him. The Pope is ſupreme in Rome, with regard to the putting down or eſtabliſhing of certain employments; and he cannot be ſubjected to a Council upon that account. Beſides, the threats employed muſt greatly offend the Pope in queſtion. He was threatened with a Council; which was treating him like a ſchool-boy, when a perſon ſays, that he will tell the Maſter of him. Farther, I would aſk any one, whether the putting down of a college or community of Sectaries, deſerves ſo much buſtle, and is of ſo much conſequence, as to merit the convening of a Council. But ſuch is the character of impatient men; they imagine that nothing is of greater conſequence to the world, than what is ſo to themſelves. Platina troubled his head very little about the reſt of the abuſes, but would have the Council chiefly employed in taking cognizance of the loſs which the apoſtolical Abbreviators had juſt before ſuſtained.

(8) Ibid.

REFLECTIONS on this Letter, which ſhew Platina's character.

[D] He was expoſed to numberleſs inconveniencies.] He was not permitted to have a fire in the depth of winter, though impriſoned in a tower which lay open to all the winds (9).

(9) Revinctus compedibus & quidem graviſſimis media hieme ſine foco, celſa in turri ac ventis omnibus expoſita coerceor munſibus quatuor. Platina, in Paulo II. folio 351.

[E] The

with as much ſeverity as the reſt: this conſpiracy was found to be a mere chimera, and yet not one of the priſoners was ſet at liberty; for the Court of Rome would have been aſhamed, to own her having treated perſons of merit with ſo much cruelty, on mere ſuſpicions [E]. When the charge of treaſon appeared too ill grounded, to inſiſt upon it, they turned the charge to that of Hereſy [F], which at laſt fell to the ground like the other. The priſoners were not ſet at liberty till a year after [G]. The Pope flattered Platina with the hopes that he would raiſe him to ſome good employment, and by that means prevented his leaving Rome. He ſpent two years in the vain expectation of the effect of theſe promiſes, after which the Pope died of the Apoplexy (f). Sixtus IV. his ſucceſſor, appointed Platina Librarian of the Vatican (g), whereby Platina found him-

(f) Extracted from Platina, in Vita Paulii II.

(g) The Vatican Library was ſet up by this Pope. Jovius, Elog. cap. 19.

[E] The Court of Rome would have been aſhamed to own their having treated perſons of merit with ſo much cruelty, on mere ſuſpicions.] I don't know whether, of all the defects found in man, vanity does not occaſion his committing the greateſt number of crimes. How many people begin an act of injuſtice, with a firm perſuaſion that they act juſtly? However, though they ſoon perceive the miſtake, pride not permitting them to own their fault, they proceed in their injuſtice, to prevent its being known that they began it without a cauſe. Every man chooſes to ſave his own reputation, rather than that of his neighbour; and hence ariſes the numberleſs ſhifts and cavils of ſuch informers, who are conſcious of their having calumniated others, and are afraid they ſhall be convicted on that account. Here we ſee a Pope, on account of a falſe punctilio of honour, obſtinately perſiſting in perſecuting men, who, contrary to his firſt ſuſpicions, were found innocent. Chriſtophorus Veronenſis Pauli Medicus ad me veniens, bono inquit animo te eſſe jubet Paulus: ac de ſe bene ſperare brevique liberum futurum: ſciſcitor quando id fore ſperaret. Reſpondet homo liber audientibus omnibus qui tum aderant: non ita cito fieri poſſe ne levitatis & ſævitiæ arguretur pontifex, quod illos quos tanto tumultu concitato cepiſſet ac torſiſſet, ſtatim veluti innoxios dimitteret (10), i. e. "Chriſtopher "of Verona, Phyſician to Pope Paul, coming to me "ſaid, Paul bids you be of good chear; to expect "the kindeſt treatment from him; and affirms "you will ſoon be ſet at liberty. I enquired, when "he imagined that would be. He anſwered, with "his uſual freedom, before all the perſons then pre-"ſent: this cannot be done ſo very ſoon, leſt the "Pontiff ſhould be charged with being fickle and "cruel, in caſe he ſhould immediately diſcharge, as "being innocent, a ſet of men whom he had cauſed "to be ſeized in a tumultous manner, and put to the "torture." See the remark [A] and [B] of the article EXPERIENS.

(10) Platina, in Paulo II. folio 358.

[F] They turned the charge to that of Hereſy.] We are told this by Platina: Neque hoc quidem contentus Paulus quos paulo ante conjurationis & majeſtatis accerſierat, eoſdem mutata ſententia ob divulgatam fabulam hæreſeos accuſat (11). Pomponius Lætus was ſeized in Venice and carried to Rome. He was accuſed of changing the names of ſome young men, and giving them Heathen names in the place of their Chriſtian ones. It is pretended that he did this, in order to excite them the more to honour and virtue; but the only anſwer he made was this; what is it to you or the Pope, if I have a mind to call myſelf Fennel, provided I have no evil deſign in it? Rogatus cur nomina adoleſcentibus immutaret, ut homo liber erat, quid ad vos, inquit, & Paulum, ſi mihi fœniculi nomen indo, modo id ſine dolo ac fraude fiat. Amore namque vetuſtatis antiquorum præclara nomina repetebat, quaſi quædam calcaria quæ noſtram juventutem æmulatione ad virtutem incitarent (12). Farther, theſe priſoners were charged with having embraced the principles of Plato; of diſputing in a doubtful manner on the immortality of the ſoul, and the exiſtence of God; and of having too great a regard for the heathen ſyſtem. Multa nobis objicit (Paulus) ſed illud potiſſimum quod de immortalitate animorum diſputaremus, teneremuſque opinionem Platonii . . . . in dubium, inquit Paulus, diſputando Deum vocabatis. . . . . Præterea vero Paulus crimini nobis dabat, quod nimium gentilitatis amatores eſſemus (13). They anſwered, 1ſt, That, if they had an affection for Plato, they did but imitate the great St. Auſtin. 2. That all the Divines and Philoſophers of that age diſputed on thoſe very truths, and called them in queſtion, in order to diſcover the certainty of them; for it is a rule in diſputation, not to look upon the ſubject in queſtion as certain; but to ſuppoſe it, for ſome time, to be uncertain, in order to ſearch, with an unprejudiced mind, for the reaſons and foundation of the belief a perſon entertains of it (14). 3. That, according to St. Auſtin, a perſon's obſtinacy in defending his errors, is what makes him a Heretic; but that they had always paid obedience to the diſcipline of the church. Platina inſiſted particularly on the innocence of his actions; that he had never omitted Confeſſion, and receiving the Sacrament once a year; and that he had never let drop a ſingle word againſt the Apoſtles Creed, or that favoured ever ſo little of Hereſy. Nullum mihi facinus impingi poteſt, non furtum, non latrocinium, non ſacrilegium, non depeculatus, non parricidium, non rapina, non ſimonia. Vixi ut Chriſtianum decebat: confeſſionem & communionem in anno ſemel præſertim intermiſi nunquam. Nil ex ore meo excidit quod contra ſymbolum eſſet, aut hæreſim ſaperet. He obſerves, that no perſon ſhewed a greater fondneſs for heathen antiquities than the Pope himſelf, he purchaſing all the antient ſtatues he could meet with, to adorn his palace, &c (15). Notwithſtanding this, the Pope ſet a mark of ignominy on the name of Academician or Academic; and pronounced all thoſe Hereticks, who, from that time, ſhould mention the word Academy, either in jeſt or earneſt. Veteres Academicos ſequebamur, novos contemnentes qui in rebus ipſis nil certi ponebant. Paulus tamen hæreticos eos pronunciavit, qui nomen Academiæ vel ſerio vel joco deinceps commemorarent. Juncta eſt hæc ignominia Platoni; ipſe ſe tueatur (16), i. e. "We followed the opinions "of the old Academics, deſpiſing the new, they "not allowing any certainty in the nature of things. "And yet Paul pronounced thoſe to be Hereticks, "who, from that time forward, ſhould mention the "word Academy, either joking or in earneſt. This "caſts an odium on Plato; let him defend himſelf." I have read in more than one Author, but I cannot now call any of them to mind, that this Pope was ſo great an enemy to the Sciences, that he forbid any perſon to uſe the word College or Academy. But thoſe who declared this, are groſsly miſtaken. For Paul II. did not condemn thoſe, who ſhould uſe the word Academy, in the ſignification of College or Houſe in which the Sciences are taught: He only condemned the ſceptical turn of mind of the Wits of his time, who, upon pretence of philoſophiſing in the manner of Plato, Founder of the antient Academy, made all things doubtful, and grew dangerous with reſpect to the foundations of the Goſpel.

(11) Ibid.

(12) Idem, ibid.

(13) Idem, ibid. folio 359.

(14) In dubium, inquit Paulus, diſputando Deum vocabatis. Quod quidem omnibus Philoſophis & Theologis noſtrorum temporum objici poteſt, qui & animos & Deum & omnes intelligentias ſeparatas diſputandi ac veri inveniendi cauſa in dubium plérumque vocant. Ibid. See the rem. [L], of the art. MALDONAT.

(15) Cum nemo eo hujus rei ſtudioſior eſſet, quippe qui & ſtatuas veterum undique ex tota urbe conquiſitas in ſuas illas ædes quas ſub Capitolio extruebat congereret. Ibidem.

(16) Ibid. folio 359 verſo, and folio 360.

[G] The priſoners were not ſet at liberty till a year after.] This proves Abbot Trithemius to have aſſerted a falſhood, he ſaying that our Platina was not releaſed out of priſon by Sixtus IV. till after the death of Paul II. Multas à Paulo Papa II. calamitates ſuſtinuit, adeo ut bonis omnibus & dignitate ſpoliatus poſt equulei ſuſpenſionem in carcerem crudeliſſime detruſus, uſque ad mortem ipſius Pauli detentus ſit, qui à Sixto mox liberatus, &c (17). When an Author writes the hiſtory of his own misfortunes, we ought to believe him, and not ſuppoſe that he has any occaſion to amplify matters. Trithemius ſhould have followed that maxim, and conſulted the life of Paul II. writ by the ſame perſon whoſe elogium he made. He then would have found the exact time he continued in priſon, and not have enlarged it, and thereby miſled many people to this day. A. Paulo II. in carcerem conjectus, menſeſque quatuor ipſo detentus eſt, donec à ſucceſſore Sixto IV. liberatus (18), i. e. "Paul II. threw him into "priſon, where he lay four months, till he was ſet at "liberty by Sixtus IV. his ſucceſſor."

(17) Trithem. de Scriptor. Eccleſ. p. 356. Boiſſard ſays the ſame in Sir Thomas Pope-Blount, Cenſ. Author. p. 339.

(18) Boſius, de comparanda Prudentia civili, p. 377. Tom. 2. of the treatiſes de ratione ſtudiorum, collected and illuſtrated with a Commentary, by the learned Cremus, at Leyden 1696.

[H] Here

himſelf in his own element; and lived very happily in that ſtation, till the year 1481, when he was ſnatched away by the plague (h). He bequeathed to Pomponius Lætus, the houſe which he had built on Mons Quirinalis, with the Laurel grove, out of which the poetical crowns were taken (i). Here follows a catalogue of his writings [H]. Daniel William Mollerus, Profeſſor of the Univerſity of Altdorf, publiſhed a curious piece (k), which has been of great ſervice to me in the drawing up of this article. He obſerves, that Andrew Corthymius (l) has made three Platinas of one; he ſpeaking of Platina the Orator, Platina the Hiſtorian, and Platina a Father of the Church. He alſo obſerves, that Barthius imagines he perceived a very criminal myſtery, in Platina's not (b) Vide the rem. [A], citat. (1).

(i) Jovius Elog. cap. 19.

(k) Entitled, Diſputatio circularis de Platina. Altdorf. d. 17. Febr. 1694.

(l) In Florilegio Hiſtorico, folio 204. num. 10. and folio 206. num. 4.

[H] Here follows a catalogue of his writings.] The moſt conſiderable of them is, the hiſtory of the Popes, from St. Peter to Sixtus IV. to whom he dedicated it. The Proteſtants approve of it well enough, and have ranked this Author in the catalogue of the witneſſes to the truth (19). See a paſſage from Illyricus hereunder. Some Roman Catholic Writers charge him with want of ſincerity and care: and yet Panvinius did not ſcruple to publiſh this hiſtory, with notes of his own; and to add to it the Lives of the Popes from Sixtus IV. to Pius IV. Cicarella, following the ſame plan, has joined to it the Lives of the Popes, from Pius V. to Clement VIII. The abovementioned work of Platina was firſt printed at Venice, in 1479, folio. Olearius (20) is therefore miſtaken, in ſuppoſing the edition of Nuremberg of 1481, to be the firſt. The Reader may ſee this remark in Mollerus's diſſertation (21), with a catalogue of ſeveral other editions. That which I make uſe of is not mentioned by him, and was printed at Lyons in 1512, 8vo. At the end of the work are the following words: Excellentiſſimi hiſtorici Platynæ in vitas ſummorum Pontificum uſque ad Julium II. Ponti. Maxi. præclarum opus fœliciter explicit. Ludun. impreſſum à Gilberto de Villiers Borbonnio: impenſis honeſtiſſimi viri domini Vincentii de Prothonotariis & Conſtantini Fradin. Anno domini milleſimo quingenteſimo duodecimo. Die vero 22. menſis Februarii. The beginning of this paragraph is very fallacious. It would lead one to believe, that Platina lived till the Pontificate of Julius II. and nevertheleſs it appears by ſome Latin verſes printed in the ſame year, and at the ſame printing-houſe, that Platina died under Sixtus IV. Bartholomew Ariſtophilus, Author of a Latin poem, inſerted in the collection of the funeral poems publiſhed in honour of Platina, ſays, in his ſhort preamble or introduction, that having ſucceeded, by the appointment of Sixtus, Platina, who was lately dead, as Librarian; and being lodged in the ſame apartment with Platina, he felt, &c. Mollerus has not omitted the catalogue of ſome German, Italian and French tranſlations of this work of Platina. He ſpeaks of a French verſion printed at Paris in 1516, folio; but takes no notice of a later tranſlation by the Sieur Coulon, and publiſhed at Paris in quarto, anno 1651. With regard to the paſſage of Illyricus, which I promiſed, it is as follows: Etſi Platina turpiter & impudenter Papis adulatus ſit: tamen nimia ipſorum turpitudine ac malitiâ coactus aliquando, etiam ſubindicat Babyloniæ Meretricis nefanda ſcelera. In Marcellino queritur Paparum ſcelera eo excreviſſe, ut vix apud Deum miſericordiæ locum reliquerint: avaritiam, ſuperbiam, neglectum Doctrinæ, & Religionis ſimulationem, mores etiam in prophanis deteſtandos, propalam eſſe, ut inde laudem quærere videantur. In Pontificibus poſt milleſimum annum, ſubinde reperit, Omnem pietatem & ſanctitatem à Papis ad Cæſares migraſſe (22), i. e. "Though Platina flattered the Roman Pontiffs in a ſhameful, impudent manner; he "yet is ſometimes forced, becauſe of their exceſſive "ſcandalous and wicked conduct, to mention the abominable crimes of the whore of Babylon. He "declares, in the Life of Marcellinus, that the Popes "were grown ſo extremely wicked, that there was "little probability of God's having mercy upon "them: that their avarice, pride, diſregard of "learning, hypocriſy, and vices, which would be "deteſted even in profane perſons, were become ſo "public, that one would conclude they were proud "of, and gloried in them. He frequently ſays, in "his Lives of the Popes, (after thoſe who lived after "the year of our Lord, one thouſand) that all piety "and ſanctity had ſhifted from the Roman Pontiffs to "the Emperors." I would willingly enough ſubſcribe to the judgment which Robert Chreyghton has formed of this work of Platina. Platinam, ſays he (23), auctorem ſiccum & ſtrigoſum ſæpe verba, ſæpe ſenſus, multoties rerum experientia, nonnunquam integritas deſtituunt. Et quod magis miremur nunquam lapſus eſt gravius quam in Eugenii vita, ſub cujus temporibus floruit, i. e. "Platina, a dry, jejune Writer, frequently wants words, "frequently ſenſe; experience very often, and ſometimes integrity: and, a circumſtance moſt to be "wondered at is, that he has not any where committed "greater miſtakes, than in the Life of Eugenius, under whoſe Pontificate he lived."

(19) See Simon Goulart, in Catalogo Teſtium Veritatis, vol. 1490.

(20) In Abaco Patrolog. p. 68.

(21) He might have obſerved, that Father Labbe, de Script. Eccl. Tom. 1. p. 174 has committed the ſame error as Olearius.

(22) Illyricus, lib. 19. Catal. Teſtium Veritatis, apud Pope-Blount, Cenſ. celebr. Autor. p. m. 339.

(23) Robertus Chreyghton, Notis ad Sylveſtri Sguropuli Hiſtoriam Concilii Florentini, ſect. 5. cap. 2.

Here follow the titles of the reſt of Platina's works. De naturis rerum: Epiſtolæ ad diverſos: de honeſta voluptate & valetudine: de falſo & vero bono: contra amores: de vera nobilitate: de optimo cive: Panegyricus in laudem Beſſarionis: Oratio ad Paulum II. de pace Italiæ componenda & bello Turcico indicendo: de floſculis linguæ Latinæ. There was printed at Lyons by Gryphius, in 1541, 8vo, at the end of Cælii Apicii de re culinaria libri decem, the following book, P. (24) Platinæ Cremonenſis viri undecunque doctiſſimi de tuenda valetudine, natura rerum & popinæ ſcientia, ad ampliſſimum D. D. B. Rovarellam S. Clementis Preſbyterum Cardinalem libri decem. This work was unworthy of its Author; and therefore I don't wonder that Sannazarius ridiculed it in the ſubſequent epigram:

Ingenia & mores vitaſque obituſque notaſſe
Pontificum, argutæ lex fuit hiſtoriæ.
Tu tamen hinc lautæ tractas pulmenta culinæ;
Hoc Platina eſt ipſos paſcere pontifices (α).

"When you deſcribe the genius, manners, lives,
"And deaths of Pontiffs, then you're an Hiſtorian:
"But when to kitchen-arts you turn your pen,
"Juſtly you're look'd upon to be their Cook.

(24) A P has been printed inſtead of B. Mollerus, p. 7. obſerves, that there is miſprinted, in the catalogue of Thuanus's library, p. 119. part 1. John Bapt. Platinæ, and p. 182. part 2. Petri Platinæ. Now this error was not made by thoſe who drew up the catalogue, but by thoſe who printed Platina's works.

§ (α) Sannazarius falſely ſuppoſed, that Platina, after having writ the Lives of the Popes, had deſcended ſo low as to write on Cookery. See the new Menagiana, Paris edition of 1715, p. 69 and 70. By the way, the laſt editions of Platina are not the moſt faithful. For inſtance, in Pope Cletus's Life, folio 13, in John Petit's edition of 1530, 8vo, we read Uxorem habuit in Bythinia, i. e. "He had a wife in "Bithynia," with which alſo agrees an old Italian tranſlation I have ſeen; whereas the following editions have corrupted it; Uxorem non habens in Bithynia, i. e. "Not having a wife in Bithynia." REM. CRIT.

The Lyons edition of 1541, was preceded by that of Colen 1529 and 1537, 8vo. The Italian book which I have ſeen, intitled B. Scacchi Cuoco ſecreto di Papa Paolo II. Opera, dove ſi tratta di diverſe vivande, &c. con le figure in 4. Venet. 1570, is not a tranſlation of Platina's ten books, de tuenda valetudine & popinæ ſcientia. This Italian work is cited after another manner by Lanzius: Extat, ſays he (25), memorabilis liber artis Apicianæ de culina & architriclini officio di M. Bartholomeo Scappi cuoco ſecreto di Papa Pio V. qui nunc præfectus eſt *(ait * ille)* noſtris intimis coquis, non ſine ejuſdem privilegio & approbatione inquiſitorum hæreticæ pravitatis, Venetiis editus anno M.D.LXXI. ſed & ante hunc Bartholomæum extant Platinæ, Suetonii Pontificii de popinæ ſcientia libri 10. ad Cardinalem Rovarellam. It is plain Lanzius was perſuaded, that his Bartholomew Scappi, called by others Bartholomew Scacchi, is not the ſame perſon with Platina, and he is right in his conjecture, B. Scappi's book containing a relation of the funeral obſequies of Paul III. at which the Author was preſent. I am to obſerve, that it is a thick quarto, divided into (25) Orat. contra Italiam, p. m. 845, 846.

* M. Freher. Comm. ad Conſtant. Donat.

not mentioning either Chriſt's Reſurrection or Aſcenſion [I]. Varillas has committed ſome errors [K].

fix books, treating of the ſeveral ways of dreſſing fiſh, fleſh, &c. There are a great number of plates (26).

(26) This particular I procured from the Mazarine library.

With regard to the Hiſtory of Mantua, written by Platina, Mollerus (27) affirms, that Lambecius publiſhed it in 1674. He nevertheleſs owns, that he was not able to purchaſe one copy of it, though he made all the enquiries poſſible; and that Martin Defenbachius (28) affirms, that this work was never publiſhed. The original of this Hiſtory of Mantua was left, by the Author himſelf, to Gaudentius Merula, who ſent it to Oporinus, a Printer at Baſil, in order for him to print it. Oporinus died before he printed it, and left it to the eldeſt ſon of his good friend Theodorus Zwingerus (29). It is certain that Lambecius publiſhed it with notes, in Vienna, anno 1675, in 4to. In the 10th Giornale de Letterati 1676, we have an extract of it, by which we are informed, that this work is divided into ſix books, and not into ſeven, as Poſſevinus affirms (30), or into three, as Voſſius imagined (31); and that Lambecius, who affirms, in oppoſition to Trithemius, Angelus Rocca, Raphael Volaterranus, Boiſſard and Voſſius, that Platina's name was Baptiſt, and not Bartholomew, is refuted by a brief of the Pope, in the Vatican Library. It is the brief in which Platina is nominated Keeper of that Library, and he is named Bartholomew in it. This proof was not known to Voſſius. Wharton (32) obſerves, that Richard Flemyngus, who was well acquainted with Platina, and beſtowed the higheſt encomiums on him (33), calls him Bartholomew § (α).

(27) De Platina, p. 26.

(28) De Henrico VII Imperat. p. 47.

(29) Diſenbachius, ibid. apud Mollerum, p. 27.

(30) In Apparatu Sacro.

(31) De Hiſtor. Latinis, p. 589.

(32) In Append. ad Cave, Hiſt. Literar. Scriptor. Eccleſiaſt. p. 153.

(33) In lib. 1. Lucubrationum Tiburtinarum.

§ (α) As alſo Benedictus Curtius (Benoît le Court) in his Commentary on the Decrees of Love (les Arrets d'Amour;) and Boiſſard in the title of an Epigram which he made on him, printed in the Deliciæ Poetarum Galliæ, Tom. 1.] REM. CRIT.

[I] Barthius imagines he perceived a very criminal myſtery, in Platina's not mentioning either Chriſt's Reſurrection or Aſcenſion.] Mollerus writes as follows. Improbitatis alicujus Platinam accuſaturi ad Caſp. Barth. animadverſ. in Guil. Briton. lib. 6. Philipp. p. 459. provocare ſolent, quippe ubi verba reperire liceat ſequentia Auguſti hoc dictum (nempe melius eſt Herodis porcum eſſe quam filium: de quo vid. Macrob. in jocis Auguſto lib. 2. c. 4) illuſtravit renaſcentibus literis B. Platina in primo ſuorum Pontificum nempe Domino & Deo noſtro Jeſu Chriſto. Qui improbe tamen hoc & profane, quod vita ſervatoris obituque utcunque commemoratis, glorioſiſſimam reſurrectionem è mortuis & aſcenſionem in cœlum, ne uno quidem verbo attigit. Cauſa facile à ſagacibus hominibus odoranda (34). i. e. "Such "perſons as charge Platina with impiety, alledge "Caſpar Barthius's Animadverſions, where, the following words are found immediately after this ſaying "Auguſtus, it is better to be Herod's hog than his ſon: "(for which ſee Macrobius) B. Platina, on the reviſ "val of Literature explained, in the Life of his firſt "Pope, viz. of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. He yet acted the "part of a wicked and impious Writer, inaſmuch "as, though he ſpoke of our Saviour's Life and "Death, he yet does not mention a word of his "moſt glorious Reſurrection and Aſcenſion into Hea"ven; the reaſon of which may be eaſily gueſſed "by ſagacious perſons." Mollerus does not grant that Platina omitted the Reſurrection and Aſcenſion of Jeſus Chriſt; Sed tamen Platinam, ſays he, mortis & reſurrectionis Chriſti meminiſſe ex principio ſtatim vitæ S. Petri inſpecto apparebit ubi verba occurrunt iſta: poſt Chriſti mortem & reſurrectionem completis jam diebus Pentecoſtes Spiritum S. accepere diſcipuli, i. e. "It will yet appear, that Platina mentioned Chriſt's "Death and Reſurrection, by the peruſal of the be"ginning of St. Peter's Life, where we find the fol"lowing words: after the death and reſurrection of "Chriſt, the days of Pentecoſt being fulfilled, the "Diſciples received the Holy Ghoſt." The Reader ſees in what manner he proves that Platina has mentioned thoſe two myſteries; but then he ſeems to entertain a ſuſpicion, that there is ſome fraud in this Author's proceeding, upon pretence that the chapter which treats of Chriſt, ſays nothing with regard to the Reſurrection and Aſcenſion of the Meſſiah. He mentions, but without refuting them, the ſuſpicions ſome entertained, that Platina's intention was to increaſe the glory of the Popes. Certum autem eſt in vitæ Chriſti deſcriptione neque reſurrectionis è mortuis neque aſcenſionis in cœlum mentionem ullam eſſe injectam, non tam ob brevitatis cauſſam, ut aliqui ſuſpicati ſunt, quam ut nonnullorum ex opinione, inſignior inſequentes Pontifices gloria maneret (35). I will own, that all I comprehend here is, that many perſons make themſelves ridiculous, by an over affectation of ſagacity. Such perſons ſeek for political views or deſigns in the plaineſt and moſt indifferent matters. I would gladly hear from any perſon, the advantage which would accrue to the Popes, from Platina's mentioning Chriſt's Reſurrection and Aſcenſion, not in the chapter which treats of Chriſt, but in the following which treats of St. Peter. I am of opinion that Platina would be greatly ſurprized, were it poſſible for him to know that ſuch fineſſes are aſcribed to him, ſo unworthy of his country.

(24) Mollerus, de Platina, p. 23.

(25) Idem, ibid.

[K] Varillas has committed ſome errors (36)] The 1ſt is, his aſſerting that Platina was born in Cremona. 2d, Cardinal Beſſarion did not requeſt Platina to write the Lives of the Popes. 3d, The work in queſtion was not writ before the Pontificate of Pope Paul II. Theſe two falſities are clearly refuted by the dedication, in which Platina ſays twice, that he wrote the Hiſtory of the Popes by order of Sixtus IV. Tu itaque Theologorum ac Philoſophorum princeps Maxime Pontifex hac hominum utilitate motus ſimulque dignitati eccleſiaſticæ conſulens, non fruſtra MANDASTI ut res geſtas Pontificum ſcriberem . . . . . ſi quid emolumenti ex hac ſcriptione noſtra perceperint, tibi ſoli Pontifex optime gratias agant, cujus ſanctiſſimo IMPERIO libenter OBTEMPERAVI. 4*th, Paul II. did not appoint him his Secretary*; as being raiſed to that employment by Pius II. and diveſted of it by Paul II.

(36) In the Anecdotes of Florence, p. 171.

PLOTINA (POMPEIA), wife of the Emperor Trajan, has been honoured with great elogiums by ſome Authors. She was not handſome; and it appears by her medals that there was more gravity than charms in her face (a); but ſhe was prudent and modeſt. Trajan married her before Nerva had adopted him [A]. The words ſhe ſpoke at her firſt coming into the Imperial Palace are highly worthy of notice; going up the ſtair-caſe ſhe turned about to the people, and ſaid, that ſhe went into the palace juſt ſuch as ſhe deſired to come out of it (b) [B]. She conducted herſelf ſo well during the whole courſe

(a) Triſtan, Comment. Hiſt. Tom. 1. p. 428.

(b) Xiphilin. in Trajano.

[A] Trajan married her before Nerva had adopted him.] This is evident from the following words of Pliny's Panegyric. Idem eſtis invicem, ſays he to Trajan, quod fuiſtis: probatis ex æquo, nihilque vobis felicitas addidit, niſi quod ſcire cœpiſtis, quam bene uterque veſtrum felicitatem ferat. i. e. "You are mutually "the ſame to each other as what you uſed to be: "equally well ſatisfied; and proſperity adds nothing "to you, except the giving you an opportunity of "being ſenſible how well you both ſhould bear pro"ſperity." And a little after ſpeaking of Plotina and Marciana, he obſerves that they behaved, when living in the Emperor's palace, with as little pride as if they had not been perſons of quality: Neque enim unquam periclitabuntur eſſe privatæ, quæ non deſierunt. i. e. "Theſe will never be in danger of becoming "private women ſince they have ever conducted "themſelves as ſuch."

[B] She ſaid, that ſhe went into the palace, juſt as ſhe deſired to come out of it.] Moreri has diſguiſed Plotina's thought. He ſays that ſhe proteſted, the firſt time ſhe went into the palace, ... that ſhe would re adily course of her reign, that she was not once murmured at (c). She refused the title of Augusta, so long as her Consort refused that of Father of his country Pater Patriæ (d). The counsels she gave to Trajan were of prodigious serviced to the Provinces, since they occasioned the redressing of numberless grievances under which the people groaned (e). The union which subsisted between hers and Marciana Trajan's sister, is a conspicuous proof of her wisdomand good temper; there being generally nothing seen but animosities and factions between the wives and sisters of Princes [C]. She was with Trajan when he died in Selinunta a city of Cilicia, the year of our Lord 117; and it was she who carried to Rome the ashes of her husband, accompanied by Tatian and Matidia, Trajan's niece (f). She did many good offices to Adrian [D], who was obliged to her for the Empire. There have always been so many slanderers in the world, that Plotina's modesty, and so many good and great qualities for which she was conspicuous [E], could not secure her from the venom of slanderous tongues. She was thought to entertain a passion for Adrian [F], and to this they ascribed his enjoyment of all the exalted posts to which he was raised. Some affirm that he was not adopted by Trajan

(c) Xiphilin. in Trajano.

(d) Plinius, in Panegyr.

(e) Aurel. Victor. Epitom. in Juliano.

(f) Spartian. in Adriano, cap. 5. p. m. 51.

readily go out of it whenever she should be desired to do it. But this was not her meaning. She wished that her exalted condition might not change her manners; and that, when she should be obliged to quit her post, she might have the same turn of mind and moderation, she found herself in, at her taking possession of the imperial palace. Such a wish is worthy of a great soul, and respects a happiness which is rarely met with. Honores mutant mores. i. e. "Honours change "people's manners."

[C] There being generally nothing seen but animosities and factions between the wives and sisters of Princes] Let us hear the Panegyrist of Trajan on this subject. Nihil est tam pronum ad simultates quam æmulatio, in feminis præsertim: ea porro maxime nascitur ex conjunctione, alitur æqualitate, exardescit invidia, cujus finis est odium. Quo quidem admirabilius existimandum est, quod mulieribus duabus in una domo, parique fortuna, nullum certamen, nulla contentio est. Suspiciunt invicem, invicem cedunt: quumque te utraque effusissimè diligat, nihil sua putant interesse, utram tu magis ames. Idemque utrique propositum, idem tenor vitæ, nihilque ex quo sentias duas esse. "i. e. "Nothing is so apt to breed "contentions as emulation, particularly in the fair-sex. "Now this passion, which arises chiefly from their "being near to one another, is fomented by their "equality, and is greatly encreased by envy, which "ever ends in hatred. It is therefore the more sur"prizing that two Ladies of the same quality should "live in the same house, without the least strife or "animosity. They mutually respect and bear with "one another: and as both have the strongest affec"tion for you, neither of them thinks herself con"cerned which of them is best beloved by you. "Their views, as well as their course of life, is the "same; and there does not appear any thing which "may distinguish them to be two persons." It would be impossible for a writer to give a more advantageous idea of the merit of two Princesses. Pliny had a wonderful talent in drawing characters; and he had reason to consider this concord as an advantage on which he might congratulate Trajan: for generally Princes are vastly unhappy in their family, how happy soever they may be in other respects, if a mother, a wife, a sister, a mother-in-law, a daughter, a daughter-in-law, &c. live under the same roof with them. These will put them to more trouble (nay, the half, the third part of this will do it) than their whole Government gives them. But when I see Panegyrists in this age, who represent Princes, not as they were, but as they should have been, according to the very sublime ideas of an orator; when I consider, I say, all this, I suspect that Pliny went very much beyond the truth.

[D] She did many good offices to Adrian.] It was she who brought about his marriage with Trajan's grandniece (1), and procured him a Government at the time when the expedition was carried on against the Parthians (2); afterwards his Consulship (3), and at last the Empire (4).

(1) Spartian. in Adriano, cap. 2. p. 23.

(2) Idem, cap. 4. p. 38.

(3) Idem, p. 40.

(4) Idem, p. 46.

[E] The good and great qualities for which she was conspicuous.] Pliny contrasts, whenever he has an opportunity for it, Trajan's perfections with the imperfections of other Princes. He does not omit that grand article of marriage. He says that many illustrious persons had dishonoured themselves on that occasion: but that, with regard to Trajan, it was one of the most glorious passages in history. Multis illustribus dedecori fuit aut inconsultius uxor assumpta, aut retenta patientius, ita foris claros domestica destruebat infamia (5), & ne maximi cives haberentur, hoc efficiebat quod mariti minores erant. Tibi uxor in decus & gloriam cedit. Quid enim illa sanctius? Quid antiquius? Nonne si Pontifici Maximo deligenda sit conjunx, aut hanc, aut similem (ubi est autem similis) elegerit? Quàm illa nihil sibi ex fortuna tua nisi gaudium vendicat? Quàm constanter non potentiam tuam, sed ipsum te reveretur? . . Eadem quam modica cultu, quàm parca commitatu, quàm civilis incessu! i. e. "Many illustrious men have "brought shame upon themselves, either by their "marrying inconsiderately, or their exercising too "much patience when they had a bad wife, by which "means their domestic infamy threw a shade over "the glory they gained abroad; and their being "weak husbands, prevented their being considered as "august citizens. But, to you your wife is an ornament "and glory. Who can be more devout than she is? "What woman descends from nobler ancestors? "Were the High-Priest himself to make choice of a "wife, would he not pitch upon her, or one like her, "(but where is there one such?) Is not the joy "which accrues to her from your good fortune all "she requires? How inviolably does she adhere to "your person, not to your power? . . . . . Then, "how modest is she in her attire? How slender her "retinue? How gracious her air!" He calls her, in "one of his epistles (6), a most holy woman: Injungis mihi jucundissimum ministerium, ut ad Plotinam sanctissimam feminam litteræ tuæ perferantur. i. e. "You enjoin me a most pleasing task, when you order "me to send your letter to Plotina, that most holy "woman."

(5) Compare this with what Tacitus says, chap. 24. book 3. Ut valida divo Augusto in Remp. fortuna, ita domi improspera fuit ob impudicitiam filiæ ac nepotis quas urbe depulit. See citat. (5), of the article LEWIS VII. and rem. [G], of the article HELOISE.

(6) The 28th of lib. 9.

[F] She was thought to entertain a passion for Adrian.] Dion tells us plainly so. Ἐξ ἐρωτικῆς φιλίας, i. e. "From love," (says he) in one place; ἐρᾶσης αὐτοῦ διαφερόντως, i. e. "had a violent passion for "him," (says he) in another. How malicious the world is! People cannot see a woman entertain an affection for a man, and use their utmost endeavours to heap honours and possessions upon him, but they instantly imagine that she entertains a criminal passion for him. A disparity with regard to age, so far from silencing the Satyrists, only sharpens their pen. Those assert, that when the Patroness is in the decline of her charms (a grandmother perhaps) if such a one shews an eagerness in making the fortune of a young man, it is a stronger indication of a criminal correspondence, than if she was but twenty. She would not be so fond in her old age, will a Satyrist say, if she did not think it incumbent on her to pay a young fellow for the nights he indulges her, and which he might have spent much more delightfully elsewhere; she would not be so forward to serve, recommend, and lay out money for a man, if she was not desirous that the tribute or amour should continue. In a word, the slander has an eye to the following verses of Juvenal.

Cum te summoveant qui testamenta merentur
Noctibus, in cælum quos evehit optima summi
Nunc via processus, vetulæ vesica beatæ (7).

(7) Juvenal, Sat. 1. ver. 37.

"When night-performance holds the place of merit,
"And brawn and back the next of kin disherit;
"For such good parts are in preferment's way,
"The rich old madam never fails to pay
"Her legacies." DRYDEN.

Trajan [G]; but that Plotina, concealing his death, made another perſon ſpeak in his name in a feint tone of voice, in order that the people might hear that Adrian was declared that Prince's ſon and ſucceſſor. It does not appear that ſhe ever bore children. After her death, Adrian, who had always ſhewed himſelf very thankful for her favours [H], expreſſed an extraordinary grief on that occaſion. He put on mourning nine days: compoſed hymns, and built a temple in her honour (g); and put her in the catalogue of the Goddeſſes (b). He had before built a temple at Niſmes in her honour (i). The family and country of Plotina are unknown: and it is very ſurprizing that the Hiſtorians of that age ſhould have been ſo careleſs as not to make the leaſt mention of them. They alſo have been ſilent with regard to the time of her death. De Tillemont (k) fancies he had found a paſſage in Dion, whence it may be concluded that ſhe died in 129: but I would not adviſe any perſon to truſt to his conjecture, till ſuch time as he ſhews the reaſon for which he pretends to draw that concluſion. Moreri, who fixes Plotina's death in the year 122, cannot prove his aſſertion. As to what he adds, that Adrian built a Temple, a Palace, and an Amphitheatre, in her honour, at Niſmes, it would be equally difficult to prove it. Spartianus ſpeaks only of a Baſilica (l), but does not ſay whether or no Plotina was then living.

(g) Xiphilin. in Adriano.

(b) We meet with ſome inſcriptions in Gruterus's Theſaurus, where mention is made of the Prieſts of the Goddeſs Plotina, Sacerdos Divæ Plotinæ. See Triſtan's Commentaries, Tom. 1. p. 430.

(i) Spartan. in Adrian. cap. 12. p. m. 110.

(k) Hiſt. de Empereurs, Vie d'Adrien, p. m. 426.

(l) Spartian. in Adriano, cap. 12. p. m. 110.

[G] Some affirm that he was not adopted by Trajan.] Dion affirms (8), that Apronienus his father, who was Governor of Cilicia, had told him, that Trajan's death was concealed for ſome days, in order to give ſucceſs to the intrigue of his adoption; and that this incident was known, by this Prince's letter to the Senate, not ſigned by him, but by Plotina, a circumſtance which had never happened before. Dodwell refutes Dion in his learned lectures on Spartian (9). By the way, Dion is not the only Writer who ſays this. Nec deſunt, ſays another, qui factione Plotinæ mortuo jam Trajano Adrianum in adoptionem adſcitum eſſe prodiderint, ſuppoſito qui pro Trajano feſſa voce loqueretur (10), i. e. "Nor are Writers wanting who "declared, that Adrian, after Trajan's death, was "adopted by the intrigues of Plotina, ſhe having "ſuborned a perſon to ſpeak, in a feint tone of "voice, for Trajan." How difficult is it to refute a probable ſlander?

(8) In Adriano, init.

(9) Page 538.

(10) Spartan. cap. 4. p. 45.

[H] Adrian .... had .... always ſhewed himſelf very thankful for her favours.] Triſtan (11) relates, that Adrian had left, by his will, very conſiderable legacies to Plotina, in caſe he ſhould happen to die firſt; which I learn, adds he, from the Law; Si Auguſtæ legaveris, ff. de legat. & fidei commiſſ. lib. 2. which relates it in manner following. Si Auguſtæ legaveris, & ea inter homines eſſe deſierit: deficit quod ei relictum eſt, ſicuti divus Hadrianus in Plotina & proxime Imperator Antoninus in Fauſtinæ Auguſtæ perſona conſtituit, cum ea ante inter homines eſſe deſiiſſet quàm teſtator decederet. i. e. "If you bequeath a legacy "to the Empreſs, and ſhe die, that article of the "will is void, as Adrian ordained with regard to "Plotina; and lately Antoninus the Emperor with "reſpect to Fauſtina, ſhe leaving the world before "the Teſtator."

(11) Comment. Hiſt. Tom. 1. p. 430.

PLOTINUS, a Platonic Philoſopher, flouriſhed in the third Century. His genius was greatly ſuperior to the vulgar herd of Philoſophers, and his ideas were very ſingular and extraordinary. He was aſhamed of being lodged in a body, for which reaſon he did not care to tell the place of his birth (a), or his family. The contempt he had for every thing terreſtrial, was the reaſon why he would not permit any perſon to draw his picture [A]: and if his Diſciples had not met with one who drew it by memory, they would not have had the ſatisfaction they deſired. I am of opinion that he refuſed, from the ſame

(a) We nevertheleſs know, that he was born in Lycopolis, a city of Egypt. Eunapius, in Plotino.

(1) Οὐ γὰρ ἄρκει φέρειν ὃ ἡ φύσις εἰδώλου ἡμᾶς περιτέθεικεν, ἀλλὰ καὶ εἰδώλα εἴδωλον συγχωρεῖν αὐτὸν ἄξιον πολυχρονιώτερον καταλιπεῖν, ὡς δή τι τῶν ἀξίων θεάτων ἔργων. Quaſi vero non ſatis hanc imaginem ferre ſit quam natura nobis ab initio circumdedit: etiam cenſus imaginis hujus imaginem diuturniorem inſuper poſteris ut opus ſpectaculo dignum relinquendum? Porphyr. in Vita Plotin. init.

[A] He would not permit any perſon to draw his picture.] Amelius, his Diſciple, was urgent with him to have it drawn, but all to no purpoſe; is it not enough (ſaid he) to drag after us, whitherſoever we go, that image in which nature has ſhut us up? Do you think that we ſhould likewiſe tranſmit, to future ages, an image of that image, as a ſight worthy of their attention (1). How noble is that thought! none but narrow minds can diſpute its being ſuch. Madam Des-Houlieres has writ ſome admirable verſes on the vanity, which prompts perſons to ſit for their pictures (2). The elevation and depth of her morality is admirable. A Lady, who thinks ſo nobly, ought to have lived in Plotinus's age, for our's was unworthy of her: mankind, in our age, have too mean ſouls; and pay too great a regard to the body and the goods of fortune. There are no Plotinus's now a-days. Madam Des-Houlieres herſelf yielded to the temptation of being drawn (3): ſhe felt a pleaſure in ſeeing herſelf grown young again, by Mademoiſelle Cheron's * pencil; and to think ſhe ſhould not be unknown, in that reſpect, when ſhe ſhould exiſt no more. Here follows what ſhe ſaid of the Lady who painted her.

Elle me rend enfin mes premieres couleurs;
Par ſon art la race future
Conoîtra les preſens que me fit la nature:
Et je puis aſperer qu'avec un tel ſecours,
Tandis que j'errerai ſur les ſombres rivages,
Je pourrai faire encor quelque honneur à nos jours.
Oui je puis m'en flater: plaire & durer toûjours
Eſt le deſtin de ſes ouvrages.

" Her colours paint me in youth's lovely bloom:
" By her ſweet art, ages to come will ſee
" The preſents which from nature I receiv'd.
" I've room to hope, that, by her charming aid,
" I ſtill may do ſome honour to our age,
" Whilſt, pale, I wander round the dreary coaſt.
" My hopes are juſt: whate'er her pencil forms,
" (Happy effect!) muſt pleaſe and laſt for ever."

To grow young again in painting, and in ſculpture, (will it be ſaid) is a trifle: to be pleaſed (will it be farther ſaid) at the reflection that future ages will not be ignorant that we once were young and beautiful, is contenting ourſelves with honours that are entirely chimerical. But who knows this better than the Lady in queſtion; and does not ſhe, from thence, draw the moſt delicate part of her reflection? Here follows the laſt verſes of her Poem.

Hé, comment pourrois-je pretendre
De guerir les mortels de cette vieille erreur,
Qu'ils aiment juſqu' à la fureur,
Si moi qui la condamne ai piene à m'en defendre?
Ce portrait dont Apelle auroit été jaloux,
Me remplit malgré moi de la flateuſe attente,
Que je ne ſaurois voir dans autrui ſans couroux.
Foible raiſon que l'homme vante!
Voilà quel eſt le fond qu'on peut faire ſur vous:
Toûjours vains, toûjours faux, toûjours pleins d'injuſtices,
Nous crions dans tous nos diſcours
Contre les paſſions, les foibleſſes, les vices
Où nous ſuccombons tous les jours.

" Ah!

(2) They are printed in the Mercure Galant, for November 1693.

(3) When I wrote this, ſhe was living. She died the 17th of February 1694.

* Mademoiſelle le Hay, and Mademoiſelle Cheron, are the ſame perſon. From the rem. to the Paris edit. of Bayle's Dict. Tom. 4. p. 973. col. 2.]

ſame principle, to make uſe of ſeveral things which were thought very conducive to health [B]: but it was another reaſon which prompted him to reject the uſe of clyſters, to which he was adviſed, as being an excellent remedy for the colic; he not thinking it becoming, or ſuitable to the gravity of an old Philoſopher, to employ ſuch a remedy (b). He began very early to ſhow a great ſingularity both in his taſte and manners: for, at eight years of age, at the time when he went to ſchool, he uſed to run to his nurſe, and uncover her breaſt to ſuck, which he uſed to do very greedily; but he diſcontinued that practice, upon her chiding him for it, and telling him that he was troubleſome. At twenty eight years of age he had a ſtrong deſire to apply himſelf to the ſtudy of Philoſophy, on which occaſion he was recommended to the moſt famous Profeſſors of Alexandria, but he was not ſatisfied with their Lectures, and was always very melancholy at his return from them. A friend of his being informed of the cauſe of his diſtaſte, did not find a better remedy than to take him to Ammonius's Lectures, in which he was not miſtaken in his conjectures, for the inſtant Plotinus heard that Philoſopher, he confeſſed to his friend that this was the man he was in ſearch of. He ſpent eleven years together under that excellent maſter, and became a great Philoſopher. The excellent learning he had imbibed, only inſpired him with a ſtronger deſire to acquire ſtill more, and to hear the Perſian and Indian Philoſophers: for which reaſon he did not let ſlip the opportunity with which the war the Emperor Gordianus intended to wage againſt the Perſians furniſhed him (c). Accordingly he followed the Roman army, but in all probability repented of it, becauſe it was with great difficulty he ſaved his life by flight, after the Emperor had been ſlain. He was then thirty nine years of age. The year following he went to Rome, and read Lectures of philoſophy of that city. He indeed there taught thoſe particulars which he had learnt from his maſter Ammonius; but he did not follow the example of Erennius and Origen, his fellow-pupils, who having promiſed (as he did) not to impart to the publick the moſt excellent particulars in which Ammonius had inſtructed them, had nevertheleſs forfeited their word. As for Plotinus, he continued ten years in Rome, without writing one book; but having afterwards writ twenty, he ſhewed them to ſuch only as he knew to be perſons of judgment. In the fiftieth year of his age Porphyry became his Diſciple, who being ſo fine a genius, muſt neceſſarily be employment enough for him. Porphyry was not ſatisfied with ſuperficial anſwers, but required to have all difficulties explained thoroughly; and therefore Plotinus, to treat things with the greater accuracy, was obliged to write ſome books [C]. He wrote four and twenty in the ſix years that Porphyry was his Diſciple; and theſe twenty four added to the twenty one which he had writ before Porphyry's arrival, together with the nine which he compoſed after that this Diſciple had left Rome, make in all fifty four books. They are divided into ſix Enneas's, and are all upon very abſtruſe ſubjects [D]. They exhibit three different ages

(b) Καὶλιαχῦ δὲ νόσου πολλάκις παρατεινούμενος ὅτε κλυστῆρος ἐνίσχυτο, οὐκ εἶναι πρὸς τὸ πρεσβυτέρῳ λέγων ὑπομένειν πάς ταῦτας θεραπείας. Proinde cum ſæpe colico vexaretur morbo, ſemper clyſteres renuit negans decere ſenem curationes ejuſmodi. Porphyr. in Vita Plotini, p. 1. The Tranſlator, inſtead of Colico, ſhould have read Cœliaco.

(c) In 243.

" Ah! how ſhou'd I pretend to cure proud mortals
" Of a vain error they ſo dearly love,
" If I, who cenſure it, am weak as they?
" This portrait, which had made Apelles jealous,
" Inſpires proud hopes (I yet attempt to check;)
" Hopes I deſpiſe in others, and deteſt.
" How weak is reaſon! man's eternal boaſt!
" What man can truſt to thy deluſive aid!
" Tho' vain, falſe and unjuſt, ſtill we exclaim
" Againſt thoſe paſſions, vices, and injuſtice,
" To which (ſtrange creatures!) we are daily victims."

This greatly ſets off the victory which Plotinus gained over ſo general a weakneſs: and all true Philoſophers ought to rejoice, that ſo noble a triumph ſhould have been reſerved for one of their greateſt heroes. Plotinus's picture was drawn, I confeſs; but then he knew nothing of the matter; Amelius brought an excellent painter into the ſchool. This painter gazed upon Plotinus as long as ever he thought proper, and drew him from the idea he had formed to himſelf of him in his mind, and the portrait was extremely like. Amelius had taken the pains, to cauſe all ſuch features to be retouched, as required correction (4). Here follows another triumph of Plotinus. He could never be prevailed upon to inform any perſon of the day or month in which he was born (5), and for this reaſon, becauſe he did not deſire to have it celebrated with feaſts and ſacrifices: and yet he himſelf never failed to celebrate thoſe of Socrates and Plato after the ſame manner (6). Was not this deſpiſing that idle vapour immortal fame?

(4) Idem, Porph. in Vita Plotini, p. 2. C.

(5) See Porphyr. in Plotinus's Life.

(6) See the ſame Life.

CHARACTERISTICKS of a Coquet.

Not knowing whether I ſhall meet with a better opportunity of employing a remark which I read in Furetieriana, I may juſtly introduce it here. " Coquets are eaſily known by their dreſs, by the people who viſit them, their ſervants, their way of ſpeaking; and they alſo are known by the number of copies they cauſe to be taken of their portraits. " One of theſe Ladies having ſat for her picture to " Mademoiſelle le Hay, cauſed five copies to be taken " of it. Heavens! (ſays a Gentleman) what can " make this woman order ſo many portraits to be " drawn? Quoniam multiplicatæ ſunt iniquitates ejus, " (becauſe her ſins are multiplied) replied Mademoiſelle le Hay very agreeably (7)."

(7) Furetieriana, p. 171. Dutch edit.

[B] He refuſed . . . . . to make uſe of ſeveral things which were thought very conducive to health.] He never made uſe of preſervatives or baths, and did not even eat the fleſh of tame animals (8). He eat but little; and abſtained very often from bread, which, joined to his intenſe meditation, kept him very much from ſleeping (9).

(8) Οὔτε τὰς θηριακὰς ἀνθιδοῦναι λαβεῖν ὑπέμεινε. μὴ δὲ τῶν ἡμέρων ζώων τὰς ἐκ τοῦ σώματος τροφὰς προσήσθαι λέγων. λουτροῦ δὲ ἀπεχόμενος. Neque theriaca antidota unquam accepit, cum nec ex animalium quoque manſuetorum corporibus capere eſcam ſe diceret. Abſtinebat & balneis. Porphyr. in Vita Plotin. p. 1.

(9) Idem, p. 6. ſub fin.

[C] Plotinus, to treat things with the greater accuracy, was obliged to write ſome books.] It is ſcarce poſſible to determine any queſtion merely by conferences or verbal diſputes: both ſides may very probably miſtake the queſtion, and they forget the beginning before they are at the end. I therefore don't wonder that Porphyry ſhould reduce his Maſter to the neceſſity of writing down his thoughts. Plotinus owned that this was the true method of inſtructing a pupil thoroughly; but he likewiſe found it very neceſſary to hear objections, and exerciſe himſelf by way of conference, before he applied himſelf to writing. Such is the anſwer he made to one who complained of Porphyry's frequent interrogations and replies. Niſi dubitationes interrogante Porphyrio diſſolvamus, commentari oratione perpetua quicquam in librum non valebimus (10), i. e. " Unleſs I ſolve the doubts which are " raiſed by Porphyry, it would be impoſſible for me " to write, in the form of a book, a continued diſ- " ſertation." He diſputed three days together on the doubts propoſed to him by Porphyry, with regard to the manner in which our ſouls are united with our bodies.

(10) Idem, p. 6.

[D] His writings are divided into ſix Enneas's, and are ages of the mind of their Author [E]. His manner of compoſing was much of the ſame caſt with the ſingularity which was peculiar to him [F]; on which account he ſtood in great need of a faithful friend to reviſe his writings. He made choice of Porphyry for this purpoſe, preferable to Gentilianus Amelius, who had been his Diſciple twenty four years, and for whom he had a great eſteem, as the reader may ſee elſewhere (d). The Romans paid ſuch a regard to Plotinus as is incredible, many of the Senators becoming his Diſciples; and ſome of them, not only frequented his auditory very aſſiduouſly, but quitted the magiſterial functions, to lead a philoſophical life; and inſpired ſome perſons of the other ſex with a ſtrong love for the ſtudy of philoſophy. A Lady (e) inſiſted upon his living in her houſe; and both ſhe and her daughter took a great pleaſure in hearing him. He had the reputation of being a man of ſuch great abilities and virtue at the ſame time, that many perſons of both ſexes, when they found themſelves dying, uſed to entruſt to him, as though he had been a Guardian Angel, their eſtates and their children (f). Plotinus never refuſed thoſe troubleſome offices. He often had the patience to examine, with other perſons, the accounts of guardians. He was the arbitrator of numberleſs law-ſuits, on which occaſions he always behaved with ſuch rectitude of mind and humanity, that he did not create himſelf one enemy during the twenty ſix years he reſided in Rome. However, he did not meet with the ſame juſtice among all perſons of his profeſſion; for a Philoſopher of Alexandria (g), who was ambitious of being thought of the firſt claſs, uſed his utmoſt endeavours to bring him into contempt, and even had recourſe to necromancy to ruin him. I ſhall obſerve, in the notes, in what manner it is pretended, that the magical operations of this man were rendered ineffectual [G]; and ſhall take ſome notice occaſionally of Plotinus's familiar ſpirit, and

(d) In the art. AMELIUS.

(e) She and her daughter's name was Gemina.

(f) Πολλοὶ δὲ καὶ ἀνδρες καὶ γυναῖκες ἀποθνήσκειν μέλλοντες τῶν συγγενεστάτων φερουσι τὰ ἑαυτῶν τέκνα ἄρρενάς τε ὁμοῦ καὶ θηλείας, ἐκείνῳ παραδιδοσαν μετὰ τῆς ἄλλης οὐσίας, ὡς ἱερῷ τινι καὶ θείῳ φύλακι. Multi quinetiam viri multæ & mulieres generis nobilitate pollentes cum morti jam propinquarent, filios ſuos tum mares tum fœminas una cum omni eorum ſubſtantia Plotino tanquam ſacro cuidam divinoque cuſtodi tradebant atque commendabant. Porphyr. in Vita Plotini.

(g) Named Olympius.

are all upon very abſtruſe ſubjects.] We are obliged to Porphyry for the order, the diviſion of the title of Plotinus's works. Moſt of them turn on the moſt high-flown ideas in Metaphyſicks; and this Philoſopher ſeems, in certain points, not to differ much from Spinoza, in ſome particulars. There are very few ages in which Spinoza's doctrine has not been taught. That impious man had only the wretched advantage of being the firſt who reduced it, according to the geometrical method, into a ſyſtem. What did Plotinus mean, when he wrote two books to prove, Τὸ ὂν πανταχοῦ ὅλον εἶναι ἓν καὶ ταυτὸ, Unum & idem ubique totum ſimul adeſſe (11)? Is not this teaching, that the Being, which is every where, is one and the ſame thing? Spinoza deſires no more. Plotinus enquires, in another book, whether there are many ſouls, or only one; Utrum omnes animæ una ſint. He applied himſelf aſſiduouſly to the ſtudy of ideas: he wrote a book, to enquire whether there are ideas of ſingular things; and another to prove, that intellectual objects are not out of the underſtanding: ὅτι οὐκ ἔξω τοῦ νοῦ τὰ νοητὰ, quod intelligibilia non ſint extra intellectum.

(11) Porphyr. p. 4, C.

[E] ..... They exhibit three different ages of the mind of their Author.] The firſt and laſt books he wrote are greatly inferior to the reſt. We perceive, in the firſt, a ſpirit and ſtrength that is not yet come up to its full maturity; and, in the laſt, a ſtrength which is paſt its maturity; but in the books writ between theſe two, we perceive a ſtrength which has attained the higheſt point of its maturity. Thus we have three ranks of books, twenty-one in the firſt, twenty-four in the ſecond, and nine in the third. Of theſe nine, the five firſt were writ with more ſpirit than the four laſt; ſo true it is, generally ſpeaking, that the mind has the ſame degrees of viciſſitude as the body. We know an Author's age by the touches or ſtrokes of his pen, almoſt as eaſily as by the features of his face (12). Here follow Prophyry's words, according to the Latin tranſlation. Quemadmodum verò conſcripti ſunt alii quidem in ætate prima, alii verò in ipſo vigore vitæ, alii denique defeſſo jam corpore, ſic ferme libri vim ſimilem ipſi declarant. Primi namque unus atque viginti, ſi cum proximè ſequentibus conferantur, leviorem vim habere videntur, nondum ſatis conſtans robur habentem. Qui vero medio tempore compoſiti ſunt, virtutis florem præferunt ad ſummum uſque vigentem. Taleſque ſunt quatuor & viginti (exceptis quibuſdam paucis) perfectiſſimi. Ultimi denique novem remiſſiorem jam referunt facultatem; idque poſtremi quatuor magis quam antecedentes quinque declarant. This tranſlation is by Marſilius Ficinus. This learned Gentleman had no ſooner ended his verſion of Plato's works, but he was informed by John Picus, Count of Mirandula, that Coſmo de Medicis was deſirous of having Plotinus tranſlated. Marſilius did not know this, becauſe Coſmo did not think it proper to deſire him to give a verſion of thoſe two Authors at the ſame time; and had thought it more juſt to inform him of his deſires with regard to Plotinus, after he ſhould have ended his tranſlation of Plato. Marſilius undertook this new taſk and completed it. He not only tranſlated Plotinus, but alſo drew up the ſummary and analyſis of each book (13). Theſe are called the Commentaries of Marſilius Ficinus. That word is fallacious on this occaſion; for the Reader expects critical notes in the Greek text, and explanations of the Author's difficult paſſages and intricate thoughts; this is what we underſtand by the word Commentary, but it is here taken in a quite different ſenſe. I thought it incumbent on me not to let my Reader, as Moreri has done, be miſled by this ambiguous expreſſion.

(12) Baillet, in Tom. 1. Jugemens des Savans, p. 381 & ſeq. has many curious particulars about this.

(13) His Latin verſion (without the Greek) and his Commentary printed at Baſil in 1559, folio.

[F] His manner of compoſing was much of the ſame caſt with the ſingularity which was peculiar to him.] He never uſed to read over his compoſitions after he had writ them; he writ a bad hand, and did not divide the ſyllables; he was no ways accurate in the orthography; he devoted his whole attention to things and thoughts, and obſerved this cuſtom all his life-time. But here follows a ſurpriſing circumſtance. He meditated ſo deeply, that he uſed to diſpoſe, or plan out, a whole work from beginning to end; and purſued the thread of his reflections ſo exactly, that he did not make the leaſt alteration when he wrote. One would have concluded, that the interior original of his work was the rule of his pen, as exactly as a written original is the rule of a Copiſt. He never loſt ſight of his meditation, whenever any perſon came to interrupt him about buſineſs; but would turn his mind to that affair; would enquire into it, and end it, without quitting the ideas of his compoſition; ſo that, after thoſe who had interrupted him were gone away, he had no occaſion to peruſe the laſt lines of his work, in order to know where he was, and reſume the ſeries of his thoughts. The ideas had always continued preſent to his mind: this gave him an opportunity of writing on, without looking into his papers to ſee where he had left off; and made the connexions as well as if he had not once ſtirred out of his place (14).

(14) See Porph. in Vita Plotini.

[G] I ſhall obſerve .... in what manner it is pretended, that the magical operations of this man were rendered ineffectual.] He found by experience, that his incantations returned upon himſelf; which obliged him to confeſs to his friends, that Plotinus's ſoul was endued with prodigious ſtrength, ſince it retorted, on his enemies, the darts they ſhot at him. The moſt ſurprizing circumſtance is, Plotinus perceived the magical devices which were carrying on againſt him, and the effect they would have on their Author. At the inſtant I am ſpeaking, ſaid he to his friends, and the ſurprizing ſagacity which is aſcribed to Plotinus [H]. The Emperor Gallienus and Salonina the Empreſs had a very high regard for him; and had it not been for the oppoſition of ſome jealous and malicious courtiers, a requeſt of his would have been granted, viz. to have a city (b) in Campania rebuilt, and yielded up to him with the whole territory belonging to it. His intention was to ſettle a Colony of Philoſophers there, and to have it governed by the ideal Laws of Plato's Commonwealth. Some envious perſons accuſed him of acting the plagiary with regard to Numenius: but Amelius took up the pen to invalidate that accuſation. Longinus, who had been prejudiced againſt our great Philoſopher, had afterwards a high eſteem for his writings, but owns at the ſame time, that they are very obſcure [I]. He wrote againſt his treatiſe of ideas, and againſt Porphyry's anſwer in defenſe of that treatiſe. Plotinus laboured under various illneſſes the year before he died; an inflammation in his throat which made him ſo hoarſe that he could ſcarce ſpeak; ulcers in his hands and feet, and a great weakneſs in his ſight. Finding himſelf in this condition, he left Rome, and was conveyed to Campania, to the heirs of a friend of his, who furniſhed him with neceſſaries of every kind: and had alſo the conſolation to know that Caſtricius (i), whoſe eſtate was in the neighbourhood, did not let him want any thing. He died in the nobleſt manner that it is poſſible for a Heathen Philoſopher to do, he ſpeaking as follows, as he breathed his laſt: I ſtrive with the utmoſt of my power, to return that part in me which is divine, to that which is ſo divine in the whole univerſe (k). He died at ſixty ſix years of age, the third year of the Emperor Claudius II. that is, the year of Chriſt 270. The moſt favourable account poſſible was given of the happy ſtate of his ſoul [K]. Amelius, (b) It was to be called Platonopolis.

(i) One of his Diſciples.

(k) Φάσας πειρᾶσθαι τὸ ἐν ἡμῖν θεῖον ἀνάγειν πρὸς τὸ ἐν τῷ παντὶ θεῖον . . . . ἀφῆκε τὸ πνεῦμα. Equidem jam annitor, quod in nobis divinum eſt ad divinum ipſum quod viget in univerſo religere, ſpiritumque his verbis emiſit. Porphyr. in Vita Plotini.

Olympius's body is ſhrivelled like a purſe; and his limbs are bruiſed by their colliſion one againſt another. Porphyry, who relates this as an undoubted fact, endeavours to confirm it by the following ſuppoſition. He declares that Plotinus was under the protection of a genius ſuperior to that of other men; and that this genius was not one of thoſe who are called Demons, but of the Order of thoſe called Gods. He informs us, that an Egyptian Prieſt conjured up, in the Temple of Iſis in Rome, Plotinus's familiar ſpirit, in preſence of Plotinus himſelf; and that he perceived, that the ſpirit which appeared was a God, and not merely a Demon. That he immediately congratulated Plotinus upon that excellent prerogative (15): that he prepared to put ſeveral queſtions to that ſpirit, but that he vaniſhed in an inſtant, becauſe a common friend of theirs, whom they had brought to ſee this ſight, killed the birds which were given him to hold. Plotinus knowing that his familiar ſpirit was of ſo eminent an order, directed more intenſely towards him the eye of his underſtanding. He even wrote a book on familiar ſpirits, in which he made a careful enquiry into the cauſe of their difference or diſparity. I ſpecify all theſe things upon a double account, firſt, to give my readers a ſmall ſpecimen of the Platonic Doctrine concerning Genii; ſecondly, to inform thoſe who peruſe this work, that the Doctrine of Guardian-Angels, ſo much ſpoken of in the Church of Rome, and which is a practical Doctrine, and accompanied with the whole train of religious worſhip, is much more antient than the Chriſtian Religion. No ſyſtem is better adapted to bring the Doctrine of the Platoniſts (duly rectified) into repute, than the Doctrine of occaſional cauſes. I know not what may happen: but it is my opinion that mankind will be forced, one time or other, to abandon mechanical principles, unleſs they aſſociate to them wills of the intelligent Beings or Spirits; and, to ſay the truth, no Hypotheſis is better adapted to account for events, than that which admits of ſuch an aſſociation, I mean eſpecially ſuch events as go by the names of caſualty, fortune, good luck, ill luck; things, the cauſes whereof are doubtleſs, regulated and determined by general laws that are unknown to us; but which, probably are only occaſional cauſes, like to thoſe which make our ſouls act on our bodies. See the learned Dodwell's Diſſertation on the genius or fortune of the Emperors (16). To return to Plotinus, I muſt obſerve that the ſuperiority of his tutelar genius puffed him up very much. Amelius deſiring him to ſhare in his devotions, I mean, in the ſacrifices which he uſed to offer up on ſolemn feſtivals: it is their buſineſs, replied Plotinus, to come to me, and not for me to go to them. No one could gueſs the reaſon of this haughty anſwer, nor dared to aſk him the reaſon of it (17). Was ever a more haughty theology than this heard of?

Of Plotinus's FAMILIAR SPIRIT.

(15) Μακάριος εἶ θεὸν ἔχων τὸν δαίμονα καὶ ὁ τοῦ ὑψιμέδοντος γένους τὸν συνόπλα. Beatus es, o Plotine, qui habeas pro Dæmone Deum neque ex inferiori genere ſis ducem ſortitus familiarem. Porphyr. ibid.

(16) Prælect. 2. ad Spartiani Hadrianum, p. 174 & ſeq.

(17) Ἐκεῖνος δεῖ πρὸς ἐμὲ ἔρχεσθαι, οὐκ ἐμὲ πρὸς ἐκεῖνους. τοῦτο δὲ ἐν τοίαις διανοίαις οὕτως ἐμεγαλήγορησεν οὐτ' αὐτοὶ δυνηῆναι δυνάμεθα, οὔτ' αὐτὸν ἱρέσθαι ἐτολμήσαμεν. Illos decet ad me, non me ad illos accedere. Qua vero mente tam excelſa de ſe loqueretur neque intelligere ipſi potuimus, neque auſi ſumus interrogare. Porphyr. in Vita Plotini.

[H] I ſhall take ſome notice . . . . of the ſurprizing ſagacity which is aſcribed to Plotinus.] A widow (18), a woman of an unblemiſhed character, who, with her children, lived in his houſe, had loſt her necklace. Plotinus ſent for all the ſervants, when after ſurveying them attentively, that is the fellow, ſays he, pointing to one of them who ſtole the necklace. The thief however denied the fact, notwithſtanding that he was whipped very ſeverely; but at laſt he confeſſed, and reſtored what he had ſtole. He foretold in a ſurprizing manner the fate of his pupils; he judging that Polemon would be amorouſly inclined, and not long lived, both which things were verified. Porphyry had formed a reſolution to kill himſelf, but Plotinus divined it, upon which he went to him that inſtant, and diverted him from his deſign (19). By the way, though Plotinus had applied himſelf very intenſly to the ſtudy of aſtrology, he yet did not depend on his own predictions (20); he knowing that they were mere chimeras, and he frequently refuted the Aſtrologers.

(18) Named Chione.

(19) Porphyr. p. 8.

(20) Idem, p. 10.

[I] Longinus owns that his writings are very obſcure.] He ſought very induſtriouſly for all Plotinus's books; and, in order to have them very correct, he deſired Porphyry to lend him his copy, but at the ſame time wrote to him as follows. Hoc equidem tibi tum præſenti, tum procul abſenti, tum habitanti Tyrum ſemper ſignificavi me ſcilicet non multa admodum Plotini librorum argumenta capere: ipſam vero ſcribendi formam intelligentiarumque frequentiam & quæſtionum diſpoſitionem admodum philoſophicam me amare ſupra modum atque venerari (21). i. e. "I always obſerved to you, when "we were together; when we were at a great diſ"tance one from the other, as well as when you "lived in Tyre, that I did not comprehend many of "the ſubjects treated of by Plotinus in his books; "but that I was extremely fond of his manner of "writing, the variety of his knowledge, and the "order and diſpoſition of his queſtions, which is al"together philoſophical." This little ſpecimen ſhews his exalted genius. This ſingle paſſage proves Longinus's exquiſite diſcernment and judicious penetration. It cannot be denied but that moſt ſubjects which this Philoſopher examines are incomprehenſible; nevertheleſs we diſcover in his works a very elevated, fruitful, and capacious genius, and a cloſe way of reaſoning. Had Longinus been an injudicious Critic; had he not poſſeſſed an elevated and beautiful genius, he would not have been ſo ſenſible of Plotinus's obſcurity. This is not a paradox in any manner. No perſons complain leſs of the obſcurity of a book, than thoſe whoſe thoughts are confuſed, and have a ſhallow underſtanding.

(21) Idem, Porphyr. in Vita Plotini, p. 10.

[K[The moſt favourable account poſſible was given of the happy ſtate of his ſoul.] Apollo was fired with ſo ſtrong a poetical rapture, when Amelius came to conſult him, with regard to the fate of his late maſter, lius, who had the curioſity to enquire about it, of the Oracle of Apollo, received it, and ſpread it among his intimate friends (l).

(l) Extracted from Plotinus's Life, written by Porphyry.

ter, that he made him an anſwer containing fifty verſes. Here follows the ſubſtance of the explication which Porphyry gives of it. Apollo declares, that Plotinus had been peaceable, gracious, and vigilant; that he had perpetually elevated his ſpotleſs ſoul towards God; that he had loved God with his whole heart, that he had diſengaged himſelf to the utmoſt of his power, from this wretched life; and that elevating himſelf with all the powers of his ſoul, and by the ſeveral gradations taught by Plato, towards that ſupreme Deity which ſurpaſſeth all underſtanding, he had been enlightened by him; he had enjoyed the viſion of that ſupreme Being, without the help or interpoſition of ideas, but as he is in himſelf, and according to that nature which is above all comprehenſion (22). Porphyry ſtops here, to tell us that he himſelf, once in his life, had been favoured with the viſion, at ſixty eight years of age; that the end to which Plotinus directed all his thoughts was, to unite himſelf with the great God who fills the whole univerſe; and that he had attained that end four times, not in power only, but by an unutterable efficacy, during the ſix years which he (Porphyry) had kept him company (23). Have we not here the unitive way of life of the Myſticks or Enthuſiaſts, ſo much ſpoken of? May we not accuſe them of ſtealing from the Platoniſts? Do not we here ſee alſo the ſeeds of Quietiſm? But to return to the Oracle. Plotinus had enjoyed this advantage, that whenever he deviated from the right path, the Gods conducted him back to it, by darting their light into his mind; ſo that it might have been ſaid, that in writing his books, he had been illuminated with the celeſtial rays. Thus far as to what concerns his life. After his death, he went to the aſſembly of the bleſſed, were charity, joy, and a love of the union with God reign. He had viſited the three judges of the other world, Minos, Radamanthus, and Æacus; not to give them an account of his actions, but to converſe with them and the reſt of the Gods who viſit them: in a word, he enjoyed the life of the bleſſed. I will not make any apology for the length of theſe remarks; imagining, that the reader will be well pleaſed to ſee collected in one place, not only ſuch particulars as relate to Plotinus's perſon, but alſo thoſe relating to his tenets, ſo far as is requiſite to give a general idea of them.

(22) Ἐφάνη ἐκεῖνος ὁ μήτε μορφὴν μήτε τινα ἰδέαν ἔχων, ὑπὲρ δὲ νοῦν καὶ πᾶν τὸ νοηθὲν ἱδρυμένος. Ipſi protinus coruſcavit Deus ille nec formam nec ideam aliquam habens, ſed ſuper intellectum univerſumque intelligibile in ſe ipſo conſiſtens. Porphyr. in Vita Plotini.

(23) Τέλος γὰρ αὐτῷ καὶ σκοπὸς ἦν, τὸ ἑνωθῆναι καὶ πελάσαι τῷ ἐπὶ πᾶσι θεῷ. ἔτυχε δὴ τέτρακις τε ὅτε συνῆμεν αὐτῷ, τοῦ σκοποῦ τούτου, ἐνεργείᾳ ἀῤῥήτῳ, καὶ οὐ δυνάμει. Finis namque Plotino fig- numque erat quo aciem mentis intenderet propinquare conjungique ipſi Deo omnibus ubique præſenti: quater autem dum cum ipſo verſarer hunc finem eſt aſſecutus, non potentia duntaxat, inquam, ſed actu quodam ineffabili conſecutus. Idem, ibid.

☞ POCOCKE (EDWARD). We muſt reſerve the article of this great man to the Appendix at the end of this work; the large account of his Life, to be prefixed to a new edition of his works, not being yet publiſhed.

POINET (JOHN) Biſhop of Rocheſter, and afterwards of Wincheſter, in the 16th Century [A], was very ſtrongly attached to the Reformation under the reign of Edward VI. and wrote among other books a treatiſe on the marriage of Prieſts, and an apology for that treatiſe (a). He was obliged to leave his native country under Queen Mary, and retired to Straſburg, where he died at about forty years of age, the 11th of April 1556 (b). He had there writ a book which was printed 1557, entitled, Diallacticon viri boni & literati de veritate, natura, atque ſubſtantia corporis & ſanguinis Chriſti in Euchariſtia (c). He therein endeavoured to reconcile the controverſies relating to the Euchariſt, and eſpecially thoſe of the Lutherans and Zuinglians. I ſhall ſpeak of this work hereunder [B]. Poinet was perfectly well ſkilled in the Greek tongue, and pretty well

(a) Epitome Bibl. Geſneri, p. m. 487, ex Balæo.

(b) Freherus, in Theatro, p. 169, ex Godwino de Præſ. Angl.

(c) It contains 83 leaves in 8vo.

[A] He was Biſhop of Rocheſter, and afterwards of Wincheſter.] He was tranſlated to the latter See, the 26th of April 1551, and had a revenue of two thouſand marks ſettled upon him (1). Poinet was put into the room of Gardiner, who had been diveſted of his Biſhoprick for refuſing to aſſert the King's ſupremacy (2); but he likewiſe was forced to quit it for Gardiner, who was reſtored to it under Queen Mary in 1553 (3).

(1) Burnet's Hiſt. of the Reformation of the Church of England, under the year 1551. p. m. 165. See alſo Mr. de Larrey, Hiſt. d'Anglet. Tom. 1. p. 690, in which the Printers have put Pointe for Poinet.

(2) Burnet, ibid.

(3) Ibid. ad ann. 1553. p. 588.

[B] I ſhall ſpeak of this work hereunder.] I have already mentioned the title, and the time in which it was printed. I ſhall add, that there was annexed to it the famous treatiſe of Bertram, De corpore & ſanguine Domini ad Carolum Magnum (4) Imperatorem, ante D.CC. annos æditus. The place where it was printed is not mentioned. The Preface was not writ by the Author. He only drew up a ſhort advertiſement, in which he foretold very exactly the fate of his book, viz. that none of the contending parties would approve it; and that, by his attempting to pacify thoſe who were engaged in war, he ſhould incur the indignation of both ſides: and compares himſelf to a man who ſhould receive a wound, whilſt he was endeavouring to ſeparate the combatants. Author Lectori. Pacem aliorum quærere pulchrum eſt, & habet certam promiſſionem Dei: Beati pacifici. Sed vereor hoc dum cupidè fector, ne quod iis qui pugnas diruunt evenire ſolet, idem mihi quoque accidat. Illi dum aliorum ſaluti conſulunt, ipſi reportant vulnera. Et ego dum id operam do, ut diſſidentes redeant in gratiam, ab iiſdem fortaſſe nullam inibo gratiam. Id ſi fit, illius exemplo me levabo qui dixit, Si hominibus placuiſſem, Chriſti ſervus non eſſem. Vale ac ſtude Chriſto placere. We ſhould, perhaps, not have known who wrote that Preface, had not John Sturmius declared it to be his. Quære quæ præfatus ſum ante annos viginti in Diallacticum P. (5) Poneti Epiſcopi Wintonienſis (6). This work was inſerted in the firſt volume (edition the firſt) of Theodore Beza's tracts (7). The French Tranſlator of it affirms, in his Preface addreſſed to the Vidame of Chartres, that he had communicated his deſign to ſome Proteſtant Miniſters (8). Theſe, perhaps, were of opinion, that ſuch a book would be ſeaſonable, at a time when a medium was ſought for, to re-unite the Roman Catholicks and Proteſtants. It is to be obſerved, that the Tranſlator aſcribes this work to Anthony Cooke, who had been King Edward the VIth's Preceptor (9). This Biſhop's opinion is explained in a book writ by Andrew Rivetus (10). Read alſo the following words of John Couſin, Biſhop of Durham. Paulò ante hanc conſcriptam Apologiam (Eccleſiæ Anglicanæ à Joh. Juello Epiſcopo Sariſburienſi) prodierat Dialacticon celeberrimi Viri Johannis Poineti Epiſcopi Wintonienſis de Veritate, Naturâ, atque Subſtantiâ Corporis & Sanguinis Chriſti in Euchariſtiâ; quod non alio conſilio edidit, quàm ut fidem & doctrinam Eccleſiæ Anglicanæ illuſtraret. Et primò oſtendit Euchariſtiam non ſolùm figuram eſſe Corporis Domini, ſed etiam ipſam Veritatem, Naturam, atque Subſtantiam in ſe comprehendere; idcirco nec has voces Naturæ & Subſtantiæ fugiendas eſſe; veteres enim de hoc Sacramento differentes ita loquutos fuiſſe. Secundò quærit, an voces illæ, Veritas, Natura, & Subſtantia, communi more in hoc myſterio à Veteribus intelligebantur, an peculiari & Sacramentis magis accommodatâ ratione? Neque enim obſervandum eſſe ſolùm, quibus verbis olim Patres uſi ſint, ſed quid iſtis ſignificare ac docere voluerint. Et licet diſcrimen ipſe cum Patribus agnoſcat, inter Corpus Chriſti formam humani corporis naturalem habens, & quod in Sacramento eſt Corpus myſticum, maluit tamen diſcrimen illud ad modum præſentiæ & exhibitionis, quàm ad ipſam rem ſubjectam, hoc eſt Corpus Chriſti verum, accommodari; quum certiſſimum ſit non aliud Corpus in Sacramento fidelibus dari, niſi quod à Chriſto pro fidelium ſalute in mortem traditum fuit. Tertiò denique, Spiritualem hîc intelli-

(4) It ſhould be Calvum.

(5) It ſhould be Joannis.

(6) Sturmius, in part. 3. Antipappi quarti, p. 176.

(7) See Rivet. in Grotianæ Animadv. Diſcuſſ. Tom. 3. Oper. p. 1132.

(8) Idem, ibid.

(9) Idem, ibid. and in Annotat. in Conſultat. de Religione, p. 948.

(10) Annotat. in Conſult. de Religione, ibid.

well verſed in the German and Italian (d). He tranſlated ſome Italian works of Ochinus (e). He was an excellent preacher, for which he was greatly admired by King Edward (f). I ſhall quote the anſwer which was made to the charge of his having carried away another man's wife, though he himſelf was married [C].

(d) Freher. in Theatro, p. 169.

(e) Epit. Bibl. Geſneri, p. m. 487.

(f) Freher. in Theatro, p. 169.

intelligentiam, juxta communem & conſentientem veterum Patrum interpretationem, requiri ſtatuit, & carnalem omnem cogitationem exeludi (11). i. e. " A " little before Biſhop Jewell's apology or vindication " of the Church of England was publiſhed, there " came out the Diallacticon of the famous John Poinet, " Biſhop of Wincheſter, concerning the reality and " ſubſtance of Chriſt's body and blood in the Eucha- " riſt; which he publiſhed with no other view, than " to exhibit in a clear light the faith and doctrine of " the Church of England. He ſhews, in the firſt " place, that the Euchariſt is not merely the type and " figure of our Lord's body; but that it alſo includes " its reality, nature, and ſubſtance; that therefore " theſe words Nature and Subſtance are not to be re- " jected, ſince the fathers in their treating of this " ſacrament, employed them. He enquires, in the " ſecond place, whether theſe words Reality, Nature, " and Subſtance, were taken in his myſtery by the " fathers, agreeably to their uſual ſignification; or " in a peculiar ſenſe, and ſuch a one as is better " adapted to the ſacraments? Nor are we to obſerve " merely, what expreſſions were employed by the fa- " thers, but in what ſenſe they intended to have them " underſtood. And though he was ready to acknow- " ledge, with the fathers, a difference between Chriſt's " body which had the natural form of a human body, " and his myſtical body in the ſacrament; he yet " was prompted to conclude, that this difference " ought to be applied to the manner in which it is " preſent and exhibited, rather than to the thing it- " ſelf, that is, to the true body of Chriſt; it being " very certain, that no other body is adminiſtered to the " faithful in the ſacrament, than that which Chriſt " devoted to death to ſave them. Thirdly and laſtly, " he aſſerts, that this is to be taken in a ſpiritual " ſenſe, agreeably to the general and unanimous in- " terpretation of the Fathers, to the excluſion of e- " very carnal thought." Poinet lays great ſtreſs on the authority of the Fathers, who ſpeak in ſtrong terms of the preſence of our Lord's body in the ſymbols of the Euchariſt, and he entirely rejects the opinion which was aſcribed to the Zuinglians; but he nevertheleſs diſapproves of thoſe who admit of the oral manducation of the body of Chriſt Jeſus. He is willing to admit the word tranſubſtantiation, provided it be underſtood in a certain manner, to the excluſion of oral manducation. Vident ſubſtantiam quoque à nobis præſentem affirmari, & communionem noſtram cum Chriſto naturaliter, & ut ita dicam, ſubſtantialiter prædicari, ſed has voces, non ut philoſophi, ſed ut theologi loquuntur, intelligi oportere. Nec de Tranſubſtantiationis vocabulo, quanvis barbaro miniméque neceſſario litigaremus, ſi modò talem ſubſtantiarum tranſmutationem interpretentur, qualem veteres agnoſcebant, ſacramentalem videlicet, qualis etiam in homine fit per Baptiſmum regenerato, qui novus homo factus eſt, & nova creatura, qualis etiam fit quum nos in carnem Chriſti convertimur, quibus Patres antiqui utebantur exemplis. Voces ipſas non tantopere fugimus, quanquam earum quoque ratio habenda eſt, ſed ſignificationem eam quam Patres ipſi docent, atque adeò flagitant, nos quoque requirimus: & ſolam σαρκοφαγίαν, id eſt, carnis vorationem, quam nullo pacto probant, ſed ut ſtultam & impiam condemnant, rejicimus ut alienam à Scripturis, alienam à Patrum interpretatione, denique cum vera fide ex diametro pugnantem, ac ſpiritualem ſenſum in hac carne edenda neceſſarium eſſe judicamus, ipſum Chriſtum authorem ſequuti, & conſenſum probatiſſimorum, qui habentur, interpretum (12). He had no reaſon to think he ſhould ſatisfy the Roman Catholicks, by his allowing of a term which he modified in that manner. But with regard to ſuch as deſired that a miracle ſhould be ſuppoſed in the Euchariſt, he might imagine that they would be ſatisfied with his Hypotheſis or Doctrine, provided they only required a mighty miracle in general: for the doctrine he inculcates, is one of the moſt incomprehenſible that could be propoſed. He admits a real and ſubſtantial preſence of the body of Chriſt Jeſus, which nevertheleſs is only ſacramental; and he declares, that by the virtue of this preſence, the bread in the Euchariſt may purify our ſouls, and unite us into one body with our Redeemer. Quòd ſi nonnulli miraculum requirunt (nam Patres aliquot Euchariſtiam ingens miraculum nominant) non minùs profectò mirandum eſt panem & vinum creaturas terrenas, & corpori tantùm paſcendo natas, eam virtute benedictionis myſticæ vim inſitam, adeóque potentem efficacitatem poſſidere, ut & animos & corpora mundent, alant, ſanctificent, atque ad immortalitatem præparent, ut nos membra Chriſti & unum cum illo corpus conficiant. Imò plus ponderis habet hoc miraculum, plus dignitatis, majorem utilitatem, ac magis myſteriorum rationi congruentem, quàm ulla poteſt craſſa tranſubſtantiatio, aut animalis & humana complecti σαρκοφαγία (13). The Catechiſm of the Proteſtant Churches, written by Calvin, does not vary very much from the opinion of this Biſhop of Wincheſter: weigh well the following words: Thus, I doubt not, as Chriſt Jeſus promiſes and repreſents, but he will make us partake of his own ſubſtance, to unite us with him in one life. Maſt. But how can this be, ſince the body of Chriſt Jeſus is in Heaven, and we are in this earthly pilgrimage? Schol. It is by the incomprehenſible virtue or power of his Spirit, which joins together things ſeparated by diſtance of place (14).

I obſerved elſewhere (15), that this Diallecticon was re-printed with the work of a Phyſician, who endeavoured to reconcile the controverſies with reſpect to the Euchariſt, and who had ſome very peculiar notions concerning this important tenet.

[C] I ſhall quote the anſwer which was made to the charge of his having carried away another man's wife, though he himſelf was married.] Sanders, after ſaying that one Poynet was appointed to the See of Wincheſter, of which Stephen Gardiner had been deprived, adds, " This fine Prelate, accounting it a ſmall thing " to marry one wife, now that he was a Biſhop, " did likewiſe carry away the wife of a certain " Butcher then living; but ſhe was taken from him " by the Parliament of that Kingdom, as no ways be- " longing to him, and reſtored to her huſband. It " was owing to this, that when ſome time after, a " man of Quality ſaid to Biſhop Gardiner, partly " by way of joke, and partly by way of ridicule, " you expect, perhaps, that the time will come " when your Biſhoprick ſhall be reſtored to you; " the Biſhop anſwered, and why ſhould not I expect " to recover my Biſhoprick, as well the Butcher " has recovered his wife? For it was the ſame perſon " who ſeized upon Stephen Gardiner's Biſhoprick, " and who carried away the Butcher's wife (16)." This is the charge, and Biſhop Burnet anſwers it as follows: " The falſeneſs of this ſtory is clearly " evinced by the anſwer that Dr. Martin gave in " the beginning of Queen Mary's reign, to a book " that Poinet had writ in the defence of the mar- " ried Clergy; Martin's anſwer is writ with ſo " much ſpite, and ſo many indecent reflections, that " though it is not reaſonable to believe all he ſays, " yet it is almoſt a certain argument, that this ſtory " concerning Poinet is a forgery; ſince, if it was a " thing ſo public as our Author makes it; Martin " muſt have heard of it, eſpecially living in Gar- " diner's houſe; and it is not to be imagined that if " he did know it, he would have concealed it: ſo " this, and the jeſt that hangs upon it, muſt paſs as " one of the flouriſhes of our Author's pen (17)."

(11) John Cofinus, Epiſcopus Dunelmenſis, Hiſt. Tranſubſtant. Papalis, cap. 2. num. 4. p. 9 & ſeq.

(12) Diallacticon, folio m. 81.

(13) Idem, folio 82.

(14) Catechiſme de Geneve, Sect. 53.

(15) In the rem. [L] of the art. HARCHIUS, towards the cloſe.

(16) Sanders's book of the Engliſh Schiſm, p. 216.

(17) Burnet's Hiſt. of the Reformation, p. 396.

POITIERS (DIANA DE), miſtreſs of Henry II. and daughter of Count de Saint Vallier [A], made very ill uſe of the credit ſhe enjoyed, either with regard to her heaping

[A] She was the daughter of Count de Saint Vallier.] His name was John (1) de Poitiers, and he was of a very antient family; for one Aymar of Poitiers, " thus ſirnamed, either becauſe he was deſcended

(1) Not Aymar, as he is called by Mezerai, Hiſt. of Henry II. in the beginning.

ing up riches, or her raiſing to, or removing from employments, whomſoever ſhe pleaſed. The world could ſcarce believe, as ſhe was ſo far advanced in years, that it was poſſible for her to captivate ſo ſtrongly a young Prince's heart, without the aſſiſtance of magic [B]. But ſome perſons of judgment do not give this reaſon for it, and make extremely good reflections on the power of an old Courtezan [C]; and do not omit taking " from the Counts of Poitiers, or upon ſome other " account, married, about the year 1184, the heireſs " of the houſe of Valentinois, in return for his ha- " ving aſſiſted his mother, a widow, againſt the Bi- " ſhop of Valence, who was her potent enemy . . . " The Aymar in queſtion had from Raymund Count " of Thoulouſe, his relation, the Earldom of Divis, " about the year 1190; and thus theſe two Earl- " doms united during two centuries, in the houſe of " Poitiers, and were poſſeſſed by ſeven Counts ſuc- " ceſſively. Lewis II. the laſt of them, having no " male iſſue, and very little affection for Charles " Lord of St. Vallier, his uncle by the father, who " was to ſucceed him or his; beſides, having run " himſelf very much in debt by his ill manage- " ment, and riotous conduct, made over and aſſign- " ed, to Charles Dauphin of France, and his ſuc- " ceſſors, the Earldoms in queſtion, in conſideration " of an hundred thouſand crowns, on condition that " they ſhould remain inſeparably united to Dauphine. " After his death, which happened in the ſame year " 1419. Lewis, ſon of Charles de Saint Vallier, at- " tempted to aſſume the title and poſſeſſion of it; " but the Dauphin, now raiſed to the throne, obli- " ged him to give up all his pretenſions to him, " in conſideration of ſeven thouſand florins yearly " rent, to him and his heirs for ever (2)." With regard to Saint Vallier, our Diana's father, he was ſeized, as having engaged in the conſpiracy of the Conſtable Charles of Bourbon; and would have been beheaded at the Greve (a place in Paris where criminals are executed) had not his daughter, as we are told, ſaved his life, by indulging Francis I. the laſt favour, as it is called. Mezerai ſpeaks of this as follows in his large Hiſtory (3): Saint Vallier was pardoned on the ſcaffold, (when brought to the Greve to be executed) on account of the beauty of Diana his only daughter. In another place (4) he ſpeaks as follows of the Diana in queſtion. The charms of her beauty had been ſo powerful ever ſince the year 1524, that the whole Court had interceded for her father, found guilty of the rebellion of Charles de Bourbon; ſo that, on her account, King Francis ſent him a pardon when brought to the ſcaffold. We cannot infer, from theſe two paſſages, that the daughter's chaſtity was a ſacrifice offered by Francis I. in order to obtain the father's pardon. But here follows a third paſſage, in which the Hiſtorian in queſtion expreſſes himſelf very clearly, with reſpect to the oblation of that propitiatory victim. " Saint Vallier was tried, and he was ſen- " tenced to loſe his head; but being brought upon " the ſcaffold, at the Greve, inſtead of being be- " headed a pardon was brought him. It is ſaid that " the King ſent it him, after having taken from " Diana his daughter, then about fourteen years of " age, her moſt valuable treaſure; a ſweet exchange " to thoſe perſons who value honour leſs than life, " or who make it conſiſt in the ſplendors of a favour " that is more envied than it is innocent (5)." The Author of the amours of the Kings of France does not ſpeak ſo plainly; but then he ſays enough for any perſon to underſtand him. I ſhall quote his own words, becauſe they include ſome circumſtances relating to the hiſtory of our Diana. She was the daughter, ſays he (6), " of John of Poictiers, Lord " of St. Vallier, who, when ſhe was very young, " left her in the family of the Counteſs of Angou- " leme, after which ſhe entred into the ſervice of " Queen Claude, in quality of maid of honour. St. " Vallier was not miſtaken in the deſign he had " formed, of procuring ſome protection at Court, " by the charms of his daughter; for it may be " affirmed that ſhe ſaved his life, by the ſeveral " ſprings ſhe ſet in motion. St. Vallier had joined " in the rebellion of the Conſtable of Bourbon, and " had been ſo unfortunate as to be taken priſoner. " He then was tried, and ſentenced to loſe his head: " Diana was thunderſtruck at this news, that ſhe " thought it would be incumbent on her to ſet every " engine at work, to ſave her father from ſuch im- " minent danger. Accordingly ſhe went and threw " herſelf at the King's feet, all diſſolved in tears, and " beſought his Majeſty to pardon him to whom ſhe " owed life. She appeared ſo ſweetly mournful on " that occaſion, that all her demands were complied " with; and inſpired him with love, under the " maſk of pity. She preſerved the conqueſt till the " fatal expedition made by the King in Italy; and " this Prince in queſtion endeavoured to conceal his " infidelity from the Counteſs of Château-Briant, for " whom he had always a great regard."

[B] Without the aſſiſtance of magic.] Thuanus ſeems inclined to believe this. Diana . . . . . amiſſo viro, is fuit Ludovicus Brezæus Magnus Normanniæ Seneſcallus, cum jam inclinata eſſet ætate, philtris & magicis, ut creditur, artibus adeo ſibi animum Henrici devinxit, ut is nunquam alienata voluntate ad exitum uſque vitæ in amore illo conſtanter perſeveraverit (7). i. e. " Diana's huſband (Lewis de Brezé great Seneſ- " chal of Normandy) being dead; ſhe tho' advanced " in years, is ſuppoſed to have ſo ſtrongly captivated " the heart of Henry, by philters and incantations, " that he bore a conſtant affection for her till his " death." Mezerai gives an exact account of all the reaſons, which induced the world to conclude that this woman had employed necromancy, but does not ſeem perſuaded of the truth of this. " The graces " of her mind, and her cunning increaſed in propor- " tion as time took away the moſt lovely features " of her face; ſo that, at the age of thirty five, " when ſhe ſhould have preferred virtue to beauty, " ſhe gained an abſolute poſſeſſion of Henry's heart. " And as it is uſual for people, in order to bring a " greater odium on Princes, and make the mean " condeſcention of Princes who abandon themſelves " to them more excuſable, to affirm that their affec- " tion was gained by magical arts: ſome related, " that ſhe had bewitched him with philters. And " indeed, it was a ſhameful thing to ſee a young " Prince adore a faded face, and full of wrinkles; " a head, the hair of which was turning gray; eyes, " whoſe luſtre was half eclipſed, ſometimes blood- " ſhot, and running; in a word, who was ſaid to " be the infamous leavings of many others: and peo- " ple had juſt reaſon to wonder, that neither time, " honour, ſage advice, nor even ſome other object, " among ſo many exquiſite beauties he might have " choſen, could divert his eyes from her. But it is " neither new nor ſo ſurprizing a circumſtance, to " ſee a man captivated in this manner without the " aſſiſtance of magic arts: a numberleſs multitude " of examples have been ſeen of this (8); and it is " not difficult to find ſome reaſons for it (9), which " reaſons will be ſeen in the following remark."

[C] Extreme good reflections on the power of an old Courtezan.] Here follows the ſequel of the words of Mezerai juſt cited. " Not to mention thoſe occult " qualities, like to thoſe of the loadſtone, which " meeting in certain perſons, unite them cloſely by " an equal and reciprocal conſent, or by ſubjecting " one to the other: it is obſerved that phlegmatic per- " ſons are conſtant in their loves, though they are " ready enough to abandon their other paſſions and " deſigns. Add to this, a man's firſt ties or engage- " ments are ſeldom or never broke off; for which " reaſon, it is no leſs dangerous for a young man juſt " coming upon the ſtage of the world, to meet with " a cunning artful woman, than for an ignorant pilot " to come againſt a rock. Then, the ſuſpicion he " had harboured with regard to the fidelity of his " wife, threw him with greater fondneſs into the " arms of another woman. To conclude, in love as " in war, the ſtratagems of perſons in years being " no leſs dangerous than the vigour and efforts of " the young: we are not to wonder that he ſhould " be ſo ſtrongly captivated by the artifices of ſo ex- " perienced

(2) Mezerai, Hiſt. de Charles VI. p. 578. vol. 2. folio ad ann. 1418.

(3) Tom. 2. p. 936. ad ann. 1523.

(4) Hiſt. of Henry II. in the beginning, p. 1058. Tom. 2.

(5) Mezerai, Abrege Chronol. Tom. 4. p. m. 520. ad ann. 1523.

(6) Tom. 1. p. 195. See alſo in the rem. [P], an error of his.

(7) Thuan. lib. 3. p. 58. ad ann. 1547.

(8) See the rem. [H], of the art. CALIGULA; and rem. [F], of the art. CYRUS; and rem. [A], of the art. DELLIUS: likewiſe the articles LAIS, LAMIA.

(9) Mezerai, Hiſt. of France, at the beginning of Henry II. p. 1058. vol. 2. in folio.

taking notice of the amorous complexion of our Diana [D]. The greateſt ſcandal proceeded from its being firmly ſuppoſed, that the ſole reaſon why ſhe abandoned herſelf to the amorous wiſhes of Francis I. was to ſave her father's life (a) [E]; and therefore the publick was filled with the higheſt indignation, to ſee a woman, who had been ſucceſſively a concubine to both father and ſon, enjoy the greateſt credit and authority in the Kingdom. It is thinking wildly, to ſuppoſe that the intimacy between Henry II. and this woman, did not exceed the bounds of Platonic Love [F]. She appeared a long time at Court,

(a) See the rem. [A].

" perienced a woman." Ovid, who was ſo great a maſter in the amorous art, might have ſuggeſted a new reflection to our French Hiſtorian; and perhaps Mezerai would not have omitted it in a Latin work.

Nec quotus annus eat, nec quo ſit nata require
Conſule: quæ rigidus munera Cenſor habet.
Præcipuè, ſi flore caret, meliuſque peractum
Tempus, & albentes jam legit illa comas.
Utilis, O juvenes, aut hæc, aut ſerior ætas;
Iſte ferat ſegetes: iſte ſerendus ager.
. . . . . .
Hoc quoque militiæ eſt: hoc quoque quærit opes.
Adde, quod eſt illis operum prudentia major:
Solus & artifices qui facit, uſus adeſt.
Illæ munditiis annorum damna rependunt:
Et faciunt curâ, ne videantur anus.
Utque velis, venerem jungunt per mille figuras.
Inveniat plures nulla tabella modos (10).

(10) Ovid. de Arte amandi, lib. 2. p. 191.

" Her age enquire not, nor the year when born,
" Nor who the reins of Government then held.
" If ſhe no longer is in life's gay bloom,
" And ſilver hairs begin to ſhade her head;
" O youths, a woman thus advanc'd in life,
" Suits better, and diſpenſes ſweeter joys.
. . . . . .
" The toil is great, and great is the reward.
" Add that, in love affairs, they're better ſkill'd.
" Experience makes them knowing in the bliſs.
" Time's injuries by art they can repair;
" By art they ſeem as in the prime of youth.
" In every act of Venery they pleaſe,
" Nor are the looſeſt pictures better teachers."

A woman, who is the infamous leavings of many others, had been brought up in a good ſchool. Such a one is much abler to perform her exerciſes, and can play the game to the beſt advantage. However this be, the Hiſtorian had reaſon to ſay, that examples of the great power of an old Courtezan are not rare. See the marginal note (8).

[D] They do not omit taking notice of the amorous complexion of our Diana.] " We might juſtly conſi-
" der it as enchantment without charms, the paſſion
" of a young King for a woman of forty, and who " had had two or three children by her huſband. . . .
" The King loved her becauſe ſhe had a ſenſibility
" in love; and this diſpoſition prompted her, ſome-
" times to ſeek for the height of pleaſure elſewhere,
" as ſhe found in him, the height of riches and ho-
" nours." Theſe are Mezerai's words (11): he inclines us to compare, in this reſpect, Henry II. to a monarch, who, in all other reſpects, was infinitely beneath this Prince in merit. We read in Suetonius that Caligula, in the bloom of life, was diſtractedly fond of Ceſonia, who was far from young, and had had three children by her huſband; but then ſhe was of a moſt laſcivious caſt (12). Ovid, one of the greateſt maſters in this affair, hints plainly enough that ſuch a complexion makes up, with regard to a man venereally inclined, for a thouſand other things: and that as the inſenſibility of a chaſte wife is very diſagreeable, ſo the eager warmth of a lewd miſtreſs is wonderfully poignant. This is one of the ſad cauſes of conjugal infidelity.

(11) Abrege Chronol. Tome 4. p. 643. ad ann. 1547.

(12) See citation (28) of the art. CALIGULA.

Odi quæ præbat, quia ſit præbere neceſſe,
Siccaque de lana cogitat ipſa ſua (13).
Quæ datur officio, non eſt mihi grata voluptas?
Officium faciat nulla puella mihi.
Me voces audire juvat ſua gaudia faſſas,
Utque morer memet ſuſtineamque roget.
Aſpiciam Dominæ victos amentis ocellos,
Langueat, & tangi ſe vetet illa diu (14).

(13) Confer quæ Martialis Epigram. 61 and 105. lib. 11.

(14) Ovid. de Arte amandi, lib. 2. ver. 692.

" I hate thoſe joys neceſſity muſt yield,
" But burn for ſuch a melting nymph diſpenſes,
" When, all diſſolving, ſhe the pleaſure tells,
" And urges me to check the mighty bliſs:
" To ſee ſtrong glances from her eye-balls dart,
" And ſoft intreating me to ſpare her beauties."

All this ſhews that Mezerai hit right: the laſcivious turn of the Seneſchal made up for what was wanting with regard to youth.

[E] It was firmly ſuppoſed, that the ſole reaſon why ſhe abandoned herſelf to the amorous wiſhes of Francis I. was upon no other account but to ſave her father's life.] Beſides what has been touched upon this ſubject, in the firſt remark of this article, I ſhall mention a circumſtance related by Thuanus, concerning the pannic with which Count de Saint Vallier was ſeized. This unhappy Gentleman being led to the place of execution, was ſeized with ſuch dread, that he fell dangerouſly ill. They were forced to bleed him ſeveral times, all which, with the good news of a pardon, was yet incapable of recovering and curing him: ſo that Saint Vallier's fever afterwards became a proverb. Diana . . . . . patrem habuit Joannem Pictavienſem Sanvalerium, qui Caroli Borbonii conjurationis particeps, cum apud Sacerdotem ſecreto rem confeſſus eſſet, à Sacerdote delatus, & ad mortem damnatus eſt: cum ad ſupplicium duceretur, ex pavore in tam acutum febrem incidit, ut venia in gratiam filiæ, quæ pulcritudine ſua multorum procerum gratiam demeruerat, à Franciſco impetrata, vix ad mentem & ſanitatem ſæpius miſſo ſanguine reduci potuerit, unde Sanvaleriana febris apud nos in proverbium abiit (15). Some affirm (16), that he ſaw death ſo near him, and was ſo greatly terrified on that occaſion, that, when brought back to his houſe (17), a continual fever ſeized him with ſo much violence, that it killed him. Thuanus relates, that St. Vallier was impeached by the Prieſt, to whom he had revealed, in confeſſion, his plot; but moſt Hiſtorians agree, that it was diſcovered to Francis I. by his Norman Gentlemen who had engaged in that conſpiracy. Some charge them with following, in this, the inclination which thoſe of their country are ſaid to have: Franciſcus Lutetia profectus ad Fanum Petri Monaſterienſis . . . . appulit . . . . ibi duo Borbonii domeſtici natione Normani (quæ natio vulgo ut parum fida notari ſolet) Argugius ac Matigno Borbonium cum Cæſare conveniſſe atque adverſus Franciſcum multa moliri indicant (18). Others ſay, that the conduct of their confeſſor forced them to reveal that ſecret. Varillas has followed the laſt opinion. Matignon and Argouges, ſays he (19), " having informed, in confeſſion, a " Pariſh-Prieſt of their country, that they had en" gaged in a conſpiracy againſt the Government, he " commanded them to go and acquaint the King of
" it; and to ſet them an example, he himſelf ſet
" out immediately to give information of it to Breze,
" great Seneſchal of Normandy. Matignon and " Argouges, thinking themſelves ruined, rode poſt,
" and overtook the King at St. Peter le Moniſtier,
" where throwing themſelves at his feet, they obtained
" their pardon by giving an exact account of every " thing they knew with reſpect to the negotiation
" between the Emperor and the Conſtable."

(15) Thuan. lib. 3. p. 58. ad ann. 1547.

(16) Father Anſelme, Palais de l'Honneur, p. 555.

(17) See the rem. [P].

(18) Belcarius, lib. 17. num. 46. p. 530.

(19) Varillas, Hiſt. de Francis I. lib. 4. p. 269.

[F] It is thinking wildly to ſuppoſe that the intimacy between Henry II. and this woman, did not exceed the bounds of Platonick Love.] I wonder how le Labourer could prevail with himſelf to believe ſuch a chimera: but we muſt hear him. He will informs us of a particular, that is curious enough with regard to the riſe of his paſſion; and we ſhall find that he owns, at leaſt, that our Diana was one of the miſtreſſes to Francis I. He was the more ſtrongly invited to go thither, ſays he (20), (ſpeaking of the running at the ring in which Henry II. delighted, " by the love he " bore

(20) Addit. aux Memoires de Caſtelnau, Tom. 1. p. 276.

Court, under the title of great Senechalle, and afterwards under that of Ducheſs of Valentinois. The firſt of theſe two names ſuited her, becauſe ſhe had been married to Lewis de Brezé, great Senechal of Normandy, by whom ſhe had two daughters, whom ſhe got married very advantageouſly [G]. With regard to the other title, ſhe aſſumed it on account of Henry the IId's beſtowing on her the Dukedom of Valen-

" bore to Diana de Poitiers, Ducheſs of Valentinois " his miſtreſs, who had been the firſt object of his " inclinations, and had rouzed him. It is ſaid that " King Francis his father, who had firſt loved that " Lady, diſcovering his diſſatisfaction, after the " death of his ſon Francis the Dauphin, at the heavy " diſpoſition of his ſon Prince Henry; ſhe ſaid to " the King, that he wanted to be in love, and that " ſhe would make him her ſpark. The King, " whoſe affections were divided between her and the " Ducheſs of Eſtampes, conſented to it; but though " the Court was extremely licentious at that time, " we yet ought to ſuppoſe, that nothing was tranſact- " ed between them that could give the leaſt handle " to ſlander; and that it was merely from a ſpirit " of calumny, that ſome perſons were prompted to " throw, into the apartment of Henry II. a writing, " containing the imprecation and curſe uttered a- " gainſt Reuben (21); and even (22) it is not cer- " tain, that Diana of Poitiers ſuffered this friendſhip " to exceed the bounds of generous eſteem and gal- " lantry. A proof of this is, ſhe had had children " by Lewis de Brezé Count de Maulevrier, Seneſchal " of Normandy, her huſband; and King Henry II. " left behind him as well legitimate as natural chil- " dren, and yet it is not obſerved that any ſprung " from the loves." The proof alledged by Le Laboureur is far from ſtrong; or, to ſpeak more juſtly, it is inſignificant, and even makes againſt him; for, at this rate he ought not to have ſaid, that Francis I. divided his affections between Diana of Poitiers and the Ducheſs of Eſtampes. We do not read that this Prince, who had ſeveral children, had ever any by Diana, who was not ſo old when he had a paſſion for her, as when ſhe was miſtreſs of Henry II. I do not oppoſe to this proof the advanced age of Diana (according to Varillas) when the Dauphin began to entertain a paſſion for her. I am not of opinion that ſhe was near ſo old as this Hiſtorian affirms her to be; but I ſhall only obſerve two particulars; 1ſt, that Diana de Poitiers might have become barren, before the age of forty, by leading too incontinent a life; 2dly, that a widower and widow, though each had had children in their firſt marriage, are often found to have none in ſuch a conjunction.

(21) Chap. xlix. ver. 4. of Geneſis.

(22) This even is ſuperfluous here, ſince the Author does not ſay any thing afterwards ſtronger than what goes before.

If a perſon were deſirous of not ſuppoſing an inceſtuous commerce, he had better follow Varillas than Le Laboureur. It were better, I ſay, to deny that the Lady in queſtion had had any affair with the father, than to deny her having had one with the ſon. However this be, let us conſider the words of the firſt of theſe two Authors. " I expect to be ac- " cuſed, for having made no mention of the pre- " tended inceſt of the Ducheſs of Valentinois in queſ- " tion with both father and ſon, that is, with King " Francis I. and King Henry II. But to this I an- " ſwer two things; 1ſt, that among the Authors of " that age, which I ſaw in his Majeſty's library, in " a collection containing thirty-ſeven volumes, I do " not meet with one Catholic Writer, who ſays a word " of this inceſtuous commerce; but that theſe having " been as careful not to mention a word of this, as " the Calviniſts have ſhewed a headſtrong paſſion in " relating the ſeveral particulars of it. Not to men- " tion that theſe Calviniſts do not agree in their " ſatyrs; ſince ſome affirm that this Ducheſs, who " was then known only by the name of Diana of " Poitiers, gave herſelf up to King Francis I. on the " ſole view of ſaving, by yielding up her virginity, " the life of the Lord of Vallier, her father, who " otherwiſe would have been beheaded, in a few " days, for having joined in the rebellion of the " Conſtable of Bourbon; whilſt others aſſert, that " ſhe proſtituted herſelf to the Conſtable of Montmo- " rency, firſt Miniſter and Favourite of Francis I. " (23)." If he has no better grounds for this, than for what he adds with regard to the origin of the hatred of the Calviniſts for the Ducheſs of Valentinois, he has loſt his cauſe; for it is quite ridiculous to ſuppoſe it to proceed from the Ducheſs's will (24), rather than to the cruel perſecution which they ſuffered under a reign, in which the whole adminiſtration was carried on according to the caprice of this woman. This doubtleſs is the ſophiſm, à non cauſa pro cauſa.

(23) Varillas, Præf. de l'Hiſt. de Henri II.

(24) By which ſhe diſinherited the Duke of Bouillon, her ſon-in-law, in caſe he ſhould go over to the Proteſtant Religion.

[G] She had two daughters by him, whom ſhe got married very advantageouſly.] Frances de Brezé, the eldeſt, married in 1538, Robert de la Marck, 4th of that name, Duke of Bouillon, Sovereign Prince of Sedan, created Marſhal of France in 1547 (25). Louiſa de Brezé, the great Seneſchal's other daughter, was married to Claudius of Lorrain, Duke of Aumale (26), brother to the Duke of Guiſe who was killed by Poltrot. Varillas is very erroneous here (27). He ſuppoſes that, in the beginning of Henry the IId's reign, the Ducheſs of Valentinois and the Cardinal of Lorrain, endeavoured reciprocally to unite their intereſt, in order to ſtrengthen and increaſe their authority; and that the Cardinal, in this view, propoſed a marriage between the Prince of Joinville, his elder brother, with the Ducheſs's eldeſt daughter; but this not ſucceeding, the Ducheſs was obliged to be content with marrying her eldeſt daughter with Duke d'Aumale, the Cardinal's younger brother; after which ſhe married her ſecond daughter to the ſon of Marſhal de Fleuranges, Prince of Sedan (28). Now this is confounding times and things; for Diana of Poitier's eldeſt daughter married Robert de la Marck, Prince of Sedan, in 1538 (29). Nor could Henry Robert of la Marck, their ſon, have married, in 1558, the Duke of Montpenſier's daughter (30), if her mother had married in the reign of Henry II. I ſay nothing of Antoinette de la Marck, ſiſter of Henry Robert, who was married to Damville, ſecond ſon of the Conſtable of Montmorency, in 1558, according to Varillas (31); for as he obſerves that ſhe was almoſt marriageable, he would eſcape the force of my objection, and I don't know how old the Lady was then. Having got a friend (32) to conſult Mr. d'Hozier, a Gentleman perfectly well ſkilled in Genealogies and Hiſtory, I am informed that Frances de Brezé, Diana de Poitier's eldeſt daughter, married in 1538, Robert de la Marck; and that Louiſa de Brezé, her ſecond daughter, married Claude of Lorrain, Duke of Aumale, in 1546 (33); for William of Poitiers, her uncle, ſpeaks of her as wife to that Prince, in the will made by him the 12th of March 1546. Preſident de la Place obſerves, that Duke d'Aumale married in the reign of Francis I. by the ſame token, that the King would not permit the bride to be dreſſed, on the day of her nuptials, as a Princeſs (34). This ſhews the miſtakes of the modern Hiſtorian of Admiral Coligni. He ſuppoſes that the Conſtable of Montmorency, having again regained the ſummit of the royal favour, after the death of Francis I. had a mind to marry Coligni to the heireſs of Laval: but Coligni did not approve of the propoſal; and put d'Andelot his brother in his room. The Conſtable imagined, that Coligni had refuſed it, becauſe of the paſſion he had entertained for Mademoiſelle de Brezé, and therefore deſired that young Nobleman not to viſit that young Lady ſo often; or to do this at leaſt with a deſign only to try whether ſhe would be of the ſame temper with her mother (35). He nevertheleſs viſited her as aſſiduouſly as before. This Author, after relating a variety of intrigues, tells us, that Diana having two daughters to diſpoſe of in marriage, caſt about for huſbands, whoſe intereſt might contribute to ſupport her's (36); when thinking the Prince of Joinville a good match, ſhe ſpoke to the Cardinal of Lorrain about it. He adds (37), that Coligni obſerved to this Prince, that ſuch a marriage would be diſhonourable to him, upon which he did not purſue that affair; and that Diana afterwards married her daughter to Duke d'Aumale, that Prince's younger brother. See the remark [Q]. I am ſurprized

(25) Anſelme, Hiſt. des Officiers de la Couronne, p. 179.

(26) Idem, Palais de l'Honneur, p. 448.

(27) Hiſt. de Henri II. liv. 1. p. 44, 49. ad ann. 1547.

(28) Ibid. p 49.

(29) Father Anſelme, Hiſt. des grans Officiers, p. 179.

(30) Ibid.

(31) Hiſt. de Henri II. liv. 7. 7. p. 301.

(32) Mr. Janniçon, Advocate of the Council.

(33) It is perhaps, by computing the beginning of the year from Eaſter.

(34) Commentaires de l'etat de la Religion & Republique, folio 59 verſon. edit. 1565.

(35) Vie de Gaſpard de Coligny, liv. 2. p. 87. edit. 1686.

(36) Ibid. p. 102.

(37) Ibid. p. 106.

Valentinois. I am of opinion, that ſhe was not ſo old as Varillas affirms [H], at the time that ſhe ſet up for Head of a Party, in oppoſition to the Ducheſs of Eſtampes, in prized at all the particulars related by this Author, and the vaſt Commentaries which he builds on a few words of Brantome. He is a faithful Imitator of Varillas, an Author who will ſpoil a numberleſs multitude of Authors, unleſs ſome remedy be applied. But not to ſpeak of theſe hiſtorical miſtakes, I ſhall only obſerve, that Diana de Poitiers had no daughter to diſpoſe of in marriage, when Henry II. her lover aſcended the Throne the 31ſt of March 1547; for, as I have already obſerved, the eldeſt of her two daughters was married in 1538, and the youngeſt in 1546.

[H] I am of opinion, that ſhe was not ſo old as Varillas affirms.] We will tranſcribe his words, obſerving only, that what follows relates to the year 1544. "Diana of Poitiers was the Dauphin's miſtreſs, as "the Ducheſs (38) was in that quality to the King. "But this was the only thing in which they reſem- "bled one another, both with regard to the body and "the mind. The Ducheſs had never been more "beautiful than ſhe was at that time. She had not "loſt one of thoſe charms, for which ſhe was thought, "by the niceſt Judges, and even by the Emperor "himſelf, the moſt finiſhed beauty in Europe; and "Diana of Poitiers had ſcarce one of thoſe features "which one and twenty years before, had ſaved St. "Vallier her father's life. The Ducheſs was but "one and thirty, and Diana of Poitiers was ſuſpect- "ed to be near threeſcore, the care that was taken "to conſult the pariſh regiſter for her birth, having "been to no purpoſe. . . . . The Ducheſs . . . . ſpoke "with great freedom of Diana; whereas the latter "concealed, under feigned demonſtrations of reſ- "pect and complaiſance, the indignation ſhe har- "boured at being ſo much deſpiſed. The ſame "freedom of ſpeech had made the Ducheſs ſay, that "ſhe was born the ſame day that Diana of Poitiers "was married. The words gave ſo much the more "offence, as they might be true; and reproached "Diana with being equally incapable of giving or "receiving love, as it was known that it was a long "time before ſhe could get a huſband (39). She ne- "verthelefs concealed her reſentment ſo long as the "King enjoyed perfect health; but the inſtant ſhe "perceived that his Majeſty was upon the decline, "ſhe hinted to the Ducheſs, that the time was at "hand in which ſhe ſhould be revenged of her (40)." I don't know where this Author picked up theſe ſtories, but I very much queſtion the truth of them. I one day heard ſome perſons ſpeak of this in manner following. Firſt (was it ſaid) had Diana de Poitiers been forty years of age, at the time of Saint Vallier's trial, it is not probable that Hiſtorians would have mentioned her as a tid-bit with regard to Francis I. A married woman, or widow, will ſooner paſs for a handſom woman, at forty years old, than a maid from the ſame age. The former are better ſecured from the odious name of old woman, than the latter is of that of old maid; and, through an ill effect of prejudice, the former will be thought a more ſuitable match than the latter. Secondly, Mezerai ſays, that Diana was but fourteen years of age when ſhe ſaved her father's life (41), which is infinitely more probable than to ſuppoſe her forty. A Reader does not ſo eaſily believe, that the life of a criminal was exchanged for a faded virgin-flower; as if he is told, (which Mezerai does) that the perſon who made that barter was but fourteen; and this even better pleads the apology of Francis the Firſt. Thirdly, If Diana de Poitiers was near ſixty years of age in 1544, ſhe muſt have been threeſcore and fifteen when Henry II. died; that is, on the day of the famous tournament on which this Prince received his death's wound, his dreſs would have been black and white, on account of the lovely widow whoſe humble ſervant he was (42): an old woman of threeſcore and fifteen years of age would have been ſerved on the foot of the lovely widow. Would the Proteſtants, who were ſo cruelly perſecuted by that woman, and who revenged themſelves in their writings, have omitted her very advanced age? A young Monarch, diſtractedly in love with an old woman of ſeventy, is ſo proper a ſubject for ridicule, that every one of the ſatyrs which were publiſhed againſt Henry II. would have cenſured him in the moſt unmerciful and drole manner, on his crazy antiquated miſtreſs, had the Ducheſs of Valentinois been ſo far advanced in years. The ſilence of the Satyriſts, who only obſerve that Diana was in the autumn of life, that is, between forty and fifty, ſeems to me a ſtrong argument againſt Varillas. But this is not the ſtrongeſt part of the objection. More ſtreſs was laid on what Brantome relates in his Memoires des Dames Galantes. He ſays (43) that, two years after this Prince's death, the enemies of the Ducheſs of Valentinois ſought her friendſhip. She conſequently muſt have lived, at leaſt, to ſeventy-ſeven years of age; how then, according to Brantome, came ſhe to die at ſeventy years and a half old (44)? Fourthly, It is ſcarce probable that, in 1544, the Ducheſs of Eſtampes was but one and thirty; if this were true, ſhe was but thirteen when ſhe was miſtreſs to Francis I. Not to inſiſt upon this; but ſhe was Maid of Honour to the Queen Regent before the King fell in love with her; and I queſtion very much whether, in that age, when children were educated leſs expeditiouſly than in this, a young Lady of twelve years would have been qualified to be one of the Maids of Honour to the Queen-Regent. Fifthly, I confeſs that jealouſy prompts Court-Ladies, as well as others, to employ paſſionate expreſſions, and to vent ſtrange untruths: but when perſons ſee themſelves expoſed to the piercing eyes of a faction who are her enemies; they endeavour not to relate particulars which are abſolutely abſurd, nor palpable falſhoods known to the whole Court. Now it cannot be ſaid that the Ducheſs of Eſtampes had kept that guard upon her tongue, in caſe ſhe preſumed to ſay, that ſhe was born on the day in which Diana de Poitiers married. Not one perſon in the French Court but knew the date of the Ducheſs's diſhonour; King Francis the Firſt's return from Spain being too ſignal an æra to be forgot. Now this was alſo the very time in which Mademoiſelle de Heilli began her intrigues. The Court remembered almoſt as well the pardon ſent to Saint Vallier on the ſcaffold; conſequently they knew the date of Diana de Poitiers's diſhonour; and were not ignorant that the æra's of the intrigues of the two Ladies in queſtion, were not far diſtant one from the other. Since therefore it was known to the whole Court, that Saint Vallier's daughter did not marry the great Seneſchal of Normandy, till after Francis I. had enjoyed her (45), we muſt conclude that the Ducheſs of Eſtampes acted very ridiculouſly, in caſe ſhe ſpoke the words which Varillas puts into her mouth; I was born on the ſame day that Diana of Poitiers married: for this might eaſily have been proved an abſolute falſhood and a trifling jeſt. The Reader will ſee hereunder (46), that none of theſe reflections are juſt.

The Author of the Amours of the Kings of France has copied all theſe errors of Varillas, and even increaſed them, by referring to the year 1547 (47), what the other had referred to 1544, which gives riſe to ſeveral new falſities. Mademoiſelle de Heilli was but ten years of age when the King lay with her, and Saint Vallier was pardoned in 1526. Eſpernai and Chateau-Thierri were taken, and the treaty of Creſpi was concluded after the year 1546. Here follows another error of that Author. He ſays (48), that Francis I. grew inſenſible to all the reſt of the Court-Ladies, upon his being fired with a paſſion for Mademoiſelle d'Heilli, immediately after his return from Spain; and that Diana, who had been long married to Lewis de Brezé, Seneſchal of Normandy, endeavoured to conſole herſelf for the loſs of that Prince's affection, by the teſtimonies which the Dauphin gave her of his affection. The Reader is to know, that Henry II. was but eight years of age when his father returned from Spain in 1526: alſo, that he was not Dauphin till 1536; and that Diana was a widow when the Dauphin fell in love with her. Hence let him judge if the Author of the Amours of the Kings of France is very accurate.

(38) The Ducheſs of Eſtampes.

(39) This is a falſity. See the rem. [P].

(40) Varillas, Hiſt. de Francis I. liv. 11. p. 97. Dutch edit.

(41) Abrege Chronol. Tom. 4. p. 520. This agrees with what he ſays in Tome 2. of his hiſtory at large, p. 1058, that Diana, tho' 53 years of age, ingratiated herſelf into the Dauphin's affections. La Planche, in his Hiſtory of Francis II. agrees with this. In her juvenile years, ſays he, p. 14. ſhe ſaved her father's (St. Vallier) life, by giving up her maidenhead; and afterwards, by an unhappineſs fatal to France, ſhe won the heart of Henry II. when in her declining years.

(42) Brantome, Eloge de Henri II. p. 39. of Tom. 2.

(43) Tom. 2. p. 328.

(44) Ibid. p. 228.

(45) This is falſe. See the rem. [P].

(46) In the rem. [P].

(47) Tom. 1. p. 204. edit. of 1695.

(48) p. 187.

[I] The

in the reign of Francis the Firſt. Many very ſingular particulars are related, both of the reſolution ſhe diſcovered after the death of Henry the Second [I], and the duration of her beauty [K]. She was a mortal enemy to the Proteſtants [L]; and, doubtleſs, the religious zeal which ſuch a woman ſhewed, was one of the moſt remarkable ſcenes of the grand comedy that is played on the ſtage of the world. If there be any particular in Brantome's Memoirs, not only flat, but even worthy of being had in deteſtation, it is his groveling condeſcention, in praiſing this Ducheſs, and in applauding the

[I] The reſolution ſhe diſcovered after the death of Henry II.] Brantome gives us the following account on that head. "The Ducheſs of Valentinois, when "King Henry II. was near his end, and little hopes "were entertained of his recovery, was ordered to "retire to her hotel in Paris, and not to come again "into his bed-chamber, leſt ſhe ſhould diſturb him in "his godly thoughts, and becauſe ſome perſons en-"vied her. Being withdrawn, orders were ſent her "to reſtore ſome rings and jewels which belonged "to the Crown. Immediately ſhe aſked the meſſen-"ger whether the King was dead; and upon his an-"ſwering that he was not, but would certainly die "very ſoon, ſhe ſpoke thus; I would have my ene-"mies know, that ſo long as the King lives, I do "not fear them, nor will obey them till he has left "the world. My courage is as yet invincible; but, "when once he ſhall have breathed his laſt, I will not "ſurvive him. How bitter ſoever my life may be here-"after, it yet will be ſweet in compariſon of the loſs "I ſhall ſuſtain; and therefore, whether my Sove-"reign be living or dead, I don't fear my enemies. "This Lady, in this behaviour, diſplayed the great-"eſt generoſity; but then, will it be objected, ſhe "did not die, according to her promiſe. She never-"theleſs was brought very near death; and indeed, "it was better for her to live than die, as ſhe thereby "ſhewed her enemies that ſhe did not fear them; "and that, having ſo often ſeen them in a poſture "of humility and trembling before her, ſhe was de-"termined not to do the ſame; and indeed, ſhe "diſcovered ſo much reſolution and intrepidity of "mind, that they could never ruffle her; nay, in "two years, they courted her friendſhip more than "ever; and were reconciled to her, as is the cuſtom "of the great, whoſe friendſhips and enmities are "not laſting; but whoſe differences are as eaſily "made up, as thoſe of thieves in a fair, and love "and hate one another with the ſame eaſe and in-"difference, which we little people do not; for we "muſt either fight, revenge ourſelves and die; or "put an end to our conteſts by very delicate and ſo-"lemn agreements; and notwithſtanding this, we are "no better friends than before (49)."

(49) Brantome, Dames Galantes, Tom. 2. p. m. 327.

The difference which Brantome obſerves between the manner in which the great are reconciled, and how little people carry on their quarrels, recalls to my memory what was ſaid to a Pariſian in the time of the wars between the houſe of Orleans and that of Burgundy. "During this war, matters were carried "on with ſo much heat, that after ſeveral ſieges had "been ſuſtained and cities ruined, a peace was pro-"jected, and concluded at Auxerre. For as the "Duke of Burgundy ſaid to a Pariſian, who was "come to wait upon him; WE WHO ARE OF THE "BLOOD ROYAL, AND RELATED TO THE KING, "FALL OUT WITH ONE ANOTHER WHENEVER WE "PLEASE; AND ARE ALSO RECONCILED WHEN-"EVER WE THINK PROPER. Monſtrelet ſays far-"ther, that a Burgundian ſaid, THAT IT WAS "GREAT FOLLY IN MEN TO KILL ONE ANOTHER "FOR THE SAKE OF PRINCES, WHO RECONCILE "DIFFERENCES WHENEVER THEY PLEASE (50)."

(50) Rouillard, Hiſt. de Melun, p. 515.

[K] The duration of her beauty.] Brantome informs us of this. "I ſaw the Ducheſs of Valentinois at "ſeventy years of age, as beautiful, freſh and love-"ly, as when ſhe was but thirty; and therefore it "is no wonder that ſhe was beloved by one of the "greateſt and moſt valiant Monarchs of the Uni-"verſe. This I may ſay freely, without injuring "that Lady's beauty; for every Lady who has won "the affections of a mighty King, it is an indicati-"on that ſhe is miſtreſs of all perfections; and in-"deed beauty, the gift of Heaven, ought not to be "beſtowed ſparingly on Demi-gods. I ſaw the Lady "in queſtion ſix months before her death, when ſhe "ſtill poſſeſſed ſo many charms, that I am perſua-"ded the moſt obdurate heart could not have with-"ſtood them, though ſhe, before, had broke her leg "in a ſtreet in Orleans. She then rode with as much "dexterity as ever; but the horſe fell under her. "One would have concluded, that the great pain "ſhe felt would have diſguiſed her features; but ſo "far from it, her beauty, her graces and majeſtic "air, were as conſpicuous as ever. She had an ex-"tremely white ſkin, and never uſed to paint; but "it is ſaid, that ſhe uſed to drink every morning, "ſome broths compoſed of potable gold, and other "things, with which good Phyſicians and learned "Apothecaries are acquainted, for as to myſelf, I "know nothing of the matter. It is my opinion, "that had this Lady lived to the age of an hundred, "ſhe would never have been an old woman, ſo re-"gular and beautiful were her features, and ſo "ſtrong and vigorous her conſtitution. It is pity "that earth ſhould cover ſo lovely a body (51)."

(51) Brantome, Dames Galantes, Tom. 2. p. 328.

[L] She was a mortal enemy to the Proteſtants.] Beza aſcribes the cruel perſecutions, which the Proteſtants ſuffered in the reign of Henry II. to the counſel of three perſons, the Cardinal of Lorrain, the Ducheſs of Valentinois, and Marſhal St. André. The Cardinal, ſays he (52), had his Majeſty's conſcience at his diſpoſal; the Ducheſs poſſeſſed his body, for which ſhe was ſtrongly ſuſpected to deal in magical arts, ſince ſhe had paſſed her life with diſreputation; and had nothing in herſelf which could with reaſon (if there is any thing like reaſon in ſuch paſſions,) attract or preſerve the heart of ſuch a Prince. Theſe three being always at the King's ear, in order to perſuade him of the truth of two things, viz. that the Proteſtant Religion was an enemy to Monarchy of every kind, and Kingly power, and the cauſes of all confuſion; the other, that the true way of making amends, before God and Men, for the ſeveral vices which were committed, in which they themſelves indulged him, was, to extirpate the adverſaries of the Romiſh religion; theſe, I ſay, prevailed ſo far, that even in the very beginning of his reign, he made it his chief ſtudy and buſineſs, to perſecute and deſtroy with the utmoſt violence, the churches which the late King his father had begun to invade. Here follows a paſſage from Brantome. Above all, ſhe was a very zealous Catholic, and bore a ſtrong hatred to the Proteſtants, which is the reaſon why they hated, and calumniated her to ſuch a degree (53). But nothing can be more remarkable than what is related by Varillas (54). "In the Will made by her, when ſhe was the moſt "in favour, and which ſhe did not revoke, at her "death, ten or twelve years after; ſhe declared, "in the chief article, that ſhe was ſo firmly devoted "to the Catholic religion, that ſhould it unfortunate-"ly happen that the Ducheſſes of Aumale and Bou-"illon, her daughters, for any cauſe or pretence "whatſoever, ſhould quit it, and embrace any of the "new opinions, ſhe would diſinherit them, and give "all her eſtates to the hoſpitals of the ſeveral places in "which they ſhould be ſituated. In caſe only one "of her daughters ſhould leave the Catholic Faith, "ſhe would give her the other half of her eſtate, which "would have been her right, had ſhe not changed "(55); and, if her relations ſhould not take due "care to ſee her laſt will exactly complied with, ſhe "conjured the Parliament of Paris, by the good of-"fices ſhe had formerly done it, with reſpect to "King Henry II. to ſupply whatever might be left "wanting by her relations." The Hiſtorian obſerves, that this article of the Will was not executed; for the Ducheſs of Bouillon made an open profeſſion of the Proteſtant Religion, and nevertheleſs ſhared her mother's eſtate equally with the Ducheſs of Aumale. The Author takes occaſion from thence to applaud the

(52) Hiſt. Eccleſiaſtique, liv. 2. p. 68.

(53) Brantome, Eloge de Henri II. Tom. 2. of his Memoirs, p. 9.

(54) Hiſt. de Henri II. liv. 1. p. 36 and 37.

(55) The Author expreſſes himſelf ſo ill, that we are forced to gueſs his meaning.

the exceſſive complaiſance of Henry II [M]. Thuanus has been far from employing ſuch ſhameleſs flattery; he branding, in a due manner, the memory of the Conſtable of Montmorency [N], who, notwithſtanding his great pride, was yet ſo mean as to cringe to that proſtitute. But Mezerai did not flatter on this occaſion [O]. She has been applauded for not carrying her vengeance to as high a pitch as ſhe might have done, againſt the Ducheſs of Eſtampes, after the death of Francis I. (b). The mighty poſſeſſions ſhe had accumulated were of great ſervice to her, after the death of Henry II. She employed them in order to ſoften the Queen-mother, and retired to her fine houſe at Anet; but not (as we are told) till after having been ſeverely reprimanded by Catharine of Medicis (c). This Queen was frighted at the offer which Tavannes made her, to cut off the Ducheſs of Valentinois's noſe. She told him that it would be his ruin; to which he anſwered, that he would die with pleaſure, could he thereby ſuppreſs vice, the bane of the King, and that of France (d). To conclude, I will examine the account of thoſe who affirm, that ſhe ſaved her father's life by giving up her virgin-flower; and will produce ſome dates to ſettle the diſputes of certain Hiſtorians [P]. It is a ſhame that they ſhould diſagree about incidents that are ſo very recent.

(a) Varillas, Hiſt de Henri II. liv. 1. p. m. 33, 44.

(c) See the rem. [O].

(d) Memoires de Tavannes, cited by le Laboureur, Addit. de Caſtelnau, Tom. 2. p. 573.

The

the generoſity of the Guiſes, ſo true it is, ſays he, that the houſe of Guiſe has ſometimes exerted ſuch acts of diſintereſtedneſs and generoſity, as are not found in the Princes of other families. He ſoon after overthrows the foundation, on which he had raiſed this elogium (56). But we have nothing to do with that here. Here follows another paſſage, which plainly ſhews the averſion the Ducheſs had to the Proteſtants. "She did not care to expreſs her thoughts to d'Andelot; for though ſhe had not ſcrupled to live, for twenty years, in ſuch a commerce with her Sovereign as was prohibited by the Laws of the Goſpel; ſhe nevertheleſs was ſo conſcientiouſly ſcrupulous, that ſhe did not dare ſo much as to ſpeak to perſons ſuſpected to be Hereticks (57)." How ridiculous was this conduct! I intreat my Readers to reflect a little on this whimſical zeal, ſo very common.

(56) He ſays, p. 49. That the Cardinal of Lorrain, who was very wary, took care to inſert, in the contract of Count d'Aumale, ſome clauſes ſo very advantageous to that Count, that he afterwards inherited the greateſt part of his mother-in-law's eſtate.

(57) Varillas, Hiſt. de Henri II. lib. 7. p. 301. ad ann. 1558.

[M] Brantome had the groveling condeſcention to applaud the exceſſive complaiſance of Henry II.] Tho' Brantome expatiates ever ſo much on the Ducheſs of Valentinois's courage; though he ſays that ſhe was handſome till the age of ſeventy, and that ſhe rode a horſe well, no perſon will be angry with him on that account. But it is intolerable to hear him ſay, that ſhe "adviſed, inculcated, and perſuaded the King "to nothing but what was great, exalted and generous ..... (58). That ſhe was very gracious, "charitable to the poor, vaſtly devout; and accordingly, that her motto was a grave, as living only "in God; and that the French ought to pray, that "God may never let the King have a worſe favourite "than ſhe was (59). The prodigious donation, which "his Majeſty, at his acceſſion to the throne, beſtowed on the Ducheſs of Valentinois, on the eſtabliſhment of all the officers of France, as is the "cuſtom in every new reign, was thought a very "ſtrange thing. An immenſe ſum aroſe from this, "by reaſon of the long reign which Francis I. enjoyed. Such a Monarch might juſtly make ſo great "a donation to ſuch a Lady, this being an eſcheat, "which made no part of the King's revenues, ariſing "from demeſnes, ſubſidies, or taxes; and the Monarchs of that age uſed to beſtow ſuch eſcheats "very freely, as I have been informed by perſons of "credit, and were blamed if they applied them to "their own uſe. With theſe they uſed to reward "their ſervants; but our later Monarchs have kept "them for themſelves, and farmed them to ſupply "their neceſſities. Farther, the Lady in queſtion "did not make an ill uſe of the money ſo ariſing, "ſhe building the beautiful palace of Anet, which "will be a perpetual ornament to France (60)." Theſe words fill one with indignation. We are leſs offended at the elogiums which Francis de Billon has beſtowed on her, and which amount to this, that ſhe was a woman of her word, and beneficent (61).

(58) Brantome, Elog. de Henri II. lib. 7. p. 301. ad ann. 1558.

(59) Ibid. p. 11.

(60) Ibid. p. 10.

(61) See the book entitled, Le Fort inexpugnable de l'Honneur du Sexe feminin conſtruit par Francois de Billon Secretaire, printed in 1555. folio 170.

[N] Thuanus ..... has branded in a due manner the memory of the Conſtable of Montmorency.] I ſhould enervate the force of his expreſſions, if I attempted a tranſlation of them, for which reaſon I will ſet them down in the original. Hæc violenta & acerba regni initia ſub miti & moderato principe & qui alieno potius quam ſuo ingenio uteretur, facile Miniſtris tributa ſunt: ſed præcipue Dianæ Pictavienſi ſuperbi & impotentis animi feminæ, apud quam plurimum gratia valebant Lotharingi fratres & Santandreanus ..... Hujus feminæ arbitrio omnia regebantur, & Momorantius ipſe, ut auctoritatem & potentiam, quam apud regem obtinebat, incolumem tueretur, morem gerere, & prudentiam ad turpe obſequium flectere ſatagebat; peſſimo exemplo ſummi imperii ad impotentis feminæ libidinem proſtituti; quæ poſtremo ut jam in homines, ſic & in ærarium quod hominibus imperat, poteſtatem arripuit, expulſo Joanne Vallo ſanctioris ærarii quæſtore, & in ejus locum ſuffecto Blondo Rupicuriano homine ſuo (62). He afterwards mentions the methods by which this blood-ſucker extorted money from the people, to ſatiate his avarice (63). De Mezerai obſerves that the King, at the caprice and pleaſure of this artful woman in queſtion changed the whole face of the Court (64).

(62) Thuan. Hiſt. lib. 3. p. 58.

(63) See Lewis de Reinier, Sieur de la Planche, in his Hiſt. of Franis II. p. 14.

[O] Mezerai did not flatter on this occaſion.] Here follow his words, ſpeaking of the ſtate to which things were reduced, after the death of Henry II. The Ducheſs of Valentinois did not continue long at Court, after the Keeper of the Seals, Bertrandi. She was ſent away upon the arrival of Olivier whom ſhe had turned out; and ſhe was obliged to give up, ignominiouſly, the keys of the King's cloſet, and the jewels belonging to the Royal Family which were given to the reigning Queen. This however was not done to ſatisfy Olivier, but to ſatiate the juſt reſentment of Catharine, who could no longer ſuffer, without reflecting a diſgrace upon herſelf, a woman who had ſo long deprived her of her huſband's heart. The reader will ſuppoſe that this Princeſs would not permit her to go without reproaches, and the ſevere treatment ſhe deſerved. By the credit and intereſt of Duke d'Aumale, her ſon-in-law, ſhe did not meet with harſher uſage; ſhe being obliged to him for the preſerving the great wealth ſhe had amaſſed by the forfeited eſtates of criminals, the ſale of benefices, and other unjuſt methods, becauſe ſhe promiſed to conſtitute him her ſole heir: however, ſhe was forced to give up to the Queen-mother her fine Seat of Chenonceaux on the Cher (65). This is an extract, (but ſoftened pretty much) of the Sieur de la Planche's account (66).

(64) Hiſt. de France, Tom. 2. p. 1058. ad ann. 1547.

(65) Ibid. Tom. 3. p. 6.

(66) Page 15 and 16 of Hiſt. de l'eſtat de France, tant de la Republique que de la Religion, ſous le Regne de François II.

[P] I will examine the account of thoſe who affirm, that ſhe ſaved her father's life by giving up her virgin-flower, and will produce ſome dates, to ſettle the diſputes of certain Hiſtorians.] I am informed by Mr. d'Hozier, that ſhe married the great Seneſchal of Normandy the 29th of March 1514. Mezerai aſſerts a notorious falſity, in relating that the King ſent a pardon to Saint Vallier, after bereaving his daughter Diana, then about fourteen, of her moſt valuable treaſure (67). He doubtleſs means that ſhe gave up her virgin-treaſure to Francis I. He therefore is miſtaken in two particulars: he did know that, in 1523, ſhe muſt have been, at leaſt, twenty years old; and that ſhe had been a woman eight or nine years. It is very plain that his words are only a paraphraſe upon thoſe of la Planche cited by me (68). He gives the following judgment of that Hiſtorian: Regnier de la Planche, ſays he (69), was ſon to the Lieutenant General of Poitiers, was an artful man, and of a ready wit, but of a miſchievous turn of mind, which had imbibed Calvin's opinions; beſides, he was the confident of Marſhal de Montmorency, and conſequently an enemy to the Guiſes.

(67) Mezerai, Abregé Chronol. Tom. 4. p. 520. ad ann. 1523.

(68) Rem. [H], citat. (41).

(69) Mezerai, Hiſt. de France, Tom. 3. p. 26.

The circumſtance which has been aſſerted in a book printed at Baſil in 1698, that the Duke of Guiſe intended to marry our Senechalle, is falſe [Q]. This is one of the miſtakes

It is no wonder that a man of this character did not enquire, whether Diana de Poitiers was long married to the great Seneſchal at the time that ſhe ſaved her father's life. Thoſe who diſcover ſomething myſterious in the minuteſt particulars, imagine that Francis I. had ſome reaſon to expreſs himſelf in manner following, in the pardon he granted to St. Vallier. Whereas our dear and truſty couſin, Counſellor and Chamberlain, Count de Maulevrier, great Seneſchal of Normandy, and the relations and friends of John de Poitiers, Sieur of St. Vallier, have lately very humbly beſought and intreated us to take pity and compaſſion on the ſaid Poitiers Sieur of St. Vallier, &c. Care was taken, ſay theſe ſpeculative men, not to mention the leaſt particular of the affinity or relation between the great Seneſchal and the criminal. Care was taken not to ſay that he made interceſſion for his wife's father: they were afraid that this would raiſe in people's minds ſuch ſuſpicions and calumnies as they juſtly dreaded, conſidering the youth and beauty of the Lady who had interceded for her father's life. But laying aſide theſe idle ſubtilties, I will now examine Varillas's remark. He has not met, ſays he (70), with one Catholic, who has ſpoke of this inceſtuous commerce; thoſe of the old religion (the Roman Catholicks) have aſſiduouſly declined ſpeaking of it, as the Calviniſts have been paſſionate in the particulars they relate concerning it. He ſpeaks only of the writers of that age, whoſe works conſiſt of thirty ſeven volumes. I wiſh I had time to examine, whether there were any books, great or ſmall, written by Catholicks in the reign of Francis I. or Henry II. which mention the cauſe of the pardon that was indulged to St. Vallier; and I exhort all thoſe who have an opportunity for it, and may have any intereſt in that affair, to enquire into it. However Varillas cannot deny but that the Roman Catholic Writers, in the 17th Century, mention the paſſion which Francis I. entertained for the great Seneſchal's Lady. Le Laboureur does not deny it (71). Mezerai ſpeaks more clearly of this than la Planche, and we have quoted a modern Author, who never was a Proteſtant, and who confirms what is to be found in the pieces which are called Huguenot Libels. I have given his words (72), but did not obſerve that it is a falſity in him to aſſert, that young Diana entered into the ſervice of Queen Claude, in quality of maid of honour. This Queen was the daughter of Lewis XII. married Francis I. the 14th of May 1514, and was not Queen till January following. Now Diana was married to Lewis de Brezé the 29th of March 1514, and therefore was not maid of honour to Queen Claude. A friend (73) has been ſo good as to inform me, that ſhe loſt her huſband in 1531; and raiſed to his memory a magnificent Mauſolæum, in the Church of Notre-Dame, in Roan; that ſhe died in 1566, aged ſixty ſix years and twenty ſeven days, and that her body was depoſited at Anet. Beſides, Hilarion du Coſte (74) obſerves, that ſhe died the 26th of April 1566. The reſult of all this is, that ſhe was born the 31ſt of March 1500; and that the Ducheſs of Eſtampes romanced very ridiculouſly, when ſhe declared herſelf ſo very young in compariſon of Diana de Poitiers her rival. This will give me occaſion to rectify ſuch particulars, as are not very accurate in the paſſages cited above, with regard to the Ducheſs of Valentinois's age.

The Franciſcan whom I cited hints clearly enough at the inceſtuous commerce. I will quote pretty largely from him, as we ſhall thereby meet with ſeveral particulars which belong to this article. "After the death of Lewis de Brezé her huſband, King Henry II. who loved her tenderly, and was entirely wrapt up in her, created her Ducheſs of Valentinois, which title ſhe enjoyed till the day of her death, which happened the 26th of April 1566; and was buried in the noble Chapel ſhe had built at her ſeat at Anet, (which the Poets of that age called Dianet) after having divided her poſſeſſions between her ſecond daughter Louiſa, Ducheſs of Aumale, and the children of her eldeſt daughter. She ordered, by her will, in caſe ſhe died at Paris, that her body ſhould be firſt carried to the Church of the Filles Penitentes, and from thence to Anet; and ſhewed the averſion ſhe entertained at the Proteſtant Religion. The emblems or devices of Diana, Ducheſs of Valentinois, were more ſuitable to Diana Ducheſs of Angouleſme. The firſt was a dart or arrow (a ſymbol of the arms of the chaſte Diana, Goddeſs of hunting) with the following Latin words on a ribbon which ſurrounded the dart, CONSEQUITUR QUODCUMQUE PETIT, SHE OBTAINS WHATEVER SHE ASKS. By this emblem, ſhe hinted at the credit and favour ſhe had with regard to King Henry II. and the aſcendant ſhe had over that Prince, who could not refuſe any thing ſhe requeſted; as likewiſe over all the Grandees of that Kingdom, and King Francis I. ſhe having obtained, from that Monarch, a pardon for her father the Lord of St. Vallier, who, for aiding the retreat of Charles Duke of Bourbon out of France, was ſeized by order of the above-mentioned Monarch, and ſentenced to loſe his head, which yet was not executed, his Majeſty having ſent him a pardon, at the ſolicitation of that Lady (75). . . . . Diana had alſo another device, viz. a tomb, or grave, whence iſſued an arrow ſurrounded with ſome branches and ſhoots of a tufted tree, with the following motto; SOLA VIVIT IN ILLO, i. e. SHE LIVES IN HIM ONLY; intimating, that the bare hope of a reſurrection makes us live in the depths of the grave. Neither this beautiful emblem, nor the third, which was a Diana, victorious over Cupid, whom ſhe had felled, and put under her feet, with the following Latin inſcription *; OMNIUM VICTOREM VICI, i. e. I HAVE VANQUISHED HIM WHO CONQUERS ALL THINGS, were really uſed by Diana Ducheſs of Valentinois, but by Diana Ducheſs of Angouleſme (76)." It is to be obſerved, that all the Authors cited by me miſrepreſent the pardon which was obtained for St. Vallier. It was not ſo full as was imagined, the criminal, though his life was ſpared, having been ſentenced to perpetual impriſonment, during which he ſuffered great hardſhips. Here follow the words of his pardon (77): We make it known for theſe cauſes, and having conſidered the ſaid ſervices, and chiefly that which was done us by the great Seneſchal (78), as it has been ſaid; we have, with our certain knowledge, full power, and royal authority, committed the ſaid puniſhment of death into that hereafter-mentioned, viz. that the ſaid de Poitiers ſhall be ſhut up and impriſoned for ever between four ſtone walls, built above and beneath, in which there ſhall be only a little window, through which food ſhall be given him. In all other things the contents of the ſentence ſhall remain in full force, and be entirely put in execution. If any one ſhould infer from thence, that whatever is related concerning the favours which Diana indulged is falſe, he will be told, that Francis I. ordered a ſuperſedeas to be drawn up, commanding the Parliament to detain the ſaid St. Vallier in the place where he was impriſoned (79), till his Majeſty ſhould pleaſe to order otherwiſe. Paſquier may be cited, who was perſuaded that had not St. Vallier been ſnatched away by death, he would at laſt have been reſtored to all his honours (80). If it ſhould be added, that this priſoner's crime was one of thoſe which leaſt merited pardon, it will be anſwered, that the leaſt favour which the Lady granted was paid to its full worth, and even beyond it; her father being concerned in a conſpiracy levelled againſt even the perſon of that Monarch. This the King declares in his pardon (81).

[Q] What has been aſſerted; . . . . that the Duke of Guiſe intended to marry our Seneſchalle, is falſe.] It is related in Tom. II. (82) of the Mélange critique de Literature, that the Ducheſs of Valentinois was the cauſe of the diviſion between Admiral de Colligny and the Duke of Guiſe, which, at laſt, was productive of ſuch aſtoniſhing and fatal effects. Theſe two Noblemen playing one day at tennis, the Admiral ſaid to the Duke of Guiſe, that he was ſurpriſed a man of his quality and wiſdom would marry a whore, ſpeaking of that Ducheſs. The Duke of Guiſe who loved her, could not bear theſe words; but entertained a hatred againſt the (70) See rem. [F], citat. (23).

(71) See the rem. [F].

(72) Citation (6) above.

(73) Mr. Janniſon, Advocate of the Council at Paris.

(74) Eloges des Dames Illuſtres, Tom. I. p. 519.

(75) Hilarion de Coſte, ibid.

* In the cabinet of the medals of the library of the Franciſcans, in the Place Royale.

(76) Hilarion de Coſte, Eloges des Dames illuſtr. Tom. I. p. 520.

(77) See the Recueil de divers Memoires, printed at Paris in 1623, p. 58.

(78) A prieſt having informed him, that two Norman Gentlemen had told him, in confeſſion, of a conſpiracy, he ſent notice to the Court of it, and took the depoſitions of the two Gentlemen in queſtion.

(79) In the conciergerie of the Palais, in Paris.

(80) Paſquier, Recherches de la France, lib. 8. chap. 39. p. m. 741.

(81) The ſaid great Seneſchal . . has diſcovered to us the plots carrying on againſt our perſon, our children, and our kingdom. Recueil de Memoires, p. 58.

(82) Page 113.

miſtakes ſo common in converſation on theſe occaſions, perſons of the beſt memory ſometimes miſtake one period for another, fathers for ſons, and daughters for mothers, &c.

the Admiral; became afterwards his profeſſed enemy, and endeavoured to ruin him; ſo that the whore, as the Admiral called her, on the quarrel which broke out on her account, was perhaps more the cauſe of the maſſacre on St. Bartholomew's Day, than Religion, which probably was only a handle; this Herodias had perhaps demanded the Admiral's head . . . . . (83). I am of opinion that this private quarrel contributed greatly to the maſſacre. The circumſtance which contributes the more to make me conclude this is, becauſe ſeveral Hiſtorians affirm, that the Duke of Guiſe had been often heard to ſay, ſince the maſſacre, that matters had been carried to greater lengths than he intended, and that he did not deſign miſchief againſt any perſon except the Admiral. It is ſuppoſed, in this narrative, that the Duke of Guiſe in queſtion, who was deſirous of marrying Diana de Poitiers, often declared, that the maſſacre on St. Bartholomew's Day was carried farther than he intended. Now this is blending the father with the ſon; for the Duke of Guiſe, who is repreſented as in love with Diana of Poitiers, had been dead above nine years, at the time that this maſſacre was perpetrated. But the greateſt error is in ſaying, that the Duke of Guiſe, who had been the Admiral's intimate friend, was in love with the Ducheſs of Valentinois, &c. Nothing can be falſer than this, and here follows the cauſe of this miſtake. The Admiral adviſed againſt marrying the Ducheſs of Valentinois's daughter; which was taken as if he had intended to oppoſe the exaltation of the Guiſes, and this was one of the cauſes why theſe two friends became enemies. I will here quote an Author who lived at that time. "The "firſt cauſe of the enmity of the late Duke of "Guiſe was this: the late Duke of Guiſe, your fa- "ther (84), deſired that the Duke d'Aumale ſhould "marry, in order to exalt your family, the ſecond "daughter of the Ducheſs of Valentinois. The "Duke of Guiſe, your brother, could not approve of "this marriage: however, as he did not dare, for "fear of the King, to oppoſe it openly, he addreſſed "the Admiral, and deſired his advice (in a friendly "way) with regard to the anſwer he ſhould make, "when that affair ſhould be mentioned to him, he "added, with tears, that be the conſequence what it "would, he would never conſent to it. The Admi- "ral did all that lay in his power to comfort him; "and after ſome diſcourſe together, his concluſion "was, that it would be better to enjoy an inch of "authority with honour, than a fathom without it, "and then they left one another. But the Duke of "Guiſe, ſo far from approving the advice which he "himſelf was the moſt forward to promote, that, in "order to exaſperate King Henry againſt the Ad- "miral, he ſaid to Marſhal de Vielle-ville, their "common friend, that he could never have believed "that the Admiral would have envied his exaltation, "by endeavouring to divert him from that marri- "age (85)."

It was the moſt neceſſary to rectify this, as perſons of great learning might have been miſled by it, and imagine that this was a very curious piece of ſecret hiſtory, with regard to the cauſes of the maſſacre on St. Bartholomew's Day. The learned Authors of the Acta Eruditorum (86), who have given an extract of the Mélange Critique de Litterature, conſider, as a very remarkable incident, what has been related above concerning Admiral de Colligni, and the Duke of Guiſe who entertained a paſſion for the Ducheſs of Valentinois, &c. One can never be too careful of preventing certain readers from being impoſed upon.

(83) Recueil de Memoires, p. 114.

(84) Theſe words are addreſſed to the Cardinal of Lorrain.

(85) Reſponſe à l'Epiſtre de Charles de Vaudemont Cardinal de Lorraine . . . . maintenant ſimple Gentilhomme de Hainault, printed in 1565. See alſo Memoires de Brantome, p. m. 146. vol. 3. in the diſcourſe of Admiral Chaſtillon.

(86) See Acta eruditor, June 1698. p. 293, 294.

POLITIANUS (ANGELUS) was born at Monte Pulciano (a) in Tuſcany, the 14th of July 1454. He was one of the moſt learned and moſt polite Writers of his time [A]. He ſtudied the Greek tongue under Andronicus of Theſſalonica *, and made a great progreſs in that language (b). It is aſſerted that he was educated in polite learning with Marſilius Ficinus, at the charge of Coſmus de Medicis [B]. The firſt work which gained him a reputation was a Poem on Julian de Medicis's Tournament [C]. It was generally acknowledged that he ſucceeded better than Luke Pulci an illuſtrious Poet, who in a work of the ſame kind deſcribed the Tournament of Laurence de Medicis Julian's

(a) In Latin, Mons Politianus.

* Now Salonichi.

(b) Voſſius de Hiſt. Latin. p. 628.

[A] He was one of the moſt learned and moſt polite Writers of his time.] Men do not differ much in their opinion as to this particular, and there never was perhaps an Author, who knew ſo well how to make all his brethren concur in their favourable ſentiments of him, as Politianus. Can there be any thing more to his honour? The two Scaligers have beſtowed great elogies on him. You will meet with this, and with ſeveral other honourable paſſages in Pope Blount (1). Conſult alſo Monſieur Baillet (2), Barthius (3), and Mr. Crenius in the Preface which he has prefixed to the new edition of Caninius's Helleniſmus, printed at Leyden 1700.

[B] It is aſſerted that he was educated . . . . at the charge of Coſmus de Medicis.] Boiſſard will be my voucher. Is ſumptu, ſays he (4), et promotione Coſmi Florentinorum Principis, cum Marſilio Ficino bonis literis inſtitutus eſt. i. e. "He was educated in Polite Lite- "rature with Marcilius Ficinus, at the charge and "under the protection of Coſmus Duke of Florence." I cannot tell whence Monſieur Varillas borrowed the following particulars. "He was of Florence, and "his parents were ſo poor, that he was obliged to "wait on Julian and Laurence de Medicis, when they "went to ſchool, and to carry their books, that he "might have an opportunity to peruſe them (5)." It is not true that Politianus was of Florence, as Meſſieurs Varillas and Bullart aſſert (6); he was of Monte Pulciano (7). Obſerve, 1. that Coſmus de Medicis died in the year 1464: ſo that Politianus could not enjoy that patron's favours longer than till he was ten years old. 2, That Marſilius Ficinus was a full grown man when Coſmus died; ſo that Bullart does not expreſs himſelf well. Politianus aſſerts ſomewhere in his works, that being ſtill very young (8) he ſtudied the Platonick Philoſophy under Marſilius Ficinus, and Ariſtotle under Argyropylus.

[C] The firſt work which gained him a reputation was a Poem on Julian de Medicis's Tournament.] Let us quote Paul Jovius. Politianus à prima ſtatim juventa admirabilis ingenii nomen adeptus eſt; quum novo illuſtrique poemate Juliani Medicis equeſtres ludos celebraſſet, Luca Pulcio nobili poeta omnium confeſſione ſuperato, qui Laurentii fratris ludicrum equeſtris pugnæ ſpectaculum, iiſdem modis, & numeris decantarat (9). i. e. "Politia- "nus being ſtill very young gained the reputation of "a wonderful genius, having celebrated Julian de "Medicis's Tournament in a noble Poem of a new "kind: it being univerſally acknowledged that he "excelled therein Luke Pulci an eminent Poet, "who had ſung in a Poem of the ſame nature the "Equeſtrian Games or Tournament, which Laurence "Julian's brother had given." This paſſage intimates that Luke Pulci's Poem was written before Politianus's; and we are confirmed in that opinion when we conſider that Julian de Medicis was younger than Laurence. Monſieur Varillas and Monſieur Baillet have underſtood that paſſage in this ſenſe. "Julian "de Medicis had carried the prize in a Tournament, "and wanted a Paranymph not inferior to Luke "Pulci, who had ſignalized himſelf on a like occa- "ſion, in commending Laurence de Medicis. Poli- "tianus undertook it, and having obſerved, that "Pulci's Poem was not of the ſame ſtrength through- "out the whole . . . . . he plundered the moſt beau- "tiful thoughts from the antient Panegyriſts . . . . .

(1) Pope Blount, Cenſura Author. p. 357.

(2) Baillet, Jugemens ſur les Critiques Gramm. Num. 315. Jugemens ſur les Traduct. Lat. Num. 817, and Jugemens ſur les Poetes, Num. 1227.

(3) Barthius, Adverſ. lib. 47. cap. 5.

(4) Boiſſard, in Iconib. apud Pope Blount, Cenſura Author. p. 357.

(5) Varillas, Anecdotes de Florence, p. 193.

(6) Bullart, Academ. des Scienc. Tom. 1. p. 277.

(7) Leand. Alb. Deſcript. Italiæ, p. m. 89.

(8) Tenera adhuc ætate. Politian. in fine Miſcellan.

(9) Jovius, Elog. cap. 38. p. 88.

Julian's brother. The account he wrote ſome time after of the conſpiracy of the Pazzi's was infinitely eſteemed (c). Being appointed Profeſſor of the Latin and Greek tongues at Florence, he was ſo much commended and applauded, that the ſtudents left the ſchool of Demetrius Chalcondyles a Greek by nation [D], and a very learned man, but whoſe Lectures were but dry and barren if compared with thoſe of Politianus. The other works which Politianus publiſhed, I mean his Latin tranſlation of Herodotus, his Miſcellanies, his Latin Poems, encreaſed his reputation more and more. If he had lived longer he would have enriched the Republick of Letters with many excellent works (d), but he died in 1494 at the age of forty years [E]. If what is related of the (c) Extracted from Paul Jovius, Elog. cap. 38.

(d) See the face to his works, written by Aldus Manucius; you will meet with ſome extracts of it in Geſner's Biblioth. fol. 45.

" and wrote ſuch a noble piece, that having read it, " Pulci out of ſhame and ſpite had a mind to ſuppreſs " his own Poem (10)." Monſieur Baillet relates the ſame particular in other words (11): but if we may believe the ſame Paul Jovius, who in another work of his gives a more full account of theſe two Tournaments, that of Laurence was inferior to Julian's, and Pulci did not write his Poem till after he had ſeen Politianus's (12). Ejus glorioſi laboris præmium fuit triumphus Politiani divini poetæ carminibus celebratus. Nec MULTO POST Laurentius ut fraternis laudibus æquaretur, novum ſpectaculum periculoſiſſimæ pugnæ edidit. . . . . Hujus quoque ſpecioſiſſimi certaminis memoriam Pulcius (13) ipſe Politiani æmulus perjucundo edito poemate ſempiternam fecit. i. e. " The reward of that " glorious and difficult action was its being cele- " brated in verſe by that divine Poet Politianus. " Soon after Laurence de Medicis, who was deſirous " to rival his brother's glory, gave a new ſhew of " that dangerous Tournament. . . . . The memory " of this pompous fight was alſo tranſmitted down " to poſterity in a moſt agreeable Poem written by " Pulci, Politianus's rival." I do not know that this Author ever aſſerted, that Pulci out of anger and ſhame would ſuppreſs his Poem. This is perhaps a mere invention of Varillas, as well as the pretended method which Politianus followed to outdo a Poem, which was not yet in being.

(10) Varillas, Anecdotes de Florence, p. 194.

(11) Baillet, Enfans Celebres, chap. 27.

(12) Jovius, in Vita Leonis X. lib. 1. p. m. 15.

(13) A few lines higher he called him Aloyſius Pulcius: in his Elogies he calls him Luke. There were at that time at Florence three brothers, all three good Poets, namely, Luke, Lewis, and Bernard Pulci.

[D] The ſtudents left the ſchool of Demetrius Chalcondyles a Greek by nation.] Paul Jovius acquaints us with this particular, Tantos de ſe excitavit clamores favente juventute ut Demetrius Calchondyles vir Græcus præſtantique doctrina, uti aridus atque jejunus à Diſcipulis deſereretur (14). We ſhall now give an inſtance of the exceſſive liberty, which Monſieur Varillas gave himſelf in his Paraphraſes. " When Argyropilus, " ſays he (15), had left the Profeſſor's chair of the " Greek tongue at Florence, Politianus ſeized it; " and as he was a man of an incomparable genius, " who left no ſtone unturned to compaſs his deſign, " he exerted his talents ſo well, and flattered his au- " dience ſo artfully, that he got all the Greeks ex- " cluded, who were come to diſpute the chair with " him. Chalcondyles, though a very humble man, " and but little careful of his own glory, could not " brook the affront that was put on thoſe of his own " nation. He made intereſt with Laurence de Me- " dicis, who had already pitched upon him to teach " his children the Greek tongue, and got leave to " teach it publickly in oppoſition to Politianus, and " at the ſame time with him, in order to ſee which " of them two ſhould get more ſcholars. But the " rough accent, of which Chalcondyles could never " get rid, and the difficulty he had to pronounce " ſome Latin words, made him contemptible in " compariſon of Politianus, whoſe agreeable voice, " and gallant expreſſion, raviſhed all them that heard " him. Laurence de Medicis, who would by all " means keep Chalcondyles at Florence, was obliged " to procure him ſcholars, and endeavoured to per- " ſuade Politianus to behave with more civility to- " wards him. Laurence de Medicis did afterwards at- " tempt to reconcile them together, but he found " by his own experience, it was an eaſier taſk to give " peace to all Italy, than to eſtabliſh it between two " learned men. However, he prevented them from " ſhewing their reſentment againſt each other pub- " lickly during his life time." All this is grounded on the following paſſage from Paul Jovius. Demetrius Chalcondyles . . . . . ſcholam Florentiæ inſtauravit, deſertam ab Argyropylo, & à Politiano deficientibus Græcis occupatam; ſed ambitioſa, peracrique æmulo, multis bonis, maliſque artibus ſuggeſtus locum, & nomen defendenti Demetrius ceſſit; Latina præſertim facundia inferior, & ob id rareſcente auditorio à juventute deſtitutus, quandoquidem vel apprimè doctus, facilè jejunus, & hebes; laſcivis & delicatis auribus videri poterat: quibus Politiani decantatis, & varios ſpargentis flores, jucunda argutaque vox, & ſalſa comitas mira dulcedine placuiſſet. Sed manſit Demetrio honeſtus gratiæ locus apud Laurentium, vel infeſto, & obliquè ſemper inceſſente Politiano, qui quum neminem è Latinis ſibi parem pateretur, Græcis ipſis eruditior exiſtimari volebat. Diviſit idcirco munera Laurentius, ut emulationis lites dirimeret: & filii præceptorum contentione ad diſcendum accenderentur (16). i. e. " Demetrius Chalcondyles . . . . . reſtored at Florence " the ſchool, which Argyropylus had forſaken, and " which Politianus had ſeized, the Greeks having " abandoned it. But Chalcondyles yielded the chair " to his ambitious and moſt crafty competitor, who " defended it by all manner of means whether juſt or " unjuſt: for Chalcondyles was inferior to him, chiefly " with regard to the knowledge of the Latin tongue; " ſo that his ſchool grew thin, being left by moſt of " the youths; for though he was very learned, yet " he might appear dry and barren to nice and dainty " ears, who were mightily pleaſed with the clear and " charming voice, and ſmart wit of the celebrated " Politianus, who ſpread flowers throughout his " diſcourſes, and had a moſt agreeable and ſweet " ſtyle. However, Demetrius obtained an honour- " able employment from Laurence, notwithſtanding " the ſpite and hatred of Politianus, who was con- " tinually attacking him indirectly: for as he could " bear no equal among the Latins, ſo he would be " thought more learned than the Greeks themſelves. " Laurence divided therefore their functions, to ſup- " preſs the quarrels occaſioned by their rivalſhip, " and that his children might be encouraged to ſtudy " by the very diſputes of their teachers." Examine that paſſage from Paulus Jovius as much as you pleaſe, you will never find in it, that Politianus got all the Greeks excluded, who would diſpute the chair with him, nor that Chalcondyles looked upon it as an inſufferable affront; nor that Laurence de Medicis procured him ſcholars. I find the laſt period of Paul Jovius dark; it ſignifies Laurence divided the employments, in order to ſuppreſs the quarrels occaſioned by the rivalſhip, and to encourage his children to ſtudy, by the diſputes of their teachers. I think theſe two motives are not well conſiſtent together. Monſieur Bullart relates that Chalcondyles was forced to quit his place, by the envious caballing of Politianus, who by his artifices had him turned out; and that Laurence de Medicis gave them different employments in order . . . . . to ſuppreſs the cauſe of that dangerous emulation (17).

(14) Paulus Jovius, in Elog. cap. 38. p. m. 88.

(15) Varillas, Anecdotes de Florence, p. 179, 180.

(16) Paulus Jovius, Elog. cap. 29. p. m. 69.

(17) Bullart, Academ. des Sciences, Tom. 1. p. 281.

[E] He died in 1494 at the age of forty years.] At Florence the 24th of September (18). Volateranus's account is more acurate than Paul Jovius's; the latter pretends that he was entered upon his 44th year (19); but the former gives him but forty years (20). Several Authors are miſtaken as to the time of his death, which they place under the year 1509: amongſt them are Eber (21), and Reuſnerus (22), as Voſſius obſerves. Nathan Chytræus gives us the following epitaph of Politianus, as though it had been tranſcribed from his tomb in St. Mark's Church at Florence.

(18) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. p. 629.

(19) Vitæ quadrageſimum quartum ætatis annum attigerat. Jovius, Elog. cap. 38. p. 89.

(20) Deceſſit quadragenarius, Volateran. lib. 21. p. 777. See a paſſage from Marſilius Ficinus in Voſſius de Hiſt. Lat. p. 629.

(21) In Faſtis, apud Voſſium, ubi ſupra.

(22) In Diario Hiſtorico, apud eund. ibid.

Politianus in hoc tumulo jacet Angelus, unum
Qui caput, & linguas, res nova, tres habuit.
Obiit an. 1509, Septemb. 24.

i. e. " In this tomb lyeth Angelus Politianus, who " had indeed but one head, but, oh wonder! three " tongues: he died September the 24th, 1509." This is what we read in page 110 of the Variorum in Europa the cauſe of his death were true [F], it might be ſaid that his morals anſwered the homelineſs of his face, rather than the beauty of his genius [G]. Some of his Poems were ſo much admired, that ſeveral learned men took the pains to write Commentaries ropa Itinerum deliciæ, (the delights of ſeveral travels made in Europe) collected by Nathan Chytræus, in the ſecond edition, printed in the year 1599, apud Chriſtophorum Corvinum, in 8vo. But Father Mabillon aſſerts, that there is no epitaph on Politianus's tomb (23). For the reſt he agrees with Chytræus, placing that tomb in St. Mark's church at Florence, and Politianus's death under the year 1509. The Bernardine Saint Romuald follows the ſame chronology (24). But it has been effectually refuted by the learned Voſſius, who urges this argument, namely, that John Picus of Mirandola, Hermolaus Barbarus, and Politianus died the ſame year. The continuator of Palmerius aſſerts it as a matter of fact, and there is a letter of Marſilius Ficinus, in which the death of Politianus is lamented, as happening ſoon after John Picus's. Now it is univerſally acknowledged, that John Picus died in the year 1594. Theſe are Voſſius's arguments. To which we may add, that Peter Crinitus, Politianus's ſcholar, teſtifies, that the three learned men, mentioned above, died the very ſame year that Charles VIII. invaded Italy (25). This is hinting very plainly, that they died in the year 1494.

(23) Mabill. in Muſæo Ital. Tom. 1. p. 178.

(24) Pierre de St. Romuald, Abrege Chronol. Tom. 3. p. 262. under the year 1509.

(25) Crinitus, de Honeſta Diſcipl. p. 15. cap. 9.

[F] If what is related of the cauſe of his death were true.] Let us tranſcribe Monſieur Varillas's expreſſions (26). "Death .... ſurpriſed him at the age "of forty-two (27). As he could not gratify the cri- "minal paſſion he had conceived for one of his ſcho- "lars of a very eminent rank, it threw him into a vio- "lent fever. In the height of his fit, he compoſed "a ſong on the object that charmed him, got out "of his bed, took a lute, and began to ſing it in a "tune ſo tender and paſſionate, that he expired juſt as "he was finiſhing the ſecond ſtanza, the very ſame "day (28) that Charles VIII. paſſed the Alps, to go "and conquer the Kingdom of Naples." Thus that Author was pleaſed to tranſlate the following paſſage from Paulus Jovius. Ferunt eum ingenui adoleſcentis inſano amore percitum, facilè in letalem morbum incidiſſe. Correpta enim cithara, quum eo incendio, & rapida febre torreretur, ſupremi furoris carmina decantavit; ita, ut mox delirantem, vox ipſa, & digitorum nervi, & vitalis denique ſpiritus, inverecunda urgente morte, deſererent (29). i. e. "It is reported, that being paſſionately in "love with a young man of quality, it threw him in- "to a mortal diſtemper: for taking up his lute whilſt "he was in the height of a burning fever, he began "to play upon it a ſong on the object of his love: ſo "that beginning ſoon to rave, his voice, his ſtrength, "and life itſelf left him, and he died a diſgraceful "death." Some aſſert, that being unable to bear the violence of his paſſion, he beat his head againſt a wall, and daſhed his brains out (30). But the death of this man of wit is alſo related after another manner. "He did not end his days very honourably; "here follows what Monſieur Balzac ſays of him, in "one of his letters. We have now a true account of "Politianus's death, which Cardinal Bembo has miſ- "repreſented in the epitaph he drew up for him. As "he was ſtanding on the top of a ſtair-caſe, ſinging "upon his lute a ſong he had made formerly for a "girl with whom he was in love, and coming to "ſome very moving lines, his lute dropt out of his "hands, and he fell down ſtairs and broke his "neck. The Cardinal aſſerted in his epitaph, that "he died as he was ſinging ſome doleful verſes on "the death of Alexander Duke of Florence, whom "his Couſin Laurence had wickedly killed (31)." There is a moſt notorious falſity in theſe laſt words; for that Alexander Duke of Florence was killed forty three years after Politianus's death. The epitaph (32) of the latter, written by Peter Bembo, acquaints us, that he died whilſt he was ſinging doleful verſes on the death of Laurence de Medicis. Monſieur Bullart relates a falſity, when he pretends that Cardinal Bembo aſſerted that Politianus fell down ſtairs as he was ſinging on his lute an elegy which he had compoſed on the death of Laurence de Medicis (33). This Cardinal's verſes, which he tranſcribes, contains nothing concerning that fall. What does a man mean by quoting paſſages, which moſt plainly refute his own aſ-

(26) Varillas, Anecdotes de Florence, p. 196.

(27) He ought to have ſaid at the age of 40.

(28) This is not true: Charles the VIIIth paſſed the Alps before the 24th of September 1494.

(29) Jovius, Elog. cap. 38. p. 89.

(30) Vulgo fertur obiiſſe Politianum fœdi amoris impatientia capite in parietem illiſo. Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. p. 629.

(31) Pierre de St. Romuald, Abrege Chronol. Tom. 3. p. 262, under the year 1509.

(32) It is in Paul Jovius, Elog. cap. 38. p. 90, 91.

(33) Bullart, Academ. Tom. 1. p. 278.

ſertions? Obſerve, that ſome perſons pretend, that the ſtory mentioned by Paulus Jovius is a mere ſlander. Read this noble paſſage of Pierius Valerianus. Angelus Politianus, nullius ignarus eruditionis, & diſciplinæ, cùm in adverſa Medicorum procerum tempora incidiſſet, inclinantibus jam Petri, quem ipſe litteris inſtituerat, rebus, in eam incidit ægritudinem, ut in multis, & variis moleſtiis, cogitationibuſque, conſolationem nullam admittere voluerit, atque ita demum dolore, mœſtitiaque confectus expirarit. Quodque illi longè fuit infelicius conficta in eum turpitudinis fabula maledicentiſſimis obtrectationibus proſciſcus, calumniatuſque eſt, utque ea gens promptiſſima eſt ad inſimulandum in invidiam Petri ipſius ignominioſam aliam mortis voluntariæ cauſam univerſo terrarum orbi magna cum ejus infamia propalarunt (34). i. e. "An- "gelus Politianus, who was well verſed in all kinds "of learning and ſciences, happened to live in thoſe "days when the Princes of Medicis met with misfor- "tunes and the affairs of Prince Peter, whom he him- "ſelf had educated in Polite Literature, began to de- "cline; which vexed him to ſuch a degree, that he "could receive no comfort in the many and great "difficulties under which he laboured, and died at "laſt with grief. But what adds to his misfortune "is that ſhameful ſtory, by which ſome ſlanderous "backbiters have traduced and diſgraced him; for "theſe people being very much inclined to accuſe "others, and out of malice againſt Peter de Medicis, "have publiſhed to the whole world that there was "another cauſe of his voluntary death, very much "to his diſgrace." According to this account Politianus died only with grief, occaſioned by the declining condition of the houſe of Medicis. Philoſophy may indeed find herein a natural defect, but not a moral one.

(34) Pierius Valerianus, de Litterator. infelic. lib. 2. p. 70, 71.

[I] It might be ſaid, that his morals anſwered the homelineſs of his face, rather than the beauty of his genius.] It is probable that his ſtrong affection for the houſe of Medicis expoſed him to the moſt ſhameful ſlanders, whilſt the Florentines being extremely fond of their Republican Liberty, inſulted that baniſhed family, and giving a looſe to their ſatyrical humour, publiſhed a thouſand Paſquils. Let us not aſſert therefore, that Paul Jovius's ſtory is well grounded. But let us boldly affirm that Politianus had contracted an habit of that pride and envy, which learning does but too often produce. We have ſeen (35) that in order to keep his poſt againſt his antagoniſt, he employed indifferently good and bad methods. We ſhall now ſee an account of his haughty and envious temper. Erat diſtortis ſæpe moribus, uti facie nequaquam ingenua & liberali, ab enormi præſertim naſo, ſubluſcoque oculo perabſurda, ingenio autem aſtuto, aculeato, occulteque livido, quum aliena ſemper irrideret, nec ſua, vel non iniquo judicio expungi pateretur (36). i. e. "His face looked often deformed, being neither "handſome nor agreeable, but rather very ugly, "on account of his very big noſe, and his being "almoſt blind of one eye: but he had a crafty "genius, and ſharp wit, and was ſecretly envious "and backbiting, finding always fault with what "others wrote, and unable to ſee his own writ- "ings cenſured, though they deſerved it ever ſo "much." If you chooſe rather to read Monſieur Varillas's Paraphraſe, here it follows. "He had a "very ugly face, for his noſe was extremely big "and long, and he ſquinted with his left eye. "His genius was crafty and ſlily ambitious. He "never diſſembled more artfully, than with "thoſe, who admitted him into their familiarity; "nothing raiſed his indignation higher, than to "hear others commended: he was envious both "of his friends and of his enemies. No man could "write to pleaſe him; he found fault with all "the works of others, though he could not bear "to be cenſured himſelf: one might ſometimes "perceive that he was ſenſible of his own miſ- "takes, and that it was only out of malice he refuſed "to own the truth: for he never confeſſed that he "had been in the wrong (37)."

(35) Above, quotation (16).

(36) Jovius, Elog. cap. 38. p. 89.

(37) Varillas, Anecdot. de Florence, p. 193.

[H] Several

Commentaries on them [H]. Let us not forget to obſerve that he was a Prieſt, and a Canon of Florence (e), and tutor to Laurence de Medicis's children (f). He is charged with ſpeaking very indecently of the Bible [I], for which reaſon ſome propoſe it as a queſtion, whether or not he muſt be reckoned among the Atheiſts [K]. Others vindicate him by denying the fact (g). I can eaſily believe what is reported of his taſte with regard to the Pſalms of David, and the Odes of Pindar [L]. He has alſo been charged (e) See the rem. [I].

(f) Volaterran. lib. 21. p. 777.

(g) See the rem. [I].

[H] Several learned men took the pains to write Commentaries on his Poems.] Nicholas Beroaldus commented (38) Politianus's Sylva, entitled Ruſticus, the countryman. Francis Sanchez, Profeſſor at Salamanca, that Grammarian whom Scioppius has ſo much commended, publiſhed notes in the year 1554 on Politianus's four Sylva's. John Alexander Braſſicanus publiſhed at Nuremberg in the year 1534 a Commentary on the Sylva, entitled Nutricia, the nurſing, or education. Jodocus Badius added notes of his own to Politianus's works, which he publiſhed at Paris in 1519 in folio. He added alſo to them Francis Sylvius's remarks on Politianus's Epiſtles. Theſe Epiſtles were reprinted in 4to by the ſame Badius in the year 1526, with the ſame obſervations. Braſſicanus makes heavy complaints againſt a certain Plagiary. Meminit, ſays he (39), et Politianus in Nutritiis, ubi quidam nugator arrogantiſſimus noſtra ante nos dixit: Expungendus jam & plane radendus è Philologiæ faſtis, quoniam, ut Cicero dixit, maluit improbè tollere quàm humaniter ſumere & agnoſcere. i. e. "Politianus mentions in his Nutricia a certain proud and "impertinent trifler, who publiſhed our own thoughts, "before we publiſhed them ourſelves. He muſt be "entirely blotted out and eraſed from the liſt of Phi"lologers, ſince, as Cicero expreſſes it, he choſe ra"ther to ſteal wickedly, than to borrow civilly, and "to acknowledge the favour." One would think this complaint is made againſt a robber of manuſcripts.

(38) His Commentary was printed at Baſil in the year 1518. See Crenius, Animadv. Philolog. part. 3. p. 55. but inſtead of Beroaldus, read there Beraldus.

(39) Jo. Alexander Braſſicanus, ſchol. in Petronium.

[I] He is charged with ſpeaking very indecently of the Bible.] Lewis Vives is perhaps the firſt who laid that imputation upon him. Angelus Politianus, ſays he (40), totam ſacram lectionem aſpernabatur. i. e. "Politianus ſlighted the reading of the holy Bible." Melanchthon has expreſſed himſelf in ſtronger terms; for he aſſerted, that Politianus having read the Scripture but once, complained that he never employed his time ſo ill. Melanchthon ait ſemel ſolum ſacras literas legiſſe, dixiſſeque nullum ſe tempus pejus collocaſſe (41). Thouſand and thouſand Writers have related this over again (42). Voſſius explodes it as an incredible fact (43), and urges two reaſons againſt it; 1. That Politianus was a Prieſt and a Canon of Florence; 2. That he preached the Lent Sermons during an whole ſeaſon, as appears from theſe words. Cum per hos quadrageſimæ proximos dies enarrandis populo ſacris literis eſſem occupatus, perlegi tamen libros carminum tuorum, quos mihi pro ſingulari humanitate tua mutuoque inter nos amore dedicaveras (44). i. e. "Though this "laſt Lent I was buſy with explaining the holy Scrip"ture to the people, yet I read your Poems, which "out of your ſingular kindneſs, and as a token of "our mutual friendſhip, you have dedicated to me." Some perſons (45) think that Voſſius's ſecond argument is a full refutation of what Melanchthon relates; but others make no account either of his firſt or of his ſecond argument. Hæc ratio nimis tenuis videbitur iis qui norunt quantopere Atheiſmus ſeu Epicureiſmus ſive Libertiniſmus graſſetur inter Sacerdotes non tantum Canonicos & Monachos papales, ſed etiam inter Prælatos, Cardinales, Pontifices (46). i. e. "That argument (the "firſt) will appear but weak to thoſe, who know "how much Atheiſm, or Epicuriſm, or Libertiniſm, "prevails not only among the Prieſts, Canons, and "Monks, but alſo among the Prelates, the Cardinals, "and the Popes themſelves." This is what Voetius objects againſt the firſt argument; here follows what he urges againſt the ſecond. Quaſi vero poſtilliſtæ coram populo iſtic concionantes ut plurimum abſque lectione ſcripturæ, ex inſpectis legendis, poſtillis, homiliariis, dormi ſecurè, theſauris pauperum concionatorum & ſimilibus myrotheciis prædicare non ſoleant. Prædicavit etiam aliquando coram populo Cæſar Atheorum Vaninus, quod tamen illum è numero profanorum non eximit (47). i. e. "As though theſe ſorry preachers who preach before "the people could not do it without reading the "Scripture, ſince they have their legends, notes, col"lectors of homilies, common-places, treaſures of "indigent preachers, and ſuch other helps. Vanini, "that ringleader of the Atheiſts, preached ſome"times; yet this did not hinder him from be"ing reckoned among the Atheiſts." That Author obſerves, that we ought not to imagine Melanchthon and Mornai acted only from a ſpirit of party, when they ſpoke ill of Politianus; for, adds he, Gabriel Putherbeus, a moſt paſſionate Author againſt the Reformed, laid the ſame imputation on Politianus (48). But I muſt tell the Reader that this Putherbeus does not only tranſcribe Lewis Vives word for word, and that Du Pleſſis Mornai quotes no other voucher but the ſame Vives (49). Theſe are not therefore different witneſſes: the whole matter in this reſpect reſts upon the teſtimony of one ſingle Author.

(40) Ludov. Vives, de Veritate Fidei Chriſt. lib. 2. p. 264. edit. Baſil. 1544.

(41) Voſſius, de Poet. Lat. p. 80. He quotes Tom. 3. Declamationum, p. 545.

(42) Monſieur Teiſſier, among others, in his Addit. aux Eloges, Tom. 1. p. 11. but inſtead of quoting Melanchthon, he quotes Vives, who does not ſay what he relates.

(43) Voſſius, de Poet. Lat. p. 80.

(44) Angelus Politianus, epiſt. 10. lib. 4. ad Joannem Gottium Raguſinum, folio m. 106.

(45) Boxhornius, in Monument. illuſt. Viror. apud Pope-Blount, Cenſ. Auth. p. 359. Borremanſ. Var. Lect. p. 126.

(46) Voetius, Diſp. Theolog. Tom. 2. p. 1273.

(47) Idem, ibid. p. 1274.

(48) Putherbeus, de tollendis & expurgandis malis Libris, lib. 1. p. 81.

(49) Mornai, Verité de la Religion, chap. 26. folio m. 356.

Monſieur Crenius has lately preſented the publick with the obſervation, which his great reading has furniſhed him with, concerning this particular relating to Politianus. He does not think Voſſius's arguments are of any weight, could he quote ſome authorities, by which it appears that the preachers of thoſe times did not much dwell on the holy Scripture (50). What he quotes from the Ariſtarchus Philoſophicus (51), a book but little known in this country (52), is very curious. I have read in Manlius's Common-places, which are for the moſt part extracted from Melanchthon's Lectures, that it was the reading of the Breviary, which Politianus ſpoke of with ſo much contempt. Politianus Canonicus Florentinus interrogatus an legiſſet horas Canonicas? dixit ſemel perlegi iſtum librum & nunquam pejus collocavi tempus (53). i. e. "Politianus being aſked whether he read the "Breviary, anſwered, I have read it once, and never "employed my time worſe."

(50) Thom. Crenius, Animadv. Philolog. & Hiſt. part. 3. p. 22. & ſeq. edit. of Leyden 1698.

(51) Written by Henry Ernſtius, Counſellor to the King of Denmark, and printed at Hamburg, 1678, in 8vo.

(52) Admodum raro & inde hic poucis noto. Crenius, Animadv. part. 3. p. 25.

(53) Joan. Manlius, in Locor. Commun. Collectan. Titulo de Satisfact. p. m. 99.

[K] Some propoſe it as a queſtion, whether or not he muſt be reckoned among the Atheiſts.] Voetius aſks whether Politianus muſt not be ſuſpected of a Lucianic Neutrality, or of Epicuriſm (54), and he anſwers that Mornai relates Politianus complained he never ſpent his time worſe than in the reading of the Scripture (55). He adds that he does not know after what manner this Critick and ſome others died, but that conſidering what kind of ſtudy they applied themſelves to, one may conjecture that they were like the Philoſopher Averroes, who being out of conceit with Chriſtianity, choſe rather that his ſoul ſhould be with the Philoſophers. Obſerve, that Mornai does not ſay what Voetius aſcribes to him. Moſt Authors abound with that kind of falſities, which are owing to their truſting to the quotations of others, without giving themſelves the trouble to compare them with the originals. Let us not omit theſe words of the Bernardine Monk Peter de Saint Romuald. Some have wrote that Politianus profeſſed Atheiſm ſecretly with Marſilius Ficinus, and Domitius Calderinus a Prieſt (56).

(54) Voet. Diſp. Theol. Tom. 1. p. 206.

(55) De Politiano refert Pleſſeus in libro de veritate religionis Chriſtianæ, quod diceret nunquam ſe bonas horas ſuas pejus collocaſſe quam in lectione ſcripturæ ſacræ. Idem, ibid.

[L] I can eaſily believe what is reported of his taſte with regard to the Pſalms of David, and the Odes of Pindar.] He did not deny that the Pſalms contained many good and beautiful things, but he pretended that the ſame things were expreſſed in Pindar in a more grand and agreeable ſtyle. It is pretended this was reported by one of his ſcholars. Let us tranſcribe Melanchthon's words. Dionyſius Capnio, qui adoleſcens audivit Angelum Politianum, narrabat eum interrogatum aliquando quid de Pſalmis Davidis ſentiret, et ad quid prodeſſe eorum lectionem judicaret, reſpondiſſe, ſibi vero placere illa antiqua carmina, et continere ea partim honeſta præcepta, partim graviſſimas conciones de providentia, et de ſceleratorum pœnis; partim querelas de infirmitate hominum utiles ad frænandos immoderatos impetus: partim hiſtorias ejus gentis. Sed addidit Politianus hanc collationem charged with Plagiariſm [M]. George Merula among others was one of his Antagoniſts.

(56) Pierre de Saint Romuald, Abrege Chronol. Tom. 3. p. 262. under the year 1509.

tionem, res eaſdem dulcius & ſplendidius narrari in odis Pindaricis, ibi pingi Ixionem in rota clamantem, Diſcite juſtitiam moniti, & non ſpernere divos.

Ibi deſcribi Bellerophontem propter priores victorias factum inſolentiorem, & vehi Pegaſo intra cælum volantem, id eſt, res non neceſſarias ambitioſe moventem, excuti à Pegaſo & dejici in Ciliciam. Ibi celebrari Pelei caſtitatem, qui expetitus ab Acaſti conjuge, & ab ea falſo accuſatus, & objectus Centauris, ſervatur accepto gladio divinitus. Denique multas imagines pulcherrimas, multas hiſtorias, & graviſſima præcepta tradi. Hæc Politiani oratio & ſi ſpecioſa eſt, tamen eſt hominis ignorantis diſcrimen inter genera doctrinarum, inter legem & Evangelium (57). i. e. " Dionyſius Capnio, who in his youth ſtudied " under Angelus Politianus, related, that he being once " aſked what he thought of the Pſalms of David, " and in what reſpect a man might be improved by " reading them, anſwered, that he liked thoſe an- " tient Poems well enough; that they contained good " precepts of morality, weighty diſcourſes concerning " providence, and the puniſhment of the wicked; ſome " complaints of the weakneſs of men, proper to re- " ſtrain the immoderate paſſions; and ſome particu- " lars of the Hiſtory of his own nation. But Poli- " tianus added, that the ſame things are expreſſed " more agreeably, and more nobly in Pindar's Odes; " that there Ixion is repreſented on his wheel crying " aloud,

" Learn Righteouſneſs, and dread th' avenging Deities.

" There Bellerophon is deſcribed, who growing au- " dacious by his former victories, and pretending to " ride to Heaven on Pegaſus, that is to ſay, to dive " haughtily into unneceſſary myſteries, was thrown " from Pegaſus, and whirled down into Cilicia. " There Peleus's chaſtity is deſcribed, who being " courted by Acaſtus's wife, and falſely accuſed by " her, and expoſed to the Centaurs, is preſerved by " receiving a ſword from the God. Laſtly, there we " meet with many beautiful images, many hiſtories, " and moſt uſeful precepts. That diſcourſe of Poli- " tianus is indeed plauſible enough, but yet it ſhews " that he did not know how to diſtinguiſh the ſeveral " kinds of doctrines, and the law from the goſpel." Manlius, in the book which I have already quoted, does not aſcribe this judgment to Politianus, but to Lazarus Bonamicus. Lazarus Bonamicus vir doctus cum eſſet interrogatus quomodo ei placeret Pſalterium, reſpondit placere ſibi, recitari enim ibi egregias ſententias de providentia: ſed tamen nihilo melius eſſe quam Pindari poëma (58), i. e. " Lazarus Bonamicus, a learned man, " being aſked how he liked the pſalms, anſwered, " that he liked them well, becauſe they contain ma- " ny noble ſentences concerning Providence; but yet " that they were not better than Pindar's poems." We do not find in that paſſage, that Pindar is ſet above David; they are both ſuppoſed to be equal. And yet the Commentator on Gaffarel aſſerts, on the credit of a German Divine, that Bonamicus eſteemed Pindar's poems more than the pſalms of David. Ejuſdem blaſphemiæ veneno correptus fuit Lazarus Bon-Amicus Italus, qui vociferabat ſe Odas Pindaricas præferre Hymnis Davidicis. Vid. beatus Dn. Selneccerus Explicat. in 1 Cor. viii. p. 496 (59). He had obſerved juſt before, that Politianus had uttered the ſame blaſphemy. This ſhews that Melanchthon, or thoſe who tranſcribed from him, varied in their accounts, as it is almoſt always the caſe, when aſſertions are grounded only on hear-ſays. Peucer has inſerted into a letter (60), what I have quoted above from Melanchthon.

[M] He has alſo been charged with Plagiariſm.] All the world has heard it reported, that he appropriated to himſelf the Latin tranſlation of Herodian made by Tiphernas, and he only altered here and there a paſſage in it. Leo X. uſed to ſay, that this calumny was ſpread by thoſe who envied Politianus's reputation. Quamquam æmuli eam tranſlationem, uti nos à Leone Pontifice accepimus, Gregorii Tiphernatis fuiſſe dicerent quod paſſim inducto fuco, & falſis nevorum coloribus interlita alieni ſtyli habitum mentiretur (61). This is all that Paul Jovius tells us. I would be very glad if any perſon could let me know on what authorities the following account is grounded. " He (Politianus) " publiſhed a tranſlation of Herodian, which had " not all the ſucceſs he expected: for though it was " generally admired, yet there was a report ſpread, " that Politianus had found it among the papers of " the celebrated Gregory of Citta di Caſtello, which " he had bought, and that report was grounded on " ſuch ſuſpicions, as were but indifferently anſwer- " ed. Pope Leo X. who ſtudied then under Politi- " anus, and heard all that was urged for and againſt " him at his father's table, being deſired, twenty " years after, by the Academicians of Rome, to tell " them his opinion of that matter, anſwered doubt- " fully, and confeſſed, that the ſtyle of that tranſla- " tion was by no means like that of Politianus's o- " ther works, and ſavoured much more of the flou- " riſhes and artifices, which Gregory of Citta di Ca- " ſtello was wont to uſe in his writings. However " (as though he feared to have ſaid too much) he " added, that this Gregory wrote nothing that came " up to the tranſlation of Herodian (62)." I am very much inclined to believe, that the Author of this account had no other Voucher but Paul Jovius, whoſe words he has enlarged upon, and paraphraſed according to his own fancy, and as though he had been writing Romances. However it be, he has not underſtood them; for the flouriſhes and artifices which were obſerved in the tranſlation, were not imputed to Tiphernas, but to Politianus. If Leo X. had ſpoke upon this matter as Monſieur Varillas pretends, Paul Jovius would not have exploded that change as unworthy to be credited (63). Obſerve, that the beſt Criticks exploded it; they found the ſame genius and the ſame character throughout the whole tranſlation of Herodian. Tiphernas was not capable to perform ſuch a maſter-piece (64). It had coſt Politianus leſs trouble to tranſlate the whole work, than to give to another's tranſlation the air and turn, which is obſervable in this.

It is not ſo eaſy to clear him with regard to other charges of Plagiariſm. For what anſwer could one make to theſe words of Budæus? Plutarchus in eo libro, quem de Homero compoſuit; qui liber nondum Latinus ex profeſſo factus eſt, licet Politianus, vir ille quidem excellentis doctrinæ, ſed animi non ſatis ingenui, ex eo libro rerum ſummas ad verbum tranſcribens, quaſique flores præcerpens, non erubuit id opus pro ſuo edere, in quo nullam præterquam tranſcribendi ac vertendi operam navaverat (65), i. e. " Plutarch, in that book which he wrote " concerning Homer, and which has not yet been " profeſſedly tranſlated into Latin, though Politianus, " a man of eminent learning indeed, but not ſo can- " did and honeſt as could be wiſhed, tranſcribing the " moſt remarkable things word for word from that " book, as though he had been gathering flowers " from it, was not aſhamed to publiſh it as a work " of his own, though all the ſhare he had in it, con- " ſiſted only in tranſlating and tranſcribing it." Budæus had related a ſtory which has been printed, and which contains a notorious piece of knavery. The ſtory is as follows. Politianus diſplayed in a pompous manner, before his audience, ſeveral things which he had extracted from Herodotus, as though they were the fruits of his own learning. John Laſcaris happened to be one of his Hearers, and took him aſide to reprove him for his boldneſs. I could never have thought, anſwered Politianus, that a Greek, like you, had been ignorant of the artifice by which the eſteem of the publick is acquired. There were but three or four of you among my whole audience, who had read Herodotus; and what is that number, if compared with that crowd of ſcholars, who admire me, and exalt me to the ſkies? I hope you will not be ſo ill-natured as to attempt to ruin my reputation with them; but if you attempt it, I am perſuaded, you will not meet with great ſucceſs. Let us relate this in the very terms of the original. Non poſſum mihi temperare, quin tibi nunc referam, quod Budæus noſter de Angelo Politiano quondam nobis domi ſuæ narrare ſolebat, idque ſe ex Jano Laſcare, qui Politiani fuerat æqualis, crebrò audiviſſe confirmabat. Cùm enim Politianus

(57) Melanchth. in Epiſtola ad Adamum Cratonem, præfixa Exegeſi Nicolai Aſclepii Barbati de antiquo & profundo conſilio Dei.

(58) Manlius, in Locorum Commun. Collectan. Titulo de vet. & nov. Teſtamento, p. 81.

(59) Gregorius Michael, Præpoſitus Regius Flensburgenſis, Notis in Jacobi Gaffarelli Curioſitates, p. 110.

(60) Peucer, Epiſt. ad Chriſtoph. Carlowitz. See Saldenus de Libris, p. 434.

(61) Paulus Jovius. Elog. cap. 38. p. 88.

(62) Varillas, Anecdotes de Florence, p. 195.

(63) Paulus Jovius, Elog. cap. 117. p. 259.

(64) Henry Stephens has cenſured it very much. Conſult Crenius, Animadv. Philolog. & Hiſt. part. 3. p. 12 & ſeq.

(65) Budæus, Annotation. in Pandectas, folio m. 151 verſo.

Antagoniſts [N]. Some aſſert that he was extremely abuſed by the Poet Marullus [O]. They have juſtly given him a place in the Hiſtory of the illuſtrious Children; but Monſieur Politianus Florentiæ Interpretationem Homericæ Iliados in magna celebritate aggrederetur; non ſine ingenti oſtentatione quæ de Homeri Poëmate perſcripta ſunt ab Herodoto, auditoribus ſuis è ſuggeſto recitabat, quo tempore Herodoti liber Græcè ſcriptus, à nullo adhuc converſus in linguam Latinam, nec Typographorum formis excuſus erat. Itaque Laſcaris, qui tum honoris causâ auditorum numerum augebat, cum paucis quibuſdam aliis Græcè doctis hominibus, qui non ignorarent unde omnia, quæ pro ſuis recitaverat, hauſiſſet. Is igitur paulo poſt ad hominem converſus, eumque ſeducens, Dic mihi quæſo, inquit, Politiane, quo ore Herodoti Opus inſigne, quod ante tot ſæcula conſcriptum eſt, in tanto cœtu, ut tuum recitaſti? Cui mox ſubridens Politianus, Nunquam, inquit, putaſſem, Jane, hominem Græcum adeò ejus artificii rudem & ignarum eſſe, quo apud multitudinem exiſtimatio & fama comparari ſolet. Quaſi vero, inquit, non ſatis intelligam tres aut ſummum quatuor fortaſſis vos hîc adeſſe, quibus Herodoti libros aliquando inſpicere contigerit. Sed quænam hîc ſit turba nobis applaudentium & in cœlum laudibus ferentium vides, apud quos ſi exiſtimationem noſtram (quod minimè ſpero) vel tantillum lædere volueritis; Oratio profectò veſtra non multum fidei ponderiſque habitura eſt (66). Let us not omit what relates to his Miſcellanies. He ſhewed the manuſcript of them to his friends, by which means that work was very much talked of even before it was printed: but ſome perſons ſpread a bad ſtory abroad, namely, that Politianus had enriched his work with all that he could plunder from a certain compilation, intitled, Copiæ Cornu (the Horn of Plenty), and compoſed by Nicholas Perot; it was aſſerted, that the orignal was lent to him by the Duke of Urbino, who imagined it would be acceptable to Laurence de Medicis. Politianus hearing of all this, put off the printing of his work; in the mean time Nicholas Perot's book was publiſhed, which made all the ſlanders vaniſh away; for they who compared it with Politianus's Miſcellanies, could not find that the latter had plundered the former. Politianus gives a full account of all this towards the end of his book: here follow only ſome of his words. Fit concurſus, & in manibus (Copiæ Cornu) Effunditur, excutitur; quid multa? Calumnia me liberat. Vidiſſes continuò nonnullorum vultus lugubre quiddam tacentes —— & erubeſcentes.——Tantum conſtiterit in præſentiarum, non idem ſpectâſſe me, quod ejus voluminis autorem, nec par utrique deſtinatum præſtitumque faſtigium. Quòd ſi locos eoſdem pro re natâ forte uterque tractavimus, (id autem incidere alicubi fuit neceſſe,) craſſior tamen inter nos, quàm inter Pyramum Thyſbenque paries (67), i. e. "Men flock together: the Cornu- "copiæ is in their hands, they pour it out, they ex- "amine it, in a word, it clears me from the ſcanda- "lous imputation. You would have ſeen the faces "of ſome betraying a ſecret ſorrow, ... and bluſh- "ing with ſhame. . . . . Let it be ſufficient to ob- "ſerve at preſent, that I had not the ſame deſign "with the Author of that work, and that the ſame "honour was not deſigned for us both, nor gained by "us both. And if we happen to handle the ſame "ſubjects (as it muſt have happened ſometimes) there "is yet a thicker wall between us, than there was "between Pyramus and Thyſbe." Notwithſtanding this, Hereſbachius has uſed Politianus as a notorious Plagiary (68). Obſerve, that Politianus himſelf complained, that he was expoſed to the plunder of Plagiaries (69): he threatens to proſecute them, in order to ſtrip them of their plunder.

(66) Franciſcus Duarenus, Operum, p. 1478. edit. 1584. apud Colomeſium, in Opuſcul. cap. 31. p. m. 66. N. B. The ſubſtance of this paſſage is contained in the words before it.

(67) Politian. in fine Miſcellan. apud Thomaſium, de Plagio Literario, p. 235.

(68) Hereſbachius, in Præfat. librorum ſuorum de re ruſtica furaciſſimum vocat Politianum, atque in Panepiſtemone aliorum non intellecta congeſſiſſe. Thomaſius, ibid. p. 235, 236.

(69) Idem, Politianus, ibid. apud eumdem, p. 234.

[N] George Merula, among others, was one of his antagoniſts.] He was a Profeſſor in the College of Milan, "and did not ſpare even Politianus, though "Politianus had gained ſuch a reputation as raiſed "him above his equals. He ſhewed him, that na- "ture had beſtowed upon him all the qualities a "man can want to become learned, yet ſhe could not "make him ſuch: he pointed out to him above "thirty conſiderable blunders, which dropt from his "pen, and gave him notice charitably, (as he ſaid) "that a man, who pretended to be the firſt in the "Republick of Letters, muſt have read more, and "ſtudied more, than all the reſt together (70). . . . . "Politianus was the perſon who got moſt by his "(Merula's) death. He had publiſhed the firſt Cen- "tury of his Miſcellanies § (α), and Merula taking "offence at the great pride, which appeared in the "word Century, threatened Politianus with whole "regiments of authorities and paſſages, which he "would ſend out againſt him, to prove the contrary "of whatever he aſſerted: but he had time only to "make the rough draught of his intended work (71)." We meet in Paulus Jovius with ſome hints relating only to the latter part of this account (72): we muſt examine where the foundation of the reſt is to be found. Obſerve, that Politianus wrote very ſharp letters to Merula (73), and ſeemed to wiſh that Lewis Sforza would give that adverſary leave to publiſh his Criticiſm.

(70) Varillas, Anecdote ſde Florence, p. 192.

(71) Ibidem. p. 193.

(72) Politiano obiter vehementi metu liberato, cum in miſcellaneam ejus centuriam cohortes & alas qua impetu obruerent emiſſurus eſſe diceretur. Jovius, Elog. cap. 37. p. 87.

(73) See the 11th book of Politianus's Letters.

§ (α) A letter of Peter Crinitus to Alexander Sartius, inſerted in p. 384 of the 1ſt vol. of Politianus's works, printed by Gryphius, in the year 1550, contains ſome paſſages of the 2d part of Politianus's Miſcellanies, written, ſays Crinitus, at the requeſt and for the ſake of Sartius; but ſtoln from the Author by a perſon, who thus was the cauſe why the publick had till that time been deprived of ſo uſeful a work. That ſecond part contained, among other things, twenty chapters, the titles of which are ſet down in the ſame letter. And indeed the title of the Baſil edition 1522, is Centuria una (one Century), and not like the other editions Centuria 1, which is equivocal, and leads the Reader to think that the ſecond Century of theſe Miſcellanies is extant. The ſecond letter to the ſame Peter Crinitus, contains the titles of eight other chapters of that ſame ſecond Century, which it is ſaid there has been ſeen in the manuſcript by ſeveral of the Author's friends. Let us obſerve, that that ſecond letter ends with an epigram, in which the Author makes Politianus ſpeak in ſuch terms, as prove moſt evidently that he died in the year 1494. Here follow the five laſt lines of that epigram.

Is ille ego Angelus Politianus ſum,
Fovit benigno me ſinu Flora, & illic
In fata ceſſi, Partheneopeos reges
Cum Gallica arma irruerent mirabunda.
Tu, vale, & hoc ſis meriti memor noſtri.

i. e. "I am that ſame Angelus Politianus, whom "kind Flora cheriſhed in her boſom: I died when "the dreadful army of France invaded the Kingdom "of Naples. Farewell, and remember this our kind- "neſs to you." Crit. Rem.

[O] He was . . . . . abuſed by the Poet Marullus.] This is what the Bernardine Saint Romuald relates. Marullus, ſays he (74), has uſed him very ill under the name of Mabilius. This may ſignify two things, either that Marullus took the name of Mabilius in the lines he wrote againſt him, or that he called Politianus thus. I have again looked over his poems, but I have met with none under that name. Thoſe of Politianus, do not incline me to think that the Monk is in the right. I find among them moſt cutting epigrams in Mabilium Novatum Inſubrem, againſt Mabilius Novatus an Italian; but they contain nothing that hints they were levelled at Marullus. And how could he be hinted at there under the name of Inſuber, ſince he was born at Conſtantinople? Though I have not read this Mabilius's poems, yet I think that Politianus was very much abuſed in them. What makes me judge thus is, that Politianus gives him the moſt horrid language. Here follow ſome inſtances of it.

(74) Saint Romuald, Abrege Chronol. Tom. 3. p. 262. under the year 1509.

Si jam carmina noſtra te, Mabili,
Urgent ad laqueum miſer crucemque,
Ne quæſo propera mori, tuum ne
Fraudes carnificem ſuo lucello:
Namque eſt percupidus tui, ac libenter
Is tantum tibi dempſerit laboris.
Quid? noſtin hominem? negas: at idem eſt
Aurem qui ſecuit tibi ſiniſtram (75).

(75) Politianus, in Libro Epigrammatum.

i. e. "If my verſes, Mabilius, nettle thee to the "quick, and force thee to look for a rope to hang

(b) See his Origines Italiennes, under the word Polizziano, and the 14th chapter of his Anti-Baillet.

(i) See the end of the 8th book, p. m. 349.

Monſieur Varillas, who was the occaſion of it, has not been accurate in his chronological account [P]. I have ſome obſervations to make againſt Moreri [Q]. Let us obſerve, that they who pretend that Politianus's family-name was Baſſo, or Baſſus, are miſtaken. Monſieur Menage (b), grounded on the authority of a Letter of Monſieur Magliabechi, proves that his name was Cino and not Baſſo. He is called Meſſer Agnolo da Montepulciano in Machiavel's Hiſtory of Florence (i), and we read in an oration of Majoragius that he changed his name of Angelus de Monte Pulciano into that of Angelus Politianus,

" thy ſelf, pray, do not be ſo much in haſte to die,
" leſt thou ſhould'ſt rob the hangman of his wages:
" for he longs to have thee in his hands, and is " willing to ſave thee ſo much trouble. What?
" do'ſt not thou know the man? Thou ſay'ſt no.
" Why 'tis the ſame who cut thy left ear off."

Mabilius had bantered Politianus about his neck that was awry; here follows what Politianus replied.

Sed quid te cruciat reflexa colla
Si interdum gero? num parum videtur
Si pronos ſtatuis tuos cinœdos
Si pronum ſtatuent miſer Mabili
Mox te carnificis manus, velut nunc
Pronum te ſtatuunt Mutoniati.

i. e. " Why ſhould you be vexed at my neck's be" ing ſometimes awry? If you think it a ſmall mat" ter to lay down your .... the hangman's hands
" will ſoon lay you down, &c."

The following lines abound ſtill more with opprobrious language.

Hæres relictus à parente ſordido
Ille impudicus, temulentus aleo,
Spurcus, lutoſus, pedecoſus, hiſpidus,
Pannoſus, unctus, horridus, caprimulgus,
Edax, ineptus, inſolens Mabilius
Uno expatravit patrimonium die,
Gula helluante, cunnilingis oſculis,
Vorace culo, & exfututa mentula.

You ſee in theſe laſt lines, a wicked and odious imitation of Catullus and Martial's licentiouſneſs; men, who abuſed too much a maxim of the Stoicks relating to the uſe of words (76), and

Apud quos
Nomen adeſt rebus, nominibuſque pudor.

Politianus indulged himſelf too much in that bad imitation in ſome other of his poems, and eſpecially in his invective againſt an old woman who had loſt all the ſigns of youth, except laſciviouſneſs (77). That poem contains almoſt all the thought of two Odes of Horace (78), but expreſſed more at length. The laſt lines abound with obſcenity, which is ſo much the more ſhocking, that immediately after we meet with two hymns to the bleſſed Virgin, which are full of devotion. This bad order muſt not be imputed to the Poet; it is owing to thoſe who publiſhed his works. But to return to Mabilius, I ſhall obſerve, that we meet with his epitaph among Politianus's poems.

Flecte viator iter, fetet nam putre Mabili
Hac fovea corpus conditur atque animus.

i. e. " Turn away travellers, for Mabilius ſtinks al-
" ready: in this hole both his body and his ſoul lye."

If this be not a good argument againſt Peter de Saint Romuald, it ſeems however to be a proof that he was miſtaken: for Marullus lived ſome years after Politianus's death. But let us not lay any ſtreſs on that method of arguing; one can give ſuch opprobrious language in an epitaph, and one meets with ſuch a large field that way, that ſome Poets have falſely ſuppoſed the death of an adverſary, in order to expatiate on that common topic. I muſt not conceal from the Reader, that a very able man, who wrote notes on Sannazarius's (79) poems, believes that Marullus and the Mabilius of Politianus are one and the ſame man.

[P] Mr. Varillas .... has not been accurate in his chronological account.] Politianus " had ſuch a won" derful genius, that the world never ſaw his fellow
" ſince Ovid. He was hardly twelve years old when " he wrote ſuch beautiful poems, that one would " have thought they were written in the age of A" lexander, or of Auguſtus. And when he took it into " his head to impoſe upon the learned, and to make his " own productions paſs for ſome fragments of Ana-
" creon or of Catullus, which he had found by chance
" in ſome old Manuſcripts of the Medicean library,
" even the beſt Judges could not diſcover the cheat
" (80)." Monſieur Baillet gives a fuller account of the ſame particular in his hiſtory of celebrated children (81), among whom he has juſtly given our Politianus a place; for though what Monſieur Varillas relates were not true, yet we know from other Authors, that Politianus was very young when he wrote his Greek poems, which, in the opinion of the Criticks, are better than his Latin poems, which he compoſed much later (82). But here follows a chronological error. It was propoſed to Virginia des Urſins, " to marry her daughter, who was but twelve " years old, to Laurence de Medicis, Peter's eldeſt
" ſon, who was not yet fifteen.... The nuptials were " not celebrated with much pomp, becauſe the ſitu-
" ation of affairs was not proper for it. However,
" there were many Epithalamiums made, among " which that which Angelus Politianus wrote, who " being but of the Bridegroom's age, wrote verſes
" worthy of Auguſtus's age, was the moſt liked. Some " days after, the report of Coliogne's arrival, forced
" young Laurence from his wife's arms, obliging
" him to get on horſe-back to learn the military
" art under his father-in-law (83)." Laurence was born in 1448: ſo that Politianus was four years older than him. Machiavel, who is a little more to be credited than Varillas, aſſerts that the nuptials of Laurence de Medicis with Clarence des Urſins were celebrated with very great pomp and magnificence after the peace (84), that is to ſay, when the war which Coliogne waged againſt the Florentines was quite finiſhed. He does not ſet down the year when that marriage was celebrated, which is a very great fault in an Hiſtorian; but we may infer from his account, that it was in the year 1471; Laurence was therefore twenty-three years old at that time. Judge then how much pains Monſieur Varillas took to acquaint himſelf with chronology. He has placed all the moſt conſiderable events of that war of Coliogne after the death of Peter de Medicis, Laurence's father (85). Did he not read in Paulus Jovius, that the peace was made before Peter de Medicis died (86).

[Q] I have ſome obſervations to make againſt Moreri.] 1. There is no accuracy in theſe words. Laurence de Medicis kept Angelus Politianus at Florence, who was already a Prieſt. This is hinting to us, that this was the firſt favour, which Politianus received from the houſe of Medicis. Now this is falſe, for we have ſeen above (87), that he ſtudied at the expence of Coſmus, Laurence's grand-father. 2. He ſhould not have ſaid that Laurence appointed him Tutor to Coſmus de Medicis's children; he appointed him Tutor to his own children (88). It would be a curious thing to ſee a man put his grand-father's children under the care of a Tutor. 3. John de Medicis, who was afterwards Pope Leo X. was the ſon of this Laurence, and not of Coſmus. 4. To ſay that Politianus wrote thoſe beautiful Greek and Latin Epiſtles, of which the learned ſpeak with ſo much commendation, ſuppoſes that the publick has ſeen a certain number of Greek Epiſtles written by that Author. Now I am very much miſtaken, if you can meet with above one in the collection of his letters. Moreri was probably miſled by the following paſſage from Volaterranus, which he had read in Voſſius (89): Mihi ſolebat Epiſtolas tum Græcas tum Latinas ſcribere, ſed ſermone

(76) Ὁ σοφὸς συνθυρήματων ἔσω. Sapiens ſine circuitu omnia efferat.

(77) It begins thus. Huc huc iambi arripite mi jam mordicus
Anum hanc furenti Percitam libidine
Tentiginoſam, catulientem ſpurcidam.

(78) The 8th of the Epods, in anum libidinoſam, and the 13th of the ſame book, ad mulierem fœdam & anum.

(79) See the notes on Sannazar, p. 229. edit. of Amſterdam, 1689.

(80) Varillas, Anecdotes de Florence, p. 194.

(81) Baillet, Enfans celebres, p. 89, 90.

(82) Gærcis vero quæ puerum ſe conſcripſiſſe dicit, ætatem minus prudenter appoſuit ſuam. Tam enim bona ſunt ut ne virum quidem Latina æque bene ſcripſiſſe putem. Jul. Cæſar Scaliger, Poet. lib. 6. p. m. 740.

(83) Varillas, Anecdotes de Florence, p. 40.

(84) Macchiavel, Hiſt. Florentine, lib. 7. p. m. 289.

(85) See his 2d book of the Anecdotes de Florence.

(86) Jovius, in Vita Leonis X. lib. 1. p. 14.

(87) In the rem. [B].

(88) See the 2d Letter of the 4th book of Politianus, folio m. 94.

(89) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. p. 628.

(k) The 66th and 67th of the 1ſt book.

Politianus. Obſerve that Sannazarius in two ſatyrical Epigrams (k) which he wrote againſt him, calls him Pulicianus, alluding to the word Pulex, a Flea.

mone vernaculo plures quod frequenter faciebat occupatus, ne naſus aliquis ſtylo offenſus impræmeditato, præjudicatæ jam de eo opinioni officeret (90). i. e. "He uſed to "write Greek and Latin letters to me, but more in "his mother-tongue, chiefly when he was buſy, leſt "ſome nice Critics being offended at his unelaborate "ſtyle, might prejudice the good opinion, which "has already been conceived of him." Whereupon Moreri, without conſidering the matter, took it into his head that Politianus wrote Greek letters, which have been publiſhed. Take notice by the by of Politianus's precaution. He knew that he was already famous for the politeneſs of his ſtyle, and that, to keep up his reputation, he ought to write nothing but what was elaborate. But as his great occupations did not ſuffer him to ſpend much time in writing a letter, he choſe to write often in Italian; for we muſt think that he uſed his other friends as he did Volaterranus. Such was the great ſlavery, which they put themſelves under, who gain the reputation of writing a letter in a polite ſtyle. They dare no longer to write familiarly and careleſsly to their friends. They are ſenſible that their letters will be ſhewed, and if they be not well written they will be contemned. Balzac did often groan under that heavy yoke; and I have read that a man of wit envied the happineſs of his Attorney, becauſe he could with impunity begin with, I have received yours, and write you theſe lines (91). The Manutius's and the Latiniſts of their ſtrength found themſelves reduced to ſuch a ſad neceſſity, that one ſingle letter coſt them whole months (92). I do not wonder therefore at what Volaterranus tells us in the paſſage quoted above. Obſerve that this ſlavery extended ſometimes even to diſcourſes held in converſation (93). But let us return to Moreri. 5. One cannot ſay that Politianus had a ſhare in the misfortunes of the Medicis, which was felt by all the men of letters who were at Florence: for he died whilſt Peter de Medicis was ſtill Sovereign in his native country. It is thought indeed that he grieved when he foreſaw that that Lord would not be able to keep his ground conſidering the turn which the publick affairs were like to take: however it be, Paulus Jovius thinks him happy, becauſe he died before the downfal of that family (94). 6. It has not been aſſerted that he made away with himſelf, becauſe he could not win the heart of a certain Lady. They impute to him a more criminal paſſion, as I have related above (95). Do not mind the paſſage quoted from Saint Romuald. 7. Paulus Jovius cannot be ſaid to give credit to thoſe ſtories; he only relates them, without aſſerting the truth of them, and makes uſe of the word ferunt, it is reported: he is only to blame for not adding that the report was not certain; for he knew no doubt that men's opinions were divided in that reſpect; and that is enough to oblige an Hiſtorian not to ſay, there was ſuch a ſlander ſpread abroad, without adding, but ſome maintain it was a mere calumny. 8. Ludovicus Vives has not ſaid what Moreri aſcribes to him (96).

(90) Volaterr. lib. 21. p. 777.

(91) Preface des Oeuvres de Sarraſin, p. 46.

(92) See Scioppius, de Stilo Hiſt. p. m. 61, 62.

(93) You will find in the Menagiana, p. 164 of the 1ſt Dutch edit. the following paſſage concerning a converſation between ſome learned men. Every one endeavoured . . . to ſpeak well: for, contrary to what is practiſed at preſent, men took care to ſpeak correctly, and not to make blunders in their diſcourſes held in aſſemblies. At laſt, every one being retired, I remained alone with Balzac, who taking me by the hand, ſaid, now we are alone, let us talk freely, and not fear to make Soleciſms.

(94) Eo præpropero vitæ exitu profecto felix fuit quod imminentem convulſæ Medicæ domus ruinam effugerit. Jovius, p. 89.
(95) In the remark [F]. (96) It is the ſame thing which Voetius aſcribes to Mornai, in the remark [K].

POLITIANUS (JOHN ANGELUS), born in the ſame city with the preceding, taught Logic at Poitiers towards the beginning of the 17th Century. Monſieur Daillé was one of his ſcholars (a). He wrote two books of controverſy againſt his countryman Cardinal Bellarmine [A]. This makes me think that he renounced Popery, and turned Proteſtant.

(a) See la Vie de Mr. Daillé, p. 4.

[A] He wrote two books of controverſy againſt his countryman Cardinal Bellarmine.] The firſt is entitled Philoſophia Euchariſtica de potentia & voluntate Dei ex tertio libro Bellarmini de Euchariſtia, expoſita & refutata. i. e. "An Expoſition and Refutation of the "Euchariſtical Philoſophy concerning the Power and "Will of God, extracted from the third Book of "Bellarmine concerning the Lord's Supper." At Amberg 1604 in 4to. The other is entitled, Philoſophiæ ſeu potius Sophiſticæ Euchariſticæ Bellarmini pars altera refutata. i. e. "A Refutation of the ſecond "Part of Bellarmine's Euchariſtical Philoſophy or "rather Sophiſtry." At Amberg 1606, in 4to.

POLITIANUS (ANTHONY LAURENTINUS), was Profeſſor of Logic in the Univerſity of Piſa (a). He was at Padua in the year 1604, as appears from the Dedication of the ſecond edition of his Dialogue De Riſu (b), of Laughter, to which he aded a Treatiſe De Cœlis eorumque motibus, of the Heavens, and their motions, and his book De Natura Logicæ, of the Nature of Logic. His mother was deſcended from the family of St. Agnes (c). She is a Saint, for whom the inhabitants of Monte Pulciano have a very great devotion (d).

(a) See the dedication of his dialogue de Riſu.

(b) The 1ſt is of Franckfort; 1ſt uſe that of Marpurg, 1606, in 8vo.

(c) Ant. Laurent. Politianus, de Riſu, p. m. 134.

(d) Leand. Albertus, Deſcript. Italiæ, p. 89.

POLONUS (MARTIN), Penitentiary to Pope Nicholas III. and a Dominican Frier, flouriſhed in the 13th Century. Some ſay he was Archbiſhop of Coſenza, others ſay of Benevento; but they cannot give good proofs of their aſſertion. However, it is certain that he was promoted to the Archbiſhoprick of Gneſna, June the 22d 1278 (a), by Pope Nicholas III. and that he was going to take poſſeſſion of it when he died at Bologna the ſame year or the next. He was buried in the Convent of his Order in the ſame city (b). He is the Author of a Chronicle of the Popes and the Emperors, which extends from Jeſus Chriſt, and from Auguſtus, to Pope John XXI. who died in the year 1277 [A]. We meet there with the Hiſtory of Pope Joan, and yet ſome learned

(a) Decimo Kalendas Julii ſay Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. p. 486, and F. Labbe, de Script. Eccleſ. Tom. 2. p. 62. But Spondanus, ad ann. 1278, n. 18. uſes the phraſe, Decimo Kalend. Junii, the 23d of May.

(b) See F. Labbe, de Script. Eccleſ. Tom. 2. p. 62; and Starovolſ. in Elogiis centum Polonorum, p. 30.

[A] He is the Author of a Chronicle . . . . . which extends from Jeſus Chriſt . . . . . to Pope John XXI. who died in the year 1277.] They who imagined that it extended to the year 1320, did not know that he died, when Nicholas IV. was Pope in the year 1278 or 1279. Volaterranus did not know it neither; for he made him flouriſh under Pope John XXII. (1). He was no doubt miſled by a copy containing an Appendix, in which the Hiſtory is carried on to the year 1320. That Appendix, which was in the manuſcript of the Abbey of Fuld, was printed with Martin Polonus's Chronicle in the Baſil edition 1559. Suffridus Petri, in the edition of Antwerp 1574, aſcribed it erroneouſly to our Martin, and it is probably by a miſtake learned men do not think that paſſage was wrote by Polonus [B]. Others imagine he take of the ſame kind that Cocceius aſſerted our Martin was ſtill living in the year 1320 (2). There are ſome manuſcripts, in which this Chronicle extends only to Clement IV. whoſe Pontificate began in the year 1265, and ended in the year 1271. The Cologne edition was printed from one of theſe manuſcripts (3). But yet let us not imagine that the continuation to the year 1277 came from another hand than Martinus Polonus; for he himſelf obſerves in his Preface, that he carried on his Chronicle to Pope John XXI. incluſively. Ego Frater Martinus Polonus Papæ Pœnitentiarius & Capellanus ex diverſis Chronicis & geſtis ſummorum Pontificum & Imperatorum præſens opuſculum uſque ad Joannem XXI. Papam deduxi incluſivè. i. e. "I Frier Martin of Poland, Penitentiary and "Chaplain to the Pope, have drawn up this work "from ſeveral Chronicles and Hiſtories of the Popes "and Emperors, and have continued it to Pope John "XXI. incluſively." Let us ſay rather, that he gave more than one edition of his work, and that the firſt extended only to Pope Clement IV. and that he made additions to it afterwards, which continued the Chronicle to Pope John XXI. and that the manuſcripts which end with Clement IV. were tranſcribed from the firſt edition. There is in the library of Vienna a manuſcript, in which we meet with theſe words, Uſque ad Gregorium Papam X. deduxi incluſivè. i. e. "I have carried on this work to Pope Gregory "X. incluſively:" whereupon Lambecius makes this remark: Quod autem Chronicon Martinianum hic dicitur pertingere ad Papam Gregorium X. incluſive, non eſt intelligendum de anno obitus ejus, qui fuit annus Chriſti 1276, ſed de initio Pontificatus, ſive anno Chriſti 1271, quo is poſt Papam Clementem IV. electus eſt. Hoc enim manifeſtè apparet ex ipſo illo codice, utpote de Gregorio X. nihil aliud antiqua manu ſcriptum cernetur, quàm hoc, Gregorius natus Lombardus de civitate Placentia ſedit. . . . . Quæ autem deinceps ſequuntur, multò recentiori manu adjecta ſunt (4). i. e. "What is obſerv-"ed here that the Hiſtory is continued to Pope Gre-"gory X. incluſively, muſt not be underſtood of "the year of his death, which was A. D. 1276, but "of the beginning of his reign, or the year of "Chriſt 1271, when he was choſen Pope after Cle-"ment IV. This appears plainly from the manu-"ſcript itſelf, where nothing is written of Pope Gre-"gory X. in an old hand but this, Gregory born in "Lombardy, of the city of Placenza ſat . . . . . What "follows has been added by a much more modern "hand."

(1) See his words in the rem. [E].

This muſt make us underſtand, 1. That the edition, which I call the firſt, extended to the Pontificate of Pope Clement IV. and not to the end of it in the year 1271 (5), as Voſſius imagined; 2. That there was a ſecond edition which extended to the beginning of the Pontificate of Gregory X. and another to Pope John XXI. But here ariſes a difficulty: there is a manuſcript in the library of Vienna, which contains theſe words, Uſque ad Quartum Honorium Papam deduxi incluſivè (6). i. e. "I have continued it to Pope Ho-"norius IV. incluſively." Honorius IV. was elected in the year 1285, and died in the year 1287. How can this be made to agree with the opinion of thoſe who place Martin Polonus's death under the year 1278, or 1279? Might not this have afforded Blondel an argument to vindicate himſelf againſt the perſon (7), who cenſured him for making his Martinus live till about the year 1290 (8). The learned Conringius aſſerts, that it is certain Martin Polonus continued his chronicle to the year 1285 (9).

The Abbot Ughelli (10), acknowledging on the one hand that Martin Polonus, Archbiſhop of Gneſna, was a Dominican, denies that he wrote the Chronicle, and aſcribes it to another Martin, who was a Ciſtercian Monk, Archbiſhop of Coſenza, and Penitentiary to Innocent X. but his opinion cannot be defended, ſince ſeveral manuſcripts of that Chronicle contain expreſly theſe words, Ego Frater Martinus Ordinis Prædicatorum; I Frier Martin, of the Order of the Dominicans. They are alſo to be met with in the prologue of the alphabetical index to the decrees and the decretals, which is commonly called Martiniani, and of which Martinus Polonus is reckoned to be the Author (11).

[B] . . . . We meet there with the hiſtory of Pope Joan; and yet ſome learned men do not think that paſſage was wrote by Polonus.] This is a controverſy, which men never fail to touch upon, whenever they write for or againſt the hiſtory of Pope Joan: but there will always be ſome difficulties remaining, as long as no perſon is able to produce the very original of Polonus. The Manuſcript copies, in which Pope Joan is mentioned, and thoſe in which ſhe is not mentioned, are not proper to determine the queſtion poſitively and to a demonſtration: for if one urges that Pope Joan's ſtory has been omitted in thoſe manuſcripts, in which it is wanting, another replies it has been foiſted in thoſe manuſcripts, in which it is found. Each of theſe two anſwers has ſome probability, and is ſupported by ſome arguments. The prejudices of the heart are more capable to determine a man, than the knowledge of the mind. It muſt nevertheleſs be owned, that there are ſome Roman Catholicks, who aſcribe that paſſage to our Martin, and that all the Proteſtants do not aſcribe it to him. Dr. Cave, an Engliſh Divine, aſſerts, that the ſtory of Pope Joan has been foiſted into Polonus's Chronicle, by another hand. Let us tranſcribe his whole paſſage; you will ſee that he explodes as a mere fable, all that relates to Pope Joan, and that ſome very good manuſcripts do not mention her in the leaſt. Nihil illud (Chronicon Martini Poloni) magis famoſum reddidit, quàm decantatiſſima illa de Joanna Papiſſa, ſeu fabula, ſeu narratiuncula. Sanè fabulam eſſe, & Martini Chronico intruſam nullus dubito, præſertim cùm in pleriſque vetuſtis Codicibus MSS. deſideretur. In IV Codicibus MSS. Bibliothecæ Cæſareæ deſiderari, in totidem etiam reperiri ingenuè fatetur Cl. Lambecius *. Deerat etiam in antiquiſſimo Codice, quem Bibliothecæ Vaticanæ donavit Urbanus VIII cujus meminit Leo Allatius Confut. fab. de Joan. Pap. num. 7. ut alios taceam; certè Martini Chronicon non unam interpolationem paſſum eſſe eruditi dudum obſervarunt. Editum eſt hoc Chronicon Baſil. 1559. deinde cum notis Petri Suffridi, Antverp. 1574. in 8. Denique è vetuſtiſſimo MS. & ipſi Scriptori, uti ferunt, penè coætaneo, ſumma fide & diligentia expreſſum, in lucem emiſit Joannes Fabricius Cæſar, Monachus Præmonſtratenſis, Colon. 1616. fol. in qua editione Hiſtoria de Joanna Papiſſa non comparet (12). i. e. "Nothing "has made that Chronicle (of Martin Polonus) more "famous than the moſt celebrated fable or ſtory of "Pope Joan. I am perſuaded it is nothing but a fa-"ble, which has been foiſted into Martin's Chronicle, "eſpecially becauſe it is wanting in the moſt antient "manuſcripts. Lambecius confeſſes ingenuouſly, that "as it is not to be met with in four manuſcripts of "the Emperor's library, ſo it is to be found in four "others. It is alſo wanting in a moſt antient copy, "which Pope Urban VIII. lodged in the library of "the Vatican, and which Les Allatius mentions, in "his Refutation of the ſtory of Pope Joan, num. 7. not "to mention other manuſcripts in which it is alſo "wanting: and indeed, the learned have obſerved "long ago, that there are ſeveral interpolations in "Martin's Chronicle. It was printed at Baſil in "1559, and then at Antwerp 1574 in 8vo, with Peter "Suffridi's notes. And at laſt at Cologne 1616, fo-"lio, from a very antient manuſcript, almoſt of the "ſame time with the Author himſelf, as they ſay; "it was publiſhed with the utmoſt fidelity and care "by John Fabricius Cæſar, a Monk of the Order of "St. Auguſtin: the hiſtory of Pope Joan is not to be "found in that edition." Monſieur du Pin is one of thoſe, who think that the ſtory of Pope Joan is an addition made to Polonus's Chronicle (13).

However, it is certain, that the Proteſtants have not inſerted that addition; it is to be met with in ſome manuſcripts which have been written long before Luther was mentioned; for Antoninus Biſhop of Florence, and Platina, who lived in the 15th century, have related the ſtory of Pope Joan, quoting Martin for it: there are ſome Authors of the 14th century, who have quoted Martin *(13) for the ſame particular. It was therefore a notorious temerity, and a profound ignorance in Florimond de Remond, who charged Herold with having added that ſtory to the edition of Polonus's Chronicle (14): he means the edition of Baſil publiſhed by the care of John Heroldus

(2) Coccius in Catalogo Scriptorum quem ſuo Theſauro præmiſit. Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. p. m. 485.

(3) Cl. Joannis Fabricii Cæſaris, Canonici Gladbachenſis, Idem, ibidem.

(4) Lambecius, lib. 2. Bibliotb. Vindobon. apud Sandium, Notis in Voſſium de Hiſt. Lat. p. 175, 176.

(5) There is in Voſſius 1251, which is a miſtake either of the Author or of the Printers. Neither F. Labbe, nor Sandius, have taken notice of that miſtake.

(6) Lambecius, lib. 2. Bibliotb. Vindobon. apud Sandium, Notis in Voſſium de Hiſt. Lat. p. 176.

(7) F. Labbe, in Addendis ad Tom. 2. de Script. Eccleſ. p. 759.

(8) Blondel, in his Latin treatiſe on Pope Joan, p. m. 6. obſerves, that in his French treatiſe, p. 17. he aſſerts that Martin Polonus died about the year 1270.

(9) Conringius, Animadv. in Bullam Innocentii X. p. m. 329.

(10) In Italia Sacra, in Catalogo Archiepiſcoporum Conſentinor. See Sandius in Voſſium de Hiſt. Lat. p. 174.

(11) See Sandius, ibidem.

(12) Cave, de Script. Eccleſ. Tom. 1. p. 739, 740. edit. Lond. 1688.

(13) Du Pin, Biblioth. Tom. 10. p. m. 82.

*(13) See Spanheim, de Papa fœmina, p. 165, and Mareſius in Examine de Papa fœmina, p. 22.

(14) Florimond de Remond, l'Anti-Papeſſe, chap. 2. num. 5. folio m. 367. See alſo Father Oudin, in Supplem. de Script. Eccleſ. p. 550.

* Comment. Bib. Vindob. lib. 2. cap. 8. p. 869.

(c) See the rem. [C].

he is the first who wrote any thing concerning that story (c). He has been blamed as Heroldus, in the year 1559, and which contains the Chronicles of Marianus and of our Martin. These two Chronicles had never been printed before. Monsieur Maimbourg would have been guilty of the same blunder, if we were to give credit to Monsieur Jurieu. " It is proper to observe, that the Sieur Maim- " bourg exposes himself to be soundly ridiculed, " when he charges us with contriving that monstrous " story, and with inserting it into the Chronicles of " the Monks Marianus Scotus, Sygebertus, and Martin " the Polander †. There never was a more rash and " inconsiderate assertion. There are still copies of " those Authors to be seen, in which that story is " told, and which were printed above twenty years " before Luther was mentioned. All the antient " manuscripts agree in this; and though it were " true that it is not to be found in two or three co- " pies, as the Sieur Maimbourg asserts, it would be " more probable that these few manuscripts were " corrected by those who were offended at that story, " and thought it odious (15)." In order to form a true judgment of that censure, it must be known what expressions Monsieur Maimbourg used. The fable of Pope Joan, says he (16), was never true but in the person of that Pope John (17). For as he acted with so much weakness, and suffered himself to be so wretchedly imposed upon by an half-man (18), who was more cunning than he, he was called a woman, and Pope Joan, by a most cutting raillery, much like those Pasquins, which through the insolent freedom of slanderers, are pretty often posted up at Rome against the Popes, for much slighter reasons. But some time after, in those most dark and ignorant ages, that raillery was taken for a truth, and simple persons imagined that a woman disguised in the habit of a man, had, by surprise, been raised to St. Peter's throne. However, neither the time nor the circumstance of such an odd and improbable story was yet mentioned; till in the latter ages, some more rash Writers, and afterwards the Hereticks, with a design to abuse the Church of Rome, having often differed upon that subject, some placing the story in one time, some in another, agreed at last, for the most part, to place it between Leo X. and Benedict III. It is even very probable that they themselves invented that monstrous fable, and foisted it into the Chronicles of Marianus Scotus, Sigebertus, and Martin the Polander. For there is no hint of it in the most antient manuscripts and copies of these three Authors, except perhaps in those of the first.

† Hist. du Schisme des Grecs, an. 881.

(15) Jurieu, Apologie pour la Reformation, Tom. 2. p. 38, 39. edit. in 4to.

(16) Maimbourg, Hist. du Schisme des Grecs. lib. 2. p. 198. of the 1st vol. Dutch edition.

(17) That is to say, John VIII.

(18) That is to say, Photius, Patriarch of Constantinople, who was an Eunuch.

If you compare this Author's words with those of his Censurer, you will find that Monsieur Jurieu did by no means pretend to these two qualities, which are requisite in a good Censurer, I mean equity and accuracy. These two qualities require that a man should put upon the expressions, he designs to censure, the sense which they necessarily imply. Now Monsieur Maimbourg's expressions do not necessarily signify, that the Hereticks invented the story of Pope Joan, and foisted it into the Chronicles of Marianus, Sigebertus, and Martin the Polander. That Author had just been mentioning two sorts of Writers, some Catholicks, and the other Hereticks. He might therefore mean that the former invented and inserted that story; why then is he censured as though he meant only the latter? This is not the only blunder of Mr. Jurieu: he pretends that there are copies of Marianus Scotus, Sigebertus, and Martin the Polander, printed above twenty years before Luther was ever mentioned. This is a piece of ignorance. Marianus Scotus, and Martin Polonus, were not printed before the year 1559; and there is no edition of Sigebertus mentioned, which is more antient than that of Paris 1513. It is not true that all the antient manuscripts agree (19), nor that Maimbourg asserts, that the story is extant only in two or three copies. We have seen, that without determining any number, he says in general, the most antient manuscripts.

(19) See the rem. [B] of the art. POPE JOAN.

If this Censurer had had a less superficial knowledge of the books, which have been published on both sides in this controversy, he would not have dared to assert that pretended agreement between all the antient manuscripts. There is nothing more false than that agreement; read only with regard to Marianus and Sigebertus, the remarks [B] and [C] of the article POPE JOAN, and with regard to Polonus what I have quoted from Dr. Cave (20), and what I am going to add. " Josias Simbler (21), Minister at " Zurich, who has made additions to Conrad Ges- " ner's Bibliotheque, confesses that he has read four " copies of this Martinus, which are still to be seen at " this day in the library of Dresserus (22), quite dif- " ferent from one another, some larger, or contain- " ing more than the others. I have an old one " which does not agree with that of Suffridus Petrus " Leovadiensis (23) Frisius has printed in the year " 1573, who confesses that he had collected with a great " deal of care from several places, the antient copies " he could meet with, in order to correct the gross " blunders and errors, which through the ignorance " or malice of some men, were crept into that Au- " thor's Chronicle. I cannot sufficiently wonder, " says he, how so many things could get into that " Martinus's work, such as it is in the first edition, " which things are wanting in the manuscripts, and " which Martinus never thought of, much less " would he have wrote them down. And if they " had dropt from his pen, he would have betrayed " every where his ignorance, and want of sense (24)." Here follows what we read in an English Writer, who was a strenuous assertor of the history of Pope Joan. Doctor Bristow * . . . . . relates, that some years ago, a certain Protestant, (who is reckoned to be an eminent Historian) shewed a manuscript of that same book of Martinus, written in a very good letter, desiring that they would point out to him the passage where that story is told; but it was not in the text, but only in the margin, and written by another hand; which having seen, he said, I see now that that Author also foils you (25). The English Writer will not allow that authority; he asserts, that it is impossible to shew any one copy of Polonus's work, either printed or manuscript, where the history of Pope Joan is wanting (26). And yet here follows what Dr. Burnet (27) observes. I do not believe the story of Pope Joan, having seen in England, with my own eyes, a manuscript of Martinus Polonus, one of the most ancient Authors who are used to be quoted upon that subject, which manuscript seems to have been wrote soon after the Author's death, and in which that story is, not in the text, but only in the margin, where it is even writ by a different hand from that of the text (28). Who could question but that manuscript is the same, which Dr. Bristow mentions? Spanheim (29) quotes John Chiflet, who mentions an old Manuscript of Martin Polonus, in which there is not a word of Pope Joan. The manuscripts of that Chronicle, which are lodged in the library of Leyden, differ very much from that (30), since they have the same particulars concerning Pope Joan, which are in the printed copies (31). They are also to be found in a manuscript, which a Monk who turned Protestant shewed to a Professor of Groningen. Nec diu est quod meis oculis usurpavi vetustissimum Martini codicem in charta pergamena scriptum, quam secum Coloniâ detulit R. V. D. Micaël Ruckertius olim Philosophiæ Lector inter Recollectos Colonienses, nunc Dei gratiâ Verbi Divini fidelis dispensator in Oostfrisia, in quo extabat hæc eadem narratio (32). i. e. " It is not long since I saw with " my own eyes, a most antient manuscript of Martin's " Chronicle, written on parchment, which the Re- " verend Michael Ruckertius, formerly Reader of " Philosophy among the Recollects of Cologne, and " now a Minister of the Gospel in East-friesland, " had brought with him from Cologne; that manu- " script has the history of Pope Joan." It is therefore certain, that all the antient manuscripts do not agree.

(20) Above, quotation (12).

(21) It should be Simler.

(22) Simler's words are, ejusdem (Martini Poloni) exemplaria quatuor copiosiora multo quam expressum extant in Bibl. Dresseri. Florimond has not translated them faithfully.

(23) He should have said Suffridus Petri Leovardiensis.

(24) Florimond de Remond, l'Anti-Papesse, chap. 2. num. 6. fol. 367 verso.

* In his answer to Dr. Fulke, chap. 10. qu. 54. p. 373.

(25) Cooke, de la Papesse, p. 61, 62.

(26) Ibidem, p. 61.

(27) Now Bishop of Salisbury. That is to say, when Mr. Bayle was writing this.

(28) Burnet, Voyage, p. m. 300.

(29) Spanheim, de Papa fœmina, p. 60, 61.

(30) Idem, ibid. p. 66, 67.

(31) Ibid.

(32) Sam. Maresius, in Exam. p. 22. edit. Gron. 1658.

Let us make some reflections on that diversity, and trace the origin of it. I begin with two propositions. 1. To shew that the History of Pope Joan is to be found in very antient manuscripts of Polonus's Chronicle, is no proof of his mentioning it. 2. To shew that that story is not to be found in very antient manuscripts, does not prove that he did not mention it. The truth of these two propositions appears from this, namely, that some pieces may possibly have been added to, or blotted out of an Author's works soon after his death. Additions and subtractions are two methods equally frequent of corrupting manuscripts, as appears from an hundred instances.

SOME CONSIDERATIONS on the cause of the difference there is between several manuscripts.

So that, as long as the original of Polonus is not produced, there will be no means of diſcovering with any certainty whether the difference there is between the manuſcript copies of his Chronicle be owing to an addition or an omiſſion.

It is by no means probable, will the Proteſtants ſay, that the Hiſtory of Pope Joan was foiſted into the manuſcript, and it is very probable that it was afterwards left out: for it is a ſcandalous ſtory, which loads the Papal See with ſhame. And therefore, as they who tranſcribe manuſcripts, were concerned for the honour of the Popes, they found it their intereſt to ſuppreſs that ſtory, and by no means to add it to the work. This diſcourſe has ſome probability; but it proves too much, and makes it difficult to anſwer this queſtion, how came the Hiſtory of Pope Joan to be left out in ſo many manuſcripts? Where was the zeal of Tranſcribers? How can that contradiction in their conduct be accounted for? Here is another difficulty. You pretend that Anaſtaſius the Librarian, that Marianus Scotus, that Sigebertus, that Martin Polonus, &c. have publiſhed that ſcandalous ſtory: and yet they were very good Papiſts; they were Prieſts or Monks, entirely devoted to the Church of Rome. Why ſhould they have leſs zeal than their Tranſcribers? Or why ſhould their Tranſcribers have been more ſcrupulous than they had been? Were not moſt of the Writers, who have told the ſtory of Pope Joan, very much addicted to the Catholick Religion? Can a man be more zealous for it than St. Antoninus was, who yet has inſerted it into his work? Here is another difficulty. That tradition was ſo well eſtabliſhed, that no man oppoſed it. Antoninus, who was contemporary with Luther, is the firſt who exploded it as a mere fable. The Council of Conſtance did not cenſure John Hus for alledging the fact (33), which proves evidently, that the fathers of that Council did not queſtion but a woman had been Pope. It follows from thence that the Roman Catholicks uſed themſelves to conſider that accident, as a thing which was by no means prejudicial to their Religion. What could then give riſe to the ſcruples, which determined ſome Tranſcribers to omit that paſſage in the manuſcript of Polonus's Chronicle? If the Church of Rome had been tired with outrages and objections upon that ſubject, as happened ſince the Reformation, it would be much eaſier to underſtand that the zealots for Popery laboured to ſuppreſs thoſe Writings, in which Pope Joan was mentioned; nay, in ſuch a caſe, they had been obliged to ſay that the fact is not true, or at leaſt that it is very doubtful. But we do not find that the Sectaries inſiſted on that article. Ockam in the 14th Century (34), and the Huſſites in the 15th (35), urged that fact as a proof that the Church can err. Æneas Sylvius anſwered, that the ſtory of Pope Joan is not certain, and that there would be no error, de jure, or of right, in the caſe. That objection made but little noiſe in thoſe times, and induced no man to take a reſolution to maintain the negative, and to trace the ſtory of Pope Joan up to its origin, in order to deſtroy the foundations of it. What could then occaſion the conſpiracy of the Tranſcribers, againſt the pages where the Chronologers had wrote that Hiſtory? Laſtly, and this is my laſt difficulty; what could have blinded them ſo as to make them ſpare ſo many other hiſtories, much more ſcandalous and diſgraceful than that, to exert all their zeal againſt that only? Have they not left in thoſe manuſcripts, and in an infinite number of others, the Hiſtories of Popes who were illegally choſen, Schiſmatical, Simoniacs, Adulterers, Magicians, &c. I do not give this for demonſtrative arguments: I would not aſſert, that never was any perſon whatſoever, who caſtrated ſome manuſcripts, in order to conceal the diſgraceful Hiſtory of a woman-Pope: I pretend only to oppoſe probable arguments, to probable arguments, and thereby to warn the readers that they ought not to be too poſitive with regard to the cauſe (36) why, according to ſo many perſons, the ſtory of Pope Joan is wanting in ſeveral eminent manuſcripts of the Chroniclers.

But, will ſome ſay, if Marianus, Sigebertus, Martin Polonus, &c. did not mention the woman-Pope; how comes it that her ſtory is to be found in ſo many antient manuſcripts of their Chronicles? Is there the leaſt probability, that the Monks, who in thoſe ages were the chief proprietors of the manuſcripts, and who did moſtly tranſcribe them, would have diſperſed ſuch a ſtory by foiſting it into books in which it was not originally? Had the Sectaries, as for inſtance the Huſſites, any occaſion to add it to thoſe works? Did they not find that tradition ſufficiently eſtabliſhed? Who denied it? Who oppoſed it? Did the firſt of their antagoniſts (37), who examined the objection they grounded on that ſtory, dare to aſſert poſitively, that the fact was not true? If therefore the addition could come neither from the zealous Papiſts, nor from the Hereticks, we muſt infer from thence, that the manuſcripts in which the woman-Pope is mentioned, agree in that reſpect with the original; and that thoſe, in which ſhe is not mentioned, have been caſtrated of that paſſage. This is an objection, which by its probability is capable to impoſe upon us; but there is nothing in it proper to convince thoſe who want to have good proofs. It ſuppoſes falſely, that no man could inſert the ſtory of Pope Joan in the manuſcripts of Sigebertus, Polonus, &c. without having a deſign to prejudice the Church of Rome. There are ſeveral other reaſons, which might engage the Tranſcribers to foiſt that addition into their copies.

The taſte which prevails at this day of preſerving editions which have additions, before thoſe that have none, has been common in all ages. We ought therefore to think there were always perſons, who choſe rather to have a Sigebertus with the ſtory of the woman-Pope, than a copy, in which that ſtory was wanting: ſo that the Tranſcribers might be ſure, that a copy into which that ſtory was foiſted would ſell better, than a copy in it was not inſerted, and which on account of that omiſſion would be thought caſtrated. And as before the art of printing was invented, the preparing of copies required a great deal of time, and books were very dear, men were ſparing of the time of the Tranſcribers, and of the purſe of the buyers; ſo that for the ſake of many perſons, they endeavoured to make one Chronicle ſerve inſtead of two or three; and with this view inſtead of tranſcribing ſeveral Chronicles, they added to one only what they found moſt remarkable or ſingular in all the reſt. Hence it came perhaps, that the monſtrous ſtory of a woman-Pope being delivered of a child in the midſt of a proceſſion, was added to Anaſtaſius, to Marianus Scotus, and to Sigebertus. It is alſo probable, that a curious man having bought a Sigebertus or a Martinus Polonus, in which he did not find the ſtory of Pope Joan, would add it in the margin, tranſcribing it from ſome other Chronicle; and that copy might ſome years after ſerve as an original to ſome Writer, who tranſcribing it would inſert into the text what he found in the margin (38). Who would dare to deny but there were in thoſe times ſome perſons more deſirous to have a work than provided with money to buy it? What did they do in ſuch a caſe? They borrowed a Chronicle, and tranſcribed it themſelves, and if they did not meet in it with ſome particulars, which other Hiſtorians mentioned, they added them, every one in its proper place, and by that means they made one ſingle manuſcript ſerve for the ſame purpoſes as many would do. Such a manuſcript might paſs from a private man's ſtudy into the great Libraries of ſome Univerſity or Monaſtery, or ſerve as an original for Tranſcribers before the invention of printing.

Thus you ſee we have made ſome ſuppoſitions, which are all probable, and from which it appears that though Sigebertus and Polonus had not related the ſtory of Pope Joan, yet we might find it in ſome antient manuſcript of their Chronicles, nor could we ſuſpect that the Authors of the addition had any wicked deſign againſt the Holy See. By theſe obſervations it appears, that there is nothing more natural than the difference which is ſaid to be between the old manuſcripts: ſome of them were faithfully tranſcribed from the original, either immediately or mediately; in theſe the ſtory of the woman-Pope is wanting: the others were tranſcribed from ſome copies, which had been adorned with the addition of that fable.

What we have related elſewhere (39) concerning the manuſcripts of Athanaſius, and what Onuphrius (40), and Dr. Burnet (41) declares, leaves us no room to doubt but ſeveral things were written in the margin of ſome copies, which the Authors of them had not mentioned.

One may make a particular obſervation concerning the

(33) See Monſieur de Launoi, epiſt. 8. part. 4. p. m. 355.

(34) See Mareſius, in Examine, p. 22.

(35) See Launoi, epiſt. 8. lib. 4. p. 355.

(36) That cauſe is, that out of the zeal for Popery, men omitted the ſtory of Pope Joan.

(37) Æneas Silvius. See the rem. [E], of the article POPE JOAN.

(38) Compare this with what I obſerve in the rem. [B] of the art. POPE JOAN.

(39) In the rem. [A] of the art. POPE JOAN.

(40) See the rem. [A] of the ſame article.

(41) Above, quotation (28).

the difference there is between the ſeveral manuſcripts of Martin Polonus's Chronicle. We have ſeen above that he gave ſeveral editions of it; and we may be certain, that he did not only add a continuation to his work in every new edition of it, but that he alſo reviſed and corrected the whole, making alterations and additions. Some manuſcripts of theſe different editions being preſerved (42), ſome muſt of courſe be larger than the others, and we muſt meet here and there with divers particulars, which are wanting in the others. Such a difference would unavoidably be obſerved in the manuſcripts, though the Tranſcribers had been never ſo careful and honeſt. It muſt not therefore be pretended, generally ſpeaking, thoſe manuſcripts, which want ſome particulars that are to be found in others, were unfairly tranſcribed: for beſides the reaſon I have already mentioned, here follows a conjecture which is very probable. All they who tranſcribed Martin Polonus's Chronicle did not do it with a deſign to ſell copies of it. A man might tranſcribe it for his own private uſe; if he were not rich, he would chooſe to take that trouble rather than ſpend money to buy the book. Such a man might mind the things rather than the expreſſions; and to have ſooner done he may have omitted what ſeemed uſeleſs to him, abridged ſome Phraſes, and put his own expreſſions inſtead of thoſe of the original. A man writes much faſter, when he furniſhes himſelf his expreſſions, than when he tranſcribes another's: for the neceſſity of ſtopping every moment, to caſt your eyes on a manuſcript, makes you loſe a great deal of time, and you gain a great deal, if you only write down your own thoughts. A Tranſcriber, who takes the ſenſe of an whole period, and expreſſes it according to his own particular taſte, will finiſh in one day, what would require two if he followed a manuſcript word for word. Suppoſe that ſuch a copy of Martin Polonus was afterwards tranſcribed, we underſtand eaſily that the copies of the Chronicle will differ from each other, and that the difference will not be owing to any ill deſign, nor to any piece of knavery. Thoſe, who make large collections, and tranſcribe whole pages of a book into their Common-places, will eaſily grant what I ſuppoſe here; they will remember that to have ſooner done, they have not tranſcribed word for word, they have omitted, they have altered many words. Even the Authors who quote long paſſages take often that liberty to leſſen the tireſome fatigue of tranſcribing (43). There is ſometimes a little artifice in this, but not always. What ſhall I ſay of ſo many omiſſions, which Tranſcribers make without being aware of them, eſpecially when two periods not far diſtant from each other begin with the ſame word? They read their copy over with ſome attention, but they too often ſave themſelves the trouble of comparing their tranſcript line after line with the original; and unleſs the omiſſions plainly and in a groſs manner ſpoil the ſenſe, or break the connexion, they imagine that all is well. Now it is certain, that there are ſome periods or half periods, which being left out of a book, do not ſo ſpoil the ſenſe but that there may ſtill remain a tolerable meaning.

Let us infer thence that the difference between manuſcripts is not always owing to a diſhoneſt deſign: ſeveral innocent cauſes may concur to produce that difference, though I muſt confeſs that there has often been ſome fraud at the bottom. See what Spanheim obſerves concerning the manuſcripts of Sigebertus. Collato eo codice (Bibliothecæ Leidenſis) cum aliis, ac præcipuè cum iis quibus uſus eſt Aubertus Miræus, Gemblacenſi, Lipſiano, &c. patet non pauca addita, mutata, detracta, quædam etiam paſſim in noſtro deſiderari ex eo genere quæ Romæ inviſa, & quæ Baronius exagitat in Sigeberto (44). i. e. "By comparing the manuſcript "of the Library at Leyden, with others, and eſpe- "cially with thoſe which Aubert le Mire uſed, with "that of the Abby of Gemblours, with that of Leip- "ſic, &c. it appears that many things have been "altered, added, omitted, and that there are ſome "things wanting in ours, but things which are odi- "ous to Rome, and for which Baronius is angry "with Sigebertus." You ſee that among thoſe things, in which the copies differ, he places additions and omiſſions, and that ſome of thoſe omiſſions relate to ſuch particulars, as the Court of Rome diſlikes, and which betray a writer too partial in favour of thoſe Emperors, who had quarrels with the Popes. There is room to think that ſuch particulars have been omitted by an unfair deſign, by ſome Tranſcribers prepoſſeſſed in favour of a party. But we ought not to judge thus with regard to thoſe additions, omiſſions, or alterations, which have no manner of connexion with ſchiſms, or diſputes. We muſt judge of this as we do of the mutilations or corruptions of the manuſcripts of the antient Heathens. There are in ſome manuſcripts of Cicero or of Livy ſome things, which are wanting in other manuſcripts; no intereſt, no prejudice, no paſſion could make a Tranſcriber omit them: his only crime is that he was lazy or ignorant, &c.

